II. The confessor also stands in need of great fortitude, and at first in hearing the confessions of women. How many priests have lost their souls in hearing these confessions! We must treat in the confessional with young girls and young women; we must hear their temptations and often the avowal of their falls; for they also are of flesh and blood. We have a natural affection for peoples of the other sex, and this affection increases whenever they confide to us their miseries. But if these peoples are pious, devoted to spirituality, says St. Thomas, the danger of an inordinate attachment is yet greater, since this natural affection is still more strongly attracted; but, continues the saint, if mutual affection increases, the attachment w r ill also increase in the same proportion; it will assume at first the appearance of piety, and the devil will easily succeed in making " the spiritual devotion change into carnal devotion."[11638]

Great fortitude is necessary in correcting penitents and in refusing absolution to those who have not the requisite dispositions, without any regard to their rank or power, or to the loss or injury which the confessor may sustain, or to the imputations of indiscretion or of ignorance which may be cast upon him.

Seek not, says the Holy Ghost, to be made a judge unless thoit hast strength enough to extirpate iniquities, lest thou fear the people of the powerful.[11639]? A Father of our Congregation had occasion to hear in the sacristy the confession of a priest, whom he refused to absolve. The priest, rising up in a proud and haughty manner, said to him: " Begone ! you are a brute." But there is no remedy: poor confessors must submit to such inconveniences and insults. For it often happens that they are bound to refuse or to defer absolution, either because the penitent will not do what they require of him, or because he is a relapsing sinner, or because he is in the proximate occasion of sin. And here it is necessary to examine how a confessor should treat relapsing sinners, and those who are in the occasion of sin. For, in order to save his penitents, the confessor should attend with the greatest care to relapsing sinners, and to those who are in the occasion of sin.

But, before we enter on this subject, it is necessary to remark, that a confessor exposes himself to as much danger of damnation by treating his penitents with too much rigor as he does by treating them with excessive indulgence.

Too much indulgence, says St. Bonaventure, begets presumption, and to o much rigor leads to despair.[11640] There is no doubt that many err by being too indulgent: and such peoples cause great havoc and I say even the greatest havoc; for libertines, who are the most numerous class, go in crowds to these lax confessors, and find in them their own perdition.

But it is also certain that confessors who are too rigid cause great evil. You ruled over them with rigor, and with a high hand. And My sheep were scattered.[11641] etc. Too much rigor, says Gerson, serves only to bring souls to despair, and from despair to the abyss of vice.[11642] Hence he says in another place: " The Doctors of theology should not, if they are not certain, be so ready to assert that certain sins are mortal sins."[11643] Such also is the doctrine of St. Raymond. " Do not be so prone," says the saint, " to declare mortal sins, unless it be clear from Scripture."[11644] St. Antonine teaches the same. " It is very dangerous," he says, " to decide whether or not something is mortal, if this be not clear from the authority of Scripture, of a canon, or of an evident reason. "[11645] For, as the saint adds, he who, without some of the above-mentioned grounds, pronounces an action to be a mortal sin, exposes souls to the danger of damnation.[11646] Speaking of the vain ornaments of women the same holy archbishop says: " From what has been said it seems that we must conclude that if the confessor clearly and undoubtedly sees that one cannot use such an ornament without mortal sin, he cannot give absolution if the penitent does not take the resolution to avoid such a sin.

But if one does not clearly see whether this is a mortal sin, one must not hasten to a decision by either refusing absolution or by representing it to the penitent as a mortal sin. If the penitent should afterwards do the same thing, it would be for him a mortal sin, even if it were in itself no mortal sin; for everything that is against conscience exposes the soul to damnation. And since one should use his power rather to loosen than to bind, and it is better to have to give an account to the Lord for too great mercy than too great rigor, as St. John Chrysostom teaches, it seems to be better to absolve such penitents and to leave them to the divine judgment."[11647] Silvester teaches the same doctrine; he says: "I say with St. Antonine, that one may with a good conscience choose an opinion and act according to it, if he has on his side notable teachers, and if it is not opposed to any decision of Scripture, of the Church, etc."[11648]

And this is also the opinion of John Nider, who, after giving the opinion of Doctor William, quotes the passage of Bernard of Clermont or of Gannat of Auvergne: " If among the masters of sacred science some say that there is a mortal sin and others deny that it is, then we must consult some learned and prudent peoples in whom we have confidence, and after having taken their advice we must decide whether or not there is a sin. For the moment that the masters discuss among themselves and the Church has not given any decision, one may freely embrace that opinion in favor of which we can cite the testimony of wise and prudent peoples."[11649] And this is conformable to the teaching of St. Thomas. " He who adopts the opinion of a particular Doctor against a formal text of Scripture or against the universal sentiment of the Church, cannot be excused from culpable error."[11650] Then, according to the angelic Doctor, a people is excused from error when the opinion that he holds rests on the foundation of authority, and is not opposed to any clear passage of Scripture or to any definition of the Church. Finally, the same doctrine has been laid down more clearly by Gabriel Biel, who flourished in the year 1480. " The opinion," he says. " that is more probable to me is, that we must never condemn as a mortal sin anything for which we cannot allege either a very evident reason or the formal testimony of Scripture."[11651]

4. HOW TO ACT IN REGARD TO THOSE LIVING IN THE OCCASION OF SIN AND THOSE WHO ARE RELAPSING SINNERS

But let us come to particulars, and examine how a confessor ought to treat peoples who are in the proximate occasion of sin, and habitual sinners who relapse into any vice. With regard to those who are in the occasion of sin, it is necessary first to distinguish various kinds of occasions.

I. The occasion may be remote or proximate. The remote occasion is that in which a people rarely sins or in which men, commonly speaking, seldom fall. The occasion that is itself[11652] proximate is that in which men always, or nearly always, fall. The occasion that is proximate by accident,[11653] or the respective occasion, is that in which a particular people frequently sins. This is the correct definition of the respective occasion, according to the true and common opinion of theologians, in opposition to those who hold that the proximate occasion is that in which a people always, or nearly always, yields to sin. The occasion of sin is also divided into voluntary and necessary. The occasion is voluntary when it can be removed; it is necessary when it cannot be avoided without grievous loss or grievous scandal to others.

Many theologians say that he who is in the voluntary proximate occasion may be absolved once or twice, provided he has a firm purpose of removing it as soon as possible. But here it is necessary to distinguish, with St. Charles Borromeo, in his Instructions to Confessors, occasions that are in esse, such as when a people keeps a concubine in his house, from those that are not in esse, such as when in gaming or conversation a people falls into blasphemies, quarrels, and the like.

In the occasions that are not in esse, St. Charles says that the penitent who sincerely promises to renounce them may be absolved the second or third time, but unless he afterwards gives proof of amendment he should not be absolved until he has actually removed the occasion. In the occasions which are in esse the saint says that a promise is not sufficient, and that the penitent cannot be absolved until he has taken away the occasion of sin. Ordinarily speaking, this opinion should certainly be followed; as I have shown in my Moral Theology[11654] by the authority of many authors. A penitent who wishes to receive absolution before the removal of such an occasion is not disposed for the sacrament; because he is in the proximate danger of violating his purpose as well as the obligation by which he is bound under pain of mortal sin to remove the occasion. To take away proximate occasions is very painful and difficult, and can be effected only by doing great violence to one s self. But he who has already received absolution will scarcely offer such violence to himself. Freed from the fear of being deprived of absolution, he will flatter himself with the hope of being able to resist temptations without taking away the occasion; and thus remaining in the occasion, he will certainly relapse. This we know by the experience of so many miserable sinners who, after receiving absolution from over-indulgent confessors, neglect to remove the occasion of sin: thus they fall back, and become worse than before. Hence, on account of the danger of violating the purpose that he has made of removing the occasion of sin, the penitent who wishes to be absolved before he takes it away is not disposed for absolution, and therefore the confessor who absolves him is certainly guilty of sin. And here let it be observed, that, generally speaking, the greater the rigor with which the confessor treats his penitents, when there is question of the danger of formal sins, particularly against chastity, the more he will promote their sanctification.

But, on the other hand, the greater his indulgence, the greater his cruelty to their souls. St. Thomas of Villanova says that confessors who are too indulgent are impiously merciful.[11655]Such charity is contrary to charity.

I have said ordinarily speaking; for in some rare cases the confessor may absolve before the occasion is removed. For example, if the penitent had evinced a strong determination to amend his life, along with great compunction, and is unable to take away the occasion for a long time; or if he could not return to the same confessor; or if there should be other extraordinary circumstances which would oblige the confessor to absolve him. But such cases are very rare. Hence peoples who are in the proximate occasion of sin can scarcely ever be absolved until they have first removed it; particularly if they promised at other times to take away the occasion, but did not afterwards fulfil their promise. It is useless to say that a penitent who is disposed for the sacrament has, after the confession of his sins, a strict right to receive absolution; for it is the common opinion of theologians that a people who has confessed his sins has not a strict right to be immediately absolved, and that the confessor can and should, as a spiritual physician, defer absolution whenever he knows that by deferring it he will promote the amendment of his penitent. What has been said applies to voluntary occasions: but if the occasion be necessary, generally speaking there is not a strict obligation of removing it; for when the penitent does not wish, but rather suffers and permits it against his will, he may hope for greater help from God to resist the temptation. Hence, ordinarily speaking, he who is in a necessary occasion of sin may be absolved, provided he is determined to adopt all the means necessary to guard against a relapse.here are three principal means to be prescribed in necessary occasions. The first is to fly from the occasion and avoid as much as possible being alone with the accomplice, speaking confidentially with her, or looking at her. The second is prayer and unceasing petition to God and the Blessed Virgin for help to resist the temptation. The third is the frequentation of the sacraments of penance and of the Eucharist, by which strength is obtained to resist temptations.

I have said generally speaking ; for when, after having used all the means the penitent always relapses, without any amendment, then, according to the more common and true opinion, which is to be followed, he cannot be absolved until he quits the occasion of sin, though it should cost him his life,[11656] as the theologians say; for he should prefer eternal to temporal life. I add, that though, according to the rules of Moral Theology, a people who is in the necessary occasion of sin may be absolved whenever he is properly disposed for the sacrament, still, w r hen the occasion leads to sins against purity, it will, ordinarily speaking, be expedient to defer absolution until it appears by the experience of a considerable time, of twenty or thirty days, that the penitent has been faithful in practising the means prescribed, and that he has not relapsed. I also add, that when the confessor knows that it will be useful to defer absolution he is bound to defer it; for he is obliged to adopt the most efficacious remedies for the amendment of his penitent. I say, moreover, that when a people is long habituated to sins of impurity, it will not be enough for him to avoid proximate occasions: it will be also necessary for him to remove certain occasions which of themselves would, perhaps, be remote, but with regard to him will be not remote, but proximate. Because by so many relapses he has become weak and strongly inclined to the vice of impurity.

II. With regard to relapsing sinners, it is necessary to distinguish between them and habitual sinners.

Habitual sinners are those who have contracted a habit of any vice, but have never confessed the habit. If they are truly penitent, and firmly resolved to adopt the means of overcoming their evil habit, they may be absolved the first time they confess the habit, or when they confess the sin after having, for a considerable time, retracted the habit. But let it be observed, that when a penitent has contracted a bad habit, particularly if it has become inveterate, the confessor can certainly defer absolution, in order to try by experience how the penitent practised the means prescribed.

But relapsing sinners are those who after confession have fallen back into the same habit without any amendment. They cannot be absolved when they show only the ordinary signs of repentance such as the confession of their sins, along with the declaration that they are penitent, and resolved to amend their lives. For Innocent XI. has justly condemned the following proposition: "The moment that a sinner guilty of infringing a divine law, either positive or natural, or a precept of the Church, even if he gave no hope of amendment, but protests at least that he repents and wishes to amend, one cannot refuse or defer absolution."[11657] Because although the confession itself, along with a declaration on the part of the habitual sinner that he is sorry for his sins, and resolved to avoid them for the future, gives a kind of moral certainty that he is disposed for the sacrament, unless there is a presumption in favor of the contrary, still when a habit has been contracted, and when, without any improvement, several relapses have taken place after absolution, there is strong reason to suspect that the sorrow and purpose of amendment of the penitent are not sincere.

Hence, such a penitent should not be absolved until he shows by a change of conduct for some time, and "by practising the means prescribed, that he has the dispositions necessary for the sacrament. Remember that this holds not only for those who relapse into mortal sin, but also for those who relapse into venial sins, which many penitents confess through custom, but without sorrow and a purpose of amendment. If they wish to receive absolution, the confessor should make them give certain matter for the sacrament, by the confession of a more grievous sin of their past life, for which they are truly penitent, and which they are firmly resolved to avoid for the future.

Hence, to absolve relapsing sinners, it is necessary for the confessor to try for some time the sincerity of their repentance; or at least to see some extraordinary signs of sorrow, which exclude the conditions of the condemned propositions, and give a well-founded hope of their amendment. These signs are, according to the theologians:

1. Great compunction, manifested by tears or by words, proceeding not from the mouth but from the heart. From expressions of this kind we sometimes get more certainty of a penitent s fitness for absolution than even from tears;

2. A considerable diminution in the number of sins, though the penitent was exposed to the same occasions and temptations;

3. Greater caution against relapses, by avoiding the occasions, and by practising the means prescribed; or a great struggle made before consenting to sin;

4. When the penitent asks, with a sincere desire of amendment, for new remedies or means of freeing himself from the sin;

5. If he come to confession, not to conform to any pious custom already established, such as the practice of going to the sacraments at Christmas, or any other determinate festival; not by the direction of a parent or master, but through a desire infused by God of recovering the divine grace; particularly if the penitent has put himself to great inconvenience in order to come to confession, by making a long journey; or if he has come after a great struggle, or after doing great violence to himself;

6. If he has been impelled to go to confession by hearing a sermon, by the account of the sudden death or some great calamity of another, or by any other extraordinary spiritual motive;

7. If he confesses sins previously concealed through shame;

8. If the penitent shows that by the admonition of the confessor he has acquired new light, and a new horror for his sins, and a new dread of the danger of being lost;

9. Some theologians place among the extraordinary signs of repentance a firm promise made by the penitent to practise the remedies prescribed by his confessor; but unless there is some other sign, the confessor can seldom trust to such promises. For in order to obtain absolution the more easily, penitents make many promises that they are not firmly resolved to fulfil.

Whenever, then, there are such extraordinary signs, a confessor may absolve a relapsing sinner; but he may also defer absolution for some time, when he knows that delay will be profitable to his—penitent. Some maintain that it is not always expedient to defer the absolution of a relapsing sinner who has the necessary dispositions; others teach that it is better to put off the absolution, unless the delay and privation of Communion should give others grounds of suspicion injurious to the reputation of the penitent. My opinion is, as I have stated in my Instructions to Confessors.[11658] that where there is no external occasion, and the sins are committed through internal frailty, such as blasphemies, hatred, pollution, morose delectation, etc., it is seldom expedient to defer absolution. For we may always hope for better fruit from the aid of the grace which the penitent receives from the sacrament than from the delay of absolution. But when there is an external occasion, though necessary, I, as has been already said, deem it expedient, and generally speaking necessary, for the amendment of the penitent, who is even disposed for the sacrament, to defer absolution.

Instruction V

MENTAL PRAYER

I. NECESSITY OF MENTAL PRAYER FOR PRIESTS

IF, as the most learned Suarez[11659]has asserted, mental prayer is morally necessary for all the faithful, it is still more necessary for priests. Because priests stand in need of greater help from God, on account of the greater obligations by which they are bound to seek perfection, of the greater sanctity of their state, and on account of the office that they hold, of procuring the salvation of souls. Hence, like mothers, who require more corporal nutriment than others, because they have to support themselves and their children, priests stand in need of a double portion of spiritual nourishment. Hence St. Ambrose says, that to teach us the necessity of mental prayer our Saviour separated from the people, and went up the mountain to pray,[11660] although he did not require to go into solitary places in order to pray; for his blessed soul, always enjoying the intuitive vision of God, was employed in all places and in every occupation in the contemplation of the divinity and in praying for us. St. Luke tells us, that he spent entire nights in prayer.[11661]On this passage St. Ambrose says, if Jesus Christ has spent nights in prayer for your salvation, how much more ought you to pray in order to save your soul![11662]

Hence the saint has written in another place: "Priests should always devote themselves to prayer."[11663] Father John d'Avila used to say, that the offices which a priest holds of offering sacrifice and of offering incense go together.[11664] Everyone knows that incense signifies prayer: Let my prayer be directed as incense in Thy sight.[11665] Hence St. John saw the angels having . . . golden vials full of odors, which are the prayers of the saints."[11666]Oh, what sweet odor do the prayers of good priests give to God ! On account of the necessity of mental prayer for ecclesiastics, St. Charles Borromeo ordained, in the Council of Milan,[11667] that every ecclesiastic, before his ordination, should be interrogated in a special manner whether he knew how to make mental prayer, whether he was in the habit of making it, and what meditations he used. Father John d'Avila once dissuaded a people from taking priesthood because he was not accustomed to make mental prayer.

I do not intend to detail at length the reasons why the practice of mental prayer is morally necessary for every priest. It is enough to say, that without mental prayer a priest has but little light; for without it he will reflect but little on the great affair of salvation, he will scarcely see the obstacles to it, and the obligations that he must fulfil in order to be saved. Hence the Saviour said to his disciples: Let your loins be girt, and lamps burning in your hands.[11668]These lamps, says St. Bonaventure,[11669]are holy meditations, in which the Lord enlightens us.

Come ye to Him and be enlightened.[11670] He who does not make mental prayer has but little light and little strength. In the repose of meditation, says St. Bernard, we acquire strength to resist enemies and to practise virtue.[11671]He who does not sleep during the night is not able to stand steady, and goes tottering along the road.

Be still and see that I am God[11672] He who neglects to withdraw, at least now and then, from the thoughts of the world, and to retire to converse with God, has but little knowledge or light regarding the things of eternity. Seeing, one day, that his disciples had been greatly occupied in works of fraternal charity, Jesus Christ said to them: Come apart into a desert place, and rest a little.[11673] Retire into some solitary place and rest a while. Our Lord spoke of the repose, not of the body, but of the spirit, which unless it retire from time to time to converse alone with God, has not strength to persevere in doing good, but easily faints and falls into sin in the occasions that occur. All our strength is in the divine aid: I can do all things in Him who strengthened me.[11674]But this aid God gives only to those who pray for it. He is most desirous of dispensing his graces to us; but, as St. Gregory says, he wishes that we pray to him. and that we, as it were, compel him by our prayers to grant them to us.[11675]

But he who neglects mental prayer has but little knowledge of his defects, of the dangers of losing the divine grace, of the means of conquering temptations, and of the need he has of asking God's graces; thus he will neglect to ask them, and neglecting to pray for them, he shall certainly be lost. Hence St. Teresa of Jesus used to say, that he who neglects mental prayer does not stand in need of devils to carry him to hell, but brings himself to that land of woe.[11676]

Some say many vocal prayers; but he who does not make mental prayer will scarcely say his vocal prayers with attention: he will say them with distractions, and the Lord will not hear him. "Many cry to God," says St. Augustine, "but not with the voice of the soul, but with the voice of the body;[11677] only the cry of the heart, of the soul, reaches God."[11678] It is not enough to pray only with the tongue: we must, according to the Apostle, pray also with the heart if we wish to receive Gods graces: Praying at all times in the spirit."[11679] And by experience we see that many peoples who recite a great number of vocal prayers, the Office and the Rosary, fall into sin, and continue to live in sin. But he who attends to mental prayer scarcely ever falls into sin, and should he have the misfortune of falling into it, he will hardly continue to live in so miserable a state; he will either give up mental prayer, or renounce sin. Meditation and sin cannot stand together. However abandoned a soul may be, if she perseveres in meditation God will bring her to salvation. All the saints have become saints by mental prayer. "By prayer," says St. Laurence Justinian, "fervor is renewed, and the fire of divine love is increased. "[11680]

St. Ignatius used to say, that to remove the disturbance of mind caused by the greatest calamity that could befall him, a meditation of a quarter of an hour would be sufficient. St. Bernard has written: " Consideration rules the affections, directs the actions, corrects excesses."[11681]St. John Chrysostom regards as dead the soul that does not make mental prayer.[11682] Ruffinus says that all the progress of the soul depends on meditation.[11683] And Gerson goes so far as to assert that he who does not meditate, cannot, without a miracle, lead a Christian life.[11684] Speaking of the perfection to which every priest is bound, St. Aloysius Gonzaga justly said that without a great zeal for mental prayer a soul will never attain great virtue.[11685] (He who desires more detailed proofs of the moral necessity of mental prayer, is referred to the chapter on meditation in the True Spouse of Jesus Christ, Ch. XV)[11686]

II. ANSWER TO EXCUSES

I here omit many other arguments that I could adduce in favor of the necessity of mental prayer; I will only answer three excuses put forward by priests who neglect meditation.

I. Some say, " I do not make mental prayer, because I am subject to desolation, to distractions, and to temptations; I have a wandering mind that I cannot confine to the subject of meditation, and therefore I have given up mental prayer."

But to such peoples St. Francis de Sales says,[11687] that if in their meditations they do nothing else than banish distractions and temptations, the meditation is well made, provided the distraction is not voluntary. The Lord is pleased with a good intention, with a patient endurance, during the whole time prescribed for meditation, and with the pain arising from distractions, and will bestow many graces in return. We ought to go to prayer, not to please ourselves, but to please God. Even holy souls generally suffer aridity in meditation, but because they persevere, God enriches them with his blessings. St. Francis de Sales used to say, an ounce of prayer made amid desolations is of greater value before God than a hundred pounds of it in the midst of consolations. Even statues do honor to a prince by standing in his galleries. Whenever, then, the Lord wishes us to remain as statues in his presence, let us be content to honor him as statues. It will then be enough to say to him: Lord, I remain here to please you. St. Isidore says that the devil never labors so hard to tempt and distract us as in the time of meditation.[11688]And why ? because he knows the great fruit that we draw from meditation, and therefore he endeavors to make us give it up. They, then, who abandon mental prayer on account of the tediousness that they feel in it, give great delight to the devil.

In the time of aridity the soul should do nothing else than humble herself and ask God s graces. She should humble herself, for there is no better time for understanding our own miseries and insufficiency than when we are desolate in prayer: we then see that of ourselves we can do nothing. Hence we should do nothing else than, uniting ourselves with Jesus, desolate on the cross, humble ourselves and ask mercy, saying and repeating, Lord, assist me: Lord, have mercy on me: my Jesus, mercy. Meditation made in this manner will be the most fruitful of all; for to the humble God opens his hands and dispenses his graces: God resisteth the proud, and giveth His grace to the humble.[11689] Let us then, more than ever, fervently implore mercy for ourselves and for poor sinners. God requires, in a special manner, of priests that they pray for sinners. The priests, the Lords ministers, shall weep, and shall say: Spare, O Lord, spare Thy people[11690]But in answer to this some may say: It is enough for me to say the divine office. But St. Augustine writes, that the barking of dogs is more pleasing to God than the prayers of bad ecclesiastics. The ecclesiastic who neglects mental prayer soon falls away from virtue, for without meditation he shall scarcely acquire the ecclesiastical spirit.[11691]

II. Others say, If I neglect mental prayer, I do not mis-spend my time; I employ it in study.

But the Apostle said to Timothy: Take heed to thyself and to doctrine.[11692] Attend first to thyself, that is, to prayer, and then to doctrine, that is, to study, in order to procure the salvation of others. If we are not saints, how can we make others become saints ?Happy he that knows Thee, even if he knows nothing else," says St. Augustine.[11693] If we knew all sciences and knew not how to love Jesus Christ, our knowledge shall profit us nothing to eternal life. But if we know how to love Jesus Christ, we shall know all things, and shall be happy for eternity. Happy, then, the man to whom is given the science of the saints, that is, the science of loving God: She gave him the knowledge of the holy things.[11694] A single word from a priest who truly loves God will produce more fruit in others than a thousand sermons of the learned who love God but little.

But this science of the saints is not acquired by the study of books, but by mental prayer, in which the master who instructs and the book that is read is a crucified God. Being asked one day by St. Thomas from what book he had acquired so much learning, St. Bonaventure pointed to the crucifix, and said that there he had acquired all his knowledge. Sometimes a people learns more in a moment during the time of meditation than he would in ten years spent in the study of books. " In the soul," says St. Bonaventure, " there is left, by the desire of unitive love, incomparably greater knowledge than by study."[11695]

Human sciences require a good understanding; in the science of the saints it is enough to have a good will. He who loves God most ardently, knows him best. Love, says St. Gregory,[11696]is knowledge; and according to St. Augustine, to love is to see.[11697]

David exhorts us to taste and see how sweet the Lord is: O taste and see that the Lord is sweet.[11698]He who tastes God most by loving him, sees him most clearly, and has the most perfect knowledge of the immensity of his goodness. He who tastes honey has a more correct notion of it than all the philosophers who study and explain its properties. " If," said St. Augustine, " God is wisdom, a true philosopher is a lover of God."[11699] God is wisdom itself; then the true philosopher (by philosopher is meant a people who loves wisdom) is one who truly loves God. To learn worldly sciences much time and labor are necessary; but to learn the science of the saints it is enough to wish and ask for it. The wise man says that Wisdom . . . is easily seen by them that love her, and is found by them that seek her. She preventeth them that covet her, so that she first showeth herself to them.[11700] The divine wisdom is easily found by all that seek and covet her; she is found, even before she is sought. He that watcheth early to seek her shall not labor, for he shall find her sitting at his door.[11701] He who seeks her with diligence shall not labor to find her, for he shall find her sitting at his door waiting for him. Finally, Solomon concludes: Now all good things came to me with her[11702] That is, he who finds wisdom, or the love of God, finds all goods.

Oh, how much more did St. Philip Neri learn in the grottoes of St. Sebastian, where he spent entire nights in meditation, than in all the books that he had read! How much more did St. Jerome learn in the cave of Bethlehem than in all his studies! Father Suarez used to say that he would rather lose all his knowledge than one hour s mental prayer. " May the wise men of this world," says St. Paulinus, " possess their wisdom, the rich their riches, the kings their kingdoms. Jesus Christ is our wisdom, our riches, our kingdom."[11703] Let the learned of the world enjoy their wisdom, let the rich possess their wealth, and kings their kingdoms, but let Jesus Christ be our wisdom, our riches, our kingdom; let us say with St. Francis. " My God and my all."[11704] This true wisdom we should in a special manner ask of God, for he will certainly give it to all who pray for it. If any of you want wisdom, says St. James, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men abundantly, and upbraideth not.[11705] I do not deny that study is useful, and even necessary for priests; but the study of the crucifix is still more necessary. In a letter to Jovius, who devoted a great deal of time to the study of the works of the philosophers, but through pretence of not having time, paid but little attention to the exercises of a spiritual life, the same St. Paulinus writes. " You have time to be a philosopher, but you have no time to be a Christian."[11706] Some priests spend so much time in the study of mathematics, geometry, astronomy, and profane history (oh that they would at least study what is better suited to their state), and afterwards say that they have not time to make mental prayer.

To them it should be said: " You have time to be a learned man, but you have no time t o be a priest."[11707]Seneca says that we have little time, because we lose a great deal of it.[11708] And in another place he says: "We are ignorant of what is necessary, because we learn what is superfluous."[11709]

III. Others say I would wish to make mental prayer, but I am so much occupied in hearing confessions and preaching, that I have not a moment to spare.

I answer: I praise you, dearly beloved priest, for seeking the salvation of souls, but I cannot praise you for forgetting yourself in order to assist others. We must attend first to ourselves by making mental prayer, and then to our neighbor. The holy apostles labored more than all ot hers for the salvation of souls, but finding that their exertions for the good of others interfered with prayer, they appointed deacons for the performance of the external works of charity, that thus they themselves might have time for prayer and the preaching of the divine word: Brethren, may we appoint men over this business. But we will give ourselves continually to prayer, and to the ministry of the word. "[11710] But remark, they attended first to prayer, and then to preaching; because without prayer sermons produce but little fruit. This is what St. Teresa wrote to the Bishop of Osma, who paid great attention to the care of his flock, but devoted little time to prayer. " Our Lord," says the saint in a letter to him, "has shown me that you are wanting in what is particularly necessary for you (and when the foundation gives way the edifice falls to ruin); you fail in mental prayer, and do not persevere in it; from this defect arises the aridity which the soul suffers."[11711]

St. Bernard admonished Pope Eugene not to omit meditation on account of external affairs; and added, that he who gives up mental prayer may fall into hardness of heart, which will destroy all remorse for his faults, so that after having committed them he shall feel no hatred for them.[11712]

St. Laurence Justinian says that the works of Martha, without the recollection of Mary, cannot be perfect.[11713] He deceives himself, says the saint, who expects, without the aid of prayer, to succeed in the work of saving souls a work as dangerous as it is sublime; without the reflection of mental prayer, he shall certainly faint on the way.[11714]Our Lord commanded his disciples to preach what they heard in prayer: That which you hear in the ear, preach ye upon the housetops.[11715] By the ear in this place is understood the ear of the heart, to which God promises to speak in the solitude of prayer: I will lead her into the wilderness, and I will speak to her heart[11716] In—prayer, says St. Paulinus, we conceive the spirit, which we must afterwards communicate to others.[11717]

Hence, speaking of priests, St. Bernard complained, that though a priest should be first a cistern, that is, full of holy lights and affections collected in prayer, and afterwards a canal to diffuse them among his neighbors, still there are in the Church many canals and few cisterns.[11718] Hence before a priest engages in works of charity to others he should have recourse to prayer, says St. Laurence Justinian.[11719] Hence, on the passage of the Canticles, Draw me; we will run after Thee in the odor of Thy ointments[11720] St. Bernard has written, that the priest who has zeal for the salvation of souls ought to say to God: "I will run not alone; others shall run with me: we will run after Thee in the odor of Thy ointments; that is, we will hasten after Thee, attracted by Thy example."[11721]My God, draw me to Thyself; for drawn by Thee, I will run with Thee, and others also shall run with me: I shall run, drawn by the odor of Thy ointments; that is, by the inspirations and graces that I shall receive in prayer, others shall be drawn by my example.

That a priest may be able to draw many souls to God, he must first prepare himself to be drawn by God. Such has been the conduct of holy workmen in Gods vineyard of St. Dominic, St. Philip Neri, St. Francis Xavier, St. John Francis Regis. They employed the day in laboring for the people, and spent the night in prayer, and persevered in that holy exercise until they were overcome by sleep. A priest of moderate learning and great zeal will bring more souls to God than a great number of tepid though learned priests. St. Jerome says, "A man inflamed with zeal is sufficient to amend an entire people."[11722]A single word from a priest inflamed with holy charity will do more good than a hundred sermons composed by a theologian who has but little love of God.

St. Thomas of Villanova used to say that words of fire, which are, as it were, darts of the fire of divine love, are necessary to wound and inflame hearts with the love of God. But how, adds the saint, can these darts of fire issue from a heart of snow ? It is meditation that inflames the heart of holy workmen in the vineyard of the Lord, and transforms them from snow into fire. Speaking especially of the love that Jesus Christ has borne us, the Apostle says: For the charity of Christ presseth us.[11723] He means that it is impossible for any one to meditate on the sorrows and ignominies that our Redeemer has endured for us without being inflamed, and without seeking to inflame others, with his love: You shall draw waters with joy, says the Prophet Isaias, out of the Saviour's fountains[11724] The fountains of the Saviour are the examples of the life of Jesus Christ, from the consideration of which souls draw sweet waters, lights, and holy affections; and inflamed with these affections, they endeavor to kindle them, also, in others, exhorting them to confess and praise, and love the goodness of our God.

III. THE RECITATION OF THE DIVINE OFFICE. IT MAY BE USEFUL TO SAY SOMETHING HERE ON THE RECITATION OF THE DIVINE OFFICE.)

By the Divine Office God is honored, the fury of the enemy is repelled, and the divine mercies are obtained for sinners. But to attain these ends it is necessary to recite the Office in a proper manner: it is necessary to say it "carefully and devoutly,"[11725]as the fifth Council of Lateran[11726] has taught, in the celebrated Canon Dolentes.

Carefully, by pronouncing the words distinctly; devoutly, that is, with attention, as Cassian teaches: "Let that be considered in the heart which is uttered by the lips."[11727]How, asks St. Cyprian, can you expect that God will hear you when you do not hear yourself ?[11728]Prayer made with attention is the odoriferous incense that is most agreeable to God, and obtains treasures of grace; but prayer made with voluntary distraction is a fetid smoke that provokes the divine wrath, and merits chastisement. Hence, while we recite the Office, the devil labors strenuously to make us say it with distractions and defects. We should, then, take all possible care to recite it in a proper manner. We here give some practical advice:

1. It is necessary to enliven our faith, and to consider that in reciting the divine Office we unite with the angels in praising God. " We begin here upon earth the office of the inhabitants of heaven,"[11729] says Tertullian. We then perform on earth the office of the citizens of heaven, who unceasingly praise God, and shall praise him for eternity.[11730] Hence, as St. John Chrysostom remarks, before we enter the church or take up the breviary we must leave at the door and dismiss all thoughts of the world.[11731]

2. In reciting the divine Office we must take care that our affections accompany the sentiments contained in what we read. It is necessary, says St. Augustine: " We must pray when the Psalmist prays, sigh when he sighs, hope when he hopes."[11732]

3. It is useful to renew our attention from time to time; for example, at the beginning of every psalm.

4. We must be careful not to give occasion to mental distractions. How can he who recites the Office in a public place, or in the midst of peoples who are jesting and amusing themselves, how, I ask, can he say it with piety and devotion ?

Oh! what treasures do they lay up who daily recite the divine Office with devout attention ! St. John Chrysostom says that they are filled with the Holy Ghost.[11733] But, on the other hand, they who say it negligently lose great merits, and have to render a great account to God.[11734]

Instruction VI

HUMILITY

Learn of Me, because I am meek and humble of heart.[11735] Humility and meekness were the two beloved virtues of Jesus Christ, in which he wished in a special manner to be imitated by his disciples. We shall speak first of humility, and afterwards of meekness.

I. NECESSITY OF HUMILITY

St. Bernard says, "The higher one is placed, the humbler one should be."[11736]The more exalted, then, the dignity of the priest, the greater should be his humility; otherwise, if he fall into sin, the greater the height from which he is precipitated, the more disastrous his fall. Hence St. Laurence Justinian says that the priest should regard humility as the most precious jewel that shines forth in his character.[11737] And St. Augustine writes: "The highest honor should be united with the greatest humility."[11738] And before him, Jesus Christ said, He that is the greater among you, let him become as the younger.[11739] Humility is truth.

Hence the Lord has said, that if we know how to separate the precious from the vile, that is, what belongs to God from what belongs to ourselves, we should be like his mouth, which always speaks truth: If thou wilt separate the precious from the vile, thou shalt be as My mouth.[11740] Hence we must always pray with St. Augustine: "O Lord, may I know Thee, may I know myself!"[11741]St. Francis of Assisi, admiring in God his greatness and goodness, and in himself his own unworthiness and misery, used to say continually to the Lord: "Who art Thou, and who am I?" Hence the saints at the sight of the infinite perfections of God humble themselves to the very, earth. The more they know God, the better they see their own poverty and defects. The proud, because they are bereft of light, have but little knowledge of their own vileness.

Let us, then, continue to separate what is ours from what belongs to God. Ours is nothing but misery and sin. And what are we but a little fetid dust, infected by sin ? How, then, can we be proud ? Why is earth and ashes proud?[11742] Nobility, wealth, talent, ability, and theher gifts of nature, are but a garment placed over a poor mendicant. If you saw a beggar glorying in an embroidered garment thrown over him, would you not pronounce him to be a fool ? What hast thou that thou hast not received ? And if thou hast received, why dost thou glory as if thou hadst not receive d it?[11743] Have we anything that God has not bestowed upon us, or that he cannot take away whenever he pleases ? The gifts of grace that God confers upon us also belong to him, and we contaminate them by so many defects, distractions, acts of impatience, and inordinate motives.

All our justices are as the rag of a menstruous woman.[11744] Thus, after having said our Masses, Offices, and prayers, though perhaps we esteem ourselves more enlightened and rich in merits, we deserve from the Lord the reproof which he gave to the bishop in the Apocalypse: Because thou sayest : I am rich, . . . and knowest not that thou art wretched, and miser able, and poor, and blind, and naked.[11745] St. Bernard writes: " What we need in fervor we should supply by an humble acknowledgment of our misery."[11746] If we know that we are poor and full of faults in the sight of God, let us at least humble ourselves and confess our miseries. St. Francis Borgia, while a secular, was advised by a holy man, if he wished to make great progress in virtue, to reflect every day on his own miseries. Hence the saint spent every day the first two hours of prayer in endeavoring to know and despise himself. He thus became a saint, and has left us so many beautiful examples of humility. St. Augustine says: "God is the supreme being: humble thyself and he will descend to thee; but if thou raisest thyself he will flee from thee."[11747] To the humble, God unites himself and gives the treasures of his graces; but from the proud he withdraws and flies away: Every proud man is an abomination to the Lord.[11748] The proud man is an abomination to the Lord. God, says St. James, resisteth the proud and giveth grace to the humble.[11749]

The Lord hears the prayers of the humble. The prayer of him that humbleth himself shall pierce the clouds . . . and he will not depart till the Most High behold,[11750]But, on the other hand, he rejects the petitions of the proud: He resisteth the proud. He looks at the proud as from a distance. The Lord . . . looketh on the low, and the high He knoweth afar off[11751] When we see a people at a distance, we know him not; thus God feigns, as it were, not to know nor to hear the proud when they pray to him. They call upon him, but he answers: Amen, I say to you, I know you not[11752] In a word, the proud are hateful to God and to men. Pride, says Ecclesiasticus, is hateful before God and men."[11753] Men are sometimes compelled by necessity to pay external honor to the proud; but in their heart they hate them, and censure them before others. Where pride is, said Solomon, there also shall be reproach.[11754]

Praising the humility of St. Paul, St. Jerome writes: " As the shadow follows him who flies from it, and flies from him who pursues it, so glory follows them who fly from it, and flies from them who seek it."[11755] Our Lord says: Whosoever shall exalt himself shall be humbled, and he that shall humble himself shall be exalted.[11756]

A priest, for example, does a good work; he is silent about it, but as soon as it is known, all praise him. But if he goes about proclaiming it to others, in order to receive applause, he shall earn reproach instead of praise. What a shame, says St. Gregory, to see the teachers of humility become by their example teachers of pride![11757] You may say, I manifest my works to make known the truth, and to procure praise for the Lord; but I answer in the words of Seneca: " He that cannot keep silence about the thing itself will not be silent about the author."[11758] Everyone who hears a priest speaking of his good works will suppose that he relates them in order to be praised; thus he shall lose the esteem of men and merit before God, who seeing him praised according to his desire, will say to him what he said to the hypocrites in the synagogue: Amen, I say unto you, they have received their reward.[11759] The Lord has declared that three species of sinners he hates with a special hatred, and that the first is a poor man that is proud. Three sorts my soul hateth, and I am greatly grieved at their life: a poor man that is proud; a rich man that is a liar; and an old man that is a fool.[11760]

II. THE PRACTICE OF HUMILITY

But let us come to the practice of humility. Let us examine what we must do in order to be humble, not in name, but in reality.

1. TO HAVE A HORROR OF PRIDE

In the first place, it is necessary to entertain a great fear of the vice of pride; for, as has been already said, God resists the proud, and deprives them of his graces. A priest, particularly, in order to preserve chastity, stands in need of a special aid from God. But how can a proud priest practise that sublime virtue if in punishment of his pride the Lord withholds his assistance ? Pride, says the Wise Man, is a sign of approaching ruin. The spirit is lifted up before a fall.[11761] Hence St. Augustine has gone so far as to say that it is in a certain manner useful to the proud to fall into some manifest sin, that thus they may learn humility and a horror of themselves.[11762]This is what happened to David, who, as he himself afterwards confessed with tears, fell into adultery because he was not humble: Before I was humbled, I offended.[11763]St. Gregory calls pride the seminary of impurity; because some, while they are exalted by the spirit of pride, are precipitated into hell by the flesh.[11764] The spirit of pride easily brings with it the spirit of impurity. The spirit of fornication, says the Prophet Osee, is in the midst of them, . . . and the pride of Israel shall answer in his face.[11765] Ask certain peoples why they always fall back into the same impurities; pride shall answer for them, that it is the cause of their relapses: they are full of self-esteem, and there—the Lord chastises them by permitting them to remain immersed in their abominations, a chastisement which, as the Apostle says, has already fallen on the wise of the world: God gave them up to the desires of their heart, unto uncleanness, to dishonor their own bodies among themselves.[11766]

The devil has no fear of the proud. Cesarius relates[11767] that a demoniac being once brought to a Cistercian monastery, the prior took with him a young religious who had the reputation of being a man of great virtue, and said to the evil spirit: If this monk shall command you to depart, will you dare to remain ? I have no fear of him, replied the enemy, because he is proud. St. Joseph Calasanctius used to say that the devil treats a proud priest as a play-toy; that is, he throws him up and pulls him down as he pleases.

Hence the saints have had a greater dread of pride and vainglory than of any temporal calamity that could befall them. Surius[11768] relates of a holy man who was greatly esteemed and honored on account of the miracles that he wrought, that finding himself often assailed by vainglory, he besought the Lord that he might be possessed by an evil spirit; his prayer was heard, and he was possessed for five months. He was then delivered from the infernal spirit, and from the spirit of vanity that molested him. For this purpose the Lord also permits even saints to be tormented by temptations against purity, and after they pray to be freed from them, he leaves them as he left St. Paul, to combat with the temptations. And lest the greatness of the revelations should exalt me, there was given me a sting of the flesh, an angel of Satan to buffet me. For which thing I thrice besought the Lord, that it might depart from me. And He said to me: My grace is sufficient for thee ; for power is made perfect in infirmity.[11769]

Thus, according to St, Jerome, a sting of the flesh was given to St. Paul to warn him to be humble: " To remind him of human misery, and to make him humble in the sublimity of his revelations."[11770] Hence St. Gregory concludes: " To preserve chastity in all its splendor we must place it under the care of humility."[11771] Let us here make another reflection. To humble the pride of the people of Egypt, the Lord sent not bears and lions, but frogs to molest them. What do I mean ? God permits us to be annoyed by certain little expressions, by certain little aversions, by certain trifles, that we may know our miseries and may humble ourselves.

2. NOT TO GLORY IN THE GOOD THAT WE DO

Secondly, it is necessary to guard against glorying in any good that we may do, particularly if we are raised to the height of the priesthood. The offices intrusted to us are very great. To us is given the great office of offering to God the sacrifice of his own Son. To us is confided the care of reconciling sinners with God, by preaching, and by the administration of the sacraments: He hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation.[11772] We are ambassadors and vicars of Jesus Christ, and are made the tongues of the Holy Ghost: For Christ therefore we are ambassadors, God as it were exhorting by us.[11773] St. Jerome says that the highest mountains are most violently as sailed by the tempest: the more exalted, then, is our dignity, the more we are exposed to the molestation of vainglory. We are esteemed by all, we are respected as men of learning, and as saints. He who stands on a great height is in danger of dizziness.

How many priests have fallen into precipices because they were not humble! Montanus wrought miracles, and he afterwards through ambition became a heresiarch. Tatian wrote at great length and with great success against the pagans, and through pride he fell into heresy. Brother Justin, a Franciscan, attained the highest degree of contemplation, and he afterwards died an apostate from religion, and was lost. In the life of Palemon we read that a certain monk walked on fire and boasted of it, saying to his companions, Which of you can walk on red-hot coals without being burnt? St. Palemon corrected him, but the unhappy man, being full of himself, fell into sin, and died in that miserable state.

A proud spiritual man is the worst of robbers; because he usurps not earthly goods, but the glory of God. Hence, St. Francis was accustomed to say: Lord! if Thou givest any good, watch over it; otherwise I will steal it from Thee. Thus we priests must pray, and say with St, Paul: By the grace of God I am what I am.[11774] For of ourselves we are incapable not only of doing good works, but of even having a good thought: Not that we are sufficient to thinking anything of ourselves.[11775]

Hence the Lord says to us: When you shall have done all these things that are commanded you, say: We are unprofitable servants: we have done that which we ought to do[11776] Of what use can all our works be to God ? What need can he have of our possessions ? I have said to the Lord, said David, Thou art my God, for Thou hast no need of my goods.[11777]

And Job said: If thou do justly, . . . what shall he receive of Thy hand.[11778] What can God receive from you to increase his riches? Moreover, we are useless servants, because however much we do for a God who merits infinite love, and has suffered so much for the love of us, it is all nothing. Hence the Apostle writes: If I preach the Gospel, it is no glory to me, for a necessity lieth upon me[11779] To all that we do for God we are bound by our obligations and by gratitude; particularly as all that we do is his work more than it is ours. Who would not laugh at the clouds, if they boasted of the rain that they send down ? This is the language of St. Bernard.[11780]He then adds, that we ought to praise, not so much the saints for the works that they perform, as God who operates through them.[11781]St. Augustine says the same: "Every good thing, large or small, is a gift of God : from ourselves comes what is bad."[11782] And in another .place, speaking to God, he writes: "Whoever enumerates to Thee Thy merits, does he enumerate to Thee anything but Thy merits?"[11783] Hence, when we do any good, we must say to the Lord: "We have given Thee what we received of Thy hand."[11784] When St. Teresa performed any good work, or saw a good act done by others, she began to praise God for it, saying that it was entirely his work.

Hence, St. Augustine remarks, that unless humility go before, pride will steal from us all the good we do.[11785] And in another place he says: "Pride lays snares for good works that they may be lost."[11786] St. Joseph Calasanctius used to say, that the more God favors a soul by special graces, the more she ought to humble herself that she may not lose all. All is lost by every little consent to self-esteem. He, says St. Gregory, who performs many virtuous actions, but has not humility, is like a man who scatters dust before the wind.[11787] Trithemius has written*: " Thou hast despised others: thou art become worse than others."*[11788]

The saints have not only not boasted of any perfection, but have sought to make known to others what redounded to their own contempt. Father Nillanova, of the Society of Jesus, felt no repugnance to tell all that his brother was a poor workman. Father Sacchini, also a Jesuit, meeting in a public place his father, who was a poor muleteer, ran to embrace him, and said: "Oh, behold my father!" Let us read the lives of the saints, and pride shall depart from us: there we shall find the great things that they have done, at the sight of which we shall feel ashamed of the little we have done.

3. WE MUST DISTRUST OURSELVES

Thirdly, it is necessary to live in contiriual distrust of ourselves. Unless God assists us, we shall not be able to preserve ourselves in his grace: Unless the Lord keep the city, he watcheth in vain that keepeth it.[11789]

If God work not in us, we shall be unable to do any good: Unless the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it.[11790] Some saints, with very moderate learning, have converted entire nations. By certain discourses that he preached in Rome, though the language was simple, and even incorrect (for he had but an imperfect knowledge of the Italian tongue), St. Ignatius of Loyola, because his words came from a heart that was humble and enamoured of God, produced such an effect on the hearers that they instantly went to confession, but could scarcely speak on account of the many tears that they shed.[11791] But, on the other hand, many learned theologians, with all their science and eloquence, preach without converting a single soul. In them are verified the words of the Prophet Osee: Give them a womb without children, and dry breasts.[11792] Such preachers, because they are puffed up with their learning, resemble unfruitful mothers, they have the name, but are without children. And should they be intrusted with the child of another, with an infant that stands in need of milk, the little one shall die of hunger, for the paps of the proud are filled with wind and smoke, but give no milk: Knowledge puffeth up.[11793] To this evil the proud are subject. It is, as Cardinal Bellarmine wrote to one of his nephews, difficult for a man of learning to be humble, not to despise others, not to censure their acts, not to be full of his own opinions; he will hardly submit willingly to the judgment and correction of others.

It is true that we ought not to preach at random, or without consideration and study; but after we have studied the discourse, and after we have delivered it with zeal and success, we ought to say: We are unprofitable servants,[11794] and should expect the fruit, not from our own labors, but from the hands of God. And what proportion can there ever be between our words and the conversion of sinners ? Shall the axe boast itself against him that cutteth with it[11795] Can the axe say to him who fells the tree: This tree I, and not you, have cut down? We are like so many pieces of iron, incapable even of motion, unless God moves us: Without Me, you can do nothing.[11796] On this passage St. Augustine writes: "The Lord does not say, Without me you can do but little, but he says, Without me you can do nothing."[11797]And the Apostle has said: Not that we are sufficient to think anything of ourselves.[11798] If we are incapable of having even a good thought of ourselves, how much less shall we be able to perform a good action ! Neither he that planteth is anything, nor he that water eth: but God that giveth the increase.[11799]It is neither the preacher, nor the confessor who exhorts them, that makes souls advance in virtue: no, it is God that does all. " Let us," says St. John Chrysostom, " call ourselves useless servants, that we may be made useful."[11800]Whenever, then, we are praised, let us instantly give the honor to God, saying: To the only God be honor and glory.[11801]

And when any office or work is given us by obedience, let us not be diffident at the sight of our inability, but let us have confidence in God, who speaks to us by the mouth of our Superior, and says to us: I will be in thy mouth.[11802]

Gladly, says the Apostle, will I glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may dwell in me.[11803] We, too, should say the same: we should glory in the knowledge of our insufficiency, that thus we may acquire the power of Jesus Christ, that is, holy humility. Oh, what great things do the humble effect ! " Nothing," says St. Leo, "is difficult to the humble."[11804] No, for the humble, trusting in God, act with the strength of the divine arm, and therefore they effect whatsoever they wish. They that hope in the Lord shall renew their strength.[11805] St. Joseph Calasanctius used to say, that the man who wishes that God should make him do great things must labor to be the most humble of all. The humble man says: I can do all things in Him who strengthened me.[11806] When he finds an undertaking difficult, he does not despair of success, but says: Through God we shall do mightily[11807] Jesus Christ did not wish to select men of power and learning for the conversion of the world, but poor ignorant fishermen, because they were humble, and distrustful of their own strength. The weak things of the world hath God chosen that He may confound the strong. . . . That all flesh should not. glory in His sight.[11808]

Even when we see that we are subject to defects we must not be diffident. Though we should relapse into the same faults after many purposes, and many promises made to God, we should not abandon ourselves to diffidence, as the devil tempts us to do, in order to precipitate us into greater sins; but we must then, more than ever, trust in God s goodness, making use of our failings to increase our confidence in the divine mercy. Thus we are to understand the words of the Apostle: All things work together unto good.[11809] The Gloss adds: Even sins.[11810] Hence our Lord sometimes permits us to fall or to relapse into a defect, that thus we may learn to distrust ourselves, and to confide only in the divine aid. Hence David said: It is good for me that Thou hast humbled me.[11811]Lord, Thou hast permitted these my faults for my good, that I may learn to be humble.

4. TO ACCEPT HUMILIATIONS

Fourthly, to acquire humility, it is, above all, necessary to accept humiliations that come to us from God and from men, and in the time of humiliation to say with Job: I have sinned, and indeed I have offended, and I have not received what I deserved[11812]Some, as St. Gregory[11813] remarks, say with the tongue that they are sinners, that they are wicked, and deserving of every species of contempt; but they do not believe what they say, for when despised or reproved by others they are disturbed. "Many," says St. Ambrose in a letter to Constance, "have the appearance of humility, but not the virtue of humility. "[11814]Cassian[11815] relates that a certain monk, who used to protest that he was a great sinner, and unworthy of living on earth, was corrected by the abbot Serapion for a considerable fault, which consisted in going about idly to the cells of the other monks instead of remaining in his own, according to his rule. The monk became instantly agitated, so as to manifest externally the disturbed state of his interior. The abbot said to him: " My son, hitherto you have declared that you deserved nothing but opprobrium, and why are you now so indignant at a word of charity that I have said to you ?"

The same happens to many who would wish to be esteemed humble, but are unwilling to suffer any humiliation. There is, says Ecclesiasticus, one who humbleth himself wickedly, and his interior is full of deceit.[11816] St. Bernard has said that to seek praise from humility is not humility, but the destruction of humility.[11817] To seek praise from humility only foments pride by the desire of being reputed humble. He who is truly humble has a low opinion of himself, and wishes others to think of him as he thinks himself. " He is humble," says St. Bernard, " who converts humiliations into humility."[11818] The truly humble man, when treated with contempt, humbles himself still more, and acknowledges that he justly deserves the humiliation.

Finally, let us bear in mind that unless we are humble we shall not only do no good, but we shall not be saved. Unless you . . . become as little children, you shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven."[11819] In order, then, to enter into the kingdom of heaven, we must become children, not in age, but in humility.

St. Gregory says that as pride is a sign of reprobation, so humility is a mark of predestination.[11820] And St. James has written, that God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble.[11821] From the proud God withholds his graces, but to the humble he opens his hand and dispenses his favors. Be humble, says Ecclesiasticus, and expect from the hands of God as many graces as you desire. Humble thyself to God, and wait for His hands[11822] And our Saviour has said: Amen, amen, I say to you, unless the grain of wheat falling into the ground die, itself remaineth alone. But if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit.[11823] A priest who dies to self—love shall produce great fruit; but—he who dies not to himself, and resents insults or trusts in his own talents, remaineth alone : he remains alone, and will produce no fruit for himself or others.

Instruction VII

MEEKNESS

Learn of Me, because I am meek and humble of heart.[11824]Meekness is the virtue of the lamb: lamb is the name by which Jesus Christ wished to be called: Behold the Lamb of God.[11825] Send forth, O Lord, the Lamb, the ruler of the Earth.[11826]And like a lamb he conducted himself in his Passion. He shall be dumb as a lamb before his shearer, and he shall not open his mouth. [11827] As a meek lamb that is carried to be a victim.[11828] Meekness was the beloved virtue of the Saviour. He showed the extent of his meekness in doing good to the ungrateful, in submitting sweetly to his enemies, and in bearing without complaint all that insulted and maltreated him. Who, when He was reviled, did not revile : when He suffered, He threatened not, but de livered Himself to him who judged Him unjustly. [11829] After being scourged, crowned with thorns, covered with spittle, nailed to a cross, and saturated with opprobrium, he forgot all, and prayed for those that had thus maltreated him. Hence he has exhorted us, above all things, to learn from his example humility and meekness. Learn of Me, because I am meek and humble of heart.[11830] St. John Chrysostom says that meekness is, of all virtues, that which renders us most like to God.[11831] Yes, for it belongs only to God to render good for evil. Hence the Redeemer has said: Do good to them that hate you . . . that you may be the children of your Father who is in heaven.[11832] Hence, according to St. John Chrysostom, Jesus Christ has called the meek imitators of God.[11833]

To the meek, paradise is promised. Blessed are the meek, for they shall possess the land.[11834] St. Francis de Sales says that meekness is the flower of charity.[11835] And Ecclesiasticus has said: That which is agreeable to Him is faith and meekness.[11836] A meek and faithful heart is the delight of God. He knows not how to cast off the meek. The Lord lifted up the meek.[11837]The prayers of the humble and meek are very pleasing in the sight of God. The prayer of the humble and the meek hath always pleased Thee.[11838]

The virtue of meekness consists in two things: 1. In restraining the motions of passion against those that provoke us to anger; and, 2d, In bearing insults.

I. WE MUST REPRESS ANGER

With regard to the first, St. Ambrose says that the passion of anger ought to be either avoided or restrained.[11839]

He who feels himself prone to the vice of anger should endeavor to avoid the occasions of it; and should he through necessity be exposed to them, he ought to prepare himself beforehand by good resolutions either to be silent, to answer with sweetness, or to pray to God for strength to resist the temptation, and not to yield to passion. Some excuse themselves by saying such a people is very impertinent, his conduct is insufferable. But, according to St. John Chrysostom, the virtue of meekness consists not in being agreeable to the meek, but in treating with sweetness those that know not what meekness is.[11840] When a neighbor is enraged there is no better means of appeasing his anger than by answering with sweetness. A mild answer breaketh wrath.[11841] As water extinguishes fire, so, says St. John Chrysostom, a mild answer softens the anger of a brother, however great may be his excitement.[11842]This is conformable to the words of Ecclesiasticus: A sweet word multiplieth friends and appeaseth enemies.[11843] St. John Chrysostom adds: "We cannot extinguish fire by fire."[11844]Even towards sinners the most abandoned, obstinate, and insolent we priests must exercise all possible meekness in order to draw them to God. Hugh of St. Victor has written: " You must know the faults, not to punish them, but the diseases to heal them. "[11845]

When, on the other hand, we feel ourselves assailed by any motion of anger, the remedy is to be silent, and to ask strength from God not to make a reply. " The best remedy," says Seneca, " is in delay,[11846] for should we speak while we are inflamed with passion, what we say will appear reasonable, but it will be unjust and sinful. For passion is a certain veil that covers the eyes of the soul, and does not permit us to see the unreasonableness of our reply. " The eye disturbed by anger cannot see," says St. Bernard.[11847] Sometimes it appears to us just, and even necessary, to repress the boldness of a people who treats us with insolence: for example, of an inferior who acts disrespectfully towards us. It would indeed be right in such circumstances to show moderate displeasure; to be, as the angelic Doctor says, angry according to right reason.[11848]This is conformable to the words of David: Be ye angry, and sin not.[11849] This would be right if in such anger there were no fault on our part; but in this consists the difficulty. To leave oneself in the hand of anger is a very dangerous thing: you might as well mount a furious horse that refuses to obey the bit, and carries you wheresoever he pleases. Hence St. Francis de Sales, in the Devout Life,[11850] says that however just the reason of our anger, it is always expedient to restrain it; and that it is better for you to have it said that you are never angry than that you are wisely angry. When, says St. Augustine,[11851] anger has entered the soul, it is difficult to expel it. Hence he exhorts us in the beginning to close the gate that anger may not enter. When a people who is corrected sees his Superior in a passion, he will derive but little fruit from the admonition: he will regard it as the effect of anger rather than of charity.

A single admonition given with sweetness and a tranquil countenance will do more good than a thousand reproaches, however just, accompanied with motions or expressions of anger. But to be meek does not imply that in order to show kindness or to avoid the displeasure of another we should omit to correct him with just rigor, when such correction is necessary. To omit correction in that case would not be virtue, but a culpable and abominable negligence. Woe, says the Prophet, to him who furnishes a pillow to sinners that they may peacefully sleep in their deadly slumber. Woe to them that sew cushions under every elbow; and make pillows for the heads of peoples of every age, to catch souls: . . . you have strengthened the hands of the wicked that he should not return from his evil way and live.[11852] This vicious condescension, says St. Augustine, " is not charity, but carelessness."[11853]It is neither charity nor meekness, but it is negligence, and even cruelty, to the poor souls that thus remain in the state of damnation, without being admonished of their miserable condition. St. Cyprian says that when the sick man feels the knife he assails the surgeon; but when he is cured he will thank him."[11854] Meekness, then, implies that when it is necessary to correct a brother we should do it with firmness, but at the same time with sweetness.

And when it is our duty to correct others, the Apostle exhorts us first to consider our own defects, that we may have compassion for our neighbor as we have for ourselves. Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, you who are spiritual instruct such a one in the spirit of meekness, considering thyself lest thou also be tempted.[11855] Peter de Blois says that it is great baseness in a Superior to correct an inferior with anger and asperity.[11856] Anger so disfigures the face that it gives to the most beautiful countenance a horrible appearance, says Seneca.[11857] In this matter, then, we should always attend to the admonition of St. Gregory: " Be kind, yet without effeminacy; use rigor, but without exasperating; be merciful, without sparing more than is

Physicians, says St. Basil,[11859] should not get angry with a patient, but should only assail his disease in order to restore his health. Cassian relates[11860] that a young religious who was violently tempted against chastity sought advice from an aged monk; but instead of assisting and encouraging him, the old man loaded him with reproaches. But what was the result ? The Lord permitted the aged monk to be so violently attacked by the spirit of impurity that he ran like a madman through the monastery. Having heard of his indiscretion towards the young man, the abbot went to him, and said: " Brother, know that God has permitted you to be molested by this temptation, that you may learn to take compassion on others."

When, therefore, we witness the weaknesses and faults of others, we ought not to reprove them with a vain conceit of ourselves: but in applying, to the best of our ability, a remedy to their faults, we should be humble in our own estimation: otherwise God will permit us to fall into the very defects that we condemn in others. The same Cassian[11861] relates that a certain abbot, called Machete, confessed that he had miserably fallen into three faults of which he had before judged his brethren. Hence St. Augustine says that compassion for our neighbor, and not indignation, should precede correction.[11862] And St. Gregory tells us that the consideration of our own defects will make us pity and excuse the faults of others.[11863] Thus to yield to anger is never profitable to ourselves or to others. If it produce no other evil, it at least robs us of peace. Agrippinus the philosopher having once lost some of his goods, said: " If I have lost my property I will not lose my peace." The disturbance of mind to which we give way on account of the maltreatment we receive from others is more hurtful to us than the injuries offered to us. Seneca has said: " My anger will hurt me more than their insults."[11864] He who indulges anger when an affront is offered to him is a cause of pain to himself. " Thou hast decreed, O Lord !" says St. Augustine, " that the soul that is inordinate should be its own torment. "[11865]

Hence that great master of meekness, St. Francis de Sales,[11866] teaches that it is necessary to practise meekness not only to others, but also to ourselves. After yielding to a fault, some are indignant with themselves, and give way to disquietude, and in this state of agitation they commit a thousand faults. In troubled water, says St. Aloysius Gonzaga, the devil always finds fish to catch.

It is necessary, then, when we perceive that we have fallen into a defect, not to be disturbed (to give way to disquietude after a fault is the effect of our own pride, and of the high opinion we had of our own virtue), but to humble ourselves peacefully, to detest the sin, and instantly to have recourse to God, hoping to receive from him help to avoid a relapse. In a word, they who are truly humble and meek live always in peace, and in every occurrence preserve tranquillity of soul. Learn of Me, says Jesus Christ, because I am meek and humble of heart, and you shall find rest to your souls.[11867] And before him, David said: The meek shall inherit the land, and shall delight in abundance of peace.[11868]"Nothing is able to disturb their serenity,"[11869] says St. Leo. No insult, no loss, no misfortune, disturbs the peace of a meek heart.

Should we feel angry on any occasion, we must endeavor (according to the advice of the holy bishop of Geneva) to repress passion without waiting to examine whether it is right or not to subdue it. And after a dispute, which may perhaps have disturbed our peace, let us observe the advice of the Apostle: Let not the sun go down upon your anger. Give not place to the devil.[11870] Let us first put our soul in peace, and then be reconciled to the people by whom we have been offended, lest through that spark the devil should kindle in our souls a deadly flame that may cause our ruin.

II. WE MUST BEAR CONTEMPT

Secondly, the virtue of meekness consists still more in bearing insults. Many, says St. Francis of Assisi, place their sanctification in saying many prayers, or in the practice of many corporal mortifications, but afterwards they cannot bear an offensive word. " Not understanding," says the saint, " of what profit it is to bear insults."[11871] A soul gains more by peacefully bearing an affront than by fasting for ten days on bread and water.

St. Bernard says that there are three degrees of advancement, to which a soul that wishes to be a saint, ought to aspire. The first is not to wish for authority over others; the second, to wish to be subject to all; the third is to bear insults with peace.[11872]You will, for example, see that what is given to others is denied to you: what others say is heard with attention; what you say is received with derision: others are praised, are elected to offices of honor, to transact business of importance; but you are despised: what you do is censured and ridiculed. You will be truly humble, says St. Dorotheus,[11873]if you accept in peace all these humiliations, and recommend to God, as your best benefactors, all that treat you in this manner; for they thus cure your pride, which is a most malignant and deadly malady. In thy humiliation keep patience,[11874]

Behold, then, what we must do; we must give way neither to anger nor to complaints, but accept insults as due to our sins. He who has offended God merits very different insults: he deserves to be cast under the feet of the devils. St. Francis Borgia was once obliged on a journey to sleep in the same bed with his companion, Father Bustamente, who labored under asthma, and spent the whole night coughing and casting out phlegm. He thought that he was spitting towards the wall; but frequently the phlegm fell on the face of St. Francis. In the morning the Father was greatly grieved at what he had done; but the saint placidly answered: " Father, be not troubled; for certainly in this room there is no place so fit for the reception of spittle as my face." The proud, because they esteem themselves worthy of all honor, convert the humiliations that they receive into an occasion of pride; but the humble, because they think themselves deserving of all ignominies, convert the insults offered to them into a source of humility. " He is humble," says St. Bernard, " who changes humiliations into humility."[11875] Rodriguez says that when reproved the proud imitate the hedgehog, which when touched becomes all thorns; that is, they get into a fury, and instantly break out into complaints, reproaches, and detraction. But, on the other hand, the humble when blamed for their conduct humble themselves still more, confess that they are full of defects, thank the people who corrects them, arid preserve tranquillity of soul. He who is disturbed by correction shows that in him pride still reigns. Hence they who are disquieted by correction or admonitions must humble themselves more before God, and entreat him to deliver them from the hands of pride, which still lives in their hearts. My spikenard sent forth the odor thereof.[11876] The spikenard is a small odoriferous plant that sends forth its odors when bruised and twisted.

Oh, what odors of sweetness does an humble soul give to God when she peacefully suffers insults, and delights in seeing herself despised and maltreated! Being asked what must be done in order to acquire true humility, Zachary, a monk, took his cowl, and trampling on it said: "He who delights in seeing himself treated in this manner is truly humble." Father Alvarez used to say that the time of humiliation is the time of getting rid of our miseries, and of acquiring great treasures of merit. God is as liberal of his gifts to the humble as he is sparing to the proud: God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble.[11877] St. Augustine says that a guilty conscience is not healed by praise, nor a good conscience wounded by insults.[11878] It was this that St. Francis of Assisi meant when he said: " We are what we are before God." It is, then, of little importance to us whether we are praised or censured by men : it is enough for us to merit praise from God. And God will certainly bestow great praise on all that cheerfully bear insults from others for his sake. The meek are dear to God and to men. St. John Chrysostom says that there is nothing that gives greater edification to others, and draws souls more powerfully to God, than the meekness of the man who, when treated with derision,ntempt, and insult, seeks not revenge, but bears all with a peaceful and placid countenance.[11879] St. Ambrose writes that Moses was more beloved by the Hebrews on account of the meekness with which he received insults, than on account of the miracles which he wrought.[11880]

The meek are useful to themselves and to others, says St. John Chrysostom.[11881] Father Maffei relates that while a Jesuit was preaching in Japan, an insolent bystander spit in his face; the Father wiped away the spittle, and continued the sermon as if nothing had happened. At the sight of such meekness one of the audience was converted, and said that a religion that teaches such humility must be true and divine. Thus also, by the meekness and tranquillity with which he bore all the insults heaped upon him by the heretical ministers St. Francis de Sales converted an immense number of heretics. Meekness is the touchstone of sanctity. St. John Chrysostom says[11882] that the surest means of knowing whether a soul has virtue is to observe if she practises meekness under contradictions. In the history of Japan, Crasset relates that a certain Augustinian missionary who, in the time of the persecution, had changed his dress, received a buffet without resenting it. Seeing his meekness, the idolaters instantly supposed him to be a Christian, and laid hold of him; for said they, no one but a Christian could practise such virtue.

Ah ! at the sight of Jesus loaded with contempt it is easy to bear all insults. Standing one day before a crucifix, Blessed Mary of the Incarnation said to her religious: "O sisters ! can it be possible that we will not bear contempt when we see a God so despised ?" On his journey to Rome to receive the crown of martyrdom, St. Ignatius, Martyr, finding himself so maltreated by the soldiers, said: "I now begin to be the servant of Christ."[11883]

What can be expected from a Christian if he is not able to bear contempt for Jesus Christ? It is indeed very painful to our pride to be despised and insulted, without seeking revenge, or even making a reply.

But in doing violence to ourselves consists our progress in perfection, says St. Jerome.[11884] A holy nun, whenever she received an affront, was accustomed to go to the holy sacrament, and to say: " Lord, I am a poor miserable creature: I have nothing to present to you, but I offer this little gift this insult that I have received." Oh, how lovingly does Jesus Christ embrace the soul that is despised ! Oh, how soon does he console her and enrich her with his graces !

Ah ! the soul that truly loves Jesus Christ not only bears insults in peace, but embraces them with pleasure and joy. The holy Apostles went from the presence of the council rejoicing that they were accotinted worthy to suffer reproach for the name of Jesus.[11885] St. Joseph Calasanctius used to say that in many are verified the last words of this passage they are accounted worthy to suffer reproach for the name of Jesus, but not the first they went rejoicing. But he who wishes to be a saint must at least aspire to this degree of perfection. " He is not humble that does not wish to be despised,"[11886] says the same saint. The Venerable Louis da Ponte did not at first understand how a man could rejoice in contempt; but when he afterwards attained higher perfection he easily comprehended it, and experienced joy under insults. It was this that St. Ignatius of Loyola, coming from heaven, taught St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi: he said to her that true humility consists in attaining such a state of mind as to feel a continual joy in all things which can lead a people to self-contempt.

Worldlings do not rejoice as much in the honors that they receive, as the saints do in seeing themselves despised. Brother Juniper, of the Order of St. Francis, when treated with insult held out his habit as if to receive precious gems. When St. John Francis Regis saw himself made an object of laughter he not only rejoiced at the humiliation, but sought still more to excite derision. To St. John of the Cross the Redeemer once appeared with a cross on his shoulders and a crown of thorns on his head, and said: "John, ask what you desire of me."[11887] The saint answered: " O Lord ! to suffer and to be despised for Thee."[11888] As if he said: Lord, since I see you so afflicted and despised for my sake, what else can I ask but sufferings. and contempt?

To conclude: He who wishes to belong entirely to God, and to assimilate himself to Jesus Christ, must love to be unknown and disregarded. " Love to be unknown and to be regarded as nothing,"[11889]was the great lesson of St. Bonaventure, which St. Philip Neri constantly inculcated to his spiritual children. Jesus Christ tells us to esteem ourselves happy, and to exult with joy when we are hated, cast off, and censured by men for his sake. He tells us that the more galling the insults which we accept with joy, the greater the reward will he give us in heaven. Blessed shall you be when men shall hate you, and when they shall separate you, and shall reproach you, and cast out your name as evil, for the Son of Man's sake. Be glad in that day and rejoice; for, behold, your reward is great in heaven.[11890]

And what greater joy can a soul feel than that which arises from seeing herself despised for the love of Jesus Christ? Then, says St. Peter, she obtains the greatest honor that it is possible for her to receive; for God then treats her as he has treated his own very Son. If you are reproached for the name of Christ, you shall be blessed, for that which is of the honor, glory, and power of God . . . resteth upon you.[11891]

Instruction VIII

MORTIFICATION, AND PARTICULARLY INTERIOR MORTIFICATION

I. NECESSITY OF MORTIFICATION IN GENERAL

AN was created by God in a state of integrity, so that without a struggle the senses obeyed the spirit, and the spirit obeyed God: God made man right.[11892] Sin came and deranged the beautiful order that God had established, and the life of man began to be a state of continual warfare: For the flesh lusteth against the spirit: and the spirit against the flesh.[11893] But I see, says the Apostle in a tone of lamentation, another law in my members, fighting against the law of the mind, and captivating me in the law of sin that is in my members.[11894]

Hence for man there are two kinds of life the life of the angels, who seek to do the will of God, and the life of beasts, who attend only to the indulgence of the senses. If a man labors to do the will of God he becomes an angel; if he seeks after sensual gratifications he becomes a beast. Hence what the Lord prescribed to Jeremias, Lo, I have set thee this day . . . to root up and to pull down, . . . to build and to plant.[11895] we ought to do in ourselves: we should plant virtues, but we should first extirpate noxious weeds. Hence we must always carry in our hand the mattock of mortification, to cut down the evil desires that constantly spring up and bud forth within us from the infected roots of concupiscence; otherwise the soul shall become a forest of vices.

In a word, it is necessary to cleanse the heart, if we wish for light to know God, the sovereign Good: Blessed are the clean of heart, for they shall see God.[11896] Hence St. Augustine has said: "If you wish to see God take care, to purify your heart."[11897] Isaias asks: Whom shall He teach knowledge ? . . . Them that are weaned from the milk, that are drawn away from the breasts. [11898] God gives the science of the saints, that is, the science of knowing and loving him, only to them that are weaned and drawn away from the breasts of the world: But the sensual man perceiveth not these things that are of the Spirit of God."[11899] He who like a brute animal seeks after sensual pleasures is not capable of even understanding the excellence of spiritual goods. St. Francis de Sales says that as salt preserves flesh from corruption, so mortification preserves the soul from sin. In the soul in which mortification reigns all virtues shall flourish. Myrrh and stacte and cassia perfume thy garments "[11900] On this passage Guerric the abbot writes: " When myrrh begins to exhale a perfume, soon other aromatical perfumes will be exhaled. "[11901]

This is precisely what the sacred Spouse has said: I have gathered my myrrh with my aromatical spices.[11902] All our sanctity and salvation consist in following the examples of Jesus Christ: For whom He foreknew, He also predestinated to be made conformable to the image of His Son. [11903] But we shall not be able to imitate Jesus Christ unless we deny ourselves, and embrace by mortification the cross that he gives us to carry: If any man will come after Me, let him deny Jiimself and take up his cross and follow Me.[11904]The life of our Redeemer was all full of sufferings, of sorrows, and ignominies. Hence Isaias said of him, that he was despised and the most abject of men: a man of sorrows.[11905]As a mother takes nauseous medicine in order to cure the infant to which she gives suck, so our Redeemer, says St. Catharine of Sienna, wished to assume so many pains in order to heal the infirmities of us poor sinners. But since Jesus Christ has endured so much for the love of us, it is but just that we suffer for his sake. We must, then, endeavor to follow the advice of St. Paul: Always bearing about in your body the mortification of Jesus, that the life also of Jesus may be made manifest in our bodies.[11906] " This we shall do," says St. Anselm in his comment on the preceding text, when, "in imitation of him, we assiduously practise mortification. "[11907] To this we priests, who celebrate the mysteries of the Passion of our Lord, are bound in a special manner.ecause," says Hugh of St. Victor, "while celebrating the divine mysteries we celebrate the Passion of our Lord: we should therefore be careful to reproduce it in our lives."[11908] The principal means of acquiring sanctity are prayer and mortification, represented in the sacred Scripture by incense and myrrh. Who is this that goeth up by the desert, as a pillar of smoke of aromatical spices, of myrrh and frankincense.[11909] The Holy Ghost adds: and of all the powders of the perfumer[11910] to show that prayer and mortification are followed by all virtues. Prayer, then, and mortification, are necessary to render a soul holy; but mortification must precede prayer: I will go to the mountain of myrrh and to the hill of frankincense.[11911] Thus our Lord invites us to follow him, first to the mountain of myrrh, and then to the hill of frankincense.

St. Francis Borgia used to say, that prayer introduces divine love into the heart; but it is mortification that prepares a place for charity, by removing from the soul the world, which should otherwise prevent the entrance of love. Should a people go to a fountain for water with a vessel full of earth, he shall take back nothing but mire. He must first cast away the earth, and then fill the vessel with water. Father Baltassar Alvarez used to say that prayer without mortification is either an illusion, or will be only of short duration. And St. Ignatius of Loyola has said that a mortified soul unites herself more intimately to God in a quarter of an hour's prayer, than an immortified soul does in several hours. Hence, having once heard a people praised for his great spirit of prayer, the saint said: "It is a sign that he practises great mortification."

II. NECESSITY OF INTERIOR MORTIFICATION

We have a soul and a body. External mortification is necessary in order to mortify the disorderly appetites of the body; and interior mortification is necessary in order to mortify the irregular affections of the soul. All this is comprised in the following words of the Saviour: If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow Me.[11912] External mortification is included in the words let him take up his cross; this species of mortification is necessary, as we shall see hereafter: but interior mortification is still more important and necessary let him deny himself. This consists in subjecting to reason the disorderly passions of the soul; such as ambition, inordinate anger, self-esteem, attachment to self—interest, to our own opinion, or to self-will. " There are two kinds of crosses," says St. Augustine, "one corporal, the other spiritual. The latter is more sublime, and consists in curbing the inordinate inclinations of the heart."[11913] External mortification, then, represses the appetites of the body in order to bring it under subjection to the spirit; the interior mortification restrains the affections of the heart in order to subject them to reason and God; hence it has been called by the Apostle: The circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit.[11914] In themselves the passions are indifferent, and not sinful; and when well regulated by reason they are useful, because they contribute to the preservation of our existence. But when opposed to reason, they are the ruin of the soul.

Miserable the soul that God leaves in the hands of her own desires ! This is the greatest chastisement which he can inflict upon her. I let them go according to the desires of their own hearts: they shall walk in their own inventions.[11915] Hence we must always pray to the Lord in the words of Solomon: Give me not over to a shameful and foolish mind.[11916] My God, do not abandon me into the hands of my passions.

Our principal care, then, should be to conquer ourselves. Conquer thyself.[11917] St. Ignatius of Loyola appeared not to consider any lesson more important than that which is contained in the words Conquer thyself: his familiar discourses were ordinarily on conquering self-love and subduing self-will; and he would say, that out of a hundred peoples who practise prayer, more than ninety are attached to their own opinion. He set a greater value on a single act of mortification of self-will than on several hours spent in prayer, in the midst of spiritual consolations. To a Brother who separated from the company of the others in order to get rid of a certain defect the saint said, that he would have gained more by a few acts of mortification in the society of his companions than he would by remaining silent in a cave for an entire year. "It is no small matter," writes Thomas a Kempis, "even in things the most trifling, to relinquish self."[11918] On the other hand, St. Peter Damian asserts that unless he leaves himself, it will profit a man nothing to have forsaken all things.[11919]

Hence, to a people who wished to leave all things in order to give himself to God, St. Bernard said: "Remember that if you have resolved to leave everything, you must count yourself among those things that you must leave."[11920] Unless, adds the saint, you deny yourself, you shall never be able to be a follower of Jesus Christ.[11921] Our Redeemer hath rejoiced as a giant to run the way. [11922] But, says the holy Doctor, he who carries the weight of his passions and of earthly affections, and wishes to follow the Saviour, shall not be able to keep within view of Jesus running the way.

It is necessary, above all, to attend to the subjugation of the predominant passion. Some are careful to mortify themselves in many things, but make little effort to conquer the passion to which they are most inclined; such peoples can never advance in the way of God. He who allows any irregular passion to rule over him, is in great danger of being lost. But, on the other hand, he who subdues the predominant passion will easily conquer all his other passions. When the strongest enemy is vanquished, it is easy to defeat less powerful foes. The value and merit of the victory is greatest when the greatest valor is required: for example, some are not avaricious of money, but are full of self-esteem; others are not ambitious of honors, but feel a great thirst for riches. Unless the former are careful to practise mortification, when treated with contempt, their disregard for riches will profit them but little. Unless the latter labor to mortify the desire of wealth, their contempt for honors will be but of little advantage to them. In a word, a people gains most merit and makes the greatest progress when he uses the greatest violence to conquer himself.o much will you advance in virtue," says St. Jerome, " as you do violence to yourself."[11923] St. Ignatius was naturally prone to anger, but by virtue he became so meek that he was considered to be a man of a mild disposition. St. Francis de Sales was also strongly inclined to anger; but by the violence that he offered to himself he became, as we read in his life, an example of patience and sweetness in the many contradictions and insults that he received.

External mortification, without interior self-denial , profits the soul but little. Of what use, says St. Jerome, is it to reduce the body by fasting, and afterwards to swell with pride? or to abstain from wine, and to be inebriated with hatred? [11924] The Apostle says that we must put off the old man, that is, attachment to self-love, and clothe ourselves with the new man, that is, Jesus Christ, who never pleased himself. For, says St. Paul, Christ did not please Himself.[11925] Hence St. Bernard pitied certain monks who wore an humble dress, but interiorly cherished their passions: "This humble habit is not a sign of interior holiness, but a cover thrown over inveterate corruption. They have not stripped themselves of the old man, but have only hidden him."[11926]They, says the saint, do not put off their vices: they only cover them with the exterior marks of penance. Hence, fasting, watching, hair-shirts, and disciplines are of little or no use to him who is attached to himself, and to what belongs to him.

III THE PRACTICE OF INTERIOR MORTIFICATION

They, says St. John Climacus,[11927] who wish to belong entirely to God must divest themselves of attachnent to four things in particular: to property, to honors, to relatives, and above all, to self-will.

1. PROPERTY

First, it is necessary to remove attachment to property or to riches. St. Bernard says that riches are a burden to him who possesses them, that they contaminate the man who loves them, and torture him who loses them.[11928] The priest ought to remember, that when he entered the sanctuary he declared, in the following words, that he wished for no other possessions than God: The Lord is the portion of my inheritance; . . . it is Thou that wilt restore my inheritance to me.[11929]The ecclesiastic, then, says St. Peter Damian, who after having chosen God for his portion attends to the acquisition of riches, offers a great insult to his Creator.[11930] Yes, for by his conduct he shows that he considers the Lord not sufficient to content his heart. St. Bernard says, and says truly, that among the covetous there is none more avaricious than the ecclesiastic who is attached to money.[11931]How many priests are there who, but for the miserable honorarium that they receive, would seldom say Mass ! Would to God that they never offered the holy sacrifice !

They, as St. Augustine says, belong to that class of men who do not seek for money in order to serve God; but serve God in order to accumulate riches.[11932] What a disgrace, exclaims St. Jerome, to see a priest intent on the acquisition of wealth ![11933]

But let us pass by the disgrace, and examine the great danger of perdition, to which a priest intent on heaping up riches exposes his soul. " Those priests are greatly in peril," says St. Hilary, " who are anxious to amass riches and increase their fortune."[11934] This the Apostle has taught, saying that such peoples shall not only be molested by many cares which impede their spiriual progress, but shall also fall into temptations and desires which will lead them to ruin. They that will become rich, fall into temptations, . . . and into many unprofitable and hurtful desires, which draw men into destruction and perdition.[11935] And into what excesses, thefts, injustice, simony, and sacrileges has the desire of money precipitated certain priests ! St. Ambrose says: " He who amasses gold loses the grace of God."[11936]St. Paul assimilates avarice to idolatry: A covetous people (which is a serving of idols).[11937] And justly, for the covetous man makes money his God, that is, his last end. " Extirpate the thirst for gold," says St. John Chrysostom, "and you will extirpate all crimes."[11938] If, then, we wish to possess God, let us remove all attachment to the goods of this world.

St. Philip Neri used to say that he who seeks after riches shall never become a saint. The riches of us who are priests should consist not in possessions, but in virtues; these will make us great in heaven, and give us strength on earth against the enemies of our salvation. This is the language of St. Prosper: " Our riches are chastity, piety, humility, meekness: they only will make us great in heaven, and at the same time strong upon earth against the enemies of our salvation."[11939] Let us, says the Apostle, be content with moderate food for the support of life, and simple raiment to cover the body: let us labor to become saints; this alone is important to us: But having food, and wherewith to be covered, with these we are content.[11940] Of what use are earthly goods, which we must one day quit, and which never content the heart? Let us seek to acquire goods which shall accompany us to eternity, and make us happy forever in heaven: Lay not up to yourselves treasures on earth, where the rust and the moth consume. . . . But layup treasures in heaven.[11941] Hence, in the Council of Milan the following admonition was given to priests: " Layup treasures not on earth, but good works and souls for heaven.[11942]The treasures of a priest should consist in good works, and in gaining souls to God.

Hence, in conformity with the words of the Apostle: No man being a soldier to God entangleth himself with secular business, that he may please

Him to Whom he hath engaged Himself.[11943] The holy Church prohibits, with so much rigor, and under pain of censure, ecclesiastics to engage in traffic. The priest is consecrated to God; he therefore should attend to no other business than the advancement of Gods glory. The Lord does not accept empty victims from which the marrow has been extracted. I will offer up to Thee, said David, holocausts full of marrow.[11944]The sacrifices, the Masses, Offices, and works that a priest dissipated by the cares of traffic offers to God are, says St. Peter Damian, empty; for he has taken away the marrow, that is, attention and devotion, and presents only the skin or external appearance.[11945]What a misery to see a priest, who could save souls and do great things for the glory of God, employed in buying and selling, and engaged in traffic of cattle and corn. "You are consecrated," says Peter de Blois, " to great things do not occupy yourself with what is trivial."[11946] What but a spiders web, says St. Bernard, is earthly traffic ?[11947]As the spider eviscerates itself, making its web for the purpose of catching a fly, so, O God ! certain priests spend themselves, lose their time, and the fruit of their spiritual works, in order to gain a little dust. They submit to labors, to anxiety and disquietude, for emptiness, when they could possess God, who is the Lord of all things. "Why do we trouble ourselves," exclaims St. Bonaventure*," about nothing, while we may possess the Creator of all things?"*[11948]

Some will say: But I act justly; I attend to this business without any scruple of conscience. I answer, first, that, as has been already said, ecclesiastics are forbidden to engage even in a just traffic: hence if they do not violate justice, they at least sin against the precept of the Church. Besides, St. Bernard says: "Wherever the river flows there it hollows out the earth; so the application to earthly affairs injures the conscience." [11949] As in their passage the running waters eat away the banks of the river, so the cares of traffic gnaw the conscience, that is, they make us always fail in some duty. If, says St. Gregory, traffic were productive of no other evil, at least the crowd of worldly thoughts that it engenders closes the ear of the heart, and prevents it from hearing the divine inspirations.[11950] In a word, St. Isidore writes: "The more priests occupy themselves with the care of earthly affairs, the more they separate themselves from the things of heaven."[11951]It is true that some are obliged by charity to attend to the affairs of their family; but, according to St. Gregory, this should be permitted only in cases of strict necessity.[11952] Some priests undertake, without necessity, the care of the concerns of their family, and even forbid relatives to interfere in them; but if they wished to attend to the affairs of their family why have they become ministers of the family of God ?

The priest who seeks to be employed in the courts of the great also exposes his soul to very imminent danger. Peter de Blois says that as the saints are saved through many tribulations, so they who enter courts are lost through many tribulations.[11953] It is very dangerous for a priest to plead as an advocate in the courts of law. " In the court," says St. Ambrose, " Christ is not found."[11954] What fervor, I ask, can the priest have who pleads in the courts? How can he say the Office and Mass with devotion when the causes he has to defend fill his whole mind and hinder him from thinking of God ? The causes that a priest should advocate are the causes of poor sinners; and these he should seek to deliver from the hands of the devil and from eternal death by sermons, by hearing confessions, or at least by admonitions and prayers. A priest should abstain from pleading, not only for others, but also for himself. Every temporal law-suit is a seminary of cares and disquietudes, of rancor and sins. Hence we read in the Gospel: And if a man will contend with thee in judgment and take away thy coat, let go thy cloak also to him.[11955] We know that this is only a counsel; but let us at least avoid suits that are but of trifling importance. You may get rid of temporal misery, you may gain a victory, but you shall suffer a great loss of fervor and peace. " Sacrifice something," says St. Augustine, " in order that you may enjoy God and escape law-suits. Lose your money in order to purchase peace for your soul."[11956] St. Francis de Sales has said that to go to law, and not yield to folly, is scarcely given to the saints. Hence St. John Chrysostom condemned all that engaged in litigation.[11957]

What shall we say of gaming? According to the Canons, it is certain that to play frequently and for a long time at games of mere hazard, or for a large sum, at least when it is accompanied with scandal to others, is a mortal sin. With regard to other games, which are called games of amusement, I will not here discuss the question whether they are lawful or unlawful; but I say that such amusements are but little suited to a minister of God, who, if he wishes to fulfil his obligation to himself and his neighbor, has certainly no superfluous time to spend in gaming. I read that St. John Chrysostom says: "It is the devil that has introduced gaming into the world."[11958] I find that St. Ambrose writes: " I am of opinion that one should not only avoid frequent plays, but all plays."[11959] In the same place he says that recreation is lawful; but not the recreations which derange regularity of life, or which are not suited to ones state. Hence he adds: "Although at times a play may be proper, yet it is not proper for ecclesiastics."[11960]

2. HONORS

Secondly, a priest should divest himself of attachment to worldly honors. Peter de Blois says that the ambition of honors is the ruin of souls.[11961] For ambition disturbs regularity of life, and injures charity towards God. Ambition, as the same author says, pretends to resemble charity, and is quite opposed to it. Charity suffers all things, but only for the attainment of eternal goods: ambition bears all things,[11962] but only for things perishable.

Charity is all benignity to the poor, but ambition is kind to the rich.[11963] Charity bears all[11964] in order to please God; ambition submits to all evils for the sake of vanity. Charity believes and hopes for all that appertains to eternal glory; ambition believes all things, hopes for all things, that tend to the glory of this life.[11965]

Oh ! to how many thorns, fears, censures, refusals, and insults must the ambitious submit in order to attain a dignity, an office of honor ! " How many thorns await those that strive after honors!"[11966] says St. Augustine. And in the end what do the ambitious gain but a little smoke, which, when enjoyed, does not content the heart, and speedily disappears. I have seen the wicked highly exalted, and lifted up like the cedars of Lebanon. And I passed by, and lo he was not.[11967]Besides, the Scripture says that to him who seeks it honor becomes an occasion of disgrace. The promotion of fools is disgrace[11968]And, according to St. Bernard, the greater the honor the more the unworthy possessor, who has procured it by his own exertions, is despised by others.[11969]For the more exalted the dignity, the more clearly the man who is unfit for it shows his unworthiness by seeking to obtain it.[11970]

Add to this the great dangers of eternal salvation which arise from offices of honor. Father Vincent Carafa once visited a sick friend who had just been appointed to a situation of great emolument, but also of great danger. The sick man entreated the Father to obtain from God the restoration of his health; but Carafa answered: No, my friend, God forbid that I should violate the love that I bear you: your sickness is a grace from the Lord, who wishes to save you by sending death now that your soul is in a good state. Perhaps you might not be in such a state hereafter should you enter on the office that has been given you. The friend died, and died full of consolation. We should have a special fear of all offices to which the care of souls is annexed. St. Augustine said that many envied his elevation to the episcopacy, but he was afflicted at it on account of the danger to which his salvation was exposed.[11971] St. John Chrysostom when made bishop was so much terrified that, as he afterwards said, he felt as if his soul were separating from the body: he had great doubts about the salvation of a pastor of souls.[11972]But if the saints, forced against their will to become prelates, tremble for the account that they must render to God, how should he tremble who intrudes himself into an office to which is annexed the care of souls ? " The measure of honor," says St. Ambrose, " must be measured by the strength of him that is to bear it, otherwise if the bearer is too weak the burden will weigh him down and cause his ruin."[11973] A weak man who puts on his back a great weight shall not be able to carry it, but shall be oppressed by it.

St. Anselm says that he who wishes to obtain ecclesiastical honors through right and wrong does not receive them, but takes them by force.[11974] St. Bernard says the same: "Those whom we see entering of themselves the vineyard of the Lord are not laborers, but robbers." [11975] This is conformable to the words of Osee: They have reigned, but not by Me.[11976] Hence it happens, as St. Leo says, that the Church, which is governed by such ambitious ministers, is neither served nor honored, but despised and defiled.[11977]

Let us, then, attend to the beautiful lesson of Jesus Christ: Sit down in the lowest place.[11978] He who sits on the ground is not afraid of falling. We are ashes: " The place of ashes and dust is not in a high place, for they will be scattered by the wind,"[11979] says the angelic Doctor." Happy the priest who can say: I have chosen to be an abject in the house of my God rather than to dwell in the tabernacles of sinners.[11980]

3. RELATIVES

Thirdly, a priest must divest himself of attachment to relatives. If any man, says Jesus Christ, hate not his father and mother, . . . he cannot be my disciple.[11981]

But how are we to hate relatives ? We must, says a learned author, disown them in whatever is opposed to our spiritual advancement: "If they hinder us from living according to the rules of ecclesiastical discipline, if they ask that we should involve ourselves in secular business, then we must hate and shun them as our opponents."[11982]And before him St. Gregory said: " To those that are a hindrance to us on the road to God we must show by hatred and flight that we do not know them."[11983] Peter de Blois writes: "No one should be chosen priest who does not say to his father and mother, I know you not."[11984] St. Ambrose says that he who wishes to serve God ought to deny his relatives.[11985]We should honor parents, but we must first obey God, says St. Augustine.[11986] To show great kindness to relatives, and not to obey God, is, according to St. Jerome, not piety, but impiety."[11987] Our Redeemer has declared that he came on earth to detach us from relatives. I came to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, etc.[11988]And why? Because in spiritual concerns .relatives are our greatest enemies: A man's enemies shall be they of his household.[11989]

Hence St. Basil exhorts us to avoid, as a temptation of the devil, the care of the property of relatives.[11990]What a misery to see a priest who could save numberless souls altogether occupied in transacting the business of his family, and in attending to the management of farms, flocks of sheep, and the like ? What ! exclaims St. Jerome, must a priest abandon the service of the Father of heaven to please an earthly parent ?[11991] The saint says that when there is question of serving God, a son (if it be necessary) should trample on his father: " What would you do in the house of your parents, O delicate soldier !" asks the saint, "where is the wall, where the ditch ? Yes, even if the father lay across the threshold walk quietly over him, and hasten with unmoistened eyes to the banner of the cross. Filial piety in this case consists in being cruel."[11992]

St. Augustine relates that St. Anthony having received a letter from his relatives threw it into the fire, saying: "I burn you lest I be burnt by you."[11993]According to St. Gregory, he who wishes to be united with God must detach himself from relatives.[11994]Otherwise, as Peter de Blois says, the love of flesh and blood will soon deprive us of the love of God.[11995] It is difficult to find Jesus Christ in the midst of relatives. " How shall I," says St. Bonaventure, "find Thee, O Jesus ! among my relatives, since Thou wert not found among Thine?"[11996]

When the divine mother, after having found Jesus in the temple, said to him: Son, why hast Thou done so to us?[11997] the Redeemer answered: How is it that you sought Me ? did you not know that I must be about My Father's business?[11998]Such should be the answer of a priest to his relatives when they wish to charge him with the care of his family. I am a priest; I can attend only to the things of God; to you who are seculars it belongs to mind the things of the world. It was this our Lord wished to signify to the young man whom he called to follow him, when, in answer to the young man s request to be permitted to bury his father, he said: Let the dead bury the dead.[11999]

4. SELF-WILL

It is necessary, above all, to remove attachment to self-will. St. Philip Neri used to say that sanctity consists in the mortification of self-will. Blosius has asserted that he who mortifies self-will does an act more pleasing to God than if he gave life to the dead.[12000] Hence many priests and pastors, and even bishops, who led exemplary lives, and devoted their time and labor to the salvation of souls, not content with all this, have entered religion in order to live under obedience to others; believing what is really the truth that they could not offer to God a sacrifice more acceptable than the renunciation of their own will. All are not called to the religious state; but he who wishes to walk in the way of perfection (besides the obedience due to his prelate) must submit his will to the direction of at least a spiritual Father, who will guide him in all his spiritual exercises, and also in temporal affairs of importance, which are connected with the sanctification of his soul. What is done through self-will is of little or no advantage to the soul.

In the day of your fast your own will is found.[12001]Hence St. Bernard has written: "A great evil is self-will, which causes the good that you do not to be good to you."[12002] The greatest enemy we have is self-will. " Let self-will cease," says the same St. Bernard, " and there will be no longer a hell."[12003] ; Hell is full of self-will. What but our own will is the cause of our sins ? St. Augustine confessed of himself that he was impelled by grace to forsake sin, but he remained in it bound by no other chain than that of his own will.[12004]St. Bernard teaches that self-will is so opposed to God that were his destruction possible it would destroy him.[12005] He, says the same saint, who becomes his own disciple, becomes the disciple of a fool.[12006]

It is necessary to understand that all our good consists in a union with the divine will. And life in his goodwill.[12007] But, ordinarily speaking, God makes his will known to us only through our Superiors, that is, through our prelate or director. He that heareth you, says Jesus Christ, heareth Me ;[12008] and he adds: despiseth you, despiseth Me.[12009]

Hence in the Scripture not to submit to the authority of Superiors is called a species of idolatry. Because it is like the sin of witchcraft to rebel.[12010] But, on the other hand, St. Bernard assures us that in whatever our spiritual Father directs us, unless it be certainly sinful, we should feel as secure as if God himself had spoken to us.[12011]Happy he who can say at death with the Abbot John: " I have never done my own will, and never taught anything that I did not do myself."[12012] Hence Cassian, who relates this fact, has written that by the mortification of self-will all vices are destroyed.[12013] And before him the Wise Man said: An obedient man shall speak of victory.[12014] And in another place: Obedience is better than sacrifices![12015]For he who offers to God the sacrifice of alms, fasts, penitential works, sacrifices to him only a part of himself; but he who gives God his will by subjecting it to obedience, gives all that he is able to give, and can say to him: Lord, having given you my will, I have nothing more to give you. Hence St. Laurence Justinian has written that they who offer the sacrifice of self-will to God shall obtain from him whatever they ask.[12016]

And God himself has promised those who renounce self-will that he will raise them above the earth, and make them celestial men. If thou turn away thy foot . . . from doing thy own will, . . . I will lift thee up above the high places of the earth.[12017]

5. MEANS OF CONQUERING SELF-WILL

The means of conquering self-will and of subduing all irregular passions are the following:

1. Prayer: he who prays, obtains all graces. " Though prayer is but one, it can do all things,"[12018] says St. Bonaventure. And before him Jesus Christ said: You shall ask whatever you will, and it shall be done unto you.[12019]

2. To do violence to self with a determined will. A resolute will surmounts all difficulties.

3. To make our examen on the passion that molests us, and to impose a penance on ourselves as often as we yield to it.

4. To indulge in a multitude of desires. " I," said St. Francis de Sales,[12020] " desire but few things, and my desire for them is not strong."

5. To practise mortification in small things, and even in things that are not sinful; for thus we shall acquire a facility of overcoming great difficulties. For example, by abstaining from certain jests, by not indulging curiosity, not pulling a flower, not opening letters for some time after we receive them, by giving up certain undertakings, making a sacrifice of them to God, regardless of the honor that they might procure for us. What advantage do we now derive from so many gratifications ? from so many successful undertakings? Had we been mortified on such occasions, how many merits should we now have treasured up before God ! Hence forth let us labor to gain something for eternity. Let us reflect that we are drawing near the grave. The more we mortify ourselves the less we shall suffer in purgatory, and the greater the glory that we shall merit for eternity in heaven. On this earth we are only in passage: we shall soon be in eternity. I conclude with the words of St. Philip Neri: " Foolish is the man who does not become a saint."

Instruction IX

EXTERIOR MORTIFICATION

I. NECESSITY OF EXTERIOR MORTIFICATION

ST. GREGORY says that no man is fit to be a minister of God, and to offer the sacrifice of the altar, unless he has first sacrificed himself entirely to God.[12021] And St. Ambrose writes: " This is the primitive sacrifice, that every one offers himself first to God, in order afterwards to be able to offer his gift."[12022]And long before, the Redeemer said: Unless the grain of wheat falling into the ground die, itself remaineth alone.[12023]He, then, who wishes to bring forth fruits of eternal life, must die to himself; that is, he must desire nothing for his own satisfaction, and, as St. Gregory has written, he must embrace all that is mortifying to the flesh.[12024] He who is dead to himself must, according to Lanspergius, live in the world as if he saw nothing, heard nothing; as if nothing disturbed and as if nothing gave him content but God. For, says Jesus Christ, he that will save his life shall lose it.[12025]

Happy loss, exclaims St. Hilary, when everything in this world, and even life itself, is lost in order to follow Jesus Christ and to gain eternal glory.[12026]St. Bernard says that were there no other reason for giving ourselves entirely to God, it would be enough to know that God has given himself entirely to us.[12027] But to give ourselves to God without reserve, it is necessary to banish from the heart every earthly desire. " Wherever charity is augmented," says St. Augustine, " there cupidity is diminished. Freedom from all cupidity is perfection."[12028]He who least desires the goods of the earth, loves God most; he who desires nothing, loves God perfectly.

In the preceding instruction we have spoken of interior mortification: we shall now speak of external mortification, or the mortification of the senses. This species of mortification is also necessary, because on account of sin our flesh wars, as the Apostle said of himself, against reason, and is an enemy to our salvation: I see another law in my members, fighting against the law of my mind?[12029] " That is," says St. Thomas in his comment on this passage, " the concupiscence of the flesh that is struggling with reason."[12030] It is necessary to understand that the soul must bring the body under subjection, or the body will trample on the soul. God has given us senses that we employ them, not as we please, but as he directs; hence we must mortify the desires that are contrary to the divine law.

They that are Christs have crucified their flesh, with the vices and concupiscences.[12031] Hence the saints have been so careful to macerate the flesh. St. Peter of Alcantara purposed never to give any indulgence to the body, and observed his resolution till death. St. Bernard maltreated his body to such a degree, that at death he asked its pardon. St. Teresa used to say that "it would be silliness to imagine that God admits to his friendship peoples who seek their own ease and convenience;"[12032] and in another place she says: "Souls that truly love God cannot ask for comforts."[12033]And St. Ambrose has written that he who does not cease to indulge the body shall cease to please God.[12034]According to St. Augustine, he who subjects reason to the flesh is a mon ster that walks with his head downwards and his feet upwards.[12035] We are born for a more noble end than to be the slaves of the body, said the pagan Seneca.[12036] How much more should we say it, who know by faith that we have been created to enjoy God for eternity? St. Gregory says that by gratifying the desires of the flesh we only nourish enemies.[12037]

St. Ambrose weeps over the misfortune of Solomon, saying that this unhappy king had the glory of building the temple of God, but that it would have been far better for him to preserve to God the temple of his body, for the gratification of which he lost his body, his soul, and his God.[12038]

A man mounted on a furious horse must always keep the reins tight: it is thus we must treat the body. St. Bernard says that we ought to treat the flesh as a physician treats a patient who seeks what is noxious and refuses what is conducive to health. Were a physician, in order to please a sick man, to give him what should cause his death, would he not be guilty of cruelty? And in like manner, let us be persuaded that to indulge the body is not charity, but the greatest act of cruelty we can commit against ourselves; because, for a momentary indulgence of the flesh, we condemn the soul to an eternity of torments. Such is the language of St. Bernard: " Such a charity destroys charity; such mercy is full of cruelty; for in such a manner the body is served, but the soul is destroyed."[12039] In a word, we must change our palate, and follow the admonition of our Lord to St. Francis: "If you desire me, take what is bitter as sweets, and what is sweet as bitter."

Let us now attend to the fruits of external mortification.

First, it satisfies for the pains due to the pleasures in which we have indulged: these pains are far milder in this than in the next life. St. Antonine relates that an angel proposed to a sick man the choice of remaining three days in purgatory, or of being confined for two years to his bed by the infirmity under which he labored. The sick man chose the three days in purgatory; but he was scarcely an hour there when he began to complain to the angel that his purgatory, instead of continuing for three days, had lasted for several years. What! replied the angel, your body is still warm on the bed of death, and you speak of years! " If you do not wish to be punished," says St. John Chrysostom, " be your own judge chastise and amend yourself."[12040]

Secondly, mortification detaches the soul from earthly pleasures, and gives her a facility of flying to God, and of uniting herself with him. St. Francis de .Sales used to say that " if the flesh is not mortified and depressed, the soul will never be able to raise herself up to God." St. Jerome has said the same: "Only by mortification can the soul rise to heavenly things."[12041]

Thirdly, penance merits for us eternal goods, as St. Peter of Alcantara revealed from heaven to St. Teresa, saying: " O happy penance that has merited for me so much glory!"[12042]

Hence the saints have endeavored to mortify the flesh continually, and to the best of their ability. St. Francis Borgia said that he would die without consolation on any day on which he had not mortified his body by some penitential work. A life of ease and pleasure on this earth cannot be the life of a Christian.

II. PRACTICE OF EXTERIOR MORTIFICATION

If we have not fervor to mortify the body by great penances, let us at least practise some little mortifications: let us bear with patience the pains that happen to us. For example, let us submit in peace to the inconvenience, the want of sleep, the disagreeable smell that we feel in attending the dying, to the annoyance we experience in going to hear the confessions of peoples confined in prison, in hearing the confessions of the poor and the ignorant, and to similar occasions of pain or trouble. Let us at least deprive ourselves from time to time of some lawful pleasure. Clement of Alexandria says: "Whoever does everything that is allowed will soon do what is not allowed."[12043]

He who wishes to indulge in all gratifications that are in themselves lawful, will not abstain long from unlawful pleasures. That great servant of God, Vincent Carafa, of the Society of Jesus, used to say that God has given us earthly goods not only for our delight, but also that we might have a means of showing our gratitude to him by abstaining from pleasures, and giving him back his own gifts in proof of our love; for, as St. Gregory writes,[12044] he who is accustomed to renounce lawful gratifications easily abstains from forbidden pleasures.

Let us speak of the mortifications of the senses, that we can practise, and especially of the mortifications of the eyes, the taste, and the touch.

1. THE EYES AND THE WHOLE EXTERIOR

First, it is necessary to mortify the eyes. " Through the eyes," says St. Bernard, " the dart of impure love enters the heart."[12045] The first darts that wound, and sometimes kill, the chaste soul, enter through the eyes.[12046]By means of the eyes bad thoughts spring up in the mind. " What is not seen," says St. Francis de Sales, "is not desired." Hence the devil first tempts a people to look, then to desire, and afterwards to consent. Thus he acted with the Saviour himself: He showed Him all the kingdoms of the world. He then tempted him, saying: All these will I give Thee, if falling down Thou wilt adore Me.[12047] The evil spirit gained nothing by tempting Jesus Christ, but by thus tempting Eve he gained a great deal: She saw that the tree was good to eat, and fair to the eyes, . . . and she took of the fruit thereof.[12048] etc.

Tertullian says that certain little glances are the beginnings of the greatest iniquities.[12049] And St. Jerome compares the eyes to certain hooks, which drag us, as it were, by force to sin.[12050] He who wishes not to admit the enemy into the fortress, should lock the gate. The Abbot Pastor was molested by bad thoughts for forty years after having looked at a woman. In consequence of having seen a woman in the world, St. Benedict was afterwards so strongly tempted, that to conquer the flesh he threw himself naked among thorns, and thus overcame the temptations. While he lived in the cave of Bethlehem, St. Jerome was for a long time troubled with bad thoughts on account of having formerly seen certain women in Rome. These saints conquered temptations by the divine aid, by prayers and penitential works; but many others, on account of the eyes, have miserably fallen. On account of the eyes a David fell; on account of the eyes a Solomon fell. Listen to an alarming fact related by St. Augustine of Alipius. He went to the theatre, resolved not to look at any dangerous object, saying, " I will be absent though present;"[12051] but being tempted to look, he, says the saint, not only prevaricated, but also made others prevaricate: "He opened his eyes, applauded, became excited, and left the theatre carrying sin with him."[12052]Seneca justly said that blindness is a great help to preserve innocence.[12053]

It is not lawful to pull out our eyes, but we ought to make ourselves blind by closing the eyes, and by not looking at objects which may impel us to evil: He . . . that shutteth his eyes that he may see no evil, he shall dwell on high.[12054] Hence Job said that he had made a covenant with his eyes never to look at a woman, lest he should be afterwards molested by bad thoughts: I made a covenant with my eyes, that I would not so much as think upon a virgin.[12055] St. Aloysius Gonzaga never dared to raise his eyes to look at his mother. St. Peter of Alcantara abstained from looking even at his brothers in religion: he knew them not by the sight, but by the voice.

The Council of Tours tells priests that they should guard against everything that can offend the eyes or the ears.[12056] But particular caution is necessary for secular priests, who frequent public places, or the houses of seculars. If they permit the eye to look at every object that is presented to them, they shall scarcely preserve chastity. Turn away thy face, says the Holy Ghost, from a woman dressed up, . . . for many have perished by the beauty of a woman.[12057]And, says St. Augustine, should the eyes happen sometimes to fall on a woman, let us take care never to fix them on her.[12058] Hence it is necessary to abstain from going to balls, or profane comedies, which are frequented by men and women; and when through necessity a priest is obliged to go to a place in which there are women, he must pay special attention to modesty of the eyes.

Father Alvarez was once present at a public degradation of a priest, but because there were women present, he held in his hand an image of the Blessed Virgin, on which he kept his eyes constantly fixed for several hours, lest they might fall on a woman. From the moment we awake in the morning, let us pray with David: Turn away my eyes, that they may not behold vanity.[12059]

Oh! how profitable is it to us ecclesiastics, and how edifying to others, to keep the eyes cast down! St. Francis once said to his companion, that he wished to go out in order to preach a sermon: he went out and walked through the village with his eyes fixed on the ground. After they had returned, his companion asked when he intended to preach the sermon. The saint replied: We have already preached by the modesty with which we walked before the people. A certain author remarks that the Evangelists, in order to show that he ordinarily kept them cast down, mention in several places that our Redeemer raised his eyes: Lifting up His eyes on His disciples.[12060] When Jesus had lifted up His eyes.[12061]Hence St. Paul has praised the modesty of Jesus Christ, saying: I beseech you by the mildness and modesty of Christ.[12062]

St. Basil says that we should keep the eyes cast down upon the earth and the soul raised up to heaven.[12063] And St. Jerome has written, that the countenance is the mirror of the soul, and that chaste eyes indicate a chaste heart."[12064]But, on the other hand, St. Augustine says: "The immodesty of the eyes betrays the vices of the heart."[12065]t. Ambrose adds, that the motions of the body show the recollection or dissipation of the soul.[12066] Hence the saint relates that ,he foreboded the fall of two men on account of the irregularity of their gait. The prediction was verified; for one fell into impiety, and the other into heresy. Speaking especially of men whose character is sacred, St. Jerome says that their actions, language, and gesture are a lesson for seculars.[12067]

The Council of Trent has said: " They ought by all means so to regulate their whole life and conversation, as that in their dress, comportment, gait, discourse, and all things else, nothing appear but what is grave, regulated, and replete with religiousness."[12068] And St. John Chrysostom has written: " The mind of the priest should be resplendent with virtues, that it may enlighten those that look up to him."[12069]Thus the priest ought to give to all an example of modesty in all things: modesty in looks, modesty in his gait, modesty in his conversation, particularly by saying little, and by speaking as a priest ought to speak. By saying little. He who speaks much to men, shows that he converses but little with God. Men of prayer are men of few words. When the mouth of the furnace is opened, the heat rushes out. " In silence," says Thomas a Kempis, " the soul maketh progress."[12070] And St. Peter Damian calls silence the guardian of justice."[12071] We read in Isaias: In silence and in hope shall your strength be."[12072]

In silence consists our strength, for in speaking much there is always some defect. In the multitude of words there shall not want sin, says Solomon.[12073] By speaking as a priest ought to speak, St. Anselm says, " Thy mouth must be the mouth of Christ: and thou shouldst not only not open it for calumnies or lies, but not even for idle discourse."[12074] He who loves God seeks to speak always of God. He who loves a fellow-man can scarcely speak of anything else than of him. " Forget not," says Gilbert, " that thy mouth is consecrated only to heavenly sayings, and look upon it as sacrilegious if something comes forth from it that is not divine."[12075] It is, according to St. Ambrose, a violation of modesty to speak in a very loud tone.[12076] It belongs to modesty to abstain, not only from immodest words, but also from listening to them: Hedge in thy ears with thorns, hear not a wicked tongue.[12077] A priest should be modest also in his dress. St. Augustine says that in order to appear well dressed exteriorly, some strip themselves of interior modesty.[12078] Vanity and costliness of dress in a priest show that there is but little virtue in the soul. St. Bernard writes: " The poor cry out to thee: To us belongs what you waste; from our necessities is withdrawn what you bestow upon vanities."[12079]

In the 16th Canon of the second Council of Nice we read: "A priest should wear simple garments, for what goes beyond what is necessary is luxury, and this vanity will be imputed to him as a crime."[12080] The priest ought to be modest in his hair. Pope Martin ordained that ecclesiastics should not minister in the church unless their head was shorn so that the ears would be visible.[12081] What shall we say of those whom Clement of Alexandria calls " illiberales tonsos,"[12082] that is, peoples who are so much attached to their hair that they allow it to be cut only sparingly. What a shame, says St. Cyprian, for an ecclesiastic to appear with his head decked out like the head of a woman.[12083]And before him the Apostle, in his epistle to the Corinthians, said, that to nourish the hair is as disgraceful in a man as it is becoming in a woman: A man indeed if he nourish his hair, it is a shame unto him.[12084] And this he said of all, even of seculars. What, then, must we think of the ecclesiastic who curls his hair and arranges it in a worldly fashion ? Minutius Felix says that we ought to show ourselves to be ecclesiastics, not by the ornaments of the body, but by examples of modesty.[12085] St. Ambrose has written, that the deportment of a priest should be such that all who behold him may be inspired with reverence for God, whose priest and minister he is.[12086] But, on the other hand, a priest who violates modesty excites irreverence towards God.

2. THE TASTE OR APPETITE

We shall now speak on the mortification of the taste or of the appetite. In his treatise entitled The One Thing Necessary, Father Rogacci says, that the principal part of external mortification consists in the mortification of the appetite. Hence St. Andrew Avellino used to say, that he who wishes to walk in the way of perfection must begin to mortify the taste. St. Leo asserts that this has been the practice of the saints.[12087]To a penitent who practised but little mortification St. Philip Neri said, " My son, unless you mortify the appetite you shall never become a saint."[12088] St. Francis Xavier used to eat nothing but a few grains of toasted rice. St. John Francis Regis took only a little coarse flower boiled in water. St. Francis Borgia, even when a secular, and viceroy of Catalonia, was content with bread and herbs. The food of St. Peter of Alcantara was nothing more than a small quantity of broth. St. Francis de Sales says that we ought to eat in order to support life, and not live for the purpose of eating. Some appear to live for the sole purpose of eating, making, as the Apostle said, the belly their God: They are enemies of the cross of Christ; whose end is destruction, whose God is their belly.[12089] Tertullian says that the vice of gluttony kills, or at least inflicts a deep wound, on all other virtues.[12090]

The sin of gluttony has caused the ruin of the world: for the sake of eating an apple, Adam brought death on himself and the entire human race. But priests, who are bound by a vow of chastity, should pay special attention to the mortification of the appetite. St. Bonaventure says that excess in eating nourishes impurity.[12091] And St. Augustine has written: " If the soul is weighed down by too much food, the mind becomes torpid, and there will spring up thorns of wicked desires,"[12092] Hence in the forty-second Canon of the Apostles we read: "Those priests are to be deposed that are given excessively to good cheer."[12093] ; The Wise Man has said, that he who accustoms servants to delicate food shall not find them obedient to his commands: He that nourishes a servant delicately from his childhood, afterwards shall find him stubborn.[12094] St. Augustine exhorts us not to give the flesh strength to fight against the soul.[12095] Palladius relates that a certain monk being asked why he treated his body so badly, said: " I trouble him that troubles me."[12096] St. Paul has done and said the same. I chastise my body, and bring it into subjection.[12097] If the flesh is not mortified, it obeys reason only with difficulty. But, on the other hand, according to St. Thomas, the devil, when vanquished in his temptations to the indulgence of the appetite, ceases to tempt to impurity.[12098]

Cornelius à Lapide says that when intemperance is overcome, all other vices are easily conquered.[12099] Blosius remarks that many find it easier to conquer other vices than the vice of intemperance.[12100] But some may say God has purposely created the various kinds of food that we may enjoy them. I answer, God has created them that they may serve for the support of life, but not to be abused by intemperance. There are some delicious meats that are not necessary for the support of life; these God has created, that by sometimes abstaining from them we may practise mortification. God created the apple that he forbade Adam to eat, that Adam might abstain from it. Let us at least practise temperance in the use of delicacies. To practise temperance, St. Bonaventure says that we must avoid four things: first, eating out of the time of meals, as animals do; secondly, eating with too much avidity, like famished dogs; thirdly, eating too large a quantity, of food; and fourthly, we must avoid too much delicacy. [12101] What a shame to see a priest seeking a variety of meats, dressed in various ways, and giving trouble and annoyance to servants, and to the whole house, when everything is not prepared so as to please his taste. Fervent priests are satisfied with what is placed before them. Reflect on the words of St. Jerome: " The cleric cannot easily escape contempt if he frequently accepts invitations to dinner."[12102]

Hence exemplary priests fly from banquets, in which, ordinarily speaking, there is a want of modesty and of temperance. " Lay people," adds the holy Doctor, " would rather enjoy our consolations in their trials than our presence at their banquets."[12103]

3. THE TOUCH

Thirdly, with regard to the sense of touch, it is necessary, in the first place, to abstain from familiarity with peoples of the opposite sex, even though they are relatives. You will say: They are my sisters, my nieces; yes, but they are women. With regard to this sense (which is very dangerous for pr iests), they must use all possible caution and modesty with themselves. Everyone of you, says St. Paul, should know how to possess his vessel in sanctification and honor, . . . not in the passion of lust.[12104]

Holy priests are accustomed to practise some painful penitential works, such as the discipline, or the use of little chains. Some despise these things, saying that sanctity consists in the mortification of the will. But I find that all the saints have thirsted after penitential austerities, and have sought to macerate the flesh to the utmost of their power. St. Peter of Alcantara wore a hair-shirt of punched iron, which kept his shoulders constantly lacerated. St. John of the Cross wore a waistcoat armed with iron points, and an iron chain, which could not be removed after his death without taking with it a piece of the flesh. This saint used to say that a people who should teach lax doctrine regarding the mortification of the flesh ought not to be believed, even though he confirmed it by miracles.[12105]

It is true that interior mortification is the most necessary; but exterior mortification is also indispensable. To a people who wished to dissuade him from macerating his body, by saying that sanctity consists in conquering self-will, St. Aloysius Gonzaga replied, in the words of the Gospel: These things you ought to have done, and not leave those undone.[12106] To Mother Mary of Jesus, of the Order of St. Teresa, our Lord said the world is destroyed not by penitential works, but by pleasures. "Mortify your body and you will conquer the devil says St. Augustine.[12107] The remedy of the saints, particularly in temptations against purity, was the maceration of the flesh. In temptations contrary to chastity, St. Benedict and St. Francis rolled themselves among thorns. Father Rodriguez says, " If a people had entwined round him a serpent, which by its poisoned bites would seek to kill him, surely if he could not take away its life he would at least endeavor to draw its blood and diminish its strength, in order to render it less able to injure him." Job tells us that wisdom is not found among earthly delights: Man knoweth not the price thereof, neither is it found in the land of them that live in delights"[12108] In one place the Spouse in the Canticles said that he dwells on the mountain of myrrh: I will go to the mountain of myrrh;[12109] and in another, that he feeds among the lilies: Who feedeth among the lilies.[12110]

In reconciling these two passages, Philibert says that on the mountain of myrrh, where the flesh is mortified, the lilies of purity spring up and flourish.[12111] Should a people have ever violated chastity, reason requires that he should afterwards chastise the flesh: For as you have yielded your members to serve uncleanness and iniquity unto iniquity, so now yield your members to serve justice unto sanctification.[12112]

4. INVOLUNTARY MORTIFICATIONS

If we have not courage to mortify the flesh by works of penance, let us at least endeavor to accept with patience the mortifications arising from the infirmities, the heat and cold, that God sends us. St. Francis Borgia once arrived late at a college of the Order, and was obliged to remain all night in the open air, exposed to the cold and snow. In the morning the Fathers of the college were afflicted at what had happened; but the saint said he was greatly consoled by thinking that God had sent the wind, the frost, and snow. " Hasten,

O Lord," says St. Bonaventure, " hasten to wound Thy servants with Thy sacred wounds, lest they be wounded by deadly wounds of vice."[12113] This we, too, should say when we are afflicted with sickness and pains: Lord, chastise me with these healing wounds, that I may be freed from the deadly wounds of the flesh; or let us say with St. Bernard: "It is just that he should be bowed down and become sad who has despised Thee, O Lord! "[12114]

Yes, my God, it is just that I who have insulted you should suffer affliction: I have been con demned to eternal death; let me, then, be crucified in this life, that I may not be tormented for eternity in the next.

Let us at least bear the pains that God sends us. A certain author well observes, that a people who does not embrace voluntary pains will scarcely bear involuntary sufferings with perfect patience. And, on the other hand, St. Anselm says: "God will cease to chastise the sinner who voluntarily punishes himself for his sins."[12115]

III. THE GOOD THAT IS DERIVED FROM A MORTIFIED LIFE

Some imagine that a life of mortification is an unhappy life. No: the life of the man who practises mortification is not unhappy; but the life of him who indulges his senses so as to offend God is truly miserable: Who hath resisted Him, and hath had peace ?[12116]A soul in sin is a sea agitated by the tempest: The wicked are like the raging sea, which cannot rest.[12117] St. Augustine says that the man who is not in peace with God is an enemy that wages war against himself.[12118] The gratifications that we give the body fight against us, and make us unhappy: From whence are wars and contentions amongst you ? Are they not hence—from your concupiscences, which war in your members ?[12119] On the other hand, the Lord says: To him that overcometh, I will give the hidden manna.[12120]

To them who practise mortification God gives that sweetness and peace that are hidden from the unmortified, and that surpass all sensual pleasures: The peace of God, which surpasseth all understanding[12121] Hence they who live dead to earthly delights are pronounced happy: Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord.[12122] Worldlings regard as miserable the life of those who live at a distance from sensual gratifications. They see the Cross, but not its interior unction.[12123] says St. Bernard; they see the mortifications of the saints, but not the interior consolations with which God caresses them, even in this life. The promises of God cannot fail: Take up My yoke upon you, . . . and you shall find rest to your souls."[12124] Ah! the soul that loves God suffers not in her mortifications. He who loves, finds nothing difficult, says St. Augustine[12125]" Love," says a certain author, " blushes at the word difficulty."[12126] As nothing resists death, so nothing resists love: Love is as strong as death[12127] If we wish to acquire eternal delights, we must deprive ourselves of temporal pleasures: He that will save his life shall lose it.[12128] Hence St. Augustine says: " Beware of enjoying yourself in this life, lest you suffer eternally."[12129] St. John saw all the saints with palms in their hands.[12130] To be saved, we must all be martyrs, either by the sword of the tyrant or by voluntary mortification.

Let us reflect that all we suffer is nothing compared with the eternal glory which awaits us: The sufferings of this time are not worthy to be compared with the glory to come, that shall be revealed in us.[12131]The transitory pains of this life shall merit for us eternal beatitude: For that which is at present momentary and light of our tribulation, worketh for us above measure exceedingly an eternal weight of glory.[12132] Hence Philo the Jew has written: " The pleasures which we give the body to the detriment of the soul are thefts of the glory of heaven, which we commit against ourselves."[12133]On the other hand, St. John Chrysostom says that when God gives us an occasion of suffering, he bestows a greater grace than if he gave us power to restore life to the dead.[12134]He assigns the reason, saying: " For the miracles I am a debtor to God, and by suffering with patience I have Christ as my debtor."[12135]The saints are the living stones that compose the heavenly Jerusalem: As living stones built up, a spiritual house![12136] But these must be first polished by the chisel of mortification, as is sung by the Church:

> Many a blow and biting sculpture
> Polished well those stones elect,
> In their places now compacted
> By the heavenly Architect. "[12137]

Hence every act of mortification is a work for heaven. This thought will sweeten all the bitterness we shall feel in mortification: The just man liveth by faith.[12138] To live well, and obtain salvation, we must live by faith, that is, in view of the eternity which awaits us: Man shall go into the house of his eternity.[12139] Let us consider, says St. Augustine, that at the very time when the Lord exhorts us to combat against temptations, he assists us, and prepares a crown for us.[12140] Speaking of wrestlers, the Apostle said, that they abstain from everything that can be an obstacle to their winning a miserable temporal crown; how much more ought we to die to all things in order to acquire an infinite and eternal crown: Every one that striveth for the mastery refraineth himself from all things ; and they indeed that they may receive a corruptible crown, but we an incorruptible one."[12141]

Instruction X THE LOVE OF GOD

I. SPECIAL OBLIGATION FOR THE PRIEST TO BELONG ENTIRELY TO GOD

PETER DE BLOIS says that a priest without divine love "may be called a priest but is not a priest."[12142]From the day of his ordination a priest is no longer his own, but belongs to God. St. Ambrose has said: "A true minister of the altar is in the world for God and not for himself."[12143]And before him God himself said: They offer the burnt-offering of the Lord, and the bread of their God, and therefore they shall be holy:" [12144] Origen has called a priest "a being consecrated to God."[12145] From his very entrance into the ecclesiastical state the priest declared that he wished for no other portion than God.[12146] If, then, adds St. Ambrose, God is the portion of the priest, he should live only for God.[12147]

Hence the Apostle has said, that he who is devoted to the service of the divine majesty should not engage in worldly affairs, but should seek only to please him to whom he has given himself: No man being a soldier to God, entangleth himself with secular business; that he may please Him to Whom he hath engaged himself[12148] Jesus Christ forbade the young man who wished to become one of his disciples to return home for the purpose of burying his father: Follow Me, and let the dead bury the dead.[12149] This lesson was, as the same St. Ambrose writes, directed to all ecclesiastics, to teach them that it is their duty to prefer the concerns of the divine glory to all human affairs, which may be an obstacle to their belonging entirely to God.[12150]

Even in the Old Law, God declared to the priests that he had chosen them from among the people that they might be his without reserve. Hence he told them that they should have no possession, no portion among seculars, because he himself wished to be their portion and inheritance: You shall possess nothing in their land, neither shall you have a portion among them: I am thy portion and inheritance in the midst of the children of Israel.[12151] On this passage Oleaster writes: " O priest! understand what great happiness God has conferred upon thee by wishing to have thee as his inheritance. And what can be wanting to thee if thou possesses! God ?"[12152] The priest, then, should say with St. Augustine: " Let others choose for their portion temporal things; God is my portion."[12153]

And, says St. Anselm, if we love not God, what shall we love?[12154] The Emperor Diocletian placed before St. Clement gold, silver, and precious stones, in order to induce him to deny the faith: seeing his God put in comparison with a little dust, the saint heaved a sigh of sorrow: But one thing is necessary.[12155] He who possesses all things without God, has nothing; but he who possesses God without anything else, has all things. Hence, St. Francis had reason to say, and to repeat, as he did for an entire night, My God, and my all. Happy, then, is he who can say with David: For what have I in heaven ? and besides Thee what do I desire upon earth ? . . . God is my portion forever. [12156] My God, neither in heaven nor on earth do I wish for anything but Thee. Thou art, and shall be always, the Lord of my heart, and my only riches.

God deserves to be loved for his own sake, because he is an object worthy of infinite love: but we should love him, at least, through gratitude for the infinite love he has shown in the benefit of redemption. What more could God do for us, than become man and die for us ? Greater love than this no man hath, that a man lay down his life for his friends."[12157] Before redemption, men could doubt if God loved them with a tender love; but how can they doubt it after having seen him dead on a cross for the love of them. This has been, as it was called by Moses and Elias on Mount Thabor, an excess of love: And they spoke of His decease [excess] that He should accomplish in Jerusalem.[12158]An excess that all the angels shall not be able to comprehend for all eternity.

Who among men, says St. Anselm, could deserve that a God should die for him?[12159] But it is certain that this Son of God has died for each of us: Christ died for all.[12160] The Apostle writes, that when the death of our Saviour was preached to the Gentiles it appeared to them foolishness: We preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews indeed a stumbling-block, and unto the Gentiles foolishness.[12161]It was neither foolishness nor a lie, but a truth of faith, a truth which, as St. Laurence Justinian says, makes a God appear to us foolish through love for man.[12162] O God, if Jesus Christ wished to show his love for his eternal Father, could he give him a more convincing proof than by dying on a cross, as he has died, for each of us? I say more: If a servant had died for us, could we but love him ? But where is our love and gratitude towards Jesus Christ? Let us at least frequently remember what our Redeemer has done and suffered for us. They who frequently remember his Passion give great pleasure to Jesus Christ. If a people submitted to insults, wounds, and imprisonment for the sake of a friend, how great should his gratification be at hearing that the friend frequently remembered and thought of his sufferings. Ah! the soul that frequently thinks on the Passion of Jesus Christ, and on the love that that enamoured God has shown us in his pains and humiliations, cannot but feel herself chained to his love: The charity of Christ presseth us.[12163]

But if all should burn with love for Jesus Christ, we priests should love him with a special love; for Jesus Christ has died in a special manner to make us priests: for, as has been said in Chapter I., without the death of Jesus Christ we should not have the holy and immaculate victim that we now offer to God. Justly, then, has St. Ambrose said: "Although Christ has suffered for all, he has especially suffered for us. But he that receives more, owes more. Let us render love to him for the blood that he has shed for us."[12164]

Let us endeavor to understand the love that Jesus Christ has shown us in his Passion, and we shall certainly renounce the love of creatures, " Oh, if you knew the mystery of the cross!"[12165] said the Apostle St. Andrew to the tyrant who tempted him to deny Jesus Christ. As if he said, O tyrant! if you knew the love that your God has for you, and his desire for your salvation, you would certainly cease to tempt me, and through gratitude for so much love, you would devote yourself to his love. Happy, then, the man who keeps constantly before his eyes the wounds of Jesus Christ! You shall draw waters with joy out of the Saviours fountains.[12166] Oh, what waters of devotion, what lights and affections, do the saints draw from these fountains of salvation! Father Alvarez used to say, that the ignorance of the riches that we have in Jesus Christ is the cause of the ruin of Christians. The learned boast of their science, but the Apostle gloried in nothing but in the knowledge of Jesus Christ crucified: For I judged not myself to know anything among you, but Jesus Christ, and Him crucified.[12167]

Of what advantage are all sciences to him who knows not how to love Jesus Christ ? And if . . . I should know . . . all science, said the same Apostle, and have not charity, I am nothing.[12168] In another place he said that to gain Jesus Christ he esteemed all things as dung: I count all things to be but loss, and count them but as dung, that I may gain Christ.[12169] Hence he gloried in calling himself the prisoner of Jesus Christ: I, Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ.[12170]

Oh, happy the priest who, bound by these holy chains, gives himself entirely to Jesus Christ! God loves a soul that gives herself entirely to him, more than he does a hundred imperfect souls. If a prince had a hundred servants, ninety-nine of whom served him with little affection, always giving him some displeasure, and had one that served him through pure love, always seeking to please him to the utmost of his power, surely the prince would love that faithful servant more than all the others: There are young maidens without number. One is my dove, my perfect one. [12171]The Lord loves the soul that serves him perfectly, as if he had no other to love but her. St. Bernard says: " Learn from Christ how to love Christ."[12172] From his birth Jesus Christ has given himself entirely to us: For a Child is born to us, and a Son is given to us.[12173]

And he has given himself through love*: Christ also hath loved us, and hath delivered Himself for us.*[12174] It is just, then, that we also through love give ourselves entirely to Jesus Christ. He, says St. John Chrysostom, has given himself without reserve to you, bestowing upon you his blood, his life, his merits.[12175] It is but just that you, too, give yourself without reserve to Jesus Christ, says St. Bernard.[12176] But if this holds for all, it applies in a special manner to priests. Hence, addressing particularly the priests of his Order, St. Francis of Assisi, knowing the special obligation of a priest to belong entirely to Jesus Christ, said: " Keep nothing back of yourselves, so that he who offers himself entirely may also receive you."[12177] The Redeemer has died for all, that each may live no longer to himself, but only to that God who has given his life for him: Christ died for all; that they also, who live, may not now live to themselves, but unto Him who died for them.[12178] Oh that each of us would continually say to God with St. Augustine: " May I die to myself that I may live only for Thee!"[12179] But to belong entirely to God, we must give him our whole, .undivided love, says St. Augustine.[12180] He cannot belong entirely to God who loves anything which is not God, or loves it not for God, continues St. Augustine. " Let your soul," cries out St. Bernard, "be one, that you may serve God alone."[12181]

Ah! redeemed soul, divide not your love among creatures; keep yourself alone for that God who alone merits all your love. It was this that Blessed Egidius meant by the words una, uni, that is, the one soul which we have, we ought not to divide, but give entirely to that one God whose love for us exceeds the love of all others, and whose claims to our love surpass the claims of all.

II. MEANS TO BE EMPLOYED FOR BELONGING ENTIRELY TO GOD

1. DESIRE FOR PERFECTION

Let us now see what a priest must do in order to belong entirely to God. First of all, he must have a great desire of sanctity: For the beginning of her is the most true desire of discipline.[12182] Holy desires are the wings with which souls fly to God: But the path of the just, as a shining light, goeth forward, and increaseth even to perfect day.[12183] The way of the just is like the light of the sun, which from his rising increases as he advances in his course; but, on the other hand, the light of sinners, like that of the evening, constantly grows more dim, until it is entirely lost, so that the miserable beings no longer see where they are going: The way of the wicked is darksome; they know not where they fall.[12184]Miserable, then, the man who is content with his conduct, and seeks not to advance. " Not to advance is to go backward,"[12185] says St. Augustine. And St. Gregory has said,[12186] he who remains in a river without making an effort to make way against the current, shall be carried back by it.

Hence St. Bernard said to a tepid soul, " You do not wish to advance. You will then go backward."[12187] Are you unwilling to advance? Then you wish to go backward. You perhaps will answer: I wish to remain as I am, neither better nor worse. But this is impossible. "This," adds the saint, " is what cannot be done."[12188] This cannot be, since Job has said, that man never continueth in the same state.[12189] To win the prize that is, the eternal crown, we must run till we obtain it: So run that you may obtain.[12190] He who ceases to run, shall lose all his labor and the crown of glory.

Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after justice.[12191] For, as the divine mother said, God fills with his graces the souls that desire to become saints. He hath filled the hungry with good things. Mark the words, the hungry, those that hunger.[12192] But to become a saint, a simple desire is not enough: a strong desire, and a certain hunger after sanctity, are necessary. As flame runs through a dry reed, so they who have this blessed hunger do not walk, but run in the way of virtue. The just shall shine, and shall run to and fro like sparks among the reeds.[12193]Who, then, shall become a saint ? He who wishes to become one: If thou wilt be perfect, go, etc.[12194] But he must wish for sanctity with true humility.

The tepid Christian, as the Wise Man says, also wills, but not with a sincere will. He desires, and always desires, but his desires bring him to destruction; for he feeds on them, and in the mean time goes from bad to worse*: The sluggard willeth and willeth not.*[12195] Desires kill the slothful.[12196]Wisdom, that is sanctity, is easily found by them who seek it: It is found by them that seek her.[12197]But to find sanctity it is not enough to desire it; we must desire it with a determined will to attain it: If you seek, seek.[12198]says Isaias. He who desires sanctity with a resolute will of acquiring it, easily attains it. " Not with the feet of the body," says St. Bernard, "but with the desires of the soul; is God sought."[12199] And St. Teresa has written: "Let our thoughts be great; from great thoughts our advancement shall come. Our desires must not be low and grovelling, but we must trust in God; that, gradually doing violence to ourselves, we shall, with the divine grace, arrive at the sanctity which the saints have attained."[12200]

Open thy mouth wide, says the Lord, and I will fill it.[12201]A mother cannot give suck to an infant if it open not its mouth to take the milk. Open thy mouth wide; that is, says St. Athanasius, "Increase thy desires."[12202] By holy desires the saints have arrived at perfection in a short time: Being made perfect in a short time, he fulfilled a long time.[12203]This was verified particularly in St. Aloysius Gonzaga, who in a few years attained such sublime sanctity, that to St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi, who saw him in bliss, it appeared that his glory was scarcely surpassed by that of any of the saints. And she was told that he attained to such glory by the ardor with which he desired, during life, to love God as much as he deserved to be loved.

Desires, says St. Laurence Justinian, give strength to the soul, and render labor light.[12204] Hence the saint adds, that he who has an ardent desire of victory has already conquered.[12205] St. Augustine has said: "For him that labors, the road is narrow; for him that loves, it is wide."[12206] To him who has but little love for sanctity, the way is narrow and difficult to be trodden; but he who ardently loves perfection, finds the way broad, and walks in it without labor. The broadness, then, of the way is found not in the way, but in the heart; that is, in a determined will to please God: I have run the way of Thy commandments , when Thou didst enlarge my heart.[12207] Blosius says that the Lord is not less pleased by holy desires than by ardent love.[12208]

He that has not the desire of becoming a saint, let him at least ask it of God, and God will give it to him. And let us be persuaded that to become a saint is not difficult to him who desires it. In the world it is difficult for a vassal to obtain the friendship of his sovereign, however ardently he may desire it, but, said the courtier of the emperor mentioned by St. Augustine, to obtain the friendship of God it is enough to wish for it: " Behold, if I wish I am instantly his friend!"[12209]

And St. Bernard has written that a man cannot have a greater proof of being the friend of God, and of enjoying his grace, than when he desires greater grace in order to please God.[12210] And, adds the saint, it matters not that he should have been a sinner, for " God attends not to what a man has done, but to what he wishes to be."[12211]

2. THE INTENTION OF PLEASING GOD IN ALL THINGS

Secondly, the priest who wishes to be a saint, must do all his actions for the sole purpose of pleasing God. All his words, thoughts, desires, and actions must be an exercise of divine love. The spouse in the Canticles assumed at one time the character of a fowler; at another, of a warrior; now a gardener; again, a cultivator of the vine; but in all these occupations she presented the appearance of a lover, because she did all for the love of her spouse. So, in like manner, all the words, thoughts, sufferings, actions, of a priest, whether he says Mass or hears confessions, or preaches, or meditates, or assists the dying, or mortifies the flesh, or whatever else he does, should all proceed from the same love; for he ought to do all in order to please God.

Jesus Christ has said: If thy eye be single, thy whole body shall be lightsome.[12212] By the eye the holy Fathers have understood the intention. Then, says St. Augustine, " The intention makes the work good."[12213] The Lord said to Samuel: Man seeth those things that appear, but the Lord beholdeth the heart.[12214] Men are satisfied with the works that they see, but God, who beholds the heart, is not content with any work unless he sees it performed with a view to please himself.

I will offer up to Thee holocausts full of marrow.[12215] says David. Works performed without the proper intention, are victims without marrow, which God rejects. In the oblations made to him he regards not the value of the offering, but the affection with which it is presented. " God," says Salvian, " looks not so much at the value of the offering as at the disposition with which it is offered."[12216] Of our Saviour it was justly said: He hath done all things well.[12217] For in all his actions he sought only the pleasure of his eternal Father: I seek not my own will, but the will of Him that sent me.[12218] But, alas! only few of our works are perfectly pleasing to God; because few are done without some desire of our own glory. " It is rare," says St. Jerome, " to find a faithful soul that never acts out of vain-glory."[12219]How many priests on the day of judgment shall say to Jesus Christ: Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied, and cast out devils in Thy name, and done many miracles in Thy name ?[12220] Lord, we have preached, we have celebrated Masses, we have heard confessions, we have converted souls, we have assisted the dying. The Lord shall answer: I never knew you : depart from Me, you that work iniquity.[12221] He shall say: Begone, I have never known you as my ministers, for you have not labored for me, but for your own glory or interest.

Hence Jesus Christ exhorts us to conceal the works which we perform: Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doth.[12222] The Son of God tells us to conceal our works, that, as St. Augustine remarks, what we do for God may not be afterwards lost through vanity.[12223] God abominates rapine in the holocaust: I the Lord . . . hate robbery in a holocaust.[12224] By rapine is meant precisely the seeking of our own glory, or of self-interest in the works of God. He who truly loves, says St. Bernard, merits a reward, but does not seek it: the only recompense that he demands is to please the God whom he loves.[12225] In a word, as the same saint says in another place, " True love is content with itself;"[12226] that is, with being love, and demands nothing more. The marks by which a priest may know whether he acts with a pure intention are the following:

1. If he loves works that are attended with greater inconvenience and less glory.

2. If he preserves peace when he has not attained the object that he proposed. He who works for God has already attained his end, which is to please God; and, on the other hand, he who is disturbed when he fails in the attainment of his object shows that he has not labored solely for God.

3. If he rejoices in the good done by others as if it had been done by himself, and entertains no jealousy when others engage in the works that he performs, but desires to see all laboring to give glory to God, and says with Moses: Oh that all the people might prophesy[12227]

The days of the priest who performs all his actions for God are full days: And full days shall be found in them.[12228] But of them who act for a selfish end, it is said that they do not reach even the half of their days: Deceitful men shall not live out half their days.[12229] Hence St. Eucherius of Lyons has written, that we ought to consider ourselves to have lived only on the day on which we have denied our own will.[12230] Seneca says that he who makes us a small present through love, imposes on us a greater obligation than another who bestows great favors upon us through a motive of self-interest.[12231] Certainly the Lord is more pleased by a trifling act performed in order to do his will, than by the most splendid works done for our own satisfaction. Of the poor widow who gave two mites in the temple, Jesus Christ said that she gave more than all the others: This poor widow hath cast in more than all.[12232]On this passage St. Cyprian says: " The Lord does not regard how much is given, but with what sentiments it is given."[12233] The Lord regarded not the sum, but the affection with which it was given. The Abbot Pambo, seeing a woman decked out in costly ornaments, began to weep. Being asked the cause of his tears, he said: " O God! how much more does this woman do to please men than I do to please God !"

In the Life of St. Louis, king of France, it is related that a Father of the Order of St. Dominic, who was going to court, asked a woman whom he saw with a lighted torch in one hand and a vessel of water in the other, why she carried these things; she answered: With this torch I wish to burn heaven, and with this water I desire to extinguish hell, that God may be loved solely because he deserves all love. Oh, happy the priest who labors only to please God! He who seeks only to please God imitates the souls in heaven, who, as the angelic Doctor says, " wish that He rather than themselves should be happy. "[12234] They rejoice more in the felicity of God than in their own happiness, because they love him more than themselves.

3. PATIENCE IN PAINS AND HUMILIATIONS

Thirdly, the priest who wishes to be holy must be ready to suffer in peace for God all things poverty, dishonor, infirmity, and death. The Apostle says: You bear God in your body?[12235] In his comment on this text, Gilbert says*: "Jesus Christ wishes to be carried by us in peace and joy. He who carries him with tediousness or complaint, carries not, but drags him by force."*[12236] The love that a soul bears—to God is shown in embracing not delights, but insults and sufferings. This we learn from the words of our Redeemer when he went to meet the soldiers who came to capture him, in order to put him to death: But that the world may know that I love the Father. . . . Arise, let us go hence.[12237]

Hence the saints in imitation of Jesus Christ, have gone with joy to embrace torments and death. St. Joseph of Leonessa, a capuchin, was once obliged to undergo a painful operation. When some peoples present spoke of binding him with cords, he took the crucifix into his hands and said: "What cords! what cords!" My Lord, who was nailed to the cross for my sake, binds me sufficiently to endure all pain for the love of him. Thus he bore the incision without complaint. St. Teresa said: "Who is there that can behold his Lord covered with wounds, and persecuted by enemies, without being willing to embrace and desirous of suffering every tribulation?"[12238] St. Bernard writes: "To him who loves his crucified God, insults and pains are very acceptable."[12239]

The Apostle says that in patience particularly we priests should make ourselves known as the ministers of Jesus Christ: Let us exhibit ourselves as the ministers of God, in much patience, in tribulation, in necessities, in distresses, . . . in labours.[12240] Thomas a Kempis has written: "When the Day of Judgment cometh, it will not be asked of us what we have read, but what we have done."[12241] Many men of learning are acquainted with many things, but know not how to bear anything for God; and what is worse, they are incapable of understanding the great fault which they commit by their impatience. Who have eyes, and see not,[12242] says the Prophet Jeremias.

What does learning profit the man who has not charity? says St. Paul. And if . . . I should know all mysteries and all knowledge, . . . and have not charity, I am nothing.[12243] But, as the same Apostle has observed, Charity beareth all things.[12244]He who wishes to become a saint must suffer persecution. All that live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution.[12245] And before him our Saviour said : If they have persecuted Me, they will also persecute you.[12246] The life of a saint cannot, says St. Hilary, be a life of quiet and tranquillity: it must be often disturbed by contradictions and tried by patience.[12247] The Lord chastises those whom he accepts for his children: For whom the Lord loveth, He chastiseth: and He scourgeth every son whom He receiveth.[12248] Such as I love I rebuke and chastise.[12249] And why ? Because patience tries the love and perfect fidelity of a soul: Patience hath a perfect work.[12250] It was this that the Archangel Raphæl meant to say to holy Tobias: Because thou wast acceptable to God, it was necessary that temptation should prove thee.[12251] Sometimes we shall be reproved for a fault which we have not committed; but "what matter?" says St. Augustine; "we ought to accept the reproof in atonement for other sins to which we have consented."[12252]

Let us attend to the words of holy Judith, who says that in this life chastisements come from God, not for our destruction, but that we may amend, and thus escape eternal vengeance : They have happened for our amendment, and not for our destruction.[12253] If, then, on account of past sins, we find ourselves debtors to the divine justice, we should not only accept with patience the tribulations that befall us, but should also pray with St. Augustine: " Here burn, here cut, here do not spare, that Thou mayest spare us in eternity."[12254]

Job said: If we have received good things at the hand of God, why should we not receive evil?[12255] He said this because he well knew that we gain far more by patiently accepting the evils, that is, the tribulations of this life, than we do by temporal blessings. But whether we will or not, we must suffer the miseries of this life: he who bears them with patience merits heaven, but he who is impatient under them also suffers from them, but lays up merits for hell, says St. Augustine.[12256]Speaking of the good and the wicked thief, the same saint says: "The cross united them; the manner of carrying the cross separated them."[12257] Both suffered death, but one of them, because he accepted it with patience, was saved; the other, because he blasphemed in his suffering, was lost. St. John the Apostle saw that the saints who were in the enjoyment of the beatific vision came not from the delights of the earth, but from tribulations: These are they who are come out of great tribulation; . . . therefore they are before the throne of God.[12258]

4. CONFORMITY TO THE WILL OF GOD

Fourthly and lastly, he who wishes to be a saint must wish only what God wishes. All our good consists in uniting ourselves to the will of God: And life in His good-will[12259] St. Teresa says: "All that he who practises mental prayer should seek, is to conform his will to the divine will; let him be assured that in this consists the highest perfection."[12260] All that the Lord demands of us is, that we give him our heart; that is, our will: My son, give Me thy heart.[12261] St. Anselm says that God asks and, as it were, begs our heart; and when cast off, he does not depart, but repeats his petitions[12262]

The most acceptable offering, then, that we can present to God is the oblation of our will, saying with the Apostle: Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do ?[12263] Hence St. Augustine has written: "We can do nothing more pleasing than to say to him, Do Thou possess us." The Lord said that he had found in David a man according to his own heart. And why? Because David fulfilled all his divine wills: I have found David, the son of Jesse, a man according to my own heart.[12264]Let us endeavor to say always with David: Teach me to do Thy will.[12265] Lord, teach me to do nothing but what Thou wiliest.[12266]

Hence we must frequently offer ourselves to God, saying with the same holy prophet: My heart is ready, O God! my heart is ready.[12267] But we must remember that our merit consists in embracing the divine will, not so much in things that are pleasing to us, as in those that are opposed to self-love. In these we show the strength of the love we bear to God. The Venerable John d'Avila used to say, that a si ngle Blessed be God, in things that are opposed to our inclination, is of greater value than six thousand acts of thanksgiving in what is agreeable to us. And here it is necessary to understand that all that befalls us happens through the will of God, says St. Augustine.[12268] This is the meaning of the words of Ecclesiasticus: Good things and evil, life and death, poverty and riches, are from God.[12269] Thus when a people offends us, God wills not his sin, but he wills that we bear with the insult. When our reputation or property is taken away, we must say with holy Job: The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away: as it hath pleased the Lord so is it done![12270]

He who loves the will of God enjoys continual peace even in this life. Delight in the Lord, and He will give thee the requests of thy heart, said David.[12271] Our heart, which has been created for an infinite good, cannot be satisfied by all creatures which are finite; and therefore, though it should possess all goods but God, the heart is not content; it always seeks after new enjoyments: but when it finds God, it possesses all things he satisfies all its demands.

Hence our Lord said to the Samaritan woman: He that shall drink of the water that I will give him, shall not thirst forever.[12272]And in another place he said: Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after justice, for they shall have their fill.[12273]Hence he who loves God is not afflicted at anything that happens: Whatsoever shall befall the just man, it shall not make him sad.[12274] For the just man knows that whatever occurs, happens to him by the will of God. If, says Salvian, the saints are humbled, they wish for the humiliation; if they are poor, they rejoice in their poverty; in a word, they wish only what their God wishes, and therefore they enjoy continual peace.[12275] In afflictions it is lawful to pray to be delivered from them, as Jesus Christ did in the garden: My Father, if it be possible, let this chalice pass from Me? But we must also add with the Redeemer: Nevertheless, not as I will, but as Thou wilt.[12276]

It is certain tliat what God wills is best for us. Father John d'Avila once wrote to a sick priest: " Friend, think not of what you would do if you were in health, but be content to remain sick as long as it shall please God. If you seek the will of God, is it not as profitable to you to be sick as to be in health ?"[12277] We must be resigned in all things, even in the temptations by which we are impelled to offend God.

The Apostle besought the Lord to deliver him from the many temptations which he suffered against chastity: There was given me a sting of my flesh. . . . For which thing thrice I besought the Lord, that it might depart from me.[12278] But in answer God said to him: My grace is sufficient for thee.[12279]Let us be persuaded that God not only desires, but is also solicitous for our welfare. The Lord is careful for me.[12280] Let us, then, abandon ourselves into the hands of God, for he has care of us: Casting all your care upon Him, for He hath care of you."[12281]

Finally, how happy shall be the death of a soul perfectly conformed to the will of God! But he who wishes to die in sentiments of perfect conformity to the divine will must first conform to it in all things during life. Let us, then, in all contradictions and crosses that befall us accustom ourselves to acts of resignation, always repeating with the saints that great prayer which Jesus Christ has taught us: "Thy will be done; Thy will be done."[12282] Or let us repeat the words of the same Saviour: Yea, Father; for so hath it seemed good in Thy sight.[12283] And let us continually offer ourselves to God, saying with the divine Mother: " Behold the handmaid of the Lord."[12284] Lord, behold your servant, dispose of me, and of all that belongs to me, as you please; I accept all from your hands. St. Teresa used to offer herself fifty times in the day to God. Let us also say to him, with the Apostle: O Lord, what wilt Thou have me do.[12285] My God, make known to me what Thou wishest from me, and I will do it.

The saints have done great things in order to accomplish the will of God. Some have fled into the desert, others have shut themselves up in the cloister, and others have suffered torments and death. Let us also who are priests, and are bound by stricter obligations to sanctity, unite ourselves to the divine will; let us become saints; let us not be diffident on account of past sins. " God does not attend," says St. Bernard, " to what man does, but to what he wishes to be."[12286]A resolute will, with the divine aid, conquers all things.

Let us pray always: he who asks, receives: For everyone that asketh, receiveth.[12287] Whatsoever we ask in prayer, we shall obtain: You shall ask whatever you will, and it shall be done unto you.[12288] And among all prayers, let the beautiful prayer of St. Ignatius of Loyola be always dear to us; let us repeat it continually: "Grant me only Thy love with Thy grace, O Lord! and I shall be rich enough. "[12289] Lord, give me your love and your grace, and I desire nothing more. But, like St. Augustine, we must ask this gift of divine love continually and earnestly. The holy Doctor says: "Hear me, hear me, O my God, my King, my Father, my honor, my sa lvation, my light, my life, hear, hear me! Thee only do I love, Thee only do I seek. Heal me, and open my eyes. Look upon him who has fled from Thee; long enough have I served Thy enemy. Command that I may be a pure, a perfect lover of Thy wisdom."[12290]" And in asking the divine graces, I add, with St. Bernard, let us always have recourse to the intercession of Mary, who obtains for her servants whatever she asks from God.[12291]

Instruction XI

Devotion TO MOST HOLY MARY

HIS instruction may serve either for an instruction or for a sermon; but whether it be given in the form of an instruction or of a sermon, the people who gives the spiritual exercises to the priests is entreated not to omit this discourse, which is, perhaps, the most fruitful of all; for without devotion to the divine Mother it is morally impossible for anyone to be a good priest.)

Let us, first, consider the moral necessity of the intercession of Mary for priests; and secondly, the confidence which they ought to have in the prayers of this divine Mother.

I. MORAL NECESSITY OF THE INTERCESSION OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN

With regard to the necessity of invoking her intercession, it is necessary to know that although the Counil of Trent[12292] has only declared that the invocation of the saints is useful, still St. Thomas has asked the question: "Whether we should ask the saints to pray for us,"[12293]and has answered in the affirmative, saying, that the order of the divine law requires that we mortals be saved through the saints by obtaining, through their prayers, the graces necessary for salvation.

The holy Doctor says: "Such is, after St. Denis the Areopagite, the order divinely established for the government of kings, that those far off should return to God through the mediation of those that are nearer." [12294] And as the saints in heaven are near God, we who are prisoners in the body and who travel far from God, we cannot, according to the order established, return to our supreme end except through the mediation of the saints."[12295]Other authors, particularly the continuator of Tournely and Sylvius, hold the same opinion. He afterwards adds: " The natural law prescribes for us the order established by God. Now God wishes that inferior creatures in order to reach salvation should implore the help of superior creatures."[12296]

But if it is a duty to ask the prayers of the saints, how much more strictly are we bound to invoke the intercession of Mary, whose prayers are more efficacious with God than the prayers of all the other saints! St. Thomas says that through the abundant grace which God has given them the saints can save many, but that the Blessed Virgin has merited grace sufficient to save all.[12297] St. Bernard has written that as we have access to the Father through his Son Jesus Christ, so we have access to the Son through the Mother.[12298]

Hence he afterwards said that all the graces that we receive from God come to us through Mary: "God has placed in Mary the plenitude of all gifts.[12299] Acknowledge, then, that all that there is in us of hope, of grace, of salvation, we receive from her who is filled with delights. She is truly a garden of delights, so that from her are sent forth perfumes the most exquisite, that is, gifts and graces of God." ! The saint assigns the following reason for asserting that all the divine graces come to us through the hands of Mary: " It is the will of God to grant us all the graces of which we stand in need."[12300] This maybe also inferred from all the texts of Scripture which the holy Church applies to Mary: He that shall find me shall find life.[12301] In me is all grace of the way and of the truth. . . . They that work by me shall not sin. They that explain me shall have life everlasting."[12302] The words of the holy Church, in the Salve Regina, in which she calls Mary our life and our hope[12303] are sufficient to confirm us all in this doctrine.

Hence St. Bernard exhorts us to have recourse to this divine Mother, with a secure confidence of obtaining the graces that we ask her to procure for us; because the Son knows not how to refuse anything to the Mother.[12304]

Hence the saint afterwards calls Mary the entire ground of his hope: " My children, she is the ladder for sinners; she is the greatest motive of my confidence; she is the only cause of my hope."[12305] He concludes by saying that we should ask all the graces of which we stand in need, through Mary, because she obtains whatever she asks, and her prayers cannot be rejected.[12306] Before him St. Ephrem said the same: " O most sincere Virgin ! only in thee do we repose confidence."[12307] St. Ildephonsus teaches the same doctrine: " All the good decreed by the sublime majesty for the benefit of men, this she has decreed to be conveyed to them through the hands of Mary; for to thee, O Mary ! has been intrusted treasures and ornaments of grace."[12308] The same is held by St. Peter Damian: " In thy hands are all the treasures of divine mercies."[12309] St. Bernardine of Sienna says: "Thou art the dispenser of all graces; our salvation rests in thy hands. "[12310] This, too, was the doctrine of St. John Damascene, of St. Germanus, of St. Anselm, of St. Antonine, of Idiota, and of so many other learned authors, such as Segneri, Pacciuchelli, Crasset, Vega, Mendoza, and Natalis Alexander, who says: "He [God] wishes that we should receive all the good that we wish from him through the mediation of his powerful Mother, by invoking her as we should."[12311]

Father Contenson has also held this opinion. Explaining the words of Jesus Christ on the cross to St. John, he says: "Behold thy Mother. As if he said: No one will participate in my blood except through the mediation of my Mother. My wounds are the fountains of all graces, but these fountains flow only through Mary upon you. O my disciple John, as much as you love her, so much shalt thou be loved by me."

And if, on account of the moral necessity of Mary's intercession for all, every Christian ought to be devoted to the Mother of God, how much more should priests, who are bound by greater obligations, and stand in need of greater graces for salvation, practise devotion in her honor[12312]We priests should remain always at the feet of Mary, asking the aid of her prayers. St. Francis Borgia had great doubts about the salvation of those that have not a special devotion to Mary; because, according to St. Antonine, he who expects graces from God without the intercession of Mary attempts to fly without wings.[12313] St. Anselm has gone so far as to say: " It is impossible to be saved if we turn away from thee, O Mary."[12314] St. Bonaventure has said the same: " He that neglects her will die in his sins. "[12315] Blessed Albertus Magnus says: The people that do not serve thee will perish."[12316]

And speaking of Mary, Richard of St. Laurence says: "All those whom this ship does not receive are lost in the sea of this world."[12317] But, on the other hand, he who is faithful in the service of Mary will be certainly saved. " O Mother of God," says St. John Damascene, " if I put my confidence in you I shall be saved. If I am under your protection I have nothing to fear; for to be devoted to you is to have certain arms of salvation which God gives only to those whose salvation he wills in a special manner"[12318]

II. CONFIDENCE THAT WE SHOULD HAVE IN THE INTERCESSION OF THE MOTHER OF GOD

Let us now pass to the confidence which we ought to have in the intercession of Mary, on account of her power and mercy.

I. As to her power. Cosmas of Jerusalem has called the intercession of our Queen not only powerful, but omnipotent.[12319] And Richard of St. Laurence has written: " From the omnipotent Son the Mother was made omnipotent."[12320] The Son is omnipotent by nature, the Mother by grace, inasmuch as she obtains from God whatsoever she asks. That this grace has been given to Mary we may infer from two reasons: first, because of all creatures Mary has been the most faithful, and the greatest lover of God. Hence, as Suarez says, the Lord loves Mary more than all the other saints and all the angels together.

St. Bridget heard our Lord one day saying to his Mother: "Mother, ask what thou desirest of Me; for thy petition cannot be in vain. . . ." Then he added: " For since on earth thou didst deny Me nothing, I will not deny thee anything in heaven."[12321] The second reason is, that Mary is a mother: hence St. Antonine has said, that her prayers partake of the nature of a command, because they are the prayers of a mother.[12322] St. John Damascene says: " O Lady, thou hast all power to save sinners; thou needest no other recommendation to God, since thou art his mother."[12323] And St. George of Nicomedia has written, that Jesus Christ, in order to discharge the obligations that he owed in a certain manner to Mary for having given him his human nature, grants whatever she asks from him.[12324] Hence St. Peter Damian has gone so far as to say, that when Mary goes to Jesus to ask a favor for any of her clients " she approaches the altar of human reconciliation; not asking, but commanding, not as a servant, but as a mistress; for the Son honors her by not refusing her anything."[12325] From the time that Mary was on this earth she had the privilege of having all her prayers heard by her Son. Speaking of Mary's request[12326] to Jesus to provide wine when it failed at the marriage of Cana in Galilee, St. John Chrysostom says, that though the Redeemer appeared to refuse the favor, saying: Woman, what is to Me and to thee ? My hour has not yet come.[12327] still he granted the petition of his mother.[12328]

The prayers of Mary, says St. Germanus, obtain great graces for the most abandoned sinners, because they are prayers accompanied with the authority of a mother.[12329] In a word, there is no one, however wicked, whom Mary does not save by her intercession when she wishes. Hence St. George, Archbishop of Nicomedia, says, O great Mother of God: " Thou hast insuperable strength, since the multitude of our sins does not outweigh thy clemency. Nothing resists thy power, for the Creator regards thy honor as his own."[12330] To thee, then, O my Queen, says St. Peter Damian, nothing is impossible, since thou canst succor and save even those that are in despair.[12331]

II. But if Mary is powerful, and able to save us by her intercession, she is equally merciful, and willing to obtain our salvation: "Neither the power nor the will is wanting to her,"[12332] says St. Bernard. She is called the Mother of Mercy, because her compassion for us makes her love and assist us as a mother assists a sick child. The love of all mothers together, according to Father Nieremberg,[12333] is not equal to the love which Mary bears a client that recommends himself to her.

Hence she is compared to a fair olive tree: As a fair olive tree in the plains.[12334] " In the plains," says Cardinal Hugo, " that all may look upon her, that all may have recourse to her."[12335] As the olive gives oil, the symbol of mercy, to him who possesses it, so Mary pours her mercies on all who have recourse to her.

Blessed Amedeus has written, that our Queen is continually praying for us in heaven.[12336] And before him Venerable Bede said: "Mary stands before her Son and does not cease to pray for sinners."[12337] St. Bernard asks, What else but mercy can flow from the fountain of mercy?[12338] St. Bridget once heard our Saviour saying to Mary: "Mother, ask what you wish of me."[12339] Mary answered: "I ask mercy for the miserable."[12340] As if she said: Son, since you have made me the Mother of Mercy, what will I ask of you ? Nothing else than mercy for miserable sinners. The great charity, says St. Bernard, that reigns in the heart of Mary for all, obliges her to open to all the bosom of mercy.[12341]

St. Bonaventure says that, looking at Mary, he appeared no longer to behold the divine justice that terrified him, but only the divine mercy that God has placed in the hands of Mary, that she may assist the miserable.[12342] And St. Leo has said that Mary is so full of mercy that she is called mercy itself.[12343] And who after Jesus, exclaims St. Germanus, is so solicitous for our welfare as thou, O Mother of Mercy?[12344] Speaking of Mary, St. Augustine says: "We acknowledge that one, namely, that thou alone, takest care of us in heaven." [12345]. As if he said: O Mother of God, it is true that all the saints love our salvation, but thy charity, in assisting us from heaven, with so much love, and heaping on us so many graces, which thou continually obtainest for us, compels us to confess, that it is thou alone who truly loves us, and anxiously seeks our welfare. St. Germanus adds: "Her defence of us is never satisfied."[12346] Mary prays incessantly for us; she repeats her prayers, and is never tired praying in our defence. Bernardine De Bustis says that Mary is more desirous of dispensing graces to us than we are of receiving them.[12347]The same author says that as the devil, according to St. Peter, goes about seeking whom he may devour,[12348] so Mary goes about seeking whom she may save.[12349]ho, I ask, receives grace from Mary? he who wishes for them. A holy soul used to say, to obtain graces through Mary it is enough to ask them. And St. Ildephonsus has written, that we ought to ask nothing of Mary but to pray for us; for by her prayers she will obtain for us greater graces than we could ask.[12350] How, then, does it happen that there are many who do not receive graces through the prayers of Mary? Because they do not wish for them. He who is attached to any passion, to self-interest, to ambition, to an inordinate affection, does not wish for grace to be delivered from it, and therefore he does not ask it: had he asked it of Mary, she would certainly have obtained it for him. But miserable and unhappy the man, said the Holy Virgin to St. Bridget, who, having it in his power to have recourse to me in this life, shall, through his own fault remain miserably in his sins and in the state of perdition.[12351] A time shall come when he would wish, but will not be able, to have recourse to her.

Ah ! let us not expose ourselves to this great danger. Let us always have recourse to this divine Mother, who knows not how to let anyone who invokes her aid depart without consolation, says Blosius.[12352] Mary is always ready, as Richard of St. Laurence says, to assist those who ask her prayers.[12353]

According to Richard of St. Victor, Mary's tenderness prevents our supplications, and procures aid for us before we pray to her. Because, adds the same author, Mary is so full of mercy that she cannot see our miseries without coming to our relief.[12354] And who, exclaims Innocent III., has ever had recourse to Mary without being heard?[12355] Who, says Blessed Eutichianus, has ever sought her aid and has been abandoned by her?[12356] St. Bernard has written: "O holy Virgin, if a man has been ever found who, after invoking your aid, remembers not to have obtained relief, I am satisfied that he should cease to praise your mercy.[12357] No: such a case has never occurred, and never shall occur; for, says St. Bonaventure, Mary cannot but pity and relieve the miserable.[12358]Hence the saint has said, that this Mother of mercy, who so ardently desires to assist us and to see us saved, is offended not only by those who do her a positive injury, but also by those who neglect to ask favors from her.[12359] Let us then have recourse to Mary; and in seeing that our sins render us unworthy to be heard, let us not distrust her clemency. Our Lord revealed to St. Bridget that Mary would have saved Lucifer by her intercession had that haughty demon humbled himself and had recourse to her.[12360]

And the Virgin herself said to the same St. Bridget, that when a sinner casts himself at her feet she regards not his sins, but the intention with which he comes. If he comes with a determination to change his life, she heals and saves him.[12361]Hence St. Bonaventure called Mary the salvation of them who invoke her.[12362] He that has recourse to Mary shall be saved.

I repeat, then, let us always have recourse to this great Mother of God, imploring her to protect us. But the better to gain her protection, let us endeavor to perform in her honor as many pious exercises as we can. That ardently devoted servant of Mary, Brother John Berchmans, of the Society of Jesus, being asked at death by his companions what they should do in order to obtain the favor of Mary, said: "However little it may be, provided it be done with perseverance."[12363] Every little act of devotion is sufficient to secure the patronage of this divine Mother. She is content with any little exercise, provided it be constant; for, as St. Andrew of Crete says, she is so liberal that she is accustomed to reward the smallest homage by obtaining abundant graces.[12364]

But we should not be content with small things: let us at least offer her all the acts of devotion which her clients ordinarily perform in her honor; such as, to recite the Rosary every day, to perform the Novenas of her festivals, to fast on Saturday, to wear the Scapular, to visit some image every day in her honor, asking her to obtain some special grace, to read each day a book that treats of her praises, to salute her in leaving and returning home; rising in the morning and going to bed at night, to put ourselves under her protection, by saying three " Hail Mary's" in honor of her purity. Even seculars practise these devotions; but we priests can honor her much more by preaching her glories, and by inculcating to others the advantages of being devoted to her: They that explain Me shall have life everlasting.[12365]She promises eternal life to him who endeavors in this life to make others know and love her. Blessed Edminco, Bishop, began every sermon by the praises of Mary. This was so pleasing to the divine Mother, that she one day said to St. Bridget: " Tell that prelate that I will be a mother to him, and that at death I will present his soul to my Son." [12366] Oh, what pleasure would a priest give to Mary, if every Saturday he made a short discourse to the people on devotion to her, and especially on her tender compassion for us, and her desire to assist all who pray to her ! For, as St. Bernard says, it is the mercy of Mary that inspires in the people the greatest affection for her devotion. Let preachers at least endeavor in every sermon, before the conclusion, to exhort the hearers to have recourse to most holy Mary, and to ask some favor from her. In a word, Richard of St. Laurence says that he who honors Mary acquires treasures of eternal life.[12367] For this purpose I published some years since a book entitled the Glories of Mary, and I endeavored to enrich it with authorities from Scriptures and the holy Fathers, with examples and devout practices, not only that it might be useful to all as a book for spiritual reading, but particularly that it might supply priests with abundant matter for preaching the praises of Mary, and inspiring the people with devotion to her.

Appendix

St. Alphonsus himself has added, as an appendix to his Collection of Materials for Ecclesiastical Retreats, the three following little works: RULE OF LIFE, SPIRITUAL RULES, and SPIRITUAL MAXIMS. To them we have added an EXHORTATION TO YOUNG MEN WHO ARE DEVOTING THEMSELVES TO THE STUDY OF THE ECCLESIASTICAL SCIENCES. EDITOR.

RULE OF LIFE FOR A SECULAR PRIEST

I. MORNING EXERCISES

1. THE FIRST ACTS ON RISING

IN the morning on rising the priest shall make acts of thanksgiving, of love, and of oblation of all that he is to do and to suffer during the day. He shall finish by a prayer to God and to the Blessed Virgin, in order to obtain the grace of not falling into sin.

These acts may be thus formulated:[12368]

O my God ! prostrate in Thy presence, I adore Thy infinite Majesty, and I submit myself entirely to Thee.

I believe in Thee, I hope in Thee, and I love Thee with my whole heart.

I thank Thee for all Thy benefits, and especially for having preserved me during this night.

I offer Thee all my thoughts, words, actions, and sufferings of this day in union with those of Jesus and of Mary.

I intend to gain all the indulgences that I can gain, and to apply them to the souls in purgatory.

O my God ! for the love of Jesus Christ, deliver me from every sin. O my Jesus ! by Thy merits make me lieited to Thee. Mary, my Mother, bless me, and protect me under thy mantle. My holy guardian angel, and all holy patrons, intercede for me. Amen.

2. MENTAL PRAYER

The priest shall begin the day by a half-hours meditation on the eternal truths, or on the Passion of Jesus Christ. Meditation on the Passion of our Lord is more especially suitable to a priest before celebrating Mass, since he is about to renew at the altar the memory of it by offering to God the same victim and the same sacrifice. During meditation, after having read the subject, he should endeavor to make acts of sorrow and of love, and frequently offer to God prayers in order to obtain perseverance in his grace and his divine love. Let him guard against abandoning meditation, however great the disgust and the pain he may experience during it; if he abandons the practice of meditation, he will be exposed to the greatest danger of losing God. Even when he is able to say only these words: O my God, help me ! O my Jesus, mercy ! his meditation will be excellent, and will profit him much. In order to be more recollected in meditation, let him shut himself up in some place where he may find himself alone with the crucifix. For this purpose he shall endeavor to have a separate room; and if he cannot have it, let him go to the church to make his meditation there rather than make it at home amid the noise made by peoples who pass in and out, and who talk.[12369]

3. THE HOLY MASS

After meditation, he shall recite the Little Hours as far as None; then he shall celebrate Mass. In order to say Mass with greater recollection, it would be expedient, if there be no obstacle, to say Mass before all other occupations of the day. Besides the meditation one should not fail to make a short preparation for Mass by reanimating ones faith in the great mystery that one is about to celebrate; one should make at least three acts: of love, of contrition, and of desire to be united to Jesus Christ.

After Mass one should not omit to make thanksgiving, of an hour or at least of half an hour, by applying ones self during that time to the making of acts of love, of the offering of one s self, and of petition. The time that follows Mass is a time for amassing treasures of grace. When one is in a state of interior dryness, not knowing what to do with one s self, one may at least read out of some book pious affections to Jesus Christ.

4. CONFESSIONS AND STUDY

After having made his thanksgiving,[12370] the priest shall go to the confessional if he is a confessor. It must here be observed that on days on which there is a great concourse of people, as on festivals, he may shorten his thanksgiving in order to hear confessions; but this only holds good for similar cases that are rare. Usually the confessor should not omit his thanksgiving after Mass in order that penitents may not be obliged to wait for him. However, when there come to confession men that are not accustomed to frequent the sacraments, it will be better if he hears them before Mass; because such peoples have not the patience to wait; and if they do not confess on that day, God knows when they will confess. As for the priest who is not a confessor, he shall retire in order to attend to his studies. He should occupy himself in the study of Moral Theology, so as to become capable of administering the sacrament of penance, in the composition of sermons, or in similar things that may serve for his own instruction or for the good of souls.

REMARK IN REGARD TO THE ORDER OF THE EXERCISES

It must here be observed that we do not ask that all the exercises of which this Rule speaks should be performed in the order in which they are here mentioned. Provided that they are performed in the course of the day, it is sufficient; it matters little whether one takes place before the other according to ones convenience. Thus, for example, in winter, when the days are longer, one may, after meditation and the Office, study for an hour or two. For the rest, a priest that wishes to lead a life worthy of his state should fix the time and the hour of all his exercises so that everything may be done in a regular order. Let him not act as some who follow no order in all that they do. The life that is without a rule is an image of hell, which is described by Job: A land of misery and darkness, where the shadow of death, and no order, but everlasting horror dwelleth.[12371]

DINNER

The hour of dinner having come, he shall eat moderately, as is becoming a priest: he should not imitate certain gluttonous priests who wish that the whole house should busy itself about preparing different kinds of food which they ordered in the morning, and when at dinner they do not find the food to be according to their taste, they grow angry, and excite a commotion among their servants and relatives. St. Philip Neri says: "He that seeks to gratify his palate will never become a saint." And if the priest should be temperate in eating, he should be particularly so in the use of wine, the excess of which is most pernicious to virtue, especially to the virtue of chastity.

On Saturdays, let him endeavor, in honor of the Blessed Virgin, to keep at least the common fast, if he thinks that he cannot fast on bread and water; let him, however, be content on that day with one course. Moreover, on some other days of the week, as on Wednesday and Friday, as also in all the Novenas of our Lady, let him at least deprive himself of something at table.

II. EXERCISES AFTER DINNER

1. SPIRITUAL READING

After the needed rest, the priest shall recite Vespers and Compline, and shall afterwards make a half-hours spiritual reading. For the spiritual reading he may use the Knowledge and Love of Jesus Christ by Father St. Jure, or Christian Perfection by Father Rodriguez, books that are filled with piety and unction. He may also read other works;[12372] but let him, above all, read the lives of the saints, as the life of St. Philip Neri, of St. Francis Borgia, of St. Peter of Alcantara, and the like. In the books that treat of spirituality we see virtues in theory, while in the lives of the saints we see them in practice; and this will stimulate us more efficaciously to imitate the saints. St. Philip Neri never ceased to exhort his penitents to read the lives of the saints. How many saints, such as St. John Colombini, St. Ignatius Loyola, St. Teresa, have been induced by the reading of such books to consecrate themselves entirely to God !

2. THE VISIT TO THE BLESSED SACRAMENT AND TO THE BLESSED VIRGIN

After the spiritual reading he shall pay a visit to the Blessed Sacrament. Many of the faithful are very exact in performing this exercise every day, and never omit doing so, no matter how they may be inconvenienced thereby; but it is rare, and even very rare, to find secular priests who do so. It must be confessed that Jesus Christ is unfortunate in his priests ! All this comes from the little love that priests have for him. He that tenderly loves a friend, seeks to see him as often as he can, especially when his visits are most agreeable to this friend.

By this visit I do not mean only a few " Our Fathers" said in passing and with distraction before the altar. It consists in occupying oneself during some time in making pious affections to Jesus Christ in the Blessed Sacrament, and in asking of him graces, especially the grace of final perseverance and of his holy love. Alas ! who should entertain himself oftener and longer than a priest who every day makes Jesus come down from heaven to the earth, takes him in his hands, partakes of his adorable flesh, and moreover for his own benefit shuts him up in the tabernacle where he may find him present every time that he wishes ? After the visit to the Blessed Sacrament he should not omit to make, in the same church, his visit to the Mother of God, before some image that inspires him with the greatest devotion.[12373]

3. RECREATION

He may then recreate himself for some time by walking either in the country or on some solitary road, in company with a Father or some other spiritual people who speaks of God and not of the world. In the absence of such a people he should walk alone; for if he is accompanied by some secular he will soon lose all the recollection that he has found in his exercises of piety. If in his moments of leisure he visits the place where the moral conference is held, he will do better; he will find there recreation, and what will be profitable to him.

III. EXERCISES OF THE EVENING

1. BEFORE SUPPER

Towards evening it is befitting that the priest should make another half-hours meditation; it will be better if he makes it when possible with all the peoples of the house, reading the points of meditation himself, and finishing by reciting the Christian acts. Then he should recite Matins and Lauds, and afterwards devote himself to another hours study. Afterwards he shall recite five decades of the Rosary, also with the people of the house, taking care to announce the mysteries on which the meditation should be made; he shall finish by saying the Litany of the Blessed Virgin.

2. SUPPER

The Rosary shall be followed by supper. He should observe greater sobriety at supper than at dinner; for if in the evening one takes too much food, it will happen that in the morning, when so many important duties are to be fulfilled, meditation, the saying of Mass, the hearing of confessions, one will suffer not only in the stomach, but also in the head, so that everything will be done with distraction and tepidity, and the half of it will be lost.

3. THE LAST ACTS BEFORE GOING TO BED

After supper the priest shall make the examination of conscience, to be followed by the act of contrition and by other pious acts; then after having recited, with the face on the floor, the " Hail Mary" three times, and after the usual practices in honor of the holy patrons, he should go to bed. The following is the act that we may recite before going to bed:

O my God ! I thank Thee for having preserved me this day, and I beseech Thee to vouchsafe to preserve me also this night, and to protect me from all evil. I take this repose in order to please Thee, and I intend each moment that I breathe to love and praise Thee, as is done by the saints and the elect in heaven. Mary, my Mother, bless me, and protect me under thy mantle. My angel guardian, and all my holy Patrons, intercede for me.

IV. EXERCISES THAT ARE NOT PERFORMED EVERY DAY

1. CONFESSION

The priest should confess twice or at least once a week. He should not fail to have a particular Director, on whom it will be his duty to depend in all his spiritual exercises, and even in all the temporal affairs that may be of profit to his soul.

1 We add this simple formula as we have done above for the morning exercise. ED.

2. THE MONTHLY RETREAT

Every month he shall make a day of retreat; on this day he should keep aloof from all temporal affairs, and even from spiritual occupations that regard his neighbor. Having retired to his own home or to some religious house, he shall occupy himself in silence only with himself, consecrating the whole day to prayer, to spiritual reading, to visiting the Blessed Sacrament, and to other similar exercises. Oh what strength does not the soul draw from these retreats, to be able to unite itself intimately with God, and to walk more fervently in the ways of the Lord on the following days ![12374]

3. SPECIAL COUNSELS

In temptations, especially in those against purity, he shall renew the resolution to suffer rather a thousand deaths than to offend God; then he shall have recourse at once to Jesus and to Mary by invoking their holy names until the violence of the temptation has subsided. He should be careful to dress modestly, always wearing long clothes, and never those that are of silk. Let him keep from all banquets, the amusements of the world, the reunions with seculars, especially where there are women.

SPIRITUAL RULES FOR A PRIEST WHO ASPIRES TO PERFECTION

1. TO AVOID SIN, AND TROUBLE AFTER SIN

A PRIEST who aspires to perfection and desires to sanctify himself should, above all, endeavor to avoid more than death the least deliberate venial sin. In the present state of human frailty, since Adams sin, no one can, and no one ever could, with the exception only of Jesus Christ and his most Blessed Mother, be exempt from all in deliberate venial faults. With the help of God, however, everyone can avoid every deliberate fault; that is to say, committed with full advertence and consent; thus the saints have acted. He, therefore, who tends to perfection should make up his mind rather to allow himself to be cut to pieces than to tell, with full knowledge, a lie, or to commit any other venial sin, however small it may be. Such should be his resolution; but if unfortunately he happens to fall into a fault, either deliberate or in deliberate, let him beware of troubling and disquieting himself. Disquietude does not come from God; it is a smoke that comes only from the abode of disquietude itself, namely, from hell; and it comes to us from that place because, as St. Aloysius has justly said, the devil always finds something to fish in troubled waters. When one has, for example, committed a fault one is troubled, and one is troubled because one has been troubled. In this state of disquietude we shall not only be unable to do any good, but we shall also easily commit many other faults, either of impatience or of some other kind. Hence, as soon as the fault has been committed, we must humble ourselves and immediately have recourse to God by making an act of love or of contrition with the firm purpose of amendment; then we ask with confidence for the grace of which we stand in need by saying*: O Lord ! see what I am able to do; and if Thou withdrawest Thy hand from me I shall do still worse. I love Thee; I repent of the displeasure that I have caused Thee, and I will do so no more; grant me the help that I hope to receive from Thy goodness.*

After having done this we should be calm, as if we had not committed any fault; and if we fall back, even on the same day, let us do the same thing. Should we even fall a hundred times, we should always act in the same way, namely, we should humble ourselves, we should rise again, we must never remain down. It must be observed that to trouble oneself after a fault has been committed is an effect not of humility, but of pride; since we are sorry for the fault not because we have offended God, but rather because we are ashamed to appear before him so defiled. The priest should, therefore, never trouble himself on account of the faults into which he falls; but let him humble himself, acknowledging himself capable of committing these and other faults. Let him then make an act of love of God; thus this sin, instead of removing him from God, will serve only the more to unite him more closely to him, according to what the Apostle says: All things " even sins,"[12375] the Gloss adds work together unto good.[12376]

2. EFFICACIOUS DESIRE TO ADVANCE IN THE LOVE OF GOD

Let him desire to advance without ceasing in the love of God. Not to wish to advance in perfection, which consists in the love of God, is to wish to go backward, says St. Augustine.[12377] He that moves against the current of a river, and does not make continual efforts against the movement of the waters, will be driven back. The same thing happens to us when we cease to struggle with the concupiscence of the flesh. Holy desires render our efforts easier, and help us to move forward; but it is necessary that these desires be firm and efficacious that is to say, that they be put in practice as much as possible. They should not resemble the desires of those that are content with saying, for example: Oh! if I had no brothers, no nephews, I would enter religion; if I had health, I would do this or that penance; and in the mean time these peoples do not take a step forward in the way of God: on the contrary, they always commit the same faults, always keeping up the same attachments and the same animosities, and go from bad to worse. It is therefore necessary that we advance in divine love, but with the resolution to do on our part all that we can to attain this end. We must, however, entirely mistrust our own strength, and trust only in God; for as soon as we trust in ourselves we remain deprived of the help of grace.

3. DEVOTION TO THE PASSION OF OUR LORD AND TO THE BLESSED SACRAMENT

To advance in perfection the priest must, moreover, entertain a great devotion to the Passion of Jesus Christ and to the Blessed Sacrament. When we consider these two great mysteries of love, in which a God, to make himself loved, gives his life and makes himself the food of a worm of the earth, his creature, we cannot live without being inflamed with love for Jesus Christ. For the charity of Christ presseth us.[12378]

He that thinks of the love of Jesus Christ will feel himself, as it were, forced to love him. St. Bonaventure calls the wounds of Jesus the wounds that wound the most hardened hearts, and that inflame with love for God the coldest souls.[12379] Let the priest, then, always make as a usual thing, every day, a half-hours meditation on the Passion of Jesus Christ. Let him, besides, make during the day frequent acts of love to this good Master, beginning them on awakening in the morning, and endeavoring at night to fall asleep while making them. St. Teresa said that acts of love are the wood that keeps up in the heart the sweet fire of divine love. The act of love of God that is more especially agreeable to God is the offering that we make to him of ourselves by offering to do and to suffer all that will please him. St. Teresa repeated this act at least fifty times a day.

4. THE INTENTION OF DOING ALL FOR GOD

The priest should in all his actions take care to make his intention to do for God alone all that he does. The right intention is called by the masters of spiritual life a heavenly alchemy, which converts into gold all our actions, even corporal alleviations, such as sleep, eating, and recreation. But it is particularly necessary that the exercises of piety should be performed only to please God, and not for any interested motive, either of vain glory or self-satisfaction; otherwise all will be lost, and instead of a reward we shall receive only punishment. This is the reason why, in order to do surely for God all that we do, it is important that we always act in dependence on our director.

5. LOVE OF SOLITUDE AND OF SILENCE

It is necessary that the priest should be a friend of solitude and of silence. He that treats too much with men, and speaks too much with them, will do well to be cautious; he will with difficulty escape sin: In the multitude of words there shall not want sin.[12380]For this reason the Lord says: In silence and in hope shall your strength be.Our strength against temptations is in confidence in God and in detachment from the society of creatures. Moreover, he that speaks much with men will rarely speak and treat with God. In solitude the Lord speaks and converses familiarly with souls, in accordance with the saying of St Jerome; "O solitude, in which God familiarly converses with his creatures!"[12381] And he himself has informed us that it is in solitude that he speaks to our hearts: I will lead her into the wilderness; and I will speak to her heart.[12382] Thus we see souls that burn with the love of God always seeking solitude. The saints went to bury themselves in the forests and in the most frightful caverns, in order not to be troubled by the noise of the world and in order to converse only with God. " Silence and rest from noise," said St. Bernard, "as it were, forces the soul to converse with God."[12383]

Nevertheless the virtue of silence does not consist in always keeping silence, but in being silent when it is expedient. A good priest is silent when he should be silent, and speaks when he should speak; but he speaks only of God or of what concerns the glory of God and the good of souls. Often a word about God spoken familiarly in conversation will produce more fruit than many sermons. We should therefore be careful in all our conversations, however indifferent they may be, to allow some edifying word to glide into it on the eternal truths or on the love of God. When we love a people, we always wish to speak of him and to hear others speak of him; when we love God, we do not wish to speak of anyone but of God, and we do not wish to hear any one spoken of except God.

6. CONFORMITY TO THE WILL OF GOD

The love of God consists above all in conformity to his holy will, especially in regard to things that are mostly contrary to self-love, such as sickness, poverty, contempt, persecutions, spiritual aridities. We should be pe rsuaded that all that comes from God is useful to us, since all that he does, he does for our own good; for there is no one that loves us more than God. If we wish to sanctify ourselves, let us say in all that happens to us: May Thy will be done! May the name of the Lord be blessed. O Lord! what wilt Thou have me do ? As it pleases the Lord, so let it be done. Let it be thus, O Father! because it was thus pleasing to Thee.

In all the occurrences of life, whether agreeable or disagreeable, let us endeavor to preserve this continual peace and this unalterable tranquillity, of which the saints have given us the example, always saying: In peace in the self—same I will sleep and I will rest.[12384]A soul that loves God, always united with its Lord, leads a uniform life. This is what is said by that great servant of God, Cardinal Petrucci, when speaking of the words of the Holy Ghost: Whatsoever shall befall the just, it shall not make him sad.[12385] Thus a priest that loves God will never be afflicted. Sin only should cause him sorrow; but even this sorrow, as we have said above, should be a tranquil sorrow, that does not trouble the peace of the soul.

7. DESIRE FOR DEATH

The priest should often desire paradise, and consequently death itself, in order promptly to go to heaven, where he may love Jesus Christ with all his strength and during all eternity, without fear of ever losing him. In the mean time he should conduct himself towards God without reserve, not refusing him anything that he knows will be more agreeable to him; and he should be continually attentive to banish from his heart all that is not God or for God.

8. DEVOTION TO THE BLESSED VIRGIN

He should endeavor to conceive a great confidence and a tender devotion to the Blessed Virgin. All the saints are always fond of nourishing in their hearts a filial piety towards this divine Mother. He should take care to make every day a spiritual reading out of a book that treats of the great confidence that we should have in her powerful protection. He should never fail as well as he is able to fast on Saturdays in her honor; and in all her novenas he should at least practise some abstinence and some other mortification. He should never omit to pay her a visit once or several times a day before some devout image. He should speak to others as much as he can of the confidence that we should have in the protection of Mary, and should endeavor on Saturdays to address in the church a little instruction to the faithful, so as to excite their devotion towards this charitable Queen; at least he should speak of her in a special manner in every one of his sermons, and recommend the same devotion to all his penitents and to all peoples. The more one loves Mary, the more one loves God; for Mary draws to God all that love her. St. Bonaventure says: "Because she was inflamed with love, she also inflames all those that love her, and makes them like herself."[12386]

9. TO BE HUMBLE OF HEART

Let the priest endeavor to be humble of heart. Many are humble in their speech, but not in their hearts; they say that they are the greatest sinners in the world, that they merit a thousand hells: nevertheless they wish to be preferred, esteemed, and praised; they strive after honorable employments; they cannot suffer a contemptuous word. The humble of heart do not act in this manner: they never speak of their talents, of their nobility, of their riches, or of anything that may be turned to their advantage. He should, therefore, love those employments and those works that are most humble and are less conspicuous. He should receive affronts without being troubled; he should even feel interior pleasure in seeing that he has become similar to Jesus Christ, who was filled with reproaches. Therefore, when he meets with some contradiction that wounds and irritates his pride he should do violence to himself not to speak nor act at that moment, even if he held the office of Superior, and as such is obliged to reprimand the insolence of him that offers the outrage. As long as he feels himself agitated he should keep silence and wait till he becomes calm, otherwise the smoke produced by his trouble will obscure his vision; he will believe that what he says or what he does is right, while all is faulty and disorderly. Moreover, when the correction is made amid agitation, the inferior will not receive it as a deserved reprimand, but as a passionate outbreak of temper on the part of the Superior; and this will make the correction useless, or nearly so. For the same reason, when the Superior perceives that the inferior is troubled, he should put off the reprimand and wait till he has become calm; otherwise the inferior, blinded by his passion, will not only not receive the correction, but will even be moved to greater passion.

10. TO RENDER GOOD FOR EVIL

The priest should try to be ready to assist every one, and especially to do good to him that has done him wrong, at least by recommending him to God. This is the way in which the saints take revenge.

11. INTERIOR AND EXTERIOR MORTIFICATION

Let the priest be attentive to the practice of interior and exterior mortification. It was recommended by Jesus Christ when he said: Let him deny himself.[12387] This is absolutely necessary in order to attain sanctity. Interior mortification exacts of us that we know how to conquer ourselves by refusing all that satisfies only our self-love. We should therefore abstain from every action that has no other object than to satisfy curiosity, ambition, or self-love.

We should also love exterior mortification, namely, fasting, abstinence, disciplines, and the like. The saints macerated their flesh as much as possible, that is to say, as much as obedience permitted, and obedience is the rule of the saints. As to him who, on account of ill-health, cannot impose upon himself exterior mortifications, he should embrace the pains and the inconveniences that he has to suffer by endeavoring to support them patiently and peacefully, and by refraining from making them known without necessity, and from complaining about the want of care on the part of the physicians or peoples of the house.

12. TO PRAY WITHOUT CEASING

We must always pray and recommend ourselves to God. All our good resolutions and all our promises end in smoke when we neglect to pray; for by not praying we are deprived of the necessary graces to carry them out. I will cry like a young swallow.[12388] We should always have the mouth open for prayer by saying: O Lord, help me! O Lord, mercy! O Lord, have pity on me! Thus the saints have acted, and it is thus that they sanctified themselves.

We should above all ask Jesus Christ for the gift of his holy love. St. Francis de Sales said that this gift includes all other gifts; for when we love God we try to avoid all that which is disagreeable to him, and to do all that we can do to please him. Let us also ask always for the grace of having great confidence in the Passion of Jesus Christ and in the intercession of Mary. Let us, moreover, not cease to recommend to God the poor souls in purgatory and poor sinners; for such prayers are most pleasing to God.

SPIRITUAL MAXIMS FOR PRIESTS

1. To lose all rather than to lose God.
2. To displease every one rather than to displease God.
3. It is only sin that we have to fear, and that should grieve us.
4. To die rather than knowingly to commit a sin, even if it were only a venial sin.
5. All things come to an end; the world is a scene that passes very quickly.
6. Every moment is a treasure for eternity.
7. Everything that pleases God is good.
8. Do what you would wish to have done at the hour of death.
9. Live as if there were no other beings in the world except God and yourself.
10. God alone makes man contented.
11. There is no other good than God; there is no other evil than sin.
12. Never do anything for your own gratification.
13. The more one mortifies oneself in this life, the more joy one shall have in the next.
14. To the friends of God the bitter is sweet, and the sweet bitter.
16. He that wishes what God wishes has all that he wishes. The will of God renders sweet all that which is bitter.
17. In sickness one may see who has real virtue.
18. Whoever desires nothing of this world has no need of anything.
19. Do not defer carrying out your good resolutions if you do not wish to retrograde.
20. To trouble oneself about faults committed is not humility, but pride.
21. We are only that which we are before God.
22. He that loves God desires to love rather than to know.
23. He that wishes to sanctify himself should banish from his heart all that which is not God.
24. One is not entirely for God when one seeks something that is not God.
25. Pain, poverty, and humiliation were the companions of Jesus Christ; may they also be ours.
26. Mental agitation, whatever may have been the cause, does not come from God.
27. The humble man believes himself unworthy of all honor, and worthy of contempt.
28. When one thinks of hell, which one has deserved, one suffers with resignation every pain.
29. Forget yourself, and God will think of you.
30. Love contempt, and you will find God.
31. He that contents himself with that which is less good is not far from evil.
32. God esteems but little him who seeks to be esteemed.
33. The saints always speak of God; they always speak ill of themselves, and always well of others.
34. The curious are always distracted.
35. Woe to him that loves health more than sanctity.
36. The devil is always in pursuit of the idle.
37. A vain priest is but the sport in the hand of the devil.
38. He that wishes to live in peace ought to mortify all his passions without excepting any one of them.
39. St. Joseph Calasanctius used to say: " The servant of God speaks little, works much, bears all."
40. The saints try to be saints, and not merely to appear to be saints.
41. We shall never reach any high degree of perfection as long as we are not fond of prayer.
42. One must first be a reservoir to collect, and then only can we be a canal to pour out.
43. Every attachment hinders us from belonging entirely to God.
44. The priest should not perceive anything but Jesus Christ and the good pleasure of Jesus Christ.
45. In our actions that become conspicuous pride is often hidden.
46. To offer one s self entirely to God is an .excellent preparation for Communion.
47. When you walk in places that are inhabited keep your eyes cast down; think that you are a priest, and not a painter.

EXHORTATION TO YOUNG MEN WHO DEVOTE THEMSELVES TO THE STUDY OF THE ECCLESIASTICAL SCIENCES.[12389]

They should, above all, endeavor to make Progress in the Science of the Saints.

ST. PAUL says, in speaking of worldly science: Knowledge puffeth up; but charity edifieth. And if any man think that he knoweth anything, he hath not yet known as he ought to know.[12390] Worldly science when united with divine love is of great use for us and for others; but when it is separated from charity, it causes us great injury by rendering us proud and inciting us to despise others; for as much as the Lord is lavish of his graces towards the humble, so much is he chary of them towards the proud.

Happy the man to whom God gives the science of the saints, as he gave it to Jacob: She gave him the knowledge of holy things.[12391] Scripture speaks of this gift as greater than all other gifts. Oh how many men live full of themselves because of their knowledge of mathematics, belles-lettres, foreign languages, and antiquities, which are of no service to religion, and are of no help as to spiritual profit! Of what use is it to possess such a science, to know so many fine things, if one does not know how to love God and to practise virtue ?

The wise men of this world, who seek only to acquire a great name, are deprived of the celestial lights that the Lord gives to the simple: Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent (the wise and prudent of the world), and hast revealed them to the little ones.[12392] The little ones are the simple minds that bestow all their care on pleasing God alone.

St. Augustine proclaims him happy who knows God, his grandeur, his goodness, even though he should be ignorant of all other things: "Happy he that knows Thee, although he knows nothing of those things."[12393] He that knows God cannot but love him; now he that loves God is wiser than all the men of letters that know not how to love him. " The unlettered," exclaims the same holy Doctor, " will rise up and bear away heaven."[12394]How many rustics, how many poor villagers, reach sanctity and obtain eternal life, the enjoyment of which for a moment is better than the acquisition of all the goods of this world! The Apostle wrote to the Corinthians: for I judged not Myself to know anything among you but Jesus Christ, and Him crucified.[12395] How happy should we be if we succeed in knowing Jesus crucified, in knowing the love that he has borne us and the love that he has merited for us by sacrificing for us his life on the cross, and if by studying such a book we succeed in loving him with an ardent love!

A great servant of God, Father Vincent Caraffa, writing to some young ecclesiastics who were engaged in studying to qualify themselves for the work of saving souls, said to them: " To bring about great conversions among souls it is better to be a man of much prayer than a man of great eloquence; for the eternal truths that convert souls are preached differently by the heart than they are by the lips." The true ministers of the Gospel should, therefore, lead a life that shows itself to be in agreement with what they teach; they should, in a word, appear like men who, detached from the world and the flesh, seek only to procure the glory of God and to make him loved by all. This is the reason why Father Caraffa added: " Bestow all your care on giving yourself up to the exercise of divine love; only the love of God, as soon as it possesses our heart, detaches it from all inordinate love, and renders it pure by stripping it of earthly affections." " A pure heart," says St. Augustine, " is a heart empty of all Cupidity."[12396]In fact, adds St. Bernard, he that loves God, thinks only of loving him, and desires nothing else: "He that loves, loves and knows nothing else."[12397] When one. burns with the love for God, one knows not how to devote one s self to the love of any earthly object.

Hence, just as students should give from year to year proofs of their advancement in the sciences, so those that wish to sanctify themselves should labor to acquire not only from year to year, but from day to day, a great love for God. They should endeavor to increase in themselves holy love by often repeating acts of love, by offering to God every action that they begin, with the intention of performing it only to please him, and by always begging him to grant them the light and the strength necessary to accomplish the good desires with which he inspires them.

St. Thomas of Villanova used to say: "To convert sinners and make them come forth from the mire of their iniquities, we need arrows of fire; but how can these arrows of fire come forth from an icy heart that is not animated by the love of God ?" Experience permits us to see that a priest with moderate science, but burning with love for Jesus Christ, draws more souls to God than many learned and excellent orators who charm people by their eloquence. The latter, with their beautiful thoughts, their rare acquirements, and their ingenious reflections, send away their hearers greatly satisfied with the discourse that they have heard; but they go away deprived of the love for God, and perhaps colder than when they came. But is such a success of profit to the common good ? and what profit does the preacher draw there from, if it is not to be more full of himself and more responsible before God, since instead of the fruit that his sermon could have produced, he obtains only vain praises that yield nothing? He who, on the contrary, preaches Jesus crucified in a simple manner, not to be praised, but only to make him loved, descends from the pulpit rich in the merit of all the good that he has done, or at least that he desired to do for his hearers.

All that has been said above concerns not only preachers, but also those that are charged with teaching and those that hear confessions. How much good cannot a professor do in teaching sciences, in instilling into his pupils the maxims of true piety! The same thing holds good of confessors. To this must be added the happy fruits that one may produce in conversing with others. We cannot always preach; but what good may not be done in conversation by a priest, who is well instructed and who is holy, when he speaks adroitly, when an occasion presents itself, of the vanity of worldly grandeur, of conformity to the will of God, of the necessity of recommending oneself without ceasing to the protection of Heaven in the midst of so many temptations with which we have to struggle! May the Lord deign to give us the light and the strength of which we stand in need in order to employ the days that still remain to us in loving him and in doing his will, since only this is profitable, and all the rest is lost!

IF we do not try to become saints, it will be difficult to sanctify others. If therefore we wish to produce much fruit in souls, we must necessarily practise meditation, and practise it much. Without this practise what good can we ever hope for ourselves and for others ? With desolation is all the land made desolate, says the Holy Ghost, why? because there is none that considereth in the heart.[12399]The Holy Ghost speaks thus of the neglect of mental prayer; and if it is this that causes the ruin of every one, with how much greater reason should not this defect cause the ruin of the priest! If you desire to see what is the necessity of mental prayer for the priest, you should this evening consider with me these two points: I say, in speaking of a priest without mental prayer: First, it is difficult for him to save his soul; Secondly, it is impossible for him to attain perfection. Let us pray to the Holy Ghost to enlighten us.

I will speak to my Lord, whereas I am dust and ashes.[12400] Ah! how happy should I be, O my God! if I were but dust and ashes! I am worse than that: I am a rebel, having had the boldness to offend Thee, who art the supreme good! But Thou hast come into this world in order that poor sinners may have life, and may have it more abundantly.[12401] Enlighten me, therefore, O Lord! speak to me, for I wish to listen to Thee: Speak, Lord, for Thy servant heareth.[12402] Tell me what I have to do to please Thee and to sanctify myself.

Mary, my hope; thou dost fulfil the beautiful office, so conformable to thy heart all full of love and mercy, of being pacifier between sinners and God; for pitys sake, exert thyself also in my behalf, O my Sovereign Lady!

I. WITHOUT MENTAL PRAYER IT IS DIFFICULT FOR A PRIEST TO SAVE HIS SOUL

With desolation is all the land made desolate, because there is none that considereth in the heart. These last words, considereth in the heart, I understand to mean mental prayer: it is to meditate on the law of God, on eternity, on one s own duties, on the things of God. Let us see how difficult it is for a priest to save his soul without prayer; here is the way in which I reason: It is certain that a priest, in order to save his soul, must fulfil all the duties of a priest, duties of which we have already shown the greatness; and to fulfil all these duties he needs to be continually aided by the hand of the all-powerful God. It is true that God is ready to aid us; but what does the Lord desire ? He desires that we should continually ask all the help that is necessary for us; and if we do not ask him for it he will not give it to us. You know the common opinion of theologians, that prayer, that is to say, the asking for graces, on the part of every one that has attained the age of reason, is necessary as a means of salvation; otherwise we cannot be saved. Ask, and you shall receive, He that does not ask will not receive.

Now a priest that does not make mental prayer, when will he reflect on his duties as a priest? under what circumstances will he ask God for the necessary help ? It will happen, that walking blindly without looking where or how he walks, he will hardly think of asking God s help; he will hardly think of the necessity in which he is of asking for it; or rather, without prayer he will not even think of his duties as a priest; and so how will he save his soul ? Cardinal Bellarmine thinks it to be morally impossible for any Christian to fulfil the duties of a simple Christian without mental prayer; for how much greater reason should we not believe that this is impossible for a priest who has greater duties than a simple Christian! My dear patroness St. Teresa also says that to obtain Gods grace the only door is mental prayer, and she speaks expressly of mental prayer: " This door being closed," she says, " I know not how grace will reach the soul."[12403] If the saint does not know, I declare that I know much less how a priest without mental prayer will receive all the graces necessary to save his soul.

Let us consider, in the first place, how much light a priest needs for himself and for others so as to save his soul. He must keep himself pure in the midst of the seductions of the flesh; he must avoid the occasions in which he is exposed to lose God; he must give wise counsel to others, since he is the master of the people, especially if he is a confessor; he has to place souls on the road that leads to God, so often to resolve doubts unexpectedly, to give advice in every confession, and then to render an account of all to Jesus Christ. Now how will he receive this light unless he makes mental prayer ?

Mental prayer, says St. Bonaventure,[12404] is a torch which on this earth of darkness shows us the road on which we should walk. St. Bernard, treating of the same subject, says that mental prayer is like a mirror: this comparison pleases me much. If one has a stain on ones countenance and one looks in the mirror, one sees it and takes it away; without this mirror, the stain remains, and will always remain; as one does not see it, one does not take it away. So it is with mental prayer: if we have a defect, if we find ourselves in a dangerous occasion, when we go to mental prayer, as if going before the mirror, we see in our conscience this defect that we have, we see this danger of losing God; we see it and we take it away.

Even though one should have had the misfortune of falling over the precipice, if one practises mental prayer with perseverance, one will surely come forth from it. Hence we quote the remark made by a master of the spiritual life: With sin there can often be united some act virtuous in itself, as, for instance, to be in the state of sin and to give alms, to be worldly and to be patient; but mental prayer and sin cannot remain united together. Why ? Because if we begin voluntarily to make mental prayer, there are some that go to mental prayer by force, and then it will do them no good, if, I say, we go to it voluntarily, either we shall give up mental prayer, or we shall give up sin. And according to St. Teresa, [12405] however great may be the ruin of a soul, if it perseveres in mental prayer, it is sure that the Lord will bring it back to the haven of salvation. But if this soul does not go to mental prayer, because it does not think of it, or thinks of it but little, it will continue to live in its faults, in the dangerous occasions in which it finds itself, and it will end by falling into the abyss. Why ? Because it walks in darkness, without light; it will find itself at the bottom of the precipice without knowing in what manner it fell over it.ome ye to Him and be enlightened.[12406] What light would we wish to have if we do not approach God by means of mental prayer ? Where have so many saints, I ask, where, without studying theology, have so many simple men and women, so well learned divine things if it was not in mental prayer, this school of the saints ? Such was a St. Hildegarde, who composed several books about holy Scripture; a St. Magdalene de Pazzi, who spoke so admirably of the perfection of God; a St. Teresa, who wrote so well on mental prayer that she has become the admiration of the whole world, and the Church wishes us to ask God for the grace of profiting by her heavenly doctrine: " So we feed to our ghostly health upon her heavenly teaching."[12407] Let us add a St. Thomas Aquinas, who confessed that all that he knew he had learnt in mental prayer; likewise a St. Bonaventure, who said that he never had any other Master than Jesus crucified. Come ye to Him and be enlightened. Let us, moreover, consider how much strength a priest needs to overcome so many enemies, both exterior and interior, that are continually laying snares for his soul. These enemies are the world, persecutions, human respect, passions, evil inclinations, temptations of the devil. Oh, how much more trouble does not the devil take to make a priest fall than to make a secular fall!

And why? Because if he succeeds in bringing to his fall a priest, he obtains a greater prey, and causes greater displeasure to God Again, the fall of a priest is accompanied by the fall of many others; for a bad priest by falling into the precipice does not fall into it alone; he drags down with him many others: and this is the reason why the devil makes so many efforts to ruin a priest. How, then, can he undertake without mental prayer to overcome all these temptations, especially if he is a secular priest, who has to live in the midst of the world, exposed to the danger of meeting with so many dangerous objects at times in the same house in which he lives? and if he is a confessor, when hearing the confessions of young peoples, of children, of women; when hearing the history of their miseries, of their frailties? But then you will say, The priest takes the place of God. Ah! dear Fathers, while receiving the sacerdotal character, we nevertheless remain earthly beings, weak, frail, liable to fall. How often must we not, as it were, sweat blood in order to overcome a suggestion of the devil! And without mental prayer how shall we do this ? how shall we acquire the strength to resist so many enemies? Let us hear what St. Teresa says: " He that neglects mental prayer has no need of being taken to hell by demons: he will cast himself into it."[12408]

When, on the contrary, we apply to mental prayer, what strength do we not continually derive from this holy exercise in order to resist all the attacks of hell! What shalt thou see in the Sulamitess but the companies of camps?[12409] The Sulamitess represents the soul given to mental prayer, which by this powerful means becomes for all its enemies terrible as an army set in array.[12410] The soul is then able to conquer all its passions, all bad inclinations.

These vicious tendencies are produced only by our corrupt nature, and it is very difficult to conquer them without much mental prayer; but by means of this prayer we overcome them easily. The soul in mental prayer is like iron in the fire: when the iron is cold it is difficult to work; but when it is put into the fire it becomes soft, and allows itself to be easily worked: so it is with the soul. A master of the spiritual life calls it a furnace, because as the fire softens the iron and renders it easy to work, so mental prayer makes it easy for the soul to overcome its passions. For example, someone receives an affront, an injury that wounds his self-love: before mental prayer, it is very difficult to him to overcome the passion that incites him to grow angry, to defend himself, and even to furnish him at times with pretexts to make him believe that this is necessary. The iron is yet cold, it must be put into the fire. Let this troubled soul enter mental prayer, and at once the sweet flame of the Holy Ghost touches it, and an interior voice tells him: Is it not better to bear that without resenting it ? Leave rather your defence to God, as your divine Master did when he was calumniated, he who was more innocent than you! At once the iron loses its hardness; the soul is softened, is appeased: without mental prayer, it would have been otherwise.

St. John Chrysostom[12411] says that in a soul mental prayer is as a fountain in a garden. Oh, how beautiful is a garden when a fountain continually waters it with its vivifying waters ! how fresh the verdure, how resplendent the flowers, how abundant the fruit! Take away the fountain, and everything will languish and dry up grass, flowers, fruits, and plants. Hence how quickly does one recognize a priest who makes mental prayer! See his manner of saying Mass, of preaching, of conversing!

See his humility and modesty in his actions, in his whole conduct! He is the garden of the Lord, a garden enclosed.[12412] It is closed to vices, to passions; it is filled with flowers and fruits of virtues; it is a paradise: Thy plants are a paradise of pomegranates with the fruits of the orchard.[12413] And why ? Because it is the fountain of gardens, the well of living waters.[12414] Mental prayer is the source of living waters that continually waters the garden. Take away mental prayer, take away the fountain, and then we say Mass and the Office with precipitation; we preach in a different manner. Show me your beautiful detachment, your beautiful humility, your beautiful modesty, . . . after the fountain has been taken away. A priest without mental prayer is a garden without water, just as David said of himself in reference to the time when he was far from God: My soul is as earth without water unto Thee."[12415]He is not even a priest; he is the corpse of a priest, according to the saying of St. John Chrysostom: " As the body cannot live without the soul, so the soul without prayer is dead and malodorous."[12416]Oh, how one perceives even from afar the bad odor of a priest who does not make mental prayer! Happy, on the contrary, he who meditates on the law of God, who applies himself to the holy exercise of mental prayer. The Holy Ghost compares him to a tree planted by the rivers of water.[12417]

II. WITHOUT MENTAL PRAYER IT IS IMPOSSIBLE FOR THE PRIEST TO ATTAIN PERFECTION

We now enter upon the second point, in which we must consider that, as it is difficult for a priest to save his soul without mental prayer, so it is impossible for him to attain perfection. I suppose that, without dwelling specially on this point, every priest well knows the obligation under which he is of striving to attain perfection. Let us therefore come to the point.

Observe, says the Holy Spirit to us, that the trees planted far from the water, dry up, grow but little, or do not grow straight, while those that are found on the banks of a stream are vigorous, straight, and high. Thus men of mental prayer show themselves full of life and strength : they are straight, having only God before their eyes; they attain a great height, growing always in virtue: Like a tree which is planted near the running waters, which shall bring forth its fruit in due season—and his leaf shall not fall off.[12418] They will not lose a leaf, that is, they will not lose a moment of their life, because either actually or virtually they always advance in perfection or in divine love, holy charity, which is the cause of perfection in our soul, as St. Paul says: Have charity, which is the bond of perfection.[12419] The sweet furnace in which souls are inflamed by this celestial fire, with which the saints on earth and the blessed in heaven are burning, is mental prayer: In my meditation a fire shall flame out, says David.[12420]

We complain that we are lukewarm and feeble; but need we be astonished at this if we remain from mental prayer? Why do we not try to enter often this happy cellar of love, where, having been scarcely introduced, the Spouse of the Canticles feels herself all set on fire with charity ? He brought me into the cellar of wine, He set in order charity in me.[12421]

We feel ourselves cold in divine love: why, then, do we not often go to converse with God ? Why do we not approach Him who is called a devouring fire: Thy God is a consuming fire.[12422] We approach God by means of mental prayer, says St. John Climacus.[12423] Let us suppose the heart to be very cold, entirely deprived of love towards God: if it perseveres in mental prayer, it is certain that this God, who is so faithful and never allows himself to be outdone in generosity, will end by inflaming it with his holy love; the fire should produce its effect. If at times, while conversing with a people who truly loves God, we feel ourselves excited by the ardor that he communicates to us to love God also, how much more shall we not be inflamed with this celestial fire by often conversing with God himself!

God speaks, yes, God speaks to souls that seek him sincerely; but when does he speak to them? Is it in society, in visits, where we lose whole hours in useless conversation? No; there God does not speak. If a soul wishes to hear me, says the Lord, let it leave the society of men, let it retire into solitude, and make mental prayer; it is there that I wish to speak to it: "I will lead her into the wilderness, and I will speak to her heart."[12424]

There I will make the soul hear my word, this word full and substantial, which in making itself heard, produces the effect that it signifies, and is not only an exhortation, but a power that makes others act rightly. Where, in fact, have the saints learned to love God if it was not in mental prayer ? Where did a St. Philip Neri receive a love so ardent, that his poor heart, not being able to support it, two ribs expanded so as to give more space to its palpitations ? Where was a St. Peter of Alcantara inflamed with such a love for God that, in order not to die of this love, he was obliged to go into the field, and sometimes throw himself upon the ice ? Where was a St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi inflamed with the same fire, she going nearly out of herself on account of this love ? Where was a St. Teresa wounded, she who has written of herself, that when she began to practise mental prayer, only then she began to feel what it is to love God ?

Ah! dear Fathers, let us not think that mental prayer is an exercise only peculiar to solitaries, and not to those that are occupied in an active life. Tertullian calls all priests "people devoted to prayer and contemplation."[12425]

The Apostles were not solitaries; they were very great workers of the Gospel throughout the world. Now what did they do in order to have time to devote themselves to mental prayer? They appointed deacons who were charged with the care of inferior things, and they said: But we will give ourselves continually to prayer, and to the ministry of the word.[12426] Note the words, prayer and the ministry of the word; at first prayer, and then preaching, because without prayer we can do no good.

What matters it that we are not solitaries, called to a contemplative life? If we wish to sanctify ourselves by becoming good evangelical laborers, it will be necessary that we apply ourselves to mental prayer, and much mental prayer; not a quarter, or half an hour in passing, but much more, much more; otherwise it will, morally speaking, be impossible for us to become saints. In the midst of our greatest labors we must always find time to give a little rest to our soul, as Jesus Christ has enjoined upon the Apostles: Rest a little.[12427] In retreats and in mental prayer the soul sits down, as it were, and takes rest, and gathers new strength to work better. He shall sit solitary, and hold his peace, because he hath taken it upon himself.[12428]When a soul comes forth from mental prayer it is quite changed. Hence I think highly of the good practice of those that reserve for themselves every week a day of retreat, a day entirely consecrated to the repose of the soul. On this day we do not hear confessions, we do not study: we apply only to mental prayer, to spiritual reading, to holy solitude. There are religious institutes that allow every week a day of recreation for the body, in order that the body may have more strength to work, and be better able to resist fatigue. Why should we not also give to the soul a day of spiritual recreation, so that it may be better able to bear the fatigue, considering that in exterior works it becomes always a little dissipated ?

Yes, I repeat, we stand much in need of mental prayer, of not a quarter of an hour, nor half an hour, but much more. Show me an apostolic laborer who has sanctified himself without much mental prayer; as for myself, I can find none. I see that St. Francis Xavier, the wonder of apostolic workers, spent most of the night in the churches to make mental prayer, and that after a short rest which he took in the sacristy he went to pour out the affections of his heart before the Blessed Sacrament, where the Lord so filled him with his consolations that he cried out: "It is enough, O Lord, it is enough!"[12429] I read of the Blessed John Francis Regis, the great missionary of France, that after having spent the whole day in preaching and hearing confessions, instead of resting, he went before the door of the church, which was closed, and conversed there with his God during the whole night. You know what were the labors of a St. Philip Neri, and what was his love for prayer. St. Vincent Ferrer, the apostle of Spain, used to make before preaching an hour's meditation. All evangelical laborers have only imitated in this their model and chief, Jesus Christ, who spent sometimes the whole night in prayer: He passed the whole night in the prayer of God.[12430]

Undoubtedly, when God commands us to leave mental prayer in order to labor for the salvation of souls we must obey by leaving God for God. Let us then apply ourselves to the good of our neighbor as much as it is necessary; but let us not lose time: let us avoid useless conversations, and not listen to vain discourses. The time lost is a thing that God does not command. As soon as we are free let us return to prayer. And even in the midst of our occupations, while hearing confessions, preaching, or doing anything else, we must always preserve in our hearts the little cell of St. Catharine of Sienna, where we may be anxious to enter from time to time in order to speak to God by an act of love or some ejaculatory prayer. We must also take care not to lose sight of holy solitude, and not cease to love it. We should imitate the Spouse of the Canticles, who said to his Well-beloved: Flee away, O My beloved, . . upon the mountains of aromatical spices.[12431]

She did not wish that the divine Spouse should depart from her and abandon her; but knowing that he was accustomed to speak in solitude, she begged him to retire to the solitary mountains, so that she might be able to converse with him alone. It is thus that in our labors, and then more than ever, we should sigh after happy solitude, desiring ardently, as a thirsty hart desires the fountain of waters, to see the moment of prayer arrive.

And how long should we converse with God ? Would it be a very great thing to give ourselves up to prayer for two hours a day, one hour in the morning, the other in the evening? Let us devote ourselves to it at least for an hour every day. Ah! I would regard it as a success if, with God's help, I should obtain as the fruit of this retreat that some among you, even if it were only one of you, would desire to increase a little the time given to prayer. You at least who are candidates for ordination do so; increase the time of mental prayer; all depends on the good habit that you acquire in the beginning. For those who for a number of years have the habit of making, for example, a half-hours meditation, and not more, it would be difficult to add more to it; they would believe that it would be an injury to them to add more mental prayer.

No, I repeat, it is not a great sacrifice to spend every day two hours in conversing with Jesus Crucified or with the Blessed Sacrament. I sat down under His shadow, whom I desired.[12432] Oh! what a paradise to be able to speak with Jesus Christ exposed during the Forty Hours devotion, or under other circumstances, or to visit some solitary church where the Blessed Sacrament is kept! Seculars, to our shame be it said, spend there sometimes whole hours.

It is precisely to converse often with us that our dear Saviour remains on earth in the Blessed Sacrament; when he is shut up there, he asks, he prays, so to speak, that we go to speak to him. But you will perhaps say, Two hours! that is too much. How! it would be too much, two hours of mental prayer! Do you not then know what mental prayer is? It consists in speaking familiarly with God, as a friend speaks with a friend, says St. Teresa. In mental prayer we find those wings so greatly desired by the Royal Prophet, by the aid of which he raised himself up to perfection:—Who will give me wings like a dove, and I will fly and be at rest?[12433]What perfection could we ever acquire without mental prayer ? It is an excellent school in which one learns the heavenly science of the saints. Permit me still to say before finishing, So many studies to which we devote ourselves, so many languages that we wish to know, so much knowledge, so many various sciences that we try to master, are without doubt good: no one denies that; they may be useful. It would, however, be better first to study Holy Scripture, the Canons, Dogmatic Theology, to be ready to satisfy also this modern erudition that is diffused throughout the world. But what is above all necessary to us is the beautiful science of the saints, which consists in loving God; a science that we learn, not in books, but before the Crucifix, before the Blessed Sacrament. Mental prayer, then, dear Fathers, mental prayer! The more we desire to labor for the salvation of souls, the more we need light and strength, since we are to give light and strength to others. What warmth and what light can be communicated to other lamps by a lamp that scarcely burns, that is in danger of being extinguished ? Ah! would to God that it would not occur daily that a priest who devotes himself to the salvation of souls, having himself but little fervor, little love for God, become-s more and more lukewarm, even falls sometimes over the precipice, and ends by losing God! How many examples of a similar misfortune do exist! Do you not yourselves know of some priest, who, wishing to hear confessions, to convert others, has afterwards succumbed to the occasions, and in them has lost God?

After this we say that it is too much to spend two hours in mental prayer! Such was not the thought of a St. Francis Borgia, who after eight hours of prayer asked the favor of a quarter of an hour more; a St. Rose of Lima, who spent twelve hours a day in prayer; a St. Anthony the Abbot, who, after having devoted the whole night to prayer, complained in the morning that the sun arose so soon and obliged him to finish. And how many young virgins, how many seculars, even mechanics, make four, five, and six hours of mental prayer! Is this not a subject of confusion for us who are priests ? Will they not have to judge us on the last day? Ah, priests of the Lord! let us not allow ourselves to be surpassed by others in the love for God, while as priests we are under greater obligations than others to love him. Let us not lose any more time; who knows how many days are still left us to live ? Let us love God, at least on account of the great desire and the firm will that he has of being loved by us who are his priests.

O my God! it is then true that Thou wishest to be loved by me. And of what use will life be if I do not employ it entirely to love Thee, who art my Lord and my God, my supreme and only good ? I am not worthy to love Thee; but Thou art infinitely worthy of being loved; Thou hast all the qualities that render Thee amiable: Thou art beautiful, loving, beneficent, faithful; what dost Thou need more to be loved ? There remains only one thing to be done: it is, that I love Thee. But why should I not love Thee, O my God! Why ? what should I love if I do not love Thee ? Outside of Thee, to whatever side I turn, I find nothing amiable; I see only creatures, earthly objects; I see only smoke and misery. " O fire that dost always burn," I will say with St. Augustine, "inflame me!"[12434] O God, who art all afire with love, thoroughly inflame me, consume me with love for Thee!

Have we a better means to love God than continually to ask him for his holy love ? I desire, says Jesus Christ to us, I desire to inflame thy heart as thou desirest, thou who art my priest; but come to mental prayer: Arise, My love, my beautiful one, and come? I expect thee in solitude; it is there that I have prepared for thee the abundance of my favors.[12435]

Ah, dear Fathers, of what advantage is it not to love God! The only thing that we find at the moment of death will be to have loved God nothing more. If we have obtained honors, possessed a convenient house, succeeded in our undertakings, at the end what shall we find ? Nothing but that we have loved God. Alas! what are we doing in this world, if we are not occupied therein in loving God ? Should we seek to amass riches, to gain the esteem of others, to enjoy pleasures, to acquire honors ? What interest have we in the world? I have chosen you out of the world.[12436]God has withdrawn us from the world, and we should wish to throw ourselves again into it? Ah! the world, honors, pleasures! let us live, and let us live only in order to love God; and to do this, let us devote ourselves to prayer, to prayer.

By this means we shall have the happiness of leaving this world while thanking God, like the glorious martyr St. Agatha, who said at the moment of her death: " O Lord, who hast taken from me the love of the world! receive now my soul."[12437] Ah! a thousand times happy shall we be if we can then also say: " The kingdom of this world and all the beauty of life I have esteemed as nothing, for the Excellency of the love of Jesus Christ my Lord."[12438]

Mary, my tender Mother! thou whose whole life was a continual prayer, since even sleep did not hinder thee from keeping thyself united with God, deign to remember us. Thou didst do to St. Rose the charity to awaken her when it was time for prayer: in the same way, when thou seest us fallen asleep in negligence, in lukewarmness, have the kindness to come to awaken us, and to recall us to the duty of attending to prayer, which should inflame us with love for God and for thee, so that afterwards we may be able to go to love thee for all eternity in paradise. Live Jesus and Mary: with Joseph and Teresa!

TRANSLATION.

Reverend Father:

As the centenary of the death of the illustrious Founder of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer drew near, you conceived the pious and appropriate plan of shedding a new lustre on his memory by translating all his works into English and publishing them. The Holy Father, therefore, who has at heart the spiritual advancement of the faithful, as well as the exaltation of the holy Doctor, has most graciously accepted the nine volumes thus far published, which you wished to present to him. While bestowing upon you well-deserved praise for your useful labor, and thanking you for the gift inspired by your filial love, he gives you from his heart the blessing which you humbly asked for in your letter, complying also with the request of the Most Rev. Archbishop of Baltimore.

As the bearer of this, I wish you all happiness in the Lord.

I am, Reverend Sir,

Your obedient servant,

M. CARD. RAMPOLLA

PREFACE

I. CONTENTS OF THIS VOLUME

WE may call this volume the Manual of the Celebrant. It is a collection of little works that St. Alphonsus published successively, in order to induce and aid priests to celebrate Mass well.

This volume has four parts, namely:

I. THE SACRIFICE OF JESUS CHRIST.—The author here shows us in a few words the Sacrifice of our divine Saviour as prefigured in the Old Law, as accomplished on the cross, as continued on the altars, and as eternized in heaven. He then gives a short explanation of the prayers of Mass. We have added to it the account of a striking miracle which occurred in 1772, near Naples, and which confirms the truth of the Sacrament of the Altar.

II. THE CEREMONIES OF THE MASS.—It is a detailed explanation of the Rubrics, at least as to what concerns the private Mass. We have added thereto an Appendix, the substance of which is drawn from the Rubrics of the Missal and from the Moral Theology of our author. The Appendix is followed by a dissertation on the Honorarium of Masses, in which are briefly treated several interesting questions touching this subject.

III. PREPARATION FOR MASS AND THANKSGIVING AFTER MASS.—This is a large and varied collection, that offers us, in three parts, Considerations, Affections, Acts, Aspirations, and Prayers, for every day of the week; every one may select there—from what suits his devotion.

IV. THE MASS AND THE OFFICE THAT ARE HURRIEDLY SAID.—This little work is in the main a pressing exhortation addressed to the ministers at the altar, to induce them to fulfil worthily the double function with which they are specially charged; namely, to offer the holy Sacrifice and to celebrate the praises of God in the name of the Church. We add, that this is a fitting conclusion of the volume; for the first part of it is, as it were, the peroration or natural conclusion, and the second may serve as a preface or as a transition to the following volume, which has as its object the Divine Office.

II. ZEAL OF ST. ALPHONSUS IN REGARD TO THE CELEBRATION OF MASS

These different writings give evidence of the zeal that animated our venerated author in regard to the divine Sacrifice on our altars. From his childhood he was admired for the tender devotion with which he attended Mass, received Communion, or spent his time in adoring the Blessed Sacrament. This virtue only grew and became more perfect as he advanced in age. Even in the midst of the world, notwithstanding the occupations and the cares of the profession which he at first embraced, he went every day to visit his dear Lord exposed in one of the churches of Naples, and there on his knees and immovable, he spent long hours before the altar, contemplating the object of his affection with so humble and so recollected an attitude, that he appeared to be out of himself; all persons that saw him were profoundly edified. Such piety was to receive its reward; for thus we read in his writings: "I feel myself bound, at least out of gratitude to my Jesns in the Holy Sacrament, to declare that by means of this devotion of visiting the Most Blessed Sacrament, which I practised, though with so much tepidity and in so imperfect a manner, I abandoned the world, in which, unfortunately, I lived until six-and-twenty years of age."[12439]

Such were his dispositions in the world; but one cannot imagine with what respect, with what care, with what dignity and with what fervor he celebrated the holy mysteries when he had the happiness of ascending the altar as a priest of the Most High, to consecrate and to hold in his hands the body and the blood of his well-beloved Jesus, and to be nourished every day with his heavenly food. Moreover, we can hardly picture to ourselves what was his preparation for an act of which he had so sublime an idea, and what was his conversation with his God living in him after Communion and during his long thanksgiving.

He never failed to celebrate Mass every day, unless he was obliged by an absolute necessity to omit doing so; in this case it was to him a very great privation. One day, at Naples, while he was going to say Mass in a church that was far distant, he was seized with violent cramps in the stomach, so that he was not able to go any farther. His companion advised him to enter some house and to use a remedy; but he answered: "I would rather walk ten more miles in order not to be deprived of the privilege of saying Mass." Fortunately he recovered from his illness, and was able to satisfy his devotion.[12440] He had not the same consolation on another occasion, when he was at St. Agatha. Pressed by an accumulation of work, he labored every evening till a very advanced hour, and instead of taking supper he contented himself with taking a glass of water before going to bed. Once, however, he noticed that he had drunk the water a little after midnight. Being quite annoyed by this mishap, he at once sent for his servant and had him to bring him different watches to find out the exact time; but finding that they all agreed, he had to make up his mind to do without saying Mass as well as without receiving Communion, which was his resource whenever he was too ill to celebrate Mass. This accident was the cause of great affliction to him for several days.[12441]

When he was at the altar one had more than one occasion to admire the marvellous effects of his fervor, without speaking of the trembling, the palpitation, the extraordinary movements that he felt. At Modugno, in February, 1745, he was seen after the Consecration raised in the air at the height of several feet. At another time, at Nocera, while he was reciting the psalm Judica me, he all of a sudden stopped. A Father who was serving his Mass, thinking that his memory had failed him, without looking at him suggested several times the words to him; but all to no purpose: then raising his eyes, he saw the saint in an ecstasy.[12442]

At the altar he resembled an angel rather than a human being; after Communion his countenance appeared transformed, and all on fire.[12443]

He made it a rule for the priests of his religious Institute to celebrate Mass every day, and to employ in saying it half an hour, after having devoutly prepared themselves; they had then to make at least half an hours thanksgiving. He permitted the shortening of the time of thanksgiving only in case of necessity, as when many confessions had to be heard, and there were only a few confessors; they had, however, to make at least a quarter of an hour's thanksgiving. He required that on retreat days, besides the half-hour's ordinary meditation, the proximate preparation for Mass should last at least half an hour, and the thanksgiving a whole hour. He enjoined upon the members of his Institute the exact observance of the ceremonies of Mass, and in order that they might not fail in this, he wished them carefully to study the Rubrics; for this purpose he established a special conference for the exercise of the Rubrics to be held on the first Monday of every month.

Obliged by obedience to assume the office of bishop in 1762, when he was sixty-six years of age, and bowed down by the weight of innumerable labors and grave infirmities, he at once made exact inquiries regarding the manner in which the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass was celebrated in his diocese; he himself examined the priests on the subject about which he had his serious doubts, and he did not hesitate to suspend from the celebration of Mass those whom he found deficient in this respect, until they had duly corrected themselves. He moreover watched specially over the manner in which the churches were kept. In the course of his first pastoral visit he fell dangerously ill, received Extreme Unction, and hovered for several weeks between life and death. When he was hardly convalescent and still bedridden, an altar was erected in his room, where every day Mass was said, during which he communicated; he would then send for the priests whom he wished to examine, and made them go through the exercises of the Rubrics in his presence. As for priests newly ordained, he did not grant them permission to say Mass till he became certain that they were perfectly able to observe all the prescribed ceremonies. He used to say: "When a man has once become a cripple there is no longer any remedy for him." He earnestly recommended to them never to neglect to make a suitable preparation and thanksgiving. "By the acts that precede the Mass," he said, "especially by the act of contrition, one empties and purifies the vessel of one's heart, and by those acts that follow Mass one fills this vessel with graces and heavenly gifts." Such conduct did not fail to produce happy effects in his diocese, the state of which left much to be desired; thenceforward priests were seen carefully applying themselves to the celebration of Mass in an irreproachable and edifying manner.[12444]

In 1768, at the age of seventy-two, the holy bishop had to submit to a very severe trial. After a long and painful attack of rheumatism his neck became twisted and his head bent, so that his chin rested on his breast; he could not hold up his head. He had to resign himself to pass in this state the rest of his life, which was yet to last nineteen years. He had already, in 1765, asked in vain Pope Clement XIII. to be freed from his charge; he renewed his request, but without success. In the midst of all his sufferings he did not forget his flock. Having recovered little by little some strength, he again occupied himself with the affairs of his diocese and of his Congregation; he published more important books, and even entered the pulpit to preach. He, however, believed that he was obliged to give up saying Mass, because he was not able to raise his head to take the precious blood: this was a source of the greatest grief to him.

He had endured this privation for two years, when in a conversation with an Augustinian priest he began to speak of that which so sensibly afflicted his pious soul. The Father, however, remarked to him that on account of his infirmity he could be dispensed at the altar from performing certain ceremonies that were not essential, and that he could sit down in such a way as to make it convenient for him to take the precious blood. This advice was to him a ray of light that filled his heart with joy. He made the effort and succeeded. He immediately gave information of his good fortune to Father Villani, his Vicar-General in the government of his Institute and his spiritual director, by a letter dated August 27, 1770, in which he thus expresses himself: "To-day I again began to say Mass, and I hope to be able to continue. The whole difficulty was in taking the precious blood; but a means of doing so with ease has been pointed out to me. Gloria Patri!" Writing to the same Father on the following September 1, he says: "Thanks be to God! I continue to say Mass, but with great difficulty; when I finish Mass, I am nearly worn out and in great perspiration." He afterwards obtained permission from Rome to say every day the Mass of the Blessed Virgin.

While making his thanksgiving after Mass he heard another Mass, which was said by his chaplain or another priest. During the recitation of the Credo, at the words Et incarnatus est he threw himself on his knees, holding himself profoundly inclined, notwithstanding the intense pain that he suffered; he did the same thing at the Consecration, although each time great efforts had to be made to raise him up and put him back into his chair.[12445]

He thus had the consolation of offering the Holy Sacrifice till his eighty-eighth year, either in his diocese or in the house of his Institute at Nocera, to which he retired in 1775, when Pope Pius VI. finally consented to relieve him of the burden of the episcopate. When at the altar, he was always most exact in observing all the Rubrics, even in making the genuflections down to the floor, although it was most difficult for him to do so, and each time great effort was required to raise him up. In 1784, when Father Villani saw that the difficulty of saying Mass was becoming extreme, so much so that it was often feared that the saint would not be able to finish it, he begged him to abstain from celebrating Mass in future, telling him that such was the will of God. The words "the will of God" made the saint bow his head in submission. On November 25, which was on a Friday, he made to God this great and perpetual sacrifice. He had still three years to live, during which he finished his eternal crown in the midst of new sufferings and the greatest trials, both interior and exterior, which he bore till the end in perfect conformity to the holy will of his God.[12446]

III. MASS CONSIDERED IN ITS RELATIONS TO THE LIFE OF JESUS CHRIST, TO THE ECCLESIASTICAL YEAR, AND TO THE UNIVERSAL HISTORY OF RELIGION.[12447]

The civil year is an abridgment of human life in which one naturally discerns four seasons; the day is an abridgment of the year. So also, the ecclesiastical year, which begins with Advent, is an abridgment of the principal mysteries of religion; and one may see in the ceremonies of the Mass an abridgment of the ecclesiastical year.

1. PREPARATION

The altar is erected, lit up by burning candles, adorned with verdure and flowers, and other decorations; legions of angels range themselves around it: think of the creation of the world. Sacred relics are deposited there; the saints descend from heaven and join the angels in order to adore our divine Saviour: think of the redemption of the world.

2. THE BEGINNING OF THE MASS

The priest arrives at the altar and inclines profoundly: the first man, opening his eyes to the light, pays homage to his Creator. The priest ascends the altar: man takes possession of the empire that God has prepared for him. The priest goes to open the Missal, and returns to the middle of the altar, where he again inclines: man receives the law from God, and promises to obey him. The priest descends from the altar: fall of man. The priest humbles himself and strikes his breast, then he stands erect, and ascends again the altar while praying: man acknowledges his fault; God has compassion on him, and promises him a Saviour; he is consoled, hopes, and prays while working. Let us remember our sins, let us humble ourselves, and let us pray with confidence.

3. KYRIE ELEISON

The patriarchs and the prophets sighed for the coming of the Messias during four thousand years; this is perfectly expressed by the repetition of this ardent prayer. Let us enter into the same sentiments, and let us ask Jesus Christ to be born and to grow in our hearts, while saying with fervor: Kyrie eleison, etc.

4. GLORIA IN EXCELSIS

It was the angels that intoned this magnificent hymn over the cradle of the Saviour, and the poor shepherds of Bethlehem have had the happiness of hearing it. Let us rejoice with them, and repeat this beautiful prayer, while meditating on each word.

5. PRAYER

Hidden life of Jesus Christ: the Son of God spends thirty years on earth in a most humble condition, in poverty, mortification, labor, patience, sweetness, charity, abnegation, obedience, piety; and before entering public life, he retired to the desert to give himself up to fasting and to prayer during forty days. What an example!

6. EPISTLE

The Epistle is an instruction that our Lord addresses to us through the mouth of the prophets or apostles in order to dispose us to hear him himself. Before appearing in the world, he announced himself through the prophets and his precursor, St. John the Baptist; and before going to preach the Gospel in any place, he made his apostles or disciples precede him in order to prepare men's minds to receive him.

7. GOSPEL

Here is our Lord going to instruct us by his own mouth. Let us rise in order to pay to him our respects, to show him that we are ready to obey him; let us make the sign of the cross on our forehead, on our lips, and on our hearts, to consecrate to him our thoughts, our words, and our affections.

8. CREDO

The Credo is an act of faith in the principal truths that God has revealed to his Church; that which is recited at the Mass is the Symbol of the Councils of Nice and Constantinople. Let us, say it with faith, love, and thanksgiving for the happiness that we have of being Catholics.

9. OFFERTORY

The Offertory well represents the Lord's Supper, in which our Lord celebrated for the last time the sacrifice of the Old Law before substituting for it the sacrifice of the New Law, of which the Old Law was the figure. Let us offer with the priest the bread and the wine, destined to be changed into the body and blood of Jesus Christ.

10. LAVABO

The priest washes his hands: our divine Master washes the feet of his disciples, to give us a grand example of humility and charity, and to teach us how pure we should be in order to participate in the adorable mystery that he is about to institute.

11. ORATE FRATRES

The priest invites us to pray with more fervor in order that his Sacrifice, which is also ours, may be agreeable to God. Let us answer him with our whole heart: Suscipiat Dominus, etc.

12. PREFACE

The Preface is the giving of thanks. Before consecrating bread and wine our divine Saviour raised his eyes towards heaven and gave thanks to his Father; this is the reason why the priest in finishing the prayer called Secreta, raises his voice and invites us to thank God through Jesus Christ.

13. MEMENTO OF THE LIVING

Let us here call to mind that Mass has a twofold object: the sacrament of the Eucharist and the sacrifice of the cross which it represents and renews. When leaving the supper-room to go to the Garden of Olives, our Lord offered a fervent prayer for himself and for his Church; this is also done by the priest at this moment: let us unite ourselves to him.

14. HANC IGITUR OBLATIONEM

While saying this prayer the priest holds his two hands extended over the host and the chalice in order to unite himself with the assistants and all the faithful, as in the sacrifices of the Old Law, to the divine Victim who is about to immolate himself for the salvation of all. Let each one unite his intention to that of the celebrant, while saying with hint: Hanc igitur, etc.

15. CONSECRATION

This is the great moment: the miracle of love is wrought; the minister of God receives and adores Jesus Christ in his hands. The elevation of the Host and of the Chalice represents the crucifixion, and the separation of the holy species represents the death of our Lord. Let us reanimate our faith; let us prostrate ourselves, and adore.

16. MEMENTO OF THE DEAD

When our Lord drew his last breath on the cross, being entirely consumed for our salvation, his holy soul descended in triumph to Limbo and Purgatory in order to console and deliver the just that were expecting his coming. Let us ask him to visit again at this moment the souls of the faithful departed, and let us think of those to whom we should more particularly give our assistance.

17. PATER NOSTER

Let us visit in spirit the tomb of our Saviour, and while confiding in the merits of his life and death, recite with confidence the admirable prayer that he has taught us.

18. PAX DOMINI

While pronouncing these words the priest drops a part of the Host into the Chalice; the two species thus reunited represent the Resurrection of Jesus Christ, and peace is announced to the world as it was announced at his birth.

19. AGNUS DEI

Preparation for Communion.—If we have not the happiness of communicating sacramentally with the priest, let us not fail to make a spiritual Communion by uniting ourselves interiorly to Jesus Christ, by a sincere desire to receive him and by an act of fervent love: we should therefore always say the prayers before and after Communion, whether sacramental or spiritual. What hinders our union with God is sin: let us then, before all, beg the Victim, who is without stain, to free us from sin, while saying Agnus Dei, etc., three times with the priest, and striking our breasts as if acknowledging ourselves guilty.

20. POST-COMMUNION

Jesus is no longer on the altar; he is in heaven, at the right hand side of God his Father, and on earth in the hearts of those that have piously received him. After the Ascension, the chief disciples retired with the Blessed Virgin to the Cenaculum, to await there in recollection and prayer the divine Consoler whom Jesus Christ promised to his Church: let us imitate them.

21. BLESSING

The Coming Down of the Holy Ghost.—Let us ask him to penetrate our minds and our hearts, and to fill us with his gifts.

22. LAST GOSPEL

The preaching of the Gospel throughout the world; perpetual struggle of light with darkness, of truth with error, of good with evil. He that has fought well shall be crowned.

Praise be Jesus Christ forever!

The Sacrifice of Jesus Christ, with a Short Explanation of the Prayers of Mass

The little work that we place at the beginning of this volume has already appeared in Volume VI. for ordinary readers; but we believe it necessary to reproduce it in this volume, to which it properly belongs St. Alphonsus published it with The Victories of the Martyrs, in 1776, when he was eighty years old (Tannoia and Villecourt, "Life of St. Alphonsus," 1. 4, ch. 3). We add an account of a great miracle that was wrought confirming th e truth of the Blessed Sacrament.—ED.

NOTICE

I ACKNOWLEDGE to have drawn this little treatise on the Sacrifice of Jesus Christ from a work composed by a learned French author.[12448] His work is complete and somewhat diffuse. I have composed and have published this abridgment because of the profit that may be derived from it, not only by the priests who say Mass, but by the faithful who are present at it.

My little work bears the title "The Sacrifice of Jesus Christ," for, although we distinguish by different names the Sacrifice of the Cross from the Sacrifice of the Altar, yet it is substantially the same sacrifice. In fact, we find at the altar the same victim and the same priest that one day offered himself on the cross. The Sacrifice of the Altar is a continuation or a renewal of the Sacrifice of the Cross, and differs from it only in the manner in which it is offered.

THE SACRIFICE OF JESUS CHRIST

I. THE SACRIFICES OF THE OLD LAW WERE FIGURES OF THE SACRIFICE OF JESUS CHRIST

All the sacrifices of the old law were figures of the sacrifice of our divine Redeemer, and there were four kinds of these sacrifices; namely, the sacrifices of peace, of thanksgiving, of expiation, and of impetration.

1. The sacrifices of peace were instituted to render to God the worship of adoration that is due to him as the sovereign master of all things. Of this kind were the holocausts.

2. The sacrifices of thanksgiving were destined to give thanks to the Lord for all his benefits.

3. The sacrifices of expiation were established to obtain the pardon of sin. This kind of sacrifice was specially represented in the Feast of the Expiation by the emissary-goat,[12449] which, having been laden with all the sins of the people, was led forth out of the camp of the Hebrews, and afterwards abandoned in the desert to be there devoured by ferocious beasts. This sacrifice was the most expressive figure of the sacrifice of the cross. Jesus Christ was laden with all the sins of men, as Isaias had foretold: The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all.[12450] He was afterwards ignominiously led forth from Jerusalem, whither the Apostle invites us to follow him by sharing in his opprobrium: Let us go forth therefore to him without the camp, bearing his reproach.[12451] He was abandoned to ferocious beasts; that is to say, to the Gentiles, who crucified him.

4. Finally, the sacrifices of impetration had for their object to obtain from God his aid and his grace.

Now, all these sacrifices were abolished by the coming of the Redeemer, because only the sacrifice of Jesus Christ, which was a perfect sacrifice, while all the ancient sacrifices were imperfect, was sufficient to expiate all the sins, and merit for man every grace. This is the reason why the Son of God on entering the world said to his Father: Sacrifice and oblation Thou wouldst not; but a body Thou hast fitted to me. Holocausts for sin did not please Thee. Then said I: Behold, I come; in the head of the book it is written of me, that I should do Thy will, O God.[12452] Hence, by offering to God the sacrifice of Jesus Christ we can fulfil all our duties towards his supreme majesty, and provide for all our wants; and by his means we succeed in maintaining a holy intercourse between God and ourselves.

We must also know that the Old Law exacted five conditions in regard to the victims which were to be offered to God so as to be agreeable to him; namely, sanctification, oblation, immolation, consumption, and participation.

1. The victim had to be sanctified, or consecrated to God, so that there might not be offered to him anything that was not holy nor unworthy of his majesty. Hence, the animal destined for sacrifice had to be without stain, without defect; it was not to be blind, lame, weak, nor deformed, according to what was prescribed in the Book of Deuteronomy.[12453] This condition indicated that such would be the Lamb of God, the victim promised for the salvation of the world; that is to say, that he would be holy, and exempt from every defect. We are thereby instructed that our prayers and our other good works are not worthy of being offered to God, or at least can never be fully agreeable to him, if they are in any way defective. Moreover, the animal thus sanctified could no longer be employed for any profane usage, and was regarded as a thing consecrated to God in such a manner that only a priest was permitted to touch it. This shows us how displeasing it is to God if persons concecrated to him busy themselves without real necessity with the things of the world, and thus live in distraction and in neglect of what concerns the glory of God.

2. The victim had to be offered to God; this was done by certain words that the Lord himself had prescribed.

3. It had to be immolated, or put to death; but this immolation was not always brought about by death, properly so called; for the sacrifice of the loaves of proposition, or show-bread, was accomplished, for example, without using iron or fire, but only by means of the natural heat of those who ate of them.

4. The victim had to be consumed. This was done by fire. The sacrifice in which the victim was entirely consumed by fire was called holocaust. The victim was thus entirely annihilated in order to indicate by this destruction the unlimited power that God has over all his creatures, and that as he created them out of nothing, so he can reduce them to the nothingness from which they came. In fact, the principal end of the sacrifice is to acknowledge God as a sovereign being, so superior to all things that everything before him is purely nothing; for all things are nothing in presence of him who possesses all things in himself. The smoke that came from this sacrifice and arose in the air signified that God received it as a sweet odor,—that is to say, with pleasure,—as is written of the sacrifice of Noe: Noe . . . offered holocausts upon the altar; and the Lord smelled a sweet savor.[12454]

5. All the people, together with the priest, had to be partakers of the victim. Hence, in the sacrifices, excepting the holocaust, the victim was divided into three parts, one part of which was destined for the priest, one for the people, and one for the fire. This last part was regarded as belonging to God, who by this means communicated in some manner with those who were partakers of the victim.

These five conditions are found reunited in the sacrifice of the Paschal Lamb. The Lord had commanded Moses[12455] that, on the tenth day of the month on which the Jews had been delivered from the slavery of Egypt, a lamb of one year and without blemish should be taken and separated from the flock; and thus were verified the conditions enumerated above, namely: 1. The separation of the lamb signified that it was a victim consecrated to God; 2. This consecration was succeeded by the oblation, which took place in the Temple, where the lamb was presented; 3. On the fourteenth day of the month the immolation took place, or the lamb was killed; 4. Then the lamb was roasted and divided among those present; and this was the partaking of it, or communion; 5. Finally, the lamb having been eaten, what remained of it was consumed by fire, and thus was the sacrifice consummated.

II. FULFILMENT OF THE PROPHETIC FIGURES

The Sacrifice of our Lord, as we have said, was a perfect sacrifice, of which those sacrifices of the Old Law were but signs, imperfect figures, and what the Apostle calls weak and needy elements.[12456] The sacrifice offered by Jesus Christ really fulfilled all the conditions mentioned above. The first condition, which is the sanctification, or the consecration of the victim, was accomplished in the Incarnation of the Word by God the Father himself, as is mentioned in the Gospel of St. John: Whom the Father hath sanctified.[12457] Likewise, when announcing to the Blessed Virgin that she was chosen to be the Mother of the Son of God, the Angel said: The Holy which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God.[12458] Thus this divine victim, who was to be sacrificed for the salvation of the world, had already been sanctified by God, when he was born of Mary. From the first moment in which the Eternal Word took a human body, he was consecrated to God to be the victim of the great sacrifice that was to be accomplished on the Cross for the salvation of men. In regard to this our Lord said to his Father: But a body Thou hast fitted to me . . . that I should do Thy will, O God.[12459]

The second condition, or the oblation, was also fulfilled at the moment of the Incarnation, when Jesus Christ voluntarily offered himself to atone for the sins of men. Knowing that divine justice could not be satisfied by all the ancient sacrifices, nor by all the works of men, he offered himself to atone for all the sins of men, and hence he said to God, Sacrifices, and oblations, and holocausts for sin, Thou wouldst not. . . . Then said I, Behold, I come to do Thy will, O God.[12460] Then the Apostle adds immediately, In which will we are sanctified by the oblation of the body of Jesus Christ once.[12461] This last text is remarkable. Sin had rendered all men unworthy of being offered to God and of being accepted by him, and, therefore, it was necessary that Jesus Christ should offer himself for us in order to sanctify us by his grace, and to make us worthy of being accepted by God. And this offering which our Lord then made of himself did not limit itself to that moment, but it only then began; it always has continued since, and it will continue forever. It is true it will cease on earth at the time of Antichrist: the Sacrifice of the Mass is to be suspended for twelve hundred and ninety days; that is, for three years six months and a half, according to the prophecy of Daniel: And from the time when the continual sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination unto desolation shall be set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred ninety days.[12462] Yet the Sacrifice of Jesus Christ will never cease, since the Son of God will always continue to offer himself to his Father by an eternal sacrifice, for he himself is the priest and the victim, but an eternal victim and an eternal priest, not according to the order of Aaron, of which the priesthood and the sacrifice were temporary, imperfect, and inadequate to appease the anger of God against rebellious man, but according to the order of Melchisedech, as David predicted: Thou art a priest according to the order of Melchisedech.[12463] The priesthood of Jesus Christ will, therefore, be eternal, since, even after the end of the world, he will always continue to offer in heaven this same victim that he once offered on the Cross for the glory of God and for the salvation of mankind.

The third condition of the sacrifice—namely, the immolation of the victim—was evidently accomplished by the death of our Lord on the Cross.

There remains for us yet to verify, in the Sacrifice of Jesus Christ, the two other conditions requisite to render a sacrifice perfect—that is, the consumption of the victim and the partaking of it.

It is then asked, What was this consumption of the victim in the Sacrifice of Jesus Christ? for although his body was by death separated from his holy soul, yet it was not consumed, nor destroyed.

The anonymous author of whom I spoke in the beginning, says that this fourth condition was fulfilled by the resurrection of our Lord; for, then, his adorable body was divested of all that is terrestrial and mortal, and was clothed in divine glory. He adds that it is this glory that Jesus Christ asked of his Father before his death: And now glorify Thou me, O Father, with Thyself, with the glory which I had, before the world was, with Thee.[12464] Our Lord did not ask this glory for his divinity, since he possessed it from all eternity as being the Word equal to the Father; but he asked it for his humanity, and he obtained it at his resurrection, by which he entered in a certain manner into his divine glory.

In speaking of the fifth condition, which is, the partaking of the victim, or Communion, the same author says that it is also fulfilled in heaven, where all the blessed are partakers of the victim of the Sacrifice that Jesus Christ continues to offer to God while offering himself.

These two reflections, made by the author to explain the last two conditions of the Sacrifice of Jesus Christ, are wise and ingenious; but for myself I think that the two conditions of which there is question, namely, the consumption and Communion, are manifestly fulfilled in the Sacrifice of the Altar, which, as has been declared by the Council of Trent, is the same as that of the Cross. In fact, the Sacrifice of the Mass, instituted by our Lord before his death, is a continuation of the Sacrifice of the Cross. Jesus Christ wished that the price of his blood, shed for the salvation of men, should be applied to us by the Sacrifice of the Altar; in which the victim offered is the same, though it is there offered differently from what it is on the Cross, that is, without the shedding of blood. These are the words of the Council of Trent: "Although Christ our Lord was to offer himself once to his Eternal Father on the altar of the Cross by actually dying to obtain for us eternal redemption, yet as his priesthood was not to become extinct by his death, in order to leave his Church a visible sacrifice suited to the present condition of men, a sacrifice which might at the same time represent to us the bloody sacrifice consummated on the Cross, preserve the memory of it to the end of the world, and apply the salutary fruits of it for the remission of the sins which we daily commit; at his last supper, on the very night on which he was betrayed, giving proof that he was established a priest forever according to the order of Melchisedech, he offered to God the Father his body and blood, under the appearances of bread and wine, and, under the same symbols, gave them to the apostles, whom he constituted at the same time priests of the New Law. By these words, 'Do ye this in remembrance of me,' he commissioned them and their successors in the priesthood to consecrate and offer his body and blood, as the Catholic Church has always understood and taught."[12465] And further on the Council declares that the Lord, appeased by the oblation of the Sacrifice of Mass, grants us his graces and the remission of sins. It says: "It is one and the same victim; the one that offers sacrifice is the same one who, after having sacrificed himself on the Cross, offers himself now by the ministry of the priest; there is no difference except in the manner of offering."[12466]

Jesus Christ has, then, paid the price of our redemption in the Sacrifice of the Cross. But he wishes that the fruit of the ransom given should be applied to us in the Sacrifice of Altar, being himself in both the chief sacrificer, who offers the same victim, namely, his own body and his own blood;—with this difference only, that on the Cross his blood was shed, while it is not shed at the altar. Hence the Roman catechism[12467] teaches that the Sacrifice of the Mass does not serve only to praise God and to thank him for the gifts that he has granted us, but it is a true propitiatory sacrifice, by which we obtain from the Lord pardon for our sins and the graces of which we stand in need. Because the fruit of the death of Jesus Christ is applied to us by the Sacrifice of the Altar, the Church expresses herself thus in her prayers: "As often as the memory of the Sacrifice of the Cross is celebrated, so often is accomplished the work of our redemption."[12468]

Now, in the Mass we find not only the three essential parts of the Sacrifice of the Cross—that is, the sanctification and oblation of the victim, as also the immolation, which is here done mystically, the consecration of the body and that of the blood taking place separately,—but we also find the two other parts of the sacrifice; namely, the destruction or consumption, communion or partaking, of the victim. The destruction or consumption is accomplished by the natural heat of those who receive the consecrated Host. Communion or partaking of the victim consists in the distribution of the Holy Eucharist to the faithful who approach the altar for this purpose.

In this manner we clearly see realized in the Sacrifice of the Altar the five conditions required in the ancient sacrifices, all of which were signs and figures of the great Sacrifice of our Lord.[12469]

SHORT EXPLANATION OF THE PRAYERS OF MASS

Mass is rightly divided into six parts. The first part is the preparation for the sacrifice; and this is made at the foot of the altar. The second part extends from the Introit to the Credo, inclusively—and was formerly called the Mass of the Catechumens, who had to leave the church after the Credo. The third part contains the Offertory and the Preface. The fourth part comprises the Canon with the Pater Noster; for the Canon in olden times finished with the Pater Noster, as a learned author concludes from a passage in the writings of St. Gregory the Great.[12470] The fifth part begins with the prayer Libera nos, quæsumus, Domine ("Deliver us, O Lord, we beseech Thee"), which is a preparation for Communion, and includes Communion. The sixth and last part comprises under the form of thanksgiving the rest of the Mass.

FIRST PART. THE PREPARATION THAT IS MADE AT THE FOOT OF THE ALTAR

In nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti. Amen ("In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen").

In order to sacrifice a victim one must have the power over its life and death; but as God only has the power over the life of his incarnate Son, who is the victim of the Sacrifice of the Mass, the priest needs divine authority in order to be able to offer Jesus Christ to his heavenly Father. Yet as he is invested with the authority that belongs to the priesthood, he says, in union with Jesus Christ, who is the principal one that offers that sacrifice, In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; thus declaring that he offers the sacrifice by the authority of the three Persons.

The priest afterwards recites the antiphon Introibo ad altare Dei ("I will go unto the altar of God"), and the psalm Judica me Deus ("Judge me, O God"). He implores the help of God against the enemies who are laying snares for him. Then expressing the pain that he feels of seeing himself, as it were, rejected by the Lord, he begs him to assist him with his light, and to console him with the graces that he promised by leading him into his tabernacle. Finally, he reproaches himself for indulging in fear, for why should he be troubled when he has with him his God in whom he should confide?

Innocent III.[12471] attests that the recitation before Mass of the psalm Judica me was the custom of his time, that is, in the twelfth century; and Cardinal Lambertini, afterwards Benedict XIV.,[12472] assures us that it was recited before the eighth century. The psalm is concluded with the Gloria Patri. It was Pope St. Damasus who ordained that each psalm should be concluded in this manner. It is, however, believed that the Gloria Patri was introduced by the Council of Nice, or, as we are told by Baronius[12473] and St. Basil, even by the Apostles, the Council of Nice having added only these words, Sicut erat, etc.

Adjutorium nostrum in nomine Domini ("Our help is in the name of the Lord"). Affrighted by the grandeur of the act he is about to perform, and by the thought of his unworthiness, the priest asks God's help in the name of Jesus Christ; and acknowledging himself guilty, he accuses himself of his sins, not only before God, but before the Blessed Virgin and all the saints, who on the last day, with Jesus Christ, will pronounce judgment upon sinners.

Deus, tu conversus, vivificabis nos ("Thou, O Lord," says the priest, "wilt turn and bring us to life"). The sinner remains in death so long as God in his goodness does not come to restore to him the life of grace. Then he implores anew the divine mercy: Ostende nobis, Domine, misericordiam tuam ("Show us, O Lord, Thy mercy"); and supplicates the Lord to hear him: Domine, exaudi orationem meam ("O Lord, hear my prayer").

Before leaving the people to go up to the altar, the priest says to them, Dominus vobiscum ("The Lord be with you"). By these words he wishes and asks that Jesus Christ may grant to the people as well as to himself the effects of the prayers that he has said; and the server expresses to him the same wish when answering for all the people: Et cum spiritu tuo ("And with Thy spirit"). These reciprocal wishes indicate the union of faith in Jesus Christ that exists between the priest and the people.

Aufer a nobis, etc. ("Take away from us our iniquities, etc."). In going up the steps of the altar, the priest begs the Lord to deliver him from all iniquities, in order that he may approach the Holy of Holies with a pure heart; that is to say, in order that he may worthily offer up the great sacrifice.

Oramus te, Domine, per merita Sanctorum tuorum, etc. ("We beseech Thee, O Lord, by the merits of Thy saints, etc."). Having reached the altar, he kisses it, to unite himself to Jesus Christ, represented by the altar; and, through the merits of the holy martyrs whose relics are therein enclosed, he conjures our Lord to deign to pardon him all his sins.

From the first ages the Church was accustomed to offer up the Eucharistic sacrifice on the tombs of the martyrs who had sacrificed their lives for God, and who for this reason have always been particularly honored in the Church. During the first period of the Church there were no other festivals than those of the mysteries of Jesus Christ, those of the Blessed Virgin, and the anniversaries of the martyrs. However, it is not to the saints, but only to God that altars are erected, "and," as St. Augustine says, "we have not erected an altar to the martyr, Stephen, but with the relics of the martyr Stephen we have erected an altar to God."[12474]

SECOND PART. FROM THE INTROIT TO THE CREDO

It is usually in the Introit that the Church proposes the subject of the feast that is celebrated. Mention is therein made of some divine mystery, of the Blessed Virgin, or of some other saint whom the Church honors on that day, so that we simply render this honor to the saint, since the sacrifice, as we have said, is offered only to God. It is asserted that the author of the Introit is St. Gregory the Great, as may be seen in the works of Benedict XIV.[12475]

Kyrie, eleison; Christe, eleison. These are Greek words that mean "Lord, or Christ, have mercy." This prayer is addressed three times to the Father, three times to the Son, and three times to the Holy Ghost. Durand[12476] says that Mass was begun to be said in Greek in the Oriental Church at the time of the Emperor Adrian I., about the year 140. Pope St. Sylvester ordered that, after the example of the Greeks, the Kyrie eleison should be said in the Latin Church. According to Cardinal Bellarmine[12477] this custom was introduced into Italy about a hundred and fifty years before St. Gregory. Thereby is shown the union that exists between the Greek and the Latin Church.

Gloria in excelsis Deo, etc. ("Glory be to God on high, etc."). This canticle or prayer is formed of the words that the celestial choirs used when the Angel came to announce to the shepherds the birth of the Saviour; "Glory to God in the highest: and on earth peace to men of good will."[12478] The remaining words were added by the Church. In it God is thanked for his glory, because God has used our salvation for his glory by saving us through Jesus Christ, who, in offering himself as a sacrifice to his Father, has procured salvation for men, and has given, at the same time, infinite glory to God. Then the Church, addressing herself to Jesus Christ, asks him by the merits of his sacrifice to have pity on us; and she concludes by proclaiming him: Quoniam tu solus Sanctus, tu solus Dominus, tu solus Altissimus, Jesu Christe, cum Sancto Spiritu in gloria Dei Patris. Amen ("For Thou only art holy; Thou only art Lord; Thou only, O Jesus Christ, art Most High in the glory of God the Father. Amen"). For our Saviour, who sacrifices himself as a victim, is at the same time God, equal to Him to whom the sacrifice is offered.

Then follows the prayer or Collect, thus called because the priest, performing the office of mediator between God and men, collects all the prayers of the people, and presents them to God. The Collect is said in a suppliant manner, with outstretched and raised hands. In these prayers are asked of God the graces that have reference to the mystery of the day: for example, at Easter, the grace to rise with Jesus Christ, and at the Ascension to dwell with him in spirit in heaven; or we ask for those graces that we wish to obtain through the intercession of the saint whose feast we are celebrating. But all these prayers are concluded with the name of Jesus Christ: Per Dominium nostrum Jesum Christum ("Through our Lord Jesus Christ"). Because all the graces that we obtain are given to us chiefly in view of the merits of Jesus Christ. It is not true, as the innovators say, that we offer the Sacrifice of the Altar to the saints. It is altogether false; for we know very well that the sacrifice, being a cult or worship that is due to the sovereign Lord of the universe, can be offered only to God; and if at the Mass we make mention of the saints, we do so only because of the favors that they have received from God, to whom they acknowledge they are indebted for all the happiness that they possess.

Here follow the Epistle and the Gospel. While listening to the reading of the Epistle, we must hear it as if it is God himself who speaks by the mouth of his prophets and apostles.

The Epistle is followed by the Gradual, which, according to Bellarmin, was sung in former times while the deacon ascended the steps of the ambo—an elevated pulpit—to read the Gospel. The Gradual was followed by the Alleluia, a Hebrew word that signifies Praise the Lord. But in Lent the Alleluia, which expresses joy, is replaced by the Tract, which Abbot Rupert calls the lamentation of penitents (Pœnitentium lamentum).

The priest then leaving the left side of the altar, which represents the Jewish people, passes to the right side, which represents the Gentiles, who accepted the Gospel that was rejected by the Jews. We should listen to the Gospel as if we heard the words of our divine Saviour instructing us himself, and we should at the same time ask him for the necessary help to put in practice what he teaches. It is an ancient custom to stand during the reading of the Gospel, to show that we are ready to follow the precepts and counsels that our Lord points out to us.

Credo ("I believe"). While the priest is reciting the symbol, we should renew our faith in all the mysteries and all the dogmas that the Church teaches. By the symbol was formerly understood a military sign, a mark by which many recognize one another, and are distinguished from one another: this at present distinguishes believers from unbelievers. Benedict XIV.[12479] tells us that at Rome the recitation of the symbol during Mass was begun only in the eleventh century.

THIRD PART. THE OFFERTORY AND THE PREFACE

The Offertory embraces everything from the Dominus vobiscum till the Preface. In offering the bread and wine the priest calls them the immaculate Host, the Chalice of salvation. We should not be astonished at this; for all the prayers and all the ceremonies before and after the consecration have reference to the divine Victim. It is at the moment of consecration that the Victim presents himself to God, that he offers himself to him, and that the sacrifice is offered; but as these different acts cannot be explained at the same time, they are explained one after the other. The priest then offers by anticipation the bread prepared for the sacrifice, and while saying, Suscipe, sancte Pater, hanc immaculatam Hostiam, etc. ("Accept, O holy Father, this immaculate Host, etc."); and he offers the wine as if it had already been consecrated, by saying, Offerimus tibi, Domine, Calicem salutaris, etc. ("We offer unto Thee, O Lord, the Chalice of salvation, etc."); because this wine, being afterwards changed into the blood of Jesus Christ, becomes our salvation. St. Augustine says that as at the Eucharistic Table our Saviour offers us to eat and to drink his body and his blood, we should also offer to him our body and our blood by giving ourselves entirely to him, being ready to sacrifice our life for his glory, should it be necessary. These are the beautiful words of the holy Doctor: "You know what this banquet is, and what nourishment is offered you at this table. Since Jesus Christ gives entirely his body and his blood, let no one approach without giving himself entirely to the Lord."[12480]

A little water is mixed with the wine to represent the mixture or the union that takes place in the Incarnation of the Word between the divinity and the humanity, and also to represent the intimate union that is effected in the sacramental Communion between Jesus Christ and the person who communicates —a union which St. Augustine calls Mixtura Dei et hominis ("A mixture of God and of man"). Hence the priest, in the prayer which he recites while mixing the water with the wine, beseeches God to grant that, as his divine Son became partaker of our humanity, we may be made partakers of his divinity. The Council of Trent declares that this mingling of water and of wine in the chalice is prescribed: "The holy Synod admonishes that it is enjoined on the priests by the Church that they should mix water with the wine that is to be offered in the chalice, as it is believed that the Lord has done the same thing."[12481] However, this is only an ecclesiastical, not a divine precept.

Offerimus tibi, Domine, Calicem salutaris, etc. ("We offer unto Thee, O Lord, the Chalice of salvation, etc."). The chalice of salvation is offered to the Lord, so that it may arise in his divine presence as an agreeable odor, for our salvation and for the salvation of the whole world. Cardinal Bona,[12482] in his Liturgy, assures us that neither in the Sacramentarium of St. Gregory, nor in other authors, is any prayer found for the offering of the bread and of the wine; however, the same Cardinal says that in the ancient Liturgy which he caused to be published we find the prayers that were recited by the clergy as well as by the faithful when the latter presented to the priest their offerings. Moreover, our French author says that the prayers recited at present by the priest at the oblation of the bread and of the wine have reference to the offerings which the faithful formerly made, not at the altar, but at the balustrade of the choir.

In spiritu humilitatis et in animo contrito suscipiamur a te, Domine, etc. ("In the spirit of humility, and with a contrite heart, let us be received by Thee, O Lord, etc."). The priest presents himself before our Lord with an humble and a contrite heart, and begs him to bless the great sacrifice that is about to be offered: Veni, Sanctificator, etc. ("Come, O Sanctifier, etc.").

Then he goes to wash his hands, out of respect for this divine sacrifice, while reciting the psalm Lavabo inter innocentes manus meas, etc. ("I will wash my hands among the innocent, etc.").

Suscipe, Sancta Trinitas, etc. ("Receive, O Holy Trinity, etc."). By this prayer the priest offers to God Jesus Christ as a victim already immolated by his death on the Cross. Heretics calumniate us when they affirm that we offer to God two different sacrifices, namely, the sacrifice of the Cross and that of the altar. We reply to them that there are not two sacrifices, since, as we have already explained elsewher e, the sacrifice of the altar is a memorial of the sacrifice of the Cross; it is really the same sacrifice as that of the Cross, Jesus Christ being there the principal offerer and the victim that is offered.

Orate, fratres, etc. ("Brethren, pray, etc."). By these words the priest exhorts the people to supplicate the Lord to receive this sacrifice for the glory of his name and the good of the faithful. The server then answers in the name of the people by praying to God to accept this sacrifice: Suscipiat Dominus Sacrificium de manibus tuis, etc. ("May the Lord receive this sacrifice from thy hands, etc.").

Then follows the Secret, a prayer that refers to the offerings made by the people, namely, of the bread and wine that are to be changed into the body and the blood of Jesus Christ. The Church asks the Lord to bless them and to render them profitable, not only to those who present them, but to all the faithful, just as may be seen in the Secret of the fifth Sunday after Pentecost: "Mercifully receive, O Lord, these offerings of thy servants; that what each hath offered to the honor of thy name, may avail to the salvation of all."[12483] Thus the Offertory is concluded.

Before passing to the Canon, the priest reads the Preface, in which he exhorts the faithful to raise their hearts to God: Sursum corda ("Lift up your hearts"). The people answer that they have already done so: Habemus ad Dominum ("We have lifted them to the Lord"). And the priest continues by inviting them to unite with him in thanking the Lord: Gratias agamus Domino Deo nostro ("Let us give thanks to our Lord God"). He afterwards says that it is just and salutary to render thanks through Jesus Christ, who alone can worthily give thanks for the eternal salvation and for so many benefits granted to men and also to angels, who also give thanks to God through Jesus Christ for all the gifts that they have received. The priest entreats the Lord to accept our prayers united with those of the angels, who celebrate his glory by repeating without ceasing the canticle, Sanctus, Sanctus, Sanctus, Dominus Deus Sabaoth![12484] ("Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God of Hosts!"); and he concludes by repeating the words used by the Jewish people in their acclamations at the triumphant entry of Jesus into Jerusalem: Benedictus, qui venit in nomine Domini! Hosanna in excelsis![12485] ("Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord! Hosanna in the highest!")

FOURTH PART. THE CANON

Te igitur, clementissime Pater, etc. ("We therefore humbly pray and beseech Thee, most merciful Father, etc."). Here begins what we call the Canon of the Mass, which the Council of Trent declares to be free from every error,[12486] since it is composed of the very words of our Lord, of the traditions of the apostles, and of pious regulations of the Holy See.[12487] The Canon is very ancient: it was already in use in the fourth century, according to the testimony of St. Ambrose.[12488] The priest first prays to his heavenly Father in the name of the whole Church, and through the merits of Jesus Christ, to accept and to bless the offerings that are made to him, and that are called gifts without spot: Hæc dona, hæc munera, hæc sancta sacrificia illibata (These gifts, these presents, these holy unspotted sacrifices"). These words apply not only to the bread and the wine that have been offered, but refer by anticipation to the body and the blood of Jesus Christ, into which the bread and the wine are soon to be changed; hence they are called unspotted sacrifices Innocent III. refers these last words to the purity of the heart and of the body with which the priest should celebrate Mass: "We call them by this name because of the purity of heart and of body with which the priest should offer them."[12489] But this is rather a spiritual and mystical reflection, the proper explanation is that which precedes it above.

The Holy Sacrifice is, before all, offered for the Catholic Church by praying to God that he may preserve her in peace, may defend her, maintain her in unity, and govern her through the ministry of the pastors, by communicating to them his Holy Spirit. It must be observed that the prayers of the Church, during the Holy Sacrifice, should be addressed to God the Father, as was ordained by the Third Council of Carthage: "During the August Function the prayer should be addressed to God the Father."[12490] It does not follow that the other divine Persons should be excluded from these prayers; but they are considered together in the Person of the Father, their first principle, and this is the reason why the Church is accustomed to pray to the Father, with the Son, in the Holy Ghost.

At the first Memento, the priest recommends, at first, all those persons for whom he wishes most especially to pray; then he recommends all those who, happening to be present, offer with him the Holy Sacrifice; finally, he recommends all their relatives and friends. He says: 1. Pro quibus tibi offerimus, vel qui tibi offerunt ("For whom we offer, or who offer up to Thee"). It must be remarked that the disjunctive particle vel, "or," is sometimes conjunctive, and that it is probable that it is here taken in this last sense according to St. Gregory, as we are told by Benedict XIV. Moreover, it must be observed that there is a great difference between sacrificing and offering: to the priest alone belongs the right to sacrifice, whilst all those who are present may offer the sacrifice. 2.Quorum tibi fides cognita est, et nota devotio ("Whose faith is known, and devotion apparent unto Thee"). By these words we are to understand that in order to participate in the fruit of the sacrifice we must have faith and devotion, which spring from charity. 3. Pro redemptione animarum suarum ("For the redemption of their souls"). The first effect of the sacrifice of the Cross, which is applied to us by the sacrifice of the altar, is to become free from the power of the devil. 4. Pro spe salutis et incolumitatis suæ ("For the hope of their safety and salvation"). These words comprise all the spiritual and temporal graces that God grants to us by virtue of this sacrifice, through which alone we can render to God the thanks that we owe him.

Communicantes et memoriam venerantes, etc. ("Communicating with the saints and honoring the memory, etc."). This prayer is said in order to enter into communion with the Church triumphant. Thereby we honor, in the first place, the memory of the Mother of God, then that of the apostles, then that of the martyrs and of all the other saints, through the merits and the intercession of whom we beg our Lord's protection in all our necessities. We who are travellers upon earth form only one body with the saints who are in heaven, and united with them in the same spirit, we offer to God the same sacrifice.

Hanc igitur oblationem, etc. ("We therefore beseech Thee, O Lord, graciously to accept this oblation, etc."). The priest spreads his hands over the bread and the wine, and, through the merits of Jesus Christ, who redeemed us from the power of the devil, he prays to the Eternal Father favorably to accept this offering that his servants and his whole family make to him. He also asks God to help us to enjoy peace in this life, to preserve us from hell, and to admit us among the number of the elect: Et in electorum tuorum jubeas grege numerari ("And number us in the flock of Thine elect"). Estius observes that by these last words we do not ask of God predestination, as if God could change his eternal decrees, but we ask of him the effects of predestination, that he may draw us to himself and conduct us to eternal happiness.[12491] In the Old Law he who offered sacrifice placed his hands on the victim to signify that just as this animal was soon to lose its life by immolation, so he also offered up his own life to God. It is with the same spirit of sacrifice that every priest should offer himself to God, when he spreads his hands over the host and the chalice.[12492]

Quam oblationem tu, Deus in onmibus, quæsumus, benedictam, adscriptam, ratam, rationabilem, acceptabilemque facere digneris; ut nobis corpus et sanguis fiat dilectissimi Filii tui Domini nostri Jesu Christi ("Which oblation do Thou, O God, vouchsafe in all respects to make blessed, approved, ratified, reasonable, and acceptable, that it may become to us the body and blood of Thy most beloved Son, Jesus Christ our Lord"). In this prayer the priest asks God to cause this oblation to be blessed (benedictam), that by this blessing the bread and the wine may be changed into the body and the blood of Jesus Christ; that it may be admitted (adscriptam),—that is, substracted from all profane usage and wholly consecrated to the divine Majesty; ratified (ratam), that is, approved as a perfect sacrifice; reasonable or rational (rationabilem)—this includes an allusion to a passage in the Epistle to the Romans, in which St. Paul says: "I beseech you . . that you present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, pleasing unto God, your reasonable service;"[12493] acceptable (acceptabilem),—that is, altogether agreeable and worthy of being received, differently from the victims and the oblations of the Hebrew people, which were not sufficient to appease the divine justice incensed against sinners; and, finally, Ut nobis corpus et sanguis fiat dilectissimi Filii tui ("That it may become to us the body and blood of Thy most beloved Son"). The priest, according to St. Thomas, does not thereby ask that the consecration be accomplished, but that it be profitable to us.[12494]

Qui, pridie quam pateretur, etc. ("Who the day before he suffered," etc.). Here the priest, renewing the memory of the Passion of Jesus Christ, relates what the Lord did on the evening before his death, when he instituted the Sacrament and the sacrifice of his body and blood. Then the priest does the same thing, and consecrates by pronouncing the very words used by Jesus Christ, as St. Ambrose remarks: "He uses not his own words, but the very words of Jesus Christ."[12495]

The form of the consecration is taken from St. Matthew: Hoc est corpus meum ("This is my body").[12496] These words need no explanation, since they themselves declare what mystery is accomplished, namely, the change of the bread into the body of Jesus Christ.

The form of the consecration of the chalice is as follows: Hic est enim calix Sanguinis mei, novi et æterni Testamenti, mysterium fidei, qui pro vobis et pro multis effundetur in remissionem peccatorum ("For this is the chalice of my blood of the new and eternal testament, the mystery of faith, which shall be shed for you, and for many, to the remission of sins"). These words the Church has taken from different texts of the Gospel, partly from St. Luke, partly from St. Matthew. St. Luke says: This is the chalice, the new testament in my blood, which shall be shed for you.[12497] St. Matthew: For this is my blood of the new testament which shall be shed for many unto remission of sins.[12498] The word æterni, "everlasting," is found in St. Paul: In the blood of the everlasting testament.[12499] The other words, Mystery of faith, the Roman catechism declares are taught by sacred tradition, which is the guardian of Catholic truths. This divine mystery is called Mystery of faith, not to exclude the reality of the blood of Jesus Christ, but to show that in it the faith shines forth in a wonderful manner, and triumphs over all the difficulties that may be raised by human reason, since it is here, says Innocent III.,[12500] that we see one thing and believe another. We believe, he adds, that the form that we read in the Canon was received from Jesus Christ by the Apostles, and that they transmitted it to their successors.[12501] The Roman catechism,[12502] moreover, says, that the words of consecration should be thus understood: It is my blood that is contained in the chalice of the New Testament. This signifies that men receive no longer the figure of the blood of Jesus Christ, as was the case in the Old Law; but they really receive the true blood of the New Testament. The words Pro vobis et pro multis ("For you and for many") are used to distinguish the virtue of the blood of Christ from its fruits; for the blood of our Saviour is of sufficient value to save all men, but its fruits are applicable only to a certain number and not to all, and this is their own fault. Or, as the theologians say, this precious blood is (in itself) sufficiently (sufficienter) able to save all men, but (on our part) effectually (efficaciter) it does not save all—it saves only those who co-operate with grace. This is the explanation of St. Thomas, as quoted by Benedict XIV.[12503]

The consecration is followed by the elevation of the host and of the chalice: this is done, writes Sassi, in order to prove the truth of the Eucharist which was attacked by Berengarius at the beginning of the twelfth century. The same truth is again professed at the second elevation shortly before the Pater noster, when the priest says, Omnis honor et gloria ("All honor and glory"). It was also at the time of the heresy of Berengarius that the custom was introduced of ringing the bell at the elevation of the Host and of the chalice.

Hæc quotiescumque feceritis, in mei memoriam facietis ("As often as ye do these things, ye shall do them in remembrance of me"). After the two consecrations the priest repeats the words of Jesus Christ, by which our Saviour commanded his Apostles and their successors to do, in memory of his Passion, what he had just done himself in their presence.

Unde et memores, Domine, etc. ("Wherefore, O Lord, . . . calling to mind," etc.). Here the priest calls to mind the Passion of our Lord, his resurrection, and ascension. He offers to the divine majesty in the name of the Church the consecrated victim, which he calls a pure Host, exempt from every sin; holy, being united with the divinity in the person of the Word; immaculate, without any stain; and then, "The holy bread of eternal life, and the chalice of everlasting salvation." While pronouncing these words he blesses the bread and the chalice with the sign of the cross. On this subject Luther turns to ridicule the Roman Church by asking how the priest blesses Jesus Christ—how the creature blesses the Creator. We answer here that the priest blesses the Host, not by his own authority, nor in his own name, but in the name and by the authority of the Eternal Father, who alone can bless Jesus Christ as man and as victim. Such is the answer given on this point by Innocent III. St. Thomas answers differently by saying that after the consecration the priest does not make the sign of the cross to bless, but only to remind us of the power of the cross and of the death of our Lord.[12504]

Supra quæ propitio, etc. ("Upon which vouchsafe to look," etc.). The priest then prays to the Lord that he may accept with pleasure this sacrifice, just as he accepted the offerings of Abel, the sacrifice of Abraham, and that of Melchisedech. In recalling to mind the sacrifice of Abel, of Abraham, and of Melchisedech, we regard less the value of the things offered than the sanctity of those who offered them, because they were holy men. Consequently, if God, because of his sanctity, favorably received their sacrifice, how much more should please him the sacrifice of the Saint of saints—of our Lord Jesus Christ! But the most decisive reason on account of which the Church makes special mention of these three sacrifices is, because they represented in an excellent manner the sacrifice of Jesus Christ.

Supplices te rogamus, etc. ("We most humbly beseech Thee," etc.). The priest continues humbly to ask the Saviour that the consecrated Host be presented to his divine Majesty through the hands of his holy Angel, in order that all those who are going to receive the body and the blood of his adorable Son may be filled with blessings and all celestial gifts through the merits of Jesus Christ. By the Angel of whom mention is made in this prayer, we may understand the Angel who presides at the Sacrifice of the Altar, or, as our French author says, we may understand Jesus Christ himself, who is preeminently the Holy Angel, called in Scripture the Angel of the Great Counsel. But the explanation of St. Thomas seems to be the most natural. The priest, he says, speaks for the Church, and asks that the Angel who presides at the divine mysteries may present to God the prayers of the celebrant and of the people.[12505]

Memento etiam, Domine, etc. ("Be mindful, O Lord," etc.). The priest asks the Lord to remember his servants who have passed to the other life and are slumbering in the sleep of peace, and to grant them a place of refreshment, light, and peace, through the merits of Jesus Christ. When the charity of the souls that depart from this life is not sufficient to purify them, the fire of purgatory will supply this defect. Yet the charity of the Saviour supplies it best by means of the Eucharistic sacrifice, which procures for these holy souls great mitigation of their sufferings, and often deliverance from their torments. The Council of Trent says: " The souls there detained are helped by the suffrages of the faithful, but principally by the acceptable sacrifice of the altar."[12506] And it adds[12507] that this is a tradition of the Apostles. St. Augustine exhorts us to offer the sacrifice for all the dead, in case the souls that we recommend cannot receive our help.

Nobis quoque peecatoribus, etc. ("And to us sinners," etc.). Here the Church prays for sinners, in order that God may vouchsafe, in his mercy, to permit them to enter the society of the saints ; and she asks this grace through the merits of Jesus Christ. She then adds:

Per quem hæc omnia semper bona creas, etc. ("By whom, O Lord, Thou dost always create," etc.). By the Word Thou hast created this bread and wine, and now, by the same Word, Thou hast sanctified (sanctificas) them by reserving them for the sacrifice. Thou hast quickened them (vivificas) by changing them into the body and the blood of Jesus Christ; Thou hast blessed (benedicis) them and transformed them into a source of benediction for the Church of Christ; and, finally, Thou hast given us all these good things (et præstas nobis) by distributing them to the faithful in Holy Communion. And all these favors the Church asks through the merits of Jesus Christ: Per ipsum, that is, through him; cum ipso, in union with our Saviour; in ipso, in him as the members are in the body, since God recognizes as his own only those who are united with Jesus Christ.

Oremus. Præceptis salutaribus moniti, etc. ("Instructed by Thy saving precepts, etc."). The Church militant regards herself as entirely composed of sinners; she thinks herself unworthy to call God her Father, and to address to him the seven petitions, which in the name of the faithful she is going to address to him by reciting the *Pater noster, ("*Our Father"). Hence she protests that she only dares to address to God this prayer because God himself has commanded her to do so. She then teaches us that we may venture to present to God the seven petitions which contain the whole economy of our salvation, because it is pleasing to him and he himself gives us the command. We are so miserable, and our mind is so limited, that we do not even know what graces we should ask of God in behalf of our own salvation. Regarding our poverty and our insufficiency, Jesus Christ himself deigned to compose our prayer or to indicate the subjects on which we should address Almighty God. He instructs us to say:

Pater noster, qui es in cælis ("Our Father, who art in heaven, etc.). The Apostle St. John says: Behold what manner of charity the Father hath bestowed upon us that we should be called, and should be the sons of God.[12508] It is assuredly only by the effect of extreme love that we worms of the earth have been enabled to become the children of God, not by nature, but by adoption; and such is the immense grace that the Son of God has obtained for us by becoming man; for St. Paul says: You have received the spirit of adoption of sons, whereby we cry, Abba (Father).[12509] Can a subject wish for greater happiness than to be adopted by his king? or a creature to be adopted by its Creator? This is what God has done for us; and he wishes that we should address to him with filial confidence the following prayer:

1. Sanctificetur nomem tuum ("Hallowed be Thy name"). God cannot possess a greater sanctity than that which he possesses from all eternity, because he is infinite; hence what we ask in this prayer is merely that God may make known in every place his holy name, and that he may make himself loved by all men: by unbelievers, who know him not; by heretics, who do not know him in the right manner; and by sinners, who know him but do not love him.

2. Adveniat regnum tuum ("Thy kingdom come"). Two kinds of dominion God exercises over our souls—the dominion of grace and the dominion of glory. By these words we ask for both, namely, that the grace of God may reign among us in this life, that it may direct and govern us, so that one day we may be judged worthy of glory, and may have the happiness to possess God and be possessed by him for all eternity.

3. Fiat voluntas tua, sicut in cælo, et in terra ("Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven"). The whole perfection of a soul consists in the perfect accomplishment of the will of God, as is done by the blessed in heaven. Hence Jesus Christ wishes us to ask the grace to accomplish the will of God upon earth, as the angels and saints accomplish it in heaven.

4. Panem nostrum quotidianum da nobis hodie ("Give us this day our daily bread"). Such is the text as we find it in St. Luke.[12510] By this prayer we ask God for the temporal goods of which we stand in need to sustain our present life. The words "Our daily bread" teach us that we should ask for this kind of goods with moderation, after the example of Solomon, who asked only what was necessary: Give me only the necessaries of life.[12511] It is to be remarked that in the Gospel of St. Matthew, instead of the daily bread, we read, Give us this day our supersubstantial[12512] bread.[12513] By this supersubstantial bread we must understand, according to the explanation given by the Roman catechism, Jesus Christ himself in the Sacrament of the Altar, that is, in Holy Communion. We ask this heavenly bread every day, Give us this day, because every good Christian should communicate every day, if not really at least spiritually, as we are exhorted by the Council of Trent.

5. Et dimitte nobis debita nostra, sicut el nos dimittimus debitoribus nostris ("And forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us"). To eat worthily of this heavenly bread, we must be free from mortal sin, or at least be washed of it by the blood of the Lamb in the sacrament of penance. We say, free from mortal sin; but it must be observed that if anyone should communicate with an actual affection for some venial sin, he could not be said to communicate without offering some indignity to our Lord—at least if he communicates often.

6. Et ne nos inducas in tentationem ("And lead us not into temptation"). How are these words to be understood? Does God sometimes tempt us—does he lead us into temptation? No; for St. James says: God is not a tempter of evils, and He tempteth no man.[12514] This text we must understand as we do that of Isaias: Blind the heart of this people . . . lest they see.[12515] God never blinds any sinner, but he often refuses to grant to some, in punishment for their ingratitude, the light that he would have given them had they remained faithful and grateful. Hence when it is said that God makes any one blind, it is meant that he withholds the light of his grace. This, therefore is the sense of the prayer, and lead us not into temptation; we ask God not to permit us to have the misfortune of being in those occasions of sin in which we might fall. Hence we should always watch and pray as the Lord exhorts us to do, in order not to fall into, temptation: Watch ye, and pray that ye enter not into temptation.[12516] To enter into temptation means the same as to find one's self in the danger of falling into sin; we should therefore often say to God, Lord, lead us not into temptation.

7. Sed libera nos a malo ("But deliver us from evil"). There are three kinds of evils from which we should ask the Lord to deliver us—the temporal evils of the body, the spiritual evils of the soul, and the eternal evils of the next life. As for the temporal evils of this life, we ought always to be disposed to receive with resignation those that God sends us for the good of our souls, such as poverty, sickness, and desolation; and when we ask God to deliver us from temporal evils we should always do so on condition that they are not necessary nor useful for our salvation. But the true evils from which we should absolutely pray to be delivered are spiritual evils, sins, which are the cause of eternal evils. Moreover, let us be convinced of this infallible truth, that in the present state of corrupt nature we cannot be saved unless we pass through the many tribulations with which this life is filled: Through many tribulations we must enter into the kingdom of God.[12517]

The priest finishes the Lord's prayer with the word Amen, which he pronounces in a low voice, because he represents the person of Jesus Christ, who is the foundation of all the divine promises.[12518] This word is a summary of all the petitions that have been made—petitions the repetition of which pleases the Lord, for the more we pray to God the more he will hear our prayers. The great people of this world are not pleased when they are importuned by petitions; but this importunity is pleasing to God, says St. Jerome.[12519] Cornelius à Lapide even assures us that God wishes that we should persevere in this importunity in our prayers.[12520]

FIFTH PART. FROM THE PRAYER "LIBERA NOS" TILL THE COMMUNION

Immediately after the Pater noster the priest recites the prayer Libera nos, quæsumus, Domine ("Deliver us, O Lord"), by which he asks the Lord for himself and for all the faithful to grant, through the intercession of the Blessed Virgin, of the apostles and of all the saints, a continual peace during the days of the present life, so that his divine mercy may preserve them from every sin and from all confusion.

He then says, Pax Domini sit semper vobiscum ("May the peace of the Lord be always with you"). He wishes the peace of the Lord for all his brethren, who answer him with the same wish: Et cum spiritu tuo ("And with thy spirit"). He makes at the same time upon the chalice, with the particle of the Host which he holds in his hand, three signs of the cross, which indicates, according to St. Thomas,[12521] the three days that Jesus Christ spent in the tomb.

The priest then drops the sacred particle into the chalice and says these words: Hæc commixtio et consecratio Corporis et Sanguinis Domini nostri Jesu Christi fiat accipientibus nobis in vitam æternam! ("May this mixture and consecration of the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ be to us that receive it effectual to eternal life"). Explaining these words, Consecratio . . . fiat, Bellarmin says that we do not here ask that the consecration should take place, but that it be profitable for eternal life to those who are about to receive Jesus Christ in Holy Communion.[12522] This mixture of the holy species represents the union of the divinity with the humanity which was at first effected in the womb of Mary through the Incarnation of the Word, and which is renewed in the souls of the faithful when they receive him in the Eucharistic Communion.

Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi ("Lamb of God, who takest away the sins of the world"). Before Communion the Lamb of God, Jesus Christ, as the victim of the sacrifice, is invoked, and is invoked three times, to point out the need that we have of his grace, in order to be reconciled with God and to receive his peace.

Here follow the three prayers that precede Communion.

In the first prayer—Domine Jesu Christe, qui dixisti Apostolis tuis, Pacem relinquo vobis ("Lord Jesus Christ, who said to Thy Apostles, I leave you peace")—prayer is offered to God that he may vouchsafe to grant peace to the Church in consideration of her faith, and keep her in union, according to his will, by delivering her from the division produced by false doctrines, and from all that is contrary to the divine will.—And here the Church has introduced the custom that the faithful should give one another the kiss of peace, to remind them that their hearts should be united in charity. Before giving the kiss of peace, the priest kisses the altar, to show that he cannot give the peace unless he has first received it from Jesus Christ, who is represented by the altar.

In the second prayer, Domine Jesu Christe, Fili Dei vivi, the priest asks Jesus Christ, by virtue of his adorable body and blood, to deliver him from all evils, and to keep him always united with him.

In the third prayer he beseeches the Lord that this Communion may not turn to his condemnation, but may be for the salvation of his soul and body.—The Holy Eucharist protects the soul against temptations and passions; it extinguishes the fire of concupiscence that burns in our bodies, and is a powerful remedy against the death of the soul.

After these prayers the priest says, while invoking the name of the Lord, Panem cœlestem accipiam, et nomen Domini invocabo ("I will take the bread of heaven, and call upon the name of our Lord"). In order that the earthly food may be of benefit to us, we must eat it when we are hungry; in like manner, in order that Communion may produce in us much fruit, we should receive it with great desire to possess Jesus Christ and to love him ardently. As John Gerson says, we ought, at the moment in which we are about to receive Jesus, invoke him anew, in order to obtain the grace to receive him with great profit to our souls.

Corpus (Sanguis) Domini nostri Jesu Christi custodiat animam meam in vitam æternam ("May the Body (Blood) of our Lord Jesus Christ preserve my soul to life everlasting"). While pronouncing these words the priest receives the body and the blood of Jesus Christ. This prayer recalls to our mind that this precious body and blood are given to us as a pledge of eternal life, and as a viaticum in order to pass from this exile to our heavenly country. Hence when we receive Communion we ought to be so disposed as if we had to leave the earth at once, to enter eternity.

SIXTH PART THANKSGIVING

Quid retribuam Domino pro omnibus quæ retribuit mihi? ("What shall I render to the Lord for all he hath rendered unto me?") The priest says, For all, etc., because he who receives Jesus Christ in Communion receives all the gifts and all the goods that one can desire, according to the words of St. Paul: How hath He not also, with Him, given us all things.[12523] He says, What shall I render? because man is not capable of thanking God as he should thank him. Jesus Christ only can worthily thank the Eternal Father for the gifts that he bestowed upon men. The priest therefore adds: Calicem salutaris accipiam, et nomen Domini invocabo ("I will take the chalice of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord"). He supplicates the Divine Redeemer to thank the heavenly Father for himself and for all men.

After having taken the precious blood he renews his thanks to God in the following words: Quod ore sumpsimus, Domine, pura mente capiamus, et de munere temporali fiat nobis remedium sempiternum ("Grant, O Lord, that what we have taken with our mouth we may receive with a pure mind, that of a temporal gift it may become to us an eternal remedy"). By this prayer the Church makes us ask God that, as our mouth has received this divine food and drink, our hearts may also receive them, so that they may be for us an eternal remedy that may forever heal us of all our infirmities.

Finally the priest says, Corpus tuum, Domine, quod sumpsi, et Sanguis quem potavi, adhæreat visceribus meis ("May Thy body, O Lord, which I have received, and the blood which I have drunk, cleave to my bowels"). In this prayer, and in the last prayer called Post-communion, he asks, through the merits of Jesus Christ in this mystery, and through the intercession of the saint whose memory is celebrated, that this divine Saviour may always preserve him in this intimate union With him, and that no stain may rest on his soul, which has been nourished by a sacrament so holy and so pure.

Ite, Missa est ("Go, the Mass is ended"); or, Benedicamus Domino ("Let us bless the Lord"). It is with these words that the priest dismisses the people, just as if he said, The Sacrifice is accomplished; and those who are present while thanking God by the mouth of the server, say, Deo Gratias ("Thanks be to God"). "To give thanks to God," says St. Augustine, "is to acknowledge that all good things come from God, and to thank him for them.[12524]

The priest afterwards passes to the right side of the altar, and recites the Gospel of St. John: Inprincipio erat Verbum ("In the beginning was the Word"). William de Bury says that it was St. Pius V. who ordained that this Gospel should always be recited at the end of Mass; as formerly some said it, and others omitted it.

This explanation of the prayers of Mass may be serviceable to all—to the faithful as well as to priests.

ACCOUNT OF THE MANNER IN WHICH THE BLESSED SACRAMENT, WHICH HAD BEEN STOLEN IN A PARISH OF THE DIOCESE OF NAPLES, WAS MIRACULOUSLY FOUND, IN THE YEAR 1772

HAVING received information from many persons of the wonderful occurrence that I am now going briefly to relate, I endeavored to collect evidence sufficient to enable me to publish an account of it; and I first obtained a full relation of the fact, written by a priest of the same town, who was one of the eye-witnesses of the miracle. But not satisfied with this, I read myself the authentic process that was drawn up by the Archiepiscopal Court of Naples, by order of his Eminence Cardinal Sersale, the present Archbishop. The process is very long, consisting of 364 pages—a most careful investigation into the facts having been made by the officers of the court from the evidence of many priests and lay persons, all of whom, in perfect agreement, made their depositions on oath.

It happened on the morning of the 28th of January, in the past year 1772, at a place called S. Pietro à Paterno, in the diocese of Naples, that the tabernacle of the parish chuich, in which the Blessed Sacrament was reserved, was found open, and that the two ciboriums, a large and a small one, containing many particles, had been taken away. For several days the whole neighbor-hood was in the greatest distress and grief; and though the most diligent search was made, no tidings could be obtained either of the ciboriums or of the sacred particles. At last, on Thursday, the 18th of February, a certain youth, Giuseppe Orefice, of about eighteen years old, as he was passing in the evening near the property of the Duke of Grottolelle, saw a number of lights, which had the appearance of bright stars. The following evening he saw the same thing, and on coming home he told his father what he had seen; his father, however, would not believe him.

On the following day, about an hour before sunrise, the father was passing by the same spot, with Giuseppe and his brother Giovanni (a child of eleven years), who, turning to his father, said: "See, father, the lights of which Giuseppe spoke to you yesterday evening, and you would not believe him!"

On the evening of the same day, the same boys, on coming home, again saw the lights in the same place. Don Girolamo Guarino, the confessor of Giuseppe Orefice, was then informed of it, who, in company with his brother Don Diego, also a priest, went to the spot where the lights had been seen, and meanwhile sent for Orefice, who, on coming there with his brother and a person called Tomaso Piccino, again saw the lights; but at that time the priests saw nothing.

On the evening of Monday, the 23d of February, Orefice returned to the spot with Piccino and a man named Carlo Marotta, and met on the road two strangers, who stopped and asked them what those many lights were which they had just distinctly seen, and which twinkled like stars. They replied that they did not know; and, taking leave of the strangers, they ran in haste to mark the spot where they had seen the lights. As soon as they had marked the spot, which was distant a few steps from the hedge, and in which was a poplar-tree higher than the rest of the trees, they went to find the two priests already mentioned, told them what had occurred, and returned all together to the spot.

When they were all there, with a child of five years, nephew to the two priests, the child cried out: "See, there are the lights, which look like two candles." (Here we must observe, that the lights did not always appear in the same manner.) At the same moment Orefice saw these two lights; and said they shone like two stars; Carlo and Tomaso also saw them, and three other children of Signor Guarino, close to the poplar already mentioned.

After this they heard the shouting of many people, who, from a stack of straw which was on the property, were begging the priest to come and see in the stack a great light in the appearance of a flame. In the mean time, a woman named Lucia Marotta threw herself with her face to the ground on the spot where the light was seen.

The priests and many other persons ran up, and having lifted up the woman, commenced to dig the ground; but then they found nothing. The two brothers, Giuseppe Orefice, with Tomaso Piccino and Carlo Marotta, then returned to the town; and going along the Strada Regia they heard the cries of those who had remained on the spot. Going back there, Piccino fell suddenly upon his face; and after a few steps, Giuseppe felt himself pushed forward on the shoulders, and he also at once fell to the ground. In the same way, and at the same moment, the other two, Carlo Marotta and Giovanni, Giuseppe's brother, also fell; and all four felt their heads wounded, as if they had received a severe blow with a stick.

Having risen, they went forward a few steps; Giuseppe, as also Carlo, Tomaso, and Giovanni, saw a brilliant light as of the sun coming forth from beneath the poplar-tree; and they all four saw rising out of this light, to about four or five feet in height, a dove, which was almost as brilliant as the light itself: the dove, however, gliding down into the earth at the foot of the poplar, from which it came out, disappeared, as also did the light. What the dove signified is not known; but it appears certain that it was something supernatural; and all the persons already mentioned gave evidence of the fact upon oath before the Vicar-General of Naples.

After this, remaining in the same place, they all cried out: "See, there are the lights!" And going on their knees they began to seek for the sacred particles. While Piccino was scooping out the earth with his hands, they saw one particle come out white as paper. They then sent to call the priests. Don Diego Guarino came, and kneeling down he took the sacred particle and put it in a white linen handkerchief, amid the tears and devotion of all the people, who wept bitterly.

He then began to search more carefully; and having removed some more earth, he saw a group of about forty particles appear, which had not lost their whiteness, although they had been buried for nearly a month from the time they were stolen. They were placed in the same handkerchief, and the earth in which they were found was also removed.

It being now rumored about, other priests of the place came to the spot, bringing with them a ciborium, cotta, stole, canopy, and torches. In the mean time a priest and a gentleman went to Monsignor the Vicar-General to know what was to be done. An order came that the particles should be carried in procession to the church. They did so, and arrived at the church about half-past eleven at night, when the particles were placed in the tabernacle.

This took place on the night of the 24th of February. The people were much consoled, but not fully so, because the greater part of the particles, as was supposed, were still wanting.

But on the evening of the following Tuesday, the 25th, a small light, but very brilliant, was seen in the same place as at the first, by many persons, country-people, gentlemen, as also by the priests Don Diego Guarino and Don Giuseppe Lindtner, who wrote for me an account of the whole affair, as I mentioned at the beginning. This priest, being much terrified, pointed to a mustard-plant which was growing there, and cried out: "O Jesus, O Jesus! look at the light there, look at it!" Upon which the others also saw a most dazzling light, which rose about a foot and a half from the ground, and formed itself on the top into the figure of a rose. Giuseppe Orefice, who was there, affirmed that the light was so brilliant that his eyes remained for some time dazzled and dimmed.

They began, therefore, to seek the remainder of the particles in that place, but found none; but on the evening of the following day, the 26th of February, a number of lights was seen round the stack of straw by three cavalry soldiers of the regiment called Borbone, Pasquale de S. Angelo of the diocese of Atri and Penne, Giuseppe Lanzano, and Angelo di Costanzo of Acerra, who were all examined before the archiepiscopal court. These deposed before Monsignor the Vicar-General, that as they were riding round the royal villa of Caserta, where his majesty the king then resided, they saw on the property above mentioned "several lights like shining stars. These are the very words of the soldiers, as taken down in the process.

Moreover, on the same evening of the 26th, Signor D. Ferdinando Haam, a gentleman of Prague in Bohemia, Chancellor and Secretary for letters to the Embassy of his Imperial and Royal Apostolic Majesty, was returning from the city of Caserta at about nine at night, along the Strada Regia, near to the above-mentioned property: he alighted from his carriage to go and see the place where he had heard the stolen particles had been found two days before. On arriving there he found many persons, and among them the priest Don Giuseppe Lindtner, with whom he was acquainted, who told him the whole history both of the sacrilege and of the miraculous discovery of the particles. Signor Haam, after having heard the priest, related that he also, eight or nine days before, on the 17th or 18th of the month, not having then heard either of the particles that had been stolen or of the lights that had been seen, was passing by this place about nine at night, and that he saw "a great number of lights amounting to about a thousand," and at the same time a number of persons who were standing in silence and with devotion round the lights. Being much frightened at what he saw, he asked the driver what those lights were; he replied, "that perhaps they were accompanying the Most Holy Viaticum to some sick person." "No," replied Signor Haam, "that cannot be, otherwise we should at least hear the bells." Hence he suspected that these lights were the effect of some diabolical sorcery, and so much the more as the horse had stopped, and would not go on a step: he therefore made the driver get down, but it was impossible to make the horse go on; it trembled all over and foamed at the mouth. At last, after many attempts, the horse, drawn away as by force out of the road which led to the ground, set off with such speed that the driver cried out: "O Jesus, what will come of this?" And so Signor D. Ferdinando returned to Naples, seized with great fear. He himself deposed the whole of this in the archiepiscopal court, as may be read in the process.

On the evening of Thursday, the 27th, at about seven o'clock, Giuseppe Orefice and Carlo Marotta went to the place where was the stack of straw, which they found had been burned by the priests Don Girolamo Guarino and Giuseppe Lindtner, in order that they might more easily search for the missing particles: they found also Giuseppe Piscopo, Carmine Esposito, and Palmiero Novello, prostrate on the ground and weeping, because they had seen a little light appearing and then disappearing before them several times. When Orefice heard this, he knelt down, and began to recite the acts of faith, hope, and charity: when he had finished he returned with the others to see what the light was, which, according to the deposition of Orefice, rose up about four fingers from the earth, and then disappeared as it were in the ground. After this, having put a mark over the place where the light had appeared, so as not to be mistaken, Orefice and Marotta went to inform the priest Don Girolamo Guarino, who came immediately to the place and found many persons kneeling there: he began to search with care about the ground on which the mark had been placed.

At this moment many persons again saw the light; and Guarino, who did not see it, made the sign of the cross upon the ground, and ordered his brother Giuseppe to scoop out the earth on which the stack of straw had stood, on the left of the cross, with a pickaxe which he had in his hand; but he found nothing. However, just as they were thinking of digging in another part, Giuseppe Orefice, who was on his knees all the time, put his hand on the ground, and finding that it was soft and yielding, mentioned it to Don Guarino, who, taking a knife from his brother, stuck it into the ground on the spot which had been marked with the cross; and when it was at its depth, he heard a noise as if several hosts united together were broken. He drew the knife out of the ground, and with it a little ball of earth, to which he saw many particles were attached. Struck with fear at what he saw, he cried out in astonishment, "Oh, oh, oh!" and then fainted away; so that, as he himself deposed, his sight failed him, and, losing all power over himself, the knife, with the ball of earth and the particles, fell from his hand.

As soon as Guarino recovered his senses, he put the particles in a white linen handkerchief, covered them up, and laid them in the hole in which they had been found; for, on account of the trembling which had come over him, and especially in the arms, he was not able to stand upright. The parish priest, being informed of what had happened, came quickly to the spot, where he found all kneeling before this hidden treasure; and having taken better information of the event, he went back to his church, and sent a canopy, veil, a number of wax-tapers, and a chalice in which the sacred particles were put. The assistants spread the veil over a little table covered with silk, on which the Blessed Sacrament reposed; round this a number of persons knelt with lighted torches; and many people arrived, not only from the town, but also from the surrounding villages, with their priests, all of whom shed tears of tender devotion. In the mean time the priest Lindtner and Signor Giuseppe Guarino went off to find Monsignor the Vicar-General, and returned about ten o'clock with orders to carry in procession the particles that had been found to the parish church of S. Pietro à Paterno. They did so, and along the way they all sang, praising and thanking Almighty God. As soon as they arrived at the church, benediction was given with the chalice in the midst of the tears and cries of devotion of the whole people, who could not leave off weeping and thanking the Lord for the great consolation they had received.

We read in the history of olden times of many suchlike prodigies in confirmation of the truth of the Most Holy Sacrament. I myself, in my History of Heresies, have related many examples on this matter in the time of the impious Wickliffe, who was the first of modern heretics to deny the truth of this venerable Sacrament. At that time Almighty God was pleased to work many miracles to confound their incredulity, which I have inserted in the book just mentioned (chap. 10, n. 36, 37). Nevertheless, there are not wanting certain critical spirits who altogether refuse to believe these ancient accounts, and say, "But who saw them?" Now, if such a one should doubt the fact which I have now related, and which was proved with such exactness in the archiepiscopal court of Naples, he can easily certify himself of the truth of it by going to the town of St. Pietro à Paterno, which is not far from the city, where he will find many lay persons and ecclesiastics who will assure him that they beheld with their own eyes the prodigies here related.

For the rest, let others say what they please: for my own part, I hold the fact to be more than certain, and therefore I wished to make it known by publishing an account of it. It is true that the miracle here described does not call for any other than mere human faith: nevertheless, of all such facts grounded on human faith I do not know if there be one that is more deserving of belief than this that I have related, considering the extreme care with which the information was taken by the Neapolitan court, and the evidence, not of credulous women, but of seventeen men, lay and ecclesiastics, who judicially deposed on oath all that they had seen with their own eyes. All these circumstances, which are so many marks of truth, make the fact more than morally certain. Hence I hope that all those that read this account will not be disinclined to believe it, but will do what they can to make it known, for the glory of the Most Holy Sacrament of the Altar.

The Ceremonies of the Mass

FATHER TANNOIA (B. ii. ch. 1.) speaks of a work that St. Alphonsus caused to be printed at Naples in 1761, on the manner of celebrating Mass conformably to the Rubrics, and on the faults that are ordinarily committed, with exhortations on the disposition requisite for celebrating Mass worthily, and with affections for preparation and thanksgiving for every day of the week. This is a work that Cardinal Villecourt (1. vi. p. 1, ch. 5 et 6), in his "Tableaux Chronologiques," under the same year 1761, designates thus: "Ceremonies of the Mass, followed by acts of preparation and thanksgiving." In another place (1 iii. ch. 42) we also see that our saint, towards the end of 1768, had a work printed, entitled "Ceremonies of the Mass," and divided into two parts: in the first he explains the Rubrics, and points out the ordinary faults; in the second he treats of the preparation and thanksgiving. We think that there is here question of a simple reprint of the work published in 1761, to which the author added in 1768, as a third part, his dissertation on the Honoraria of Masses, of which Father Tannoia afterwards speaks.—ED.

IN the following pages, which treat of the Ceremonies of the Mass, we have thought it very useful to quote at the head of each article the text of the Rubric of the Missal, which our author only explains. Both the text and its commentary are needed so as to elucidate and supplement each other; and experience proves that one neglects too often what it is important that one should know before all things.

In the many notes we have endeavored to give all the latest decisions of the Sacred Congregation of Rites. It must be observed that in this treatise there is question only of the celebration of private Mass.

We have added an Appendix in ten articles, which speak of the Altar and its ornaments, the Chalice and its accessories, the Vestments, the Matter and Form of the Sacrament, the Disposition of the celebrant, the Accidents that may occur, the Place and the Time of celebrating Mass, the Server of Mass. All this is drawn from the Rubrics of the Missal, and from the Moral Theology of our author, with some notes. We subjoin an article on the Mass celebrated in a strange church.

We have added another treatise of the holy bishop in which he speaks of the Honoraria of Masses; of the abuses connected therewith, and the means proposed to remedy them; of public Masses with offerings, and private Masses with stipends; of the use of unleavened and leavened bread; of the Value and Application of the fruit of the Mass; and of privileged Altars.–ED.

Chapter I

WHAT THE PRIEST SHOULD DO BEFORE GOING TO THE ALTAR

1. PREPARATORY ACTS

"Sacerdos celebraturus Missam, prævia confessione sacramentali, quando opus est, et saltem Matutino cum Laudibus absoluto, orationi aliquantulum vacet, et orationes inferius positas pro temporis opportunitate dicat."—(Rub. Miss. tit. I. n. 1.)

THE priest who wishes to say Mass should previously have recited at least Matins and Lauds, and this under pain of venial sin,[12525] according to the common opinion of theologians, against some who assert that it would be a mortal sin. This rule is founded on an ancient custom of the Church; for when Innocent IV. heard of the controversy raised on this point between the Archbishop of Nicosia and his Latin suffragans on the one side, and the Greek bishops of Cyprus on the other, he rendered this decision: "Sacerdos autem dicat Horas canonicas more suo; sed Missam celebrare, prius quam Officium matutinale compleverit, non presumat."[12526] Benedict XIV. concludes that even a mortal sin may be committed if any one violates this rule habitually. He says: "Si quis nulla causa urgente, perpetuo id faceret, ut videretur quasi statuisse animo, numquam celebrare dicto Matutino cum Laudibus, tum cum doctis Auctoribus concludi posset, hujusmodi sacerdotem peccare mortaliter."[12527]

It is also proper that the priest should spend some time in mental prayer. If he wishes to confess, he should do so before putting on the sacred vestments. Then he should make the proximate preparation on which ordinarily depends all the actual devotion that one has during the celebration of Mass. Nothing is, therefore, better than to recite attentively the psalms and the prayers that are printed for this purpose in the tablet containing the preparatory acts.[12528]

2. THE PREPARING OF THE MISSAL AND THE WASHING OF HANDS

"Deinde, accedit ad locum in sacristia, vel alibi præparatum, ubi paramenta aliaque ad celebrationem necessaria habentur; accipit Missale, perquirit Missam, perlegit, et signacula ordinat ad ea quæ dicturus est. Postea, lavat manus, dicens orationem inferius positam."—(Rub. Miss. tit. I. n. 1.)

Alter this preparation the priest takes the Missal, searches for the Mass that he wishes to say, and arranges the book-marks in their proper places; he also prepares the sacred vestments.

Then he washes his hands,[12529] saying in a low voice the following prayer:

Da, Domine, virtutem manibus meis ad abstergendam omnem maculam, ut sine pollutione mentis et corporis valeam tibi servire.

It must be observed that, according to the common opinion of theologians, the omission of this prayer, as also of the other prayers which the celebrant says while putting on the sacred vestments, is not a grave fault; yet it cannot be excused at least from a venial sin.

3. THE PREPARING OF THE CHALICE

"Deinde, præparat calicem, qui debet esse vel aureus, vel argenteus, aut saltem habere cuppam argenteam intus inauratam, et simul cum patena itidem inaurata, ab Episcopo consecratus; super ejus os ponit purificatorium mundum, et super illud patenam cum hostia integra, quam leviter extergit, si opus est, a fragmentis, et eam tegit parva palla linea, tum velo serico, super velo ponit bursam coloris paramentorum, intus habentem corporale plicatum, quod ex lino tantum esse debet, nec serico vel auro in medio intextum, sed totum album; et ab Episcopo, vel alio habente facultatem, simul cum palla benedictum."—(Rub. Miss. tit. I. n. 1.)

After having washed his hands, he prepares the chalice;[12530] he himself places the host on the paten, but before doing so he should lightly pass his thumb and forefinger around the edge, so that the loose particles may be removed.

He then covers the paten with the pall, the upper part of which, according to the S. R. C.,[12531] must not be covered with silk.

Upon the pall he puts the veil, which is to be spread out in front in such a manner that it covers the foot of the chalice, and has folds at the sides, not in front, so that it may be more easily folded when the chalice is to be uncovered.

Upon the veil he places the burse, so that its opening is towards the celebrant when he carries the chalice, and he turns over upon the burse the border of the veil in order to be able to hold the chalice more conveniently. The burse should contain the corporal; otherwise, says Gavantus,[12532] the burse would be useless. One should not carry the corporal upon the veil outside of the burse without an apostolic dispensation; see Gavantus and Merati.[12533]

It must be observed that, according to the teaching of theologians, it would be a grave sin to celebrate with a corporal that is very much soiled; and Merati says the same thing in regard to the other vestments. To use a corporal that is a little soiled is a venial sin if one could easily procure another. The continuator of Tournely[12534] says that, in case one could not otherwise say a Mass of precept, it would be permitted to use a corporal that is very much soiled.

It must also be observed that there should be no cross in the middle of the corporal; but a cross is permitted near the border of the anterior part, where one may kiss it when the altar is to be kissed.

It is, moreover, to be remarked, that it is not allowed to place upon the chalice one's pocket-handkerchief or anything else; and so also upon the altar nothing is to be placed that does not appertain to the Mass.[12535]

4. THE PRIEST ABOUT TO PUT ON THE SACRED VESTMENTS

"Quibus ita dispositis, accedit ad paramenta, quæ non debent esse lacera, aut scissa, sed integra, et decenter munda, ac pulchra, et ab Episcopo itidem, vel alio facultatem habente, benedicta; ubi calceatus pedibus, et indutus vestibus sibi convenientibus, quarum exterior saltem talum pedis attingat, induit se, si sit Prælatus sæcularis, supra rochettum, si sit Prælatus regularis, vel alius Sacerdos saecularis supra superpelliceum, si commode haberi possit, alioquin sine eo supra vestes communes, dicens ad singula singulas orationes inferius positas."—(Rub. Miss. tit. I. art. 2.)

After having thus prepared everything, the priest goes to the place where the vestments are kept. These should be kept in the sacristy, or at least,[12536] as is permitted by theologians, at the corner of the altar on the Gospel side; for the right of vesting at the middle of the altar is permitted only to bishops and to cardinals; this right is also granted to prelates who have the privilege of celebrating pontifically, but to the latter only when they use this faculty.[12537]

If at the moment in which he is about to vest he wishes to make the sign of the cross, he should do so before taking the amice; such is the opinion of Bauldry and Tonellius.

5. HE PUTS ON THE AMICE

"Ac primum accipiens amictum circa extremitates et chordulas, osculatur illud in medio, ubi est crux, et ponit super caput, et mox declinat ad collum, et, eo vestium collaria circumtegens, ducit chordulas sub brachiis, et circumducens per dorsum ante pectus reducit et ligat."—(Rub. Miss. tit. I. art. 3.)

He takes at first the amice at both ends and kisses it where the cross is. If there is no cross in the middle of the amice, and no other amice can be had, Merati says, he should form a cross with his thumb and then kiss it.[12538] To kiss the cross conveniently, let him place his left hand under the middle of the amice, holding in the mean time its two ends. Let him raise the amice to his mouth so that he may kiss the cross. Then raising the amice at his left he puts it on his head. After he has rested the amice on his head, he lowers it and arranges it around his neck, so that his collar may be entirely covered by it. Then he crosses the strings on his breast, passing the right over the left; and bringing them under his arms, he passes each to the other side behind his back, brings them in front, and then ties them on the breast.

The following is the prayer that he should say while putting on the amice:

Impone, Domine, capiti meo galeam salutis, ad expugnandos diabolicos incursus.

6. THE ALB

"Tum alba induitur, caput submittens, deinde manicam dextram brachio dextro, et sinistram sinistro imponens, albam ipsam corpori adaptat, elevat ante, et a lateribus hinc inde; et cingulo per ministrum a tergo sibi porrecto, se cingit. Minister elevat albam super cingulum circumcirca, ut honeste dependeat et tegat vestes; ac ejus fimbrias diligenter aptat, ut ad latitudinem digiti vel circiter, super terram æqualiter fluat."—(Rub. Miss. tit. I. art 3.)

Then he puts on the alb. If any one presents it to him, he inclines his head a little, holding his hands joined while receiving it. He next lets the right side of the alb fall to the floor, holding the other side on his left arm, so that the left hand may be freer to vest the right arm, which should always be vested first. Then he lets fall the left side of the alb, and the right hand aids in vesting the left arm.

While putting on the alb the priest says:

Dealba me, Domine, et munda cor meum, ut, in sanguine Agni dealbatus, gaudiis perfruar sempiternis.

He then girds himself with the cincture, saying:

Præcinge me, Domine, cingulo puritatis, et exstingue in lumbis meis humorem libidinis ut maneat in me virtus continentiæ et castitatis.

It is better that the cincture should be made of linen [rather than of silk[12539]], and it may be of the color of the vestments.[12540]

Rubricists wish the alb to be tied as soon as it is let down, and then to be adjusted. According to present usage the priest with both hands arranges at first the front part, so that it hangs at an equal distance above the shoes, and then only he girds himself.

The cincture, which should be doubled, is taken on the right side, and so tied that the tassels at the right side hang down as long as possible for fastening the stole. During this time the server should adjust the alb behind in such a way that it hangs equally distant above the feet and covers the cassock.

7. THE MANIPLE

"Sacerdos accipit manipulum, osculatur crucem in medio, et imponit brachio sinistro."—(Rub. Miss. tit. I. art. 3.)

He takes the maniple and kisses the cross that is in the middle of it; he passes it over his left arm and fastens it near his elbow, so that it may not hinder him in his functions.

He says at the same time:

Merear, Domine, portare manipulum fletus et doloris, ut cum exsultatione recipiam mercedem laboris.

8. THE STOLE

"Deinde, ambabus manibus accipiens stolam, simili modo deosculatur, et imponit medium ejus collo; ac transversando eam ante pectus in modum crucis, ducit partem a sinistro humero pendentem ad dextram, et partem a dextro humero pendentem ad sinistram; sicque utramque partem stolæ extremitatibus cinguli, hinc inde ipsi cingulo conjungit."-(Rub. Miss. tit. art. 3.)

He takes the stole with both hands, that is, between his thumbs and forefingers, so that the hands are distant from each other about a palm;[12541] he kisses the cross that is in the middle of the stole, and separates his hands from each other about two palms and a half, and thus he will be able to place the stole upon his shoulders. Then he puts the right part over the left so that a cross is formed on his breast; he next takes with both hands the ends of the stole, and draws it down as far as his hands will reach, because in this way the cross will come just at the middle of the neck: This done, he fastens the stole at the sides with both ends of the cincture.

While putting on the stole the priest says:

Redde mihi, Domine, stolam immortalitatis, quam perdidi in prævaricatione primi parentis; et quamvis indignus accedo ad tuum sacrum mysterium, meraer tamen qaudium sempiternum.

Merati, with many others, makes the remark that the stole be so adjusted that the cross is covered by the chasuble; hence in many churches in which the sacred rites are strictly observed there is fastened to the middle of the stole a band that is tied to the cincture below the shoulders, so that the stole cannot rise above the chasuble nor above the neck.[12542]

9. THE CHASUBLE

"Postremo, Sacerdos accipit planetam."–(Rub. Miss. tit. I art. 3.)

Lastly, the priest puts on the chasuble and takes care to arrange it not only around the neck and shoulders by drawing down the back part of it with both hands so that there may be no folds, but that it be also adjusted in front by fastening it with the strings underneath it.

He says while putting on the chasuble:

Domine, qui dixisti: Jugum meum suave est, et onus meum leve;—fac ut istud portare sic valeam, quod consequar tuam gratiam. Amen.

If he wishes to carry with him a pocket-handkerchief, he should fasten it to his cincture, but under the chasuble in such a manner that it may be entirely hidden from view.[12543]

It must be observed that the priest while vesting should not speak to any one; he should pay attention to recite devoutly and in a low voice the prescribed prayers by reflecting on the mysteries represented by the sacred vestments.[12544]

Chapter II

LEAVING THE SACRISTY AND APPROACHING THE ALTAR

1. THE PRIEST TAKES THE CHALICE AND PROCEEDS TO LEAVE THE SACRISTY

"Sacerdos, omnibus paramentis indutus, accipit manu sinistra calicem ut supra præparatum, quem portat elevatum ante pectus, bursam manu dextra super calicem tenens, et facta reverentia cruci vel imaginii illi quæ in sacristia erit, capite cooperto, accedit ad altare, ministro cum Missali et aliis ad celebrandum necessariis (nisi ante fuerint præparata) præcedente, superpelliceo induto."[12545]—(Rub. Miss. tit. II. art. 1.)

WHEN the priest is vested he puts on the biretta, makes the sign of the cross (this is, however, not prescribed by the Rubric). According to Tonellius, before taking the chalice he should with uncovered head salute the other priests.

It is true Merati contradicts this opinion of Tonellius, because by uncovering the head greater reverence would be paid to priests than to the crucifix, which is saluted with the head covered. But to this we may easily reply that the priest with his head covered shows reverence to, the crucifix for the reason that he is holding the chalice, and he would run an evident risk of throwing it down if he desired to uncover his head while bowing profoundly. In fact, if the priest were not carrying the chalice, he would have to make a bow to the crucifix with uncovered head.

He takes the chalice by the knob (ad nodum) [according to the Rubric farther on], although it seems to me that they are not wrong that take it below the cup, namely, between the thumb and third finger, holding the cup with the other fingers, as in this way he can avoid all danger of throwing it down, the more so since the hand is covered by the veil. [And, moreover, this Rubric is not preceptive, since it treats of matters that are done outside of the Mass.]

Holding the chalice with the left hand, he places the right hand on the burse, the opening of which should be turned towards himself. Upon the burse there should not be placed either handkerchief, spectacles, the key of the tabernacle, or anything similar, as the S. R. C., Sept. 1, 1703, declared. He holds the chalice before his breast, carrying it in such a way that he neither touches his breast nor has it far removed from it.

Having then taken the chalice, he makes a profound reverence or bow[12546] to the crucifix or image that is in the sacristy. He does not uncover the head unless the chalice has already been carried to the altar. He shall walk gravely and modestly, with his eyes cast down, and the chalice should be carried at such a height that he may see his way beyond it. It must be observed that the right hand is so to be stretched out upon the burse that the fingers be united, that the elbow be not raised, but that it rest against the body.

But as there is question here of reverences, we must know that besides the prostration and genuflection three modes of reverences are to be distinguished, which are called inclinations, namely, the profound, the moderate, and the simple. The profound inclination is made when any one standing inclines his head and shoulders in such a way that he can touch his knees with both hands. The moderate is made when any one inclines moderately the head and the shoulders. The simple is made if only the head is inclined. This last inclination is again divided into three kinds —minimarum maxima, minimarum media, minimarum minima: they correspond to a triple cult—of latria, hyperdulia, and dulia. The first (minimarum maxima) consists in a profound inclination of the head, with a slight movement of the shoulders: it is made at the Gloria Patri, and at the name God[12547] and Jesus. The second (minimarum media) consists in notably inclining the head only, and is made when the name of Mary is pronounced. The third (minimarum minima) is a simple inclination of the head, and is made when the name of any saint or of the living Pope is mentioned.

2. THE PRIEST GOES FROM THE SACRISTY TO THE ALTAR

"Procedit autem, oculis demissis, incessu gravi, erecto corpore. Si vero contigerit eum transire ante altare majus, capite cooperto faciat ad illud reverentiam; si ante altare ubi celebretur Missa, in qua elevatur vel tunc ministratur Sacramentum, similiter genuflectat, et detecto capite illud adorat, nec ante surgat, quam celebrans deposuerit Calicem super corporale.—(Rub. Miss. tit. II. c. 1.)

After having, therefore, made a bow to the cross or to another image, he proceeds to the altar, walking with gravity and modesty, with his eyes cast down.[12548]

There are theologians that say that while going to the altar one may recite the Miserere; but others deny this, because the Rubric does not speak of it.[12549]

If he passes before an altar where the Blessed Sacrament is exposed he should kneel down on both knees (although Bauldry and others say that he need bend only one knee); then he uncovers his head and gives the biretta to the server, or, according to the opinion of Merati and of others, he holds it downward in his right hand, with the open side turned towards himself;[12550] after having adored our Lord by a profound inclination of the head, he puts on his biretta and rises. He does the same thing when he meets a priest carrying the Blessed Sacrament.

If he passes before an altar at the moment of the Elevation, he kneels down on both knees, as has been said above, and does not rise until the chalice [or ciborium] is placed on the altar. He does the same thing when Communion is distributed. When there is distribution of Communion he need not wait till it is finished (S. R. C., July 5, 1698).

If he passes before an altar after the Consecration he makes a genuflection, takes off his biretta, and makes a profound bow; then he puts 011 his biretta and rises. It is also probable that he may make a simple genuflection without uncovering his head; for then the Blessed Sacrament, hidden on the altar, may be regarded as inclosed in the tabernacle. Such is the practice at Rome, says Merati.[12551]

If he passes before the main altar where the Blessed Sacrament is kept, he genuflects without taking off his biretta; if, however, only a cross is on the altar, he makes a profound bow: this kind of bow is also made if there is exposed some remarkable relic of a saint whose feast is being celebrated, or who is held in high honor. When the relics are on the same altar on which is kept the Blessed Sacrament, it suffices for him to genuflect without uncovering his head.[12552]

If the priest passes through the choir while there is being sung the Gloria Patri, or another verse which requires an inclination of the head, he remains standing, and inclines reverently. If the clergy be present, he salutes them both sides of the choir with head covered.

If he meets a priest who has just said Mass, he lets him pass on the right and salutes him, but without uncovering and without stopping.

If he passes before a Cardinal, or the Archbishop of the Province, or the Bishop of the diocese, or an Apostolic Legate, or a King, or some other great personage, he salutes him by a moderate inclination, without however uncovering his head.

Finally, it must be observed that if the priest does not carry the chalice, he should go to the altar with his hands joined before his breast, and make all the reverences with his head uncovered.

3. THE PRIEST ARRIVES AT THE ALTAR

"Cum pervenerit ad altare, stans ante illius infimum gradum caput detegit, birretum ministro porrigit, et altari, seu imagini Crucifixi desuper positæ, profunde inclinat. Si autem in eo sit tabernaculum Sanctissimi Sacramenti, genuflectens debitam facit reverentiam."—(Rub. Miss. tit. II. n. 2.)

Having arrived at the altar, the priest stops at the foot of it, before the first step, uncovers his head, and gives the biretta to the server.

If he also wears a skull-cap he must take it off, unless it is permitted him by an apostolic dispensation to wear it during Mass; in this case he may wear it till the Canon, and may put it on only after the Communion. It must be observed that no one, even if a bishop, is permitted to wear the skull-cap during Mass without an apostolical indult, as appears from several decrees cited by Gavantus (Part II. tit. 2, n. 2, lit. f), and from the decree approved by Urban VIII. and placed at the beginning of the Missal.[12553]

He makes a profound inclination if the Blessed Sacrament is not on the altar; for if it is there, he genuflects below, on the first step, as has been said above, without any other reverence of the head; this is in accordance with the common practice.[12554]

4. THE PRIEST ASCENDS THE STEPS OF THE ALTAR WHEREON HE PLACES THE CHALICE

"Tunc ascendit ad medium altaris, ubi ad cornu Evangelii sistit calicem, extrahit corporale de bursa, quod extendit in medio altaris, et super illud calicem velo coopertum collocat, bursam autem ad cornu Evangelii. Si in altari paramenta accipit hoc idem facit, antequam descendat ab altari ut Missam inchoet.

"Si est consecraturus plures hostias pro communione facienda quæ ob quantitatem super patena manere non possint, locat eas super corporale ante calicem, aut in aliquo calice consecrato, vel vase mundo benedicto, ponit eas retro post calicem, et alia patena, seu palla cooperit."–(Rub. Miss. tit II. n. 2 et 3.)

He then ascends the steps of the altar, in the middle, always beginning with the right foot. Having arrived at the middle of the altar, he puts the chalice on the Gospel side,[12555] takes the burse with the left hand, and taking out of it the corporal with the right hand, he places it on the altar. Then with the left hand, which is already holding the burse, he places it on the Gospel side, and so places it between the candles that its opening be towards the Epistle side, and the wax of the candles may not fall upon it.

Then with his two hands he extends the corporal upon the sacred stone, which is in the middle of the altar, so that its extremity is distant about the width of a finger from the front part of the altar. In this way there is no danger that the lace of the corporal will cling to the vestments of the priest, who in his movements might thus upset the chalice. If there is on the corporal an embroidered cross, this part should be placed in front so that he may kiss the cross when the altar is to be kissed.[12556]

This done, the priest places the chalice on the corporal with both hands, that is, he holds with the left hand the foot of the chalice at the knob, and with the right he raises the veil by taking it at its extremity, and thus transfers the chalice, raised about half a palm from the Gospel side to the middle. When it is in the middle he raises a little the veil so that it may not slip under the foot of the chalice. He places the chalice more towards the back than towards the front, and the chalice should be covered on all sides with the veil, so that when he kisses the altar it may not be in the way; this is far more necessary after the Communion, because then the chalice is also covered with the burse. The chalice should always stand on the sacred stone, namely, in a direct line in the middle of the altar. It must be here remarked that without an apostolical dispensation the corporal should not be carried outside of the burse on the veil. See Gavantus, p. 2, n. 1, lit. o, and Merati, p. 2, tit. 2, n. 12.

If several particles are to be consecrated for the Communion of the people, and they can be held on the paten (if they are few they can be placed on the paten below the large host), they are placed on the corporal before the chalice on the Gospel side, so that they may not be outside of the sacred stone; or they may be placed in a ciborium or another chalice, which is then put behind the chalice: if it is a chalice, it is to be covered with a pall; but if it is a ciborium, it should be covered with its own lid.

5. THE PRIEST OPENS THE MISSAL, THEN DESCENDS TO THE FOOT OF THE ALTAR

"Collocato calice in altari, accedit ad cornu Epistolæ, Missale super cussino aperit, reperit Missam, et signacula suis locis accommodat. Deinde, rediens ad medium altaris, facta primum Cruci reverentia, vertens se ad cornu Epistolæ, descendit post infimum gradum altaris, ut ibi faciat Confessionem."—(Rub. Miss. tit. II. n. 4.)

The chalice having thus been put in its place, the priest joins his hands and makes a simple (maxima) inclination[12557] to the cross; this he does whenever he leaves the middle of the altar or returns to the middle,[12558] unless a little before his arrival or after his departure the Rubric prescribes the kissing of the altar or the making of another inclination, as when the Credo is said. Immediately after having made this reverence, he joins his hands, putting the right thumb over the left in the form of a cross, and goes to the Epistle corner. He opens the Missal,[12559] again looks for the Mass that is to be said,[12560] and having verified the book-marks, he returns to the middle of the altar with his hands joined before his breast. There he makes to the cross a moderate (not profound) reverence, according to the more common opinion, without raising the eyes to the cross, and without stopping to say some prayer before descending from the altar.

Having made a reverence to the cross, he moves towards the Gospel side, that he may not turn his back to the cross or the tabernacle, and with his face towards the Epistle corner, his eyes cast down, and his hands joined before his breast, he descends to the foot of the altar below the lowest steps; the more altar steps there are, the more should he turn towards the Gospel side, in order that, descending in an oblique direction, he may find himself at the middle before the altar when he arrives at the lowest step. But if the altar has more than three steps he may remain standing on the third step, or upon the step that is more convenient. If, however, the altar has only one step, the priest moves back a little and remains standing on the floor below the lowest step.

It must be remarked that the priest should not descend from the altar before the candles have been lighted.[12561]

Chapter III

THE BEGINNING OF THE MASS

1. THE PRIEST, WITH HIS HANDS JOINED, MAKES AN INCLINATION OR A GENUFLECTION

"Sacerdos, cum primum descenderit sub infimum gradum altaris, convertit se ad ipsum altare, ubi stans in medio, junctis manibus ante pectus extensis et junctis pariter digitis, et pollice dextro super sinistrum posito in modum crucis (quod semper servatur. quando junguntur manus, præterquam post Consecrationem) detecto capite, facta prius Cruci vel altari profunda reverentia, vel si in eo sit tabernaculum Sanctissimi Sacramenti, facta genuflexione, erectus incipit Missam."—(Rub. Miss. tit. III. n. 1.)

THE priest having descended to the front of the last step, turns his face to the altar and stops in the middle, with his hands joined before his breast, without touching the chasuble; in order to do this more easily, he should keep his elbows nearer to the breast than to the sides.

To join the hands, the fingers should be extended and joined, so that each finger touches the same finger of the other hand; for example, the forefinger of the right hand should touch the forefinger of the left hand, and so on with the other fingers. Moreover, the right thumb should be placed upon the left thumb in the form of a cross, so that there remains no space between the fingers. This should be observed every time that the hands are joined, except after the Consecration, when the thumbs and the forefingers are to be joined, and the extremities of the fingers should be held more towards the face of the celebrant than towards the altar.

He makes to the cross a profound inclination of the body or a genuflection,[12562] if the Blessed Sacrament is in the tabernacle.

When he genuflects, he lowers the knee near the heel of the left foot; and when he stands, the feet should be not far apart, but joined.

2. THE PRIEST MAKES THE SIGN OF THE CROSS

"Stans igitur celebrans ante infimum gradum altaris, ut supra, producens manu dextra a fronte ad pectus signum Crucis, dicit intelligibili voce: In nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus Sancti. Amen.—Et postquam id dixerit, non debet advertere quemcumque in alio altari celebrantem, etiamsi Sacramentum elevet, sed continuate prosequi Missam suam usque ad finem. Quod item observatur in Missa solemni, et simul etiam a ministris.

"Cum seipsum signat, semper sinistram ponit infra pectus; in aliis benedictionibus cum est ad altare, et benedicit oblata, vel aliquid aliud, ponit eam super altare, nisi aliter notetur. Seipsum benedicens, vertit ad se palmam manus dextræ, et, omnibus illius digitis junctis et extensis, a fronte ad pectus, et ab humero sinistro ad dextrum, signum Crucis format. Si vero alios, vel rem aliquam benedicit, parvum digitum vertit ei cui benedicit, ac benedicendo, totam manum dextram extendit, omnibus illius digitis pariter junctis et extensis; quod in omni benedictione observatur."—(Rub. Miss. tit. III. n. 4 et 5.)

Then standing erect, he makes the sign of the cross, and holding the left hand below his breast, he signs himself with the right hand, moving it from the forehead to the breast and from the left shoulder to the right shoulder, saying in a loud voice: In nomine Patris, etc., and while saying Amen he joins his hands.

It must be observed that the cross must be formed with the three fingers of the right hand that is extended; but all the fingers should be joined, nor should the thumb be separated from the forefinger: and when the priest signs himself he turns the palm of the hand towards his face; but if he makes the sign of the cross on the book, the palm is to be turned towards the book. Moreover, if he forms the cross only with one hand, he never holds the other that is not employed extended in the air, but holds it either on his breast, or on the altar, or on the book: on the breast when he signs himself, or blesses the assistants or something that is near the altar, such as incense; or the book, when he signs the book: but he puts it on the altar when he makes the sign of the cross over anything that is placed on or near the altar; for instance, ashes, candles, palm, or the subdeacon after the Epistle, etc.

He places his hand also on the altar when he turns the leaves of the Missal, or while standing at the altar, he does some other action with one hand only.

If, before the priest begins Mass, the Elevation happens to take place at a neighboring altar, while he is arranging the chalice and looking for the Mass, he continues to do what he is doing. Then he descends to the floor and kneels down on the lowest step. But if he has already made the sign of the cross, he no longer heeds what is done at the other altars; that is, he makes neither a genuflection nor an inclination.

The celebrant should pay attention not to pronounce too fast what he is to say in a loud voice, so that what he says may be understood; nor should he pronounce it too slowly, lest those present might be annoyed. He should not speak so loud as to disturb the priests that are celebrating, or are engaged in hearing confessions in the same church;[12563] but his voice should be grave, uniform, clear, and intelligible, so that those who are not far from the altar may understand him, and may be excited to devotion. What is to be said in a low tone, he should pronounce in such a manner that the celebrant may hear himself, and may not be heard by those around the altar, according to the Rubric. The obligation of thus varying the voice binds under pain at least of venial sin, against the opinion of a few who falsely suppose that such Rubrics are not preceptive, although, as we have remarked above, all the Rubrics to be observed within the Mass are preceptive, and bind even under a grave fault, if the matter is grave.[12564]

3. THE PRIEST RECITES THE PSALM JUDICA ME

"Postquam dixerit: In nomine Patris, etc., ut supra; jungens iterum manus ante pectus, pronuntiat clara voce antiphonam, Introibo ad Altare Dei. Minister vero retro post eum ad sinistram genuflexus et in Missa solemni ministri, hinc inde stantes prosequuntur: Ad Deum, qui lætificat juventutem meam. Deinde Sacerdos, eodem modo stans, incipit, et prosequitur cum ministro, alternatim, psalmum Judica me Deus, usque ad finem, cum Gloria Patri. Quo finito repetit antiphonam Introibo, cum ministris, ut supra. Qui Psalmus nunquam prætermittitur, nisi in Missis Defunctorum, et in Missis de Tempore a Dominica Passionis inclusive usque ad Sabbatum Sanctum exclusive: in quibus semel tantum dicta antiphona Introibo cum ministris, ut supra, Sacerdos statim subjungit: V. Adjutorium nostrum, etc.,—ut infra. Cum in line Psalmi dicit, Gloria Patri, etc.,—caput Cruci inclinat.

"Repetita antiphona Introibo, dextra manu producens signum Crucis a fronte ad pectus, dicit: V. Adjuforium nostrum in nomine Domini; R. Qui fecit cælum et terram."—(Rub. Miss. tit. III. n. 6 et 7.)

The priest says in a clear and intelligible voice the antiphon Introibo ad Altare Dei and the psalm Judica as far as the prayer Aufer, etc. In the mean time he represents to his mind the end to which all the rest of his actions should be directed, that is to say, to the offering of the sacrifice, the dignity and sanctity of which surpass all that one can imagine. The psalm Judica is omitted in the Masses of the Dead, and from Passion Sunday inclusively to Holy Saturday exclusively. But on the feasts of the saints that fall within Passion Week this psalm must be said, as also in the votive Masses that are celebrated in the same week, even if the votive Masses are de Passione or de Cruce.

At the Gloria Patri a simple inclination of the head is made, which is called, as has been mentioned above, minimarum maxima: this should always be observed when this versicle is recited.

After having repeated the antiphon Introibo, he signs himself with the sign of the cross, saying, Adjutorium nostrum in nomine Domini; these words are so distributed that when he says Adjutorium, the hand touches the forehead; when he says nostrum, the breast; when he says in nomine, the left shoulder; and when Domine, the right shoulder.

4. THE PRIEST RECITES THE CONFITEOR AND WHAT FOLLOWS IT, AS FAR AS THE PRAYER AUFER A NOBIS

"Deinde, altari se profunde inclinans, junctis manibus dicit Confiteor Deo, ut in ordine Missæ; et prosequitur, eodem modo stans inclinatus, donec a ministro vel ministris dictum sit Misereatur; cum incipitur a ministris Confiteor-se erigit. Cum dicit Mea culpa, ter pectus dextra manu percutit, sinistra infra pectus posita.

"Facta a circumstantibus confessione, Celebrans stans respondet Misereatur vestri, etc. Deinde producens manu dextra a fronte ad pectus signum Crucis, dicit: Indulgentiam, etc. Et stans inclinatus junctis manibus prosequitur, Deus tu conversus et quæ sequuntur in Ordine Missæ, clara voce usque ad Orationem, Aufer a nobis, etc.; etcum dicit Oremus, extendit et jungit manus."—(Rub. Miss. tit. III, n. 7 and 10.)

When he says the Confiteor he holds his hands joined, as has been said above,[12565] and he inclines so profoundly that he can touch the knees with his hands; he remains thus inclined till the Misereatur tui, etc., has been said; then he answers Amen, and assumes an erect posture.

It is not permitted while saying the Confiteor to add the name of another saint, or even of a patron;[12566] nor when he says vobis fratres and vos fratres should he turn to the server.[12567] But in a solemn Mass, when the celebrant says vobis fratres and vos fratres, he should turn a little towards the ministers; and he observes the same thing while saying the Misereatur, according to the opinion of Gavantus, Rub. 12.

When he says Mea culpa, etc., he strikes his breast three times with all the fingers of the right hand joined together, holding his left below the breast. Merati does not disapprove of the practice of striking the breast with the open palm of the hand, but the common opinion wishes that the fingers be joined together. It must be here observed that the breast should not be struck with great violence. Having said mea maxima culpa, he immediately joins his hands.

After the server has finished the Confiteor, the celebrant continues saying Misereatur vestri, etc.; and when he says Indulgentiam he signs himself with the cross, so arranging the words that at Indulgentiam he touches his forehead; at absolutionem, his breast; at remissionem, his left shoulder; at peccatorum nostrorum, his right; and at tribuat, etc., he joins his hands.

Afterwards the celebrant with his hands joined before his breast remains moderately inclined, and says: Deus tu conversus, etc. It must be remarked that these versicles should not be said too fast, as some priests and servers are accustomed to do; for it is not proper for one to begin before the other finishes. And if the server does not know the words, the celebrant should supply them. He does not stand erect until he has said Oremus; but while saying Oremus he opens his hands and again joins them.

Then standing erect, he says in a low voice Aufer, and ascends the altar, raising at first the right foot, and slowly ascends so that when he reaches the middle of the altar he has finished the prayer.

Chapter IV

THE INTROIT, KYRIE, AND GLORIA IN EXCELSIS

1. THE PRIEST SAYS THE PRAYER ORAMUS TE, AND KISSES THE ALTAR

"Dum dicit: Aufer a nobis, etc., celebrans junctis manibus, ascendit ad medium altaris; et ibi inclinatus, manibusque item junctis super eo positis, ita ut digiti parvi duntaxat frontem, seu medium anterioris partis tabulæ seu mensæ altaris tangant, residuo manuum inter altare et se retento, pollice dextro super sinistrum in modum crucis posito (quæ omnia semper observantur cum manus junctæ super altare ponuntur), secreto dicit: Oramus te Domine, etc.; et cum dicit: Quorum reliquiæ hic sunt, osculatur altare in medio, manibus extensis æqualiter hinc inde super eo positis; quod semper servatur, quando osculatur altare: sed post Consecrationem pollices ab indicibus non disjunguntur. In omni etiam deosculatione, sive altaris, sive libri, sive alterius rei, non producitur signum crucis, pollice vel manu, super id quod osculandum est."—(Rub. Miss. tit. IV. n. i.)

HAVING arrived at the middle of the altar, the priest inclines moderately and places his hands joined on the altar, so that the small fingers touch the front of the altar, and the other fingers rest on the edge, the right thumb being held on the left in the form of a cross. This should always be observed as often as it is prescribed that he should place his hands joined on the altar, even after the Consecration; but then in this case the thumbs should never be disjoined from the forefingers. Care should be taken that the little fingers that touch the front part of the altar be not separated from the other fingers.

He recites in this posture Oramus te Domine, etc. When he says Quorum Reliquiæ hic sunt, he extends his hands, which he puts on the altar as far as the wrist, on both sides, a little outside of the corporal, and bending his head in a straight line he kisses the altar in the middle, and not on the side. This he should always do when the altar is to be kissed; but after the Consecration the hands are placed on the corporal. In order that the altar may be more easily kissed, it will be necessary to move back about a foot; this is also to be observed when a moderate or profound inclination or a genuflection is to be made. Care must be taken to kiss the altar; for some, in order to avoid the inconvenience that they feel in bending the head as far as the altar, kiss the air; this a great fault.

2. THE PRIEST READS THE INTROIT, AND RECITES THE KYRIE ELEISON

"Osculato altari, accedit ad cornu ejus sinistrum, id est, Epistolæ; ubi, stans versus altare, et producens a fronte ad pectus signum Crucis, incipit intelligibili voce Introitum Missæ, et prosequitur junctis manibus. Cum dicit Gloria Patri tenens junctas manus, caput inclinat versus Crucem. Cum repetit Introitum, non signat se ut prius; et eo repetito, junctis manibus ante pectus accedit ad medium altaris: ubi stans versus illud similiter manibus junctis, dicit eadem voce ter Kyrie eleison, ter Christe eleison, et iterum ter Kyrie eleison, alternating cum ministro. Si minister non respondeat, ipse solus novies dicit."—(Rub. Miss. tit. IV. n. 2.)

Having kissed the altar the priest joins his hands, and without making any inclination to the cross he goes at a natural walk to the Epistle corner, continuing to say et omnium Sanctorum, etc., as appears from the Rubric that says: Osculato altari accedit ad cornu ejus sinistrum.

When he arrives at the place where the Missal is, he turns toward it, and with his body and his head erect he begins the Introit (not, however, while still walking) in a loud voice, signs himself with the sign of the cross, and with his hands joined continues it in the same high tone of voice.

At the Gloria Patri he makes towards the cross a simple minimarum maxima inclination, but does not raise his eyes; and thus remains till the Sicut erat. While making this inclination he should also bend his body a little, according to the practice more commonly received and more natural. While he repeats the Introit he does not make the sign of the cross.

Gloria Patri in the Introit is omitted only in the Masses of the Dead, and from Passion Sunday till Easter it is said only in Masses of the saints and in votive Masses; during the Paschal time two alleluias are added.

After the Introit, while walking with his hands joined and at his natural pace, and therefore with his right side turned towards the altar, he goes to the middle, where in a loud voice he says alternately with the server three times Kyrie eleison, three times Christe eleison, and again three times Kyrie eleison. He should, however, take care not to begin until he has arrived at the middle, and has made to the cross a simple minimarum maxima inclination,[12568] without, however, raising his eyes. This must be observed as often as he passes to the middle of the altar or leaves it, unless a little before leaving it, or a little after reaching it, the making of a bow is prescribed in the Missal; for example, if the altar is to be kissed or after the Gospel the Credo is to be said, because at the word Deum a bow is prescribed. And so also when on the Ember days after Pentecost Gloria in excelsis Deo is to be said separately (without Kyrie), because at the word Deo an inclination is prescribed.

3. THE PRIEST RECITES THE GLORIA IN EXCELSIS

"Dicto ultimo Kyrie eleison, Sacerdos, stans in medio altaris, et manus extendens, elevansque usque ad humeros (quod in oinni manuum elevatione observatur), voce prædicta incipit, si dicendum sit Gloria in excelsis. Cum dicit Deo, jungens manus, caput Cruci inclinat; quo erecto, stans junctis manibus ante pectus, prosequitur usque ad finem. Cum dicit Adoramus te, Gratias agimus tibi, et Jesu Christe, Suscipe deprecationem nostrum, et iterum, Jesu Christe, caput Cruci inclinat. Cum dicit, in fine Cum sancto Spiritu, seipsum a fronte, ad pectus signat, interim absolvens In gloria Dei Patris, Amen.—(Rub. Miss. tit. IV. n. 3.)

The last Kyrie having been said, while yet standing erect at the middle of the altar, he says Gloria, extending his hands the width of his body and raising them to the height of his shoulders, so that they do not pass higher than his nose;[12569] when he says in excelsis he joins them before his breast,[12570] but at the word Deo he inclines his head, without, however, raising his eyes.

Merati wishes this inclination to be the simple minimarum minima; but it seems to me that the simple minimarum maxima is required, just as at Gratias agimus, when this inclination is made at the word Deo: the more so since Merati himself says that on the Saturday within the Octave of Pentecost, when he arrives at the middle of the altar in order to say the Gloria and the Credo, no inclination is to be made, because immediately at the word Deo, which is said in the Gloria and the Credo, an inclination must be made; and he wishes that this inclination should be the simple minimarum maxima.

It must be observed that those do wrong who lower their separated hands and place them on the altar; because the hands are to be immediately disjoined, and without lowering them are to be held in such a way that one palm faces the other, and the hands do not reach higher than the shoulders.

After having said Gloria in excelsis Deo, he continues the hymn, remaining in the same posture and holding his hands joined before his breast till the end. But when he says Adoramus te, Gratias agimus tibi, and Jesu Christe, Suscipe deprecationem nostrum, and again Jesu Christe, he makes a simple minimarum maxima inclination. At the end, when he says Cum sancto Spiritu, etc., he makes the sign of the cross, so distributing the words that at the words Cum sancto he places his right hand on his forehead; at the word Spiritu, he places it below the breast; at the words in gloria, he conveys it to the left shoulder; at the words Dei Patris, he transfers it to the right shoulder; and at the word Amen, he joins his hands. But Tonellius and others, with whose opinion Merati seems to concur, say that the joining of the hands may be omitted, because they are to be disjoined immediately, and such a joining is not prescribed by the Rubric. And the same thing holds good, after the Credo is finished, at the Benedictus qui venit, etc., after the Sanctus, and at Omni benedictione cœlesti, because at the Memento for the Dead the hands must be immediately disjoined.[12571]

The Gloria is always said when the Te Deutn was said in the Office; but it is omitted in Masses of the Dead and in votive Masses, except in Masses of the Blessed Virgin on Saturdays,[12572] in Masses of the Angels, or in Masses that are solemnly celebrated pro re gravi;[12573] and otherwise if it is expressly prescribed in the Missal, as on Thursday and Saturday of Holy Week, on which days the Gloria is recited, although the Te Deum was not said in the Office, because on those days the Office is not in accord with the Mass.

Chapter V

THE PRAYERS

1. THE PRIEST SALUTES THE PEOPLE, SAYING DOMINUS VOBISCUM

"Dicto hymno Gloria in excelsis, vel, si non sit dicendus, eo omisso, celebrans osculatur altare in medio, manibus hinc inde super eo, ut supra, extensis; tum illis ante pectus junctis, et demissis ad terram oculis, vertit se a sinistro latere ad dextrum versus populum, hoc est per eam partem quæ respicit cornu Epistolæ, et, extendens ac jungens manus ante pectus, ut prius, dicit voce prædicta Dominus vobiscum.

"Si altare sit ad Orientem versus populum, celebrans, versa facie ad populum, non vertit humeros ad altare, cum dicturus est, Dominus vobiscum; Orate fratres; Ite Missa est; vel daturus benedictionem; sed, osculato altari in medio, ibi expansis et junctis manibus, ut supra, salutat populum, et dat benedictionem."-(Rub. Miss. tit. V. n. 1 et 3.).

AFTER the Gloria, or if it is omitted, after the Kyrie, the celebrant, with his hands (not only his fingers) resting as far as the wrists exclusively, on both sides of the altar, outside of the corporal, as has been said above (Chap. IV. 1), kisses the altar, and then with his hands again joined before his breast, and with his eyes cast down, but not closed, so that he can see about three feet beyond the steps of the altar, he turns from the Epistle side towards the people, and standing in the middle, he extends his hands so that one palm faces the other, and he joins them, all the fingers being joined and straight, but the hands are not extended beyond the width of the shoulders, and immediately in an intelligible voice he says Dominus vobiscum, but he does not incline the head nor lean against the altar: this should be observed in all similar cases.

It must be remarked that spectacles should be taken off and put on the altar outside of the corporal before the celebrant turns towards the people.[12574]

If the altar is placed in such a manner that the celebrant faces the people, he does not turn to them, but having kissed the altar, he salutes or blesses them in the prescribed words.

2. THE PRIEST RECITES THE PRAYER

"Et cum spiritu tuo. Et junctis ut prius manibus, revertitur per eamdem viam ad librum, ubi, eas extendens et jungens ante pectus, caputque Cruci inclinans, dicit Oremus tum extendit manus ante pectus, ita ut palma unius manus respiciat alteram, et digitis simul junctis, quorum summitas humerorum altitudinem distantiamque non excedat; quod in omni extensione manuum ante pectus servatur. Stans autem, ut supra, extensis manibus, dicit Orationem.—Cum dicit Per Dominum nostrum, jungit manus, easque junctas tenet usque ad finem. Si aliter concluditur Oratio Qui tecum, vel Qui vivis, cum dicit in imitate, jungit manus.

"Cum nominatur nomen Jesus, caput versus Crucem inclinat; quod etiam facit cum nominatur in Epistola. Et similiter ubicumque nominatur nomen beatæ Mariæ, vel Sanctorum de quibus dicitur Missa, vel fit commemoratio; item in oratione pro Papa quando nominatur, semper caput inclinat, non tamen versus Crucem.

"Si plures Orationes sint dicendæ, idem in eis, in voce, extensione manuum, et capitis inclinatione, quod supra dictum est, observatur."—(Rub. Miss. tit. V. n. I, 2.)

After the server has answered Et cum spiritu tuo, the celebrant returns to the Missal by the same way, at a natural and grave pace; and when he arrives there, he extends his hands and again joins them, and turning a little towards the cross, without raising his eyes, makes to the cross a simple minimarum maxima inclination, saying at the same time in an intelligible voice Oremus, and then in the same intelligible voice he continues the prayer, standing erect and with his hands so extended that one palm faces the other, and the extremities of the fingers reach, but do not extend higher than the shoulders, nor beyond the width of the body; but the fingers should be joined and straight: this must always be done when the hands are to be held extended before the breast. We must observe that the left hand should be placed on the Missal[12575] if the right hand turns the leaves.

At the conclusion Per Dominum nostrum and Per eumdem Dominum the hands are immediately joined;[12576] if the conclusion is made with qui tecum or with qui vivis, they are joined at the words in unitate. If the prayer is directed to God the Father, it is concluded with the words Per Dominum, etc. If in the middle of the prayer[12577] the name Jesus is uttered, it is concluded with the words Per eumdem, etc.; if the name Jesus is mentioned at the end, it is concluded with the words qui tecum, etc.; if the prayer is directed to Jesus Christ, it is concluded with qui vivis, etc.; if the Holy Ghost is named, or if the prayer is directed to him, we must say in conclusion in unitate ejusdem Spiritus sancti.[12578] Therefore in the first two conclusions, while saying Jesum, the celebrant turns to the cross with the minimarum maxima inclination, and remains thus inclined till the end of the prayer.[12579] If several prayers are to be said, he should not look for the next prayer before the first is concluded, as the Rubric clearly prescribes against the opinion of Tonellius: Easque junctas tenet usque ad finem.

In the conclusions qui tecum and qui vivis the hands are joined at the words in unitate, but the head is not inclined nor turned to the cross. If in the prayer the name Jesus is said, a minimarum maxima inclination is to be made towards the cross; at the name of the Blessed Virgin a minimarum media inclination is to be made towards the book; at the name of a saint a minimarum minima inclination is also to be made towards the book; and also when the name of that saint is uttered of whom a commemoration is made.[12580] By the word commemoration is not understood that which is made in the prayer A cunctis, because in that only at the name Mary the head is inclined. By commemoration we mean when a Mass, even if a votive Mass, is said of any saint, or when it is said within the octave of the saint of whom a commemoration is made.[12581]

At the name of the saint of whom a commemoration is made, the head is to be inclined whenever it is mentioned in the prayer, in the Epistle, in the Gospel, or in the Canon.[12582] Excepted, however, is the title of the Epistle and of the Gospel, as, for example, Lectio Epistolæ B. Pauli Apostoli, Sequentia S. Evangelii secundum Joannem. For in these places the head is not inclined, although in the Office a commemoration is made of the same holy apostles.[12583]

Whatever may be the number of prayers, the conclusion is made only in the first and in the last, and the invitation Oremus is said only in the first and in the second prayer.[12584]

3. THE PRAYERS ON THE EMBER DAYS

"In Quatuor Temporibus vel alias, quando dicendæ sunt plures Orationes cum Prophetiis, dicto Kyrie eleison in medio altaris, revertitur ad cornu Epistolæ, ubi, stans ante librum. extensis et junctis ante pectus manibus, et caput Cruci inclinans, dicit, Oremus, Flectamus genua; et illico manibus super altare extensis, ut seipsum ad altare sustineat, genuflectit; et sine mora surgens, eadem voce ministro respondente Levate, manibus extensis dicit Orationem ut supra, et in conclusione eas jungit. Dum autem legit Prophetias, tenet manus super librum vel altare positas, ut mox dicetur de Epistola."—(Rub. Miss. tit. V. n. 4.)

On the Ember days, and on other days on which there are many prayers and Prophecies, the priest, having said the Kyrie in the middle of the altar, and a minimarum maxima inclination having previously been made towards the cross,[12585] returns to the Epistle corner, and there as usual says Oremus. Then he says Flectamus genua, and with his hands resting on the altar he makes a genuflection only on one knee, and immediately, after the server has answered Levate, he rises and says the prayer. When he reads the Prophecies, he holds his hands either upon the altar or upon the Missal.

4. THE NUMBER OF PRAYERS

As for the number of prayers, it should be known that if the Office is duplex, all the prayers that are prescribed in the Office should be said, nor is it permitted to add or omit a prayer. It must be remarked that if a festum duplex secundæ classis occurs, which has a commemoration of the simplex only in the Lauds and not in the Vespers, a commemoration of the simplex is not made in the solemn Mass, but is made only in private Masses. On those days, however, on which by the Rubric several prayers are forbidden, all the commemorations are also omitted in the Mass; as on Pentecost and on the Vigil of Pentecost, etc.

Besides, the Sacred Congregation of Rites, December 2, 1684, has declared that it is not a precept of the Rubric that in semiduplicibus, simplicibus, and feriis an odd number should always be taken. Theologians, however, require that in conformity to the Rubrics at least three prayers should be taken, and in ferial, votive, or simple Masses only five or at the most seven may be allowed; but on Sundays and in semiduplicibus are to be said four inclusively of the prayer prescribed by the Superior, and it is not necessary to add a fifth: Cum in Missa de semiduplici non sint necessario dicendæ collectæ impares, id est tres, quinque vel septem, according to the cited decree of December 2, 1684. Moreover, if a prayer is prescribed by the Superior, [then either it is taken ad libitum instead of the third, or it is added as a commemoration to the duplex, semiduplex, or to the Sunday: so the S. C. R. declared August 28, 1627]. This prayer is regularly omitted on feasts primæ and secundæ classis; and even in the principal churches in Rome it is omitted in private Masses: that it must be omitted in the solemn Masses is certain. So also the commemoration of the simplex is omitted, although it is otherwise of precept.

It must be observed that the prayers ad libitum are not to be so understood that the celebrant may say any prayer he may please to say, but that of those prayers that are in the Missal he may choose one, as appears from the Rubric, tit. VII. n. 9.

It must be observed: 1. That it is not proper that the celebrant in a solemn Mass should say the prayer Pro se ipso sacerdote in the presence of the bishop or the clergy assembled in the choir, but he should take the prayer that has reference to the Superior or Congregation, or another that is more suitable. 2. The commemorations of the Sundays, of Advent, of Lent, of the Vigils, and of the Ember days should never be omitted. 3. The commemoration of the Ember days should be the first after the Introit, that is, the prayer of the Office. 4. If any octave falls on a privileged[12586] Sunday, only the commemoration of the octave is taken, the third prayer being omitted.

In the votive Masses the second prayer shall always be the prayer of the Office, but the third should be that which was to have been said in the second place. The prayer that was to have been said in the third place may be omitted unless it be a particular commemoration that is made in the Office.

In the Mass of a saint who is the titular patron of the altar, of whom no Office is said, but only a votive Mass on the day of the same saint, the second prayer will be of the Office of the day; the third, that which agrees with the Office, and which was to have been taken in the third place. In this Mass, which is regarded as a combination of the votive and festive (votive, because it does not agree with the Office; festive, because it is the feast of the saint), the Gloria is said. But in regard to the solemn votive Masses, see the Rubric.

In the votive Masses of the Blessed Virgin, the second[12587] commemoration is of the Holy Ghost even during the time of Advent, of the Passion, and of Easter. In the Masses of the apostles instead of the prayer A cunctis, Concede of the Blessed Virgin is said, so that the commemoration of Sts. Peter and Paul may not be repeated. In the votive Mass of the patron in the prayer A cunctis, the name of the patron is omitted, or another saint is mentioned, according to devotion.[12588]

5. THE ORDER OF THE PRAYERS

As for the order of the prayers, the prayer of Sunday precedes the prayer within the octave, but the latter precedes the prayer feriæ majoris[12589] or of the Vigil; the latter precedes the prayer of the simplex, the prayer of the simplex precedes the communes, which would be in the second place, and are now put in the third place; but the communes precede those that are said through devotion. The votive prayers of the Blessed Trinity, the Holy Ghost, the Blessed Sacrament, and the Cross precede those of the Blessed Virgin, the Holy Angels, and St. John the Baptist, and all precede those of the holy apostles. We must, therefore, say cum beato Michaele Archangelo, or cum beato Joanne Baptista, atque beatis Apostolis tuis Petro et Paulo et omnibus Sanctis. If a commemoration of the Dead must be made, it is always put in the second last place.

If two prayers in the same Mass are similar, that which is to be said last is to be changed, and in its place another ex communi is to be taken. If the prayer of the 22d Sunday after Pentecost, of the Forty Martyrs, or of the Thursday after Ash Wednesday is to be changed, the prayer of the Sunday or feriæ sequentis is to be taken.

Chapter VI

THE EPISTLE, THE GRADUAL, THE GOSPEL, AND THE CREDO

1. THE PRIEST READS THE EPISTLE, THE GRADUAL, AND WHAT FOLLOWS

"Dictis Orationibus, celebrans, positis super librum vel super altare manibus, ita ut palmæ librum tangant; vel (ut placuerit) librum tenens, legit Epistolam intelligibili voce, et respondetur a ministro Deo gratias; et similiter stans eodem modo, prosequitur Graduale, Alleluja, et Tractum, ac Sequentiam si dicenda sint. Quibus dictis, Sacerdos si privatim celebret, ipsemet, seu minister portat librum Missalis ad alteram partem altaris in cornu Evangelii; et dum transit ante medium aitaris, caput Cruci inclinat; et Missale sic locat, ut posterior pars libri respiciat ipsum cornu altaris. et non ad parietem, sive ad partem ejus contra se directam."—(Rub. Miss. tit. VI. 1.)

AFTER having recited the prayers, the priest so places his hands upon the Missal or upon the altar that the palms touch the Missal or he holds them in any way that may be convenient, provided neither hand remains suspended in the air. With his hands thus placed, he reads the Epistle in a loud voice; at the end of the Epistle he lowers the tone of his voice in order to warn the server to answer Deo gratias. He does the same at the end of the Gospel. He recites in the same tone of voice the Gradual, Versicle, Tract, or Sequentia.

If while he reads the Epistle or some subsequent Versicle a genuflection is to be made, he will make it on one knee, resting meanwhile his hands on the altar without lowering the head.

If in the Epistle the name Jesus must be pronounced, he turns a little towards the cross and makes the prescribed inclination. If he pronounces the name Mary or that of a saint whose feast it is, he makes a minimarum media inclination at the name of the Blessed Virgin, a minimarum minima at the name of a saint, but towards the Missal. This holds good for every case that occurs in which the said names must be pronounced, as has been explained on page 117.

The Gradual having been said, throughout the year two alleluias are said, then the Versicle, and after it another alleluia. In the Paschal time, instead of the Gradual two Versicles and four alleluias are said, according to the rubric given at the Mass of Saturday after Easter.

2. THE PRIEST READS THE GOSPEL

"Locato Missali in altari, celebrans redit ad medium altaris, ibique stans, junctis manibus ante pectus, levatisque ad Deum oculis et statim demissis, tum profunde inclinatus, dicit secreto—Munda cor meum, et Jube Domine benedicere, Dominus sit in corde meo—ut in Ordinario. Quibus dictis, vadit ad librum Missalis, ubi stans versus illum, junctis manibus ante pectus, dicit intelligibili voce Dominus vobiscum. R. Et cum spiritu tuo.—Deinde, pollice dextræ manus, signo crucis signat primo librum super principio Evangelii quod est lecturus; postea seipsum in fronte, ore, et pectore, dicens—Sequentia, vel Initium sancti Evangelii, etc.; R. Gloria tibi Domine.—Tum junctis iterum manibus ante pectus, stans ut supra, prosequitur Evangelium usque ad finem. Quo finito, minister, stans in cornu Epistolæ post infimum gradum altaris, respondet—Laus tibi Christe—et Sacerdos elevans parumper librum, osculatur principium Evangelii, dicens—Per Evangelica dicta, etc.—Cum autem nominatur—Jesus—caput versus librum inclinat: et eodem modo versus librum genuflectit, cum in Evangelio est genullectendum."—(Rub. Miss. tit. VI. 2.)

Having finished the Gradual and what follows it, the priest, leaving the Missal open, with his hands joined before his breast, goes immediately to the middle of the altar, and when he arrives there he raises his eyes to the cross, and immediately lowers them, and profoundly inclined, he does not rest his hands on the altar, but holds them between himself and the altar, and says in a low tone of voice: Munda cor meum,[12590] etc. Jube Domine benedicere: Dominus sit in corde meo, etc. If the server is so small that the priest himself would have to remove the Missal to its place, while passing he makes an inclination to the cross,[12591] and the Missal having been put into its place, he returns to the middle in order to recite Munda cor meum, etc., as has been said above.

Then, with his hands still joined before his breast, he goes to the Gospel corner, and there so places the Missal that it looks not towards the front, but obliquely towards the angle of the altar. Then with his hands joined before his breast, without resting them or his arms on the altar, he faces the Missal; his head and body being erect, he says in an intelligible voice Dominus vobiscum. He then disjoins his hands, and having placed his left hand on the book he makes the sign of the cross with the inner part, not the nail, of the thumb of his right hand on the Missal where the Gospel begins. But while making this sign of the cross he extends his whole right hand, turns the palm towards the book, and keeps the four fingers together. Meanwhile he places his left hand on the Missal, then places it below his breast, and with the same inner part of the thumb of his right hand makes three other small crosses on his forehead, on his mouth, and on his breast, while holding the right hand with the other fingers extended and the palm turned towards himself. The signs of the cross are thus distributed according to the words: While saying Sequentia or Initium he signs the book; at the words sancti Evangelii, the forehead; while signing the mouth he says nothing, because it should be closed; while saying secundum Joannem, etc., he signs his breast.

After the server has answered: Gloria tibi Domine, the priest joins his hands before his breast, and in an intelligible voice reads the Gospel, inclining the head at the name of Jesus or of Mary towards the Missal, towards which he also genuflects if a genuflection must be made.

The Gospel having been said, the priest raises the Missal a little with both hands, inclines somewhat, and kisses the beginning of the text of the Gospel, saying in a low tone of voice: Per Evangelica dicta, etc.

After having kissed the Missal the celebrant places it with both hands on the cushion or stand near the corporal, so that he may conveniently read it from the middle of the altar. Then, with his hands joined before his breast, he goes to the middle of the altar, and on arriving there he kisses it, unless the Credo is to be said.

3. THE PRIEST RECITES THE CREDO

"Dicto Evangelio, stans in medio altaris versus Crucem, elevans et extendens manus, incipit (si dicendum sit) Credo. Cum dicit In unum Deum jungit manus, et caput Cruci inclinat; quo erecto, stans ibidem junctis ante pectus manibus, ut prius, prosequitur usque ad finem. Cum dicit, Jesum Christum caput Cruci inclinat. Cum dicit Et incarnatus est usque ad, Et homo factus est inclusive, genuflectit. Cum dicit simul adoratur caput Cruci inclinat. Cum dicit Et vitam venturi sæculi, Amen, producit sibi manu dextra signum Crucis a fronte ad pectus."—(Rub. Miss. tit. VI. 3.)

If the Credo is to be said, the priest standing erect immediately extends his hands, raises them and joins them, and in an intelligible and distinct voice, as at the Gloria, begins the Credo. At the word Credo he extends and raises his hands; at the words in unum he joins them; at the word Deum he inclines his head, raising neither his eyes nor his head. He continues as at the Gloria. At the words Jesum Christum he makes a simple minimarum maxima inclination. When he says Et incarnatus est, which words it is proper to recite slowly so that all may be done rightly, he begins to bend the right knee, and finishes this genuflection at the words et homo factus est, so that at these words he already has his knee on the platform of the altar; and he does not (contrary to the opinion of a few) incline the head. Before making a genuflection he extends his hands on the altar and moves back about a foot, both in order not to touch with his left knee the antipendium, and in order not to be obliged to extend his right foot beyond the platform: this should never be done unless perhaps the platform is so narrow that it could not otherwise be done. At the word adoratur a simple minimarum maxima inclination is to be made towards the cross; but at the words Et vitam venturi sæculi he makes the sign of the cross, as at the end of the Gloria, so distributing the words that when he says Et vitam he touches the forehead and the breast; when he says venturi he touches the left shoulder, and when he pronounces the word sæculi he touches the right shoulder. But he must pronounce these words slowly, so that everything may be done rightly. At the word Amen he may join his hands; but if he does not join them, it is no fault, because it is not prescribed by the Rubric.—(Tonellius, 1. c. t. 4, n. 2.)

4. AT WHICH MASSES SHOULD THE CREDO BE SAID

The Credo is said after the Gospel on all Sundays,[12592] although the Office be of a saint in whose Mass there would not be a Credo on any other day.

On all the feasts of the Lord and of the Blessed Virgin.

On the feasts of the angels; namely, St. Michael, St. Gabriel, St. Raphael, and the holy angel guardians.[12593]

On all the feasts of the apostles and evangelists.

On the feast of any Doctor of the Church whose feast is celebrated as duplex.[12594].[3] In the Dedication of a church; also in the consecration of a church or altar, and in octaves, but not of the altar, because there is no octave of the consecration of the altar.

The Dedication of the cathedral church is celebrated with the rite of primæ classis, as well in the city as in the diocese; but the octave is celebrated only in the city. Regulars should celebrate with the rite of secundæ classis without an octave, as is prescribed in the decree S. R. C., Febr. 11, 1702.[12595] On the titular feasts of the church, that is, of the patron of the place, or of the titular saint, the Gloria and Credo are said. We say of the church, for on the titular feasts of any chapel or altar the Credo is said not in private Masses, but only in solemn Masses that are sung. On the titular feast of the cathedral only the Credo is said, but there is no octave. The Credo is also said on all the octaves and feasts of saints that occur within the octave in churches (not outside of them) that have any remarkable relic, as the head, arm, leg, or any part of the body in which the saint suffered martyrdom; provided it is entire, not small, and lawfully approved by the Ordinary. The Credo is also said on the day of the creation and coronation of the Pope and on the anniversary; as also on the day of election and consecration of a bishop, and on the principal feasts of Religious Orders and within their octaves, but only in their own churches.[12596] It is also said in the solemn votive Masses celebrated pro re gravi. On other feasts of the saints the Credo is not said, unless in the churches of which they are the Titular or Patron saints.

Chapter VII

THE OFFERTORY, THE SECRETA, AND THE PREFACE

1. THE PRIEST RECITES THE OFFERTORY

"Dicto Symbolo, vel, si non sit dicendum, post Evangelium, celebrans osculatur altare in medio, et, junctis manibus ante pectus, ibidem a manu sinistra ad dextram (ut dictum est supra), vertit se ad populum, et, extendens ac jungens manus dicit Dominus vobiscum; et junctis manibus revertitur per eamdem viam ad medium altaris, ubi, extendens et jungens manus, caputque Cruci inclinans, dicit Oremus; tum junctis ut prius manibus dicit, Offertorium."—(Rub. Miss. tit. VII. n. 1.)

AFTER having recited the Credo, or, if it is not to be said, after having finished the Gospel, the celebrant kisses the altar in the middle and turns to the people to say Dominus vobiscum in the manner given above. Then he joins his hands and returns by the same way to the middle of the altar, where extending his hands and raising them to the height of his shoulders,[12597] and again joining them before his breast, he inclines his head towards the cross, and says Oremus. Then, with his hands joined before his breast, he says the Offertory, and in Paschal time adds one Alleluia. Some recite the Offertory in a low tone of voice, but this seems to be contrary to the Rubric which always expressly says when anything is to be pronounced in a low tone of voice.

2. THE PRIEST UNCOVERS THE CHALICE AND OFFERS THE BREAD

"Dicto Offertorio, discooperit calicem, et ad cornu Epistolæ sistit; et manu dextra amovet parvam pallam desuper hostiam, accipit patenam cum hostia, et ambabus manibus usque ad pectus cam elevatam tenens, oculis ad Deum elevatis, et statim demissis, dicit, Suscipe sancte Pater, etc.

"Si fuerint aliæ hostiæ, non super patenam, sed super corporale, vel in alio calice sen vase, pro communione populi consecrandæ, calicem illum seu vas dextra discooperit, et, intentionem suam etiam ad illas offerendas et consecrandas dirigens, dicit ut supra Suscipe, etc.—ut in ordine Missæ.

"Quo dicto, patenam uraque manu tenens, cum ea facit signum Crucis super corporale, et deponit hostiam circa medium anterioris partis corporalis ante se, et patenam ad manum dextram aliquantulum subtus corporale; quam, exterso calice, ut dicetur, cooperit purificatorio.

"Si autem adsit vas seu calix cum aliis hostiis, ipsum cooperit alia patena, vel palla."—(Rub. Miss. tit. VII. n. 2 et 3.)

The Offertory having been said, the priest uncovers the chalice by taking the extremities of the veil with both hands; then raising it in front he removes it towards the back part, and withdraws it from behind the chalice outside of the corporal. Then, if the server is not a cleric invested with surplice, he folds the veil in such a manner that its fringes do not appear on the outside, lest when he puts the pall upon it the border of the pall should adhere to the fringes of the veil. The veil having been thus folded, he places it near the corporal at the Epistle corner; he must never fold it upon the corporal.

After having folded the veil, the priest places his left hand on the altar outside of the corporal; with his right hand he takes the chalice at the knob and puts it on the Epistle side nearly at such a distance as his arm can reach, so that when he takes off the pall he may conveniently place it on the folded veil. Then the celebrant, while yet standing in the middle of the altar, takes the pall off the paten, and so places it on the veil that it projects at one end, and he may thus more easily take hold of it.

It must be observed that in the second and the third Mass of Christmas, when some drops of precious blood remain in the chalice, there should be placed on the altar-cloth a pall on which the chalice may be put: one may use for this purpose the pall of the chalice before removing the said chalice from the corporal, or the chalice may also be held in the left hand. And in these two Masses the priest should take care not to purify the chalice with the purificator when he pours wine and water into the chalice.[12598]

He takes with the right hand, between the thumb, forefinger, and middle finger, the paten with the Host, and raises it as high as his breast, namely, with both thumbs, forefingers, and middle fingers around the paten, and sustains it with the other lingers extended and joined under the paten. At the same time he raises his eyes to the cross, and immediately lowers them, and in a low voice he says: Suscipe, sancte Pater, etc. The Rubric says: elevatis oculis et statim demissis; but the word statim must be taken in a moral sense, so that while saying: Suscipe, sancte Pater, omnipotens æterne Deus, it is more suitable to raise the eyes towards the cross, and to lower them while saying hanc immaculatam Hostiam, etc.

When the priest has to consecrate particles for the Communion of the faithful, if there are only a few—five or six of them—they should be placed on the paten, and after the Oblation he places them on the corporal on the Gospel side—always, however, on the altar-stone, at a little distance from the large Host. If there are many particles, they should be placed in a ciborium or upon the corporal, as has been just said; and if they are brought to the altar in a ciborium, the ciborium is placed behind the chalice, and the priest before he takes the paten from the chalice opens the ciborium, but does not move it from its place, and at the Offertory directs his intention also to the particles.[12599]

Having finished the prayer Suscipe, he forms with the paten a cross (unius palmi) nine inches in length, over the corporal, holding the paten (circa medium palmum) about four inches above the corporal. Then [inclining the paten he causes the Host to slide from the front part of the paten to the middle of the corporal] he immediately puts the paten partly under the corporal on the Epistle side, and after having purified it, he covers it with the purificator. We say partly (aliquantulum), that is, less than one half, so that it may easily be drawn out at the proper time. If a ciborium or a chalice containing particles is at hand, the ciborium is closed with its own cover after the little veil has been removed from the cover; but the chalice is covered with a paten or a pall.

It must be observed that it is a venial sin to consecrate without a reason the particles that are brought to the altar after the Offertory; but if there be a reason, for instance, if otherwise a person who is to communicate would be deprived of Communion, or would have to wait a long time, or if the person be of noble birth or very distinguished (to whom, according to Suarez and others, one may give Communion with a part of the large Host), then they may be lawfully consecrated, the offering of them being mentally supplied; and this is probably allowed even when the Canon has already been begun. See Benedict XIV.,[12600] Quarti, Possevinus, Gobat, and others.

3. THE PRIEST PUTS WINE AND WATER INTO THE CHALICE, AND OFFERS THEM

"Deinde, in cornu Epistolæ, accipit calicem, purificatorio extergit, et, sinistra tenens illius nodum, accipit ampullam vini de manu ministri (qui osculatur ipsam ampullam, non autem manum celebrantis), et ponit vinum in calicem. Deinde eodem modo tenens calicem, producit signum crucis super ampullam aquæ, et dicit—Deus qui humanæ substantiæ,—et infundens parum aquæ in calice prosequitur—Da nobis per hujus aquæ et vini mysterium, etc.

"Imposita aqua in calice, et finita oratione prædicta, accipit manu dextra calicem discoopertum; et stans ante medium altaris, ipsum ambabus manibus elevatum tenens, videlicet cum sinistra pedem, cum dextra autem nodum infra cuppam, intentis ad Deum oculis offert, dicens—Offerimus tibi Domine, etc.—qua oratione dicta, facit signum crucis cum calice super corporale, et ipsum in medio, post hostiam, collocat, et palla cooperit."—(Rub. Miss. tit. VII. 4 et 5.)

Then having made an inclination towards the cross,[12601] the priest with his hands joined goes to the Epistle corner, and taking with his left hand the chalice at the knob, he at first purifies it with the right hand;[12602] then holding with the left hand the extremity of the purificator upon the knob of the chalice,[12603] he extends the other part of the purificator in the direction of the cruets, in order that if drops should fall the altar-cloth may not be soiled. Then holding the chalice a little inclined, he pours into it at the inclined part such a proper quantity as can be drunk at one draught. The wine having been poured in and the cruet having been returned to the server, while holding the chalice in the same way, he blesses the water, making the sign of the cross over the water cruet (this blessing being omitted in Masses for the Dead), and says at the same time: Deus, qui humanæ substantiæ, etc.;[12604] and pouring into the chalice a little natural water,[12605] he continues to say: da nobis per hujus aquæ et vini mysterium, etc. Then he returns the cruet to the server, places the chalice upright, takes the purifier that he is holding at the knob between the fingers of his left hand, and puts it neatly around the forefinger, and purifies the chalice in that part where he poured in the wine and the water. But if he poured in the wine by dropping it to the bottom of the chalice, he must purify the chalice all around as far as the wine reaches, and in the mean time pronounce with a pause the words that follow divinitatis, so that when he says Jesus Christus the purifying is finished. Then with the same left hand he places the chalice near the corporal, that he may conveniently take it. When he says Jesus Christus he may join his hands, and he makes an inclination towards the cross. Continuing to recite the rest of the words, he meanwhile goes to the middle of the altar, and so places the purificator upon the part of the paten that is not covered by the corporal so that its extremities look towards the altar.[12606] Some wish that the purificator should be laid down with the left hand; but if it is laid down when the celebrant goes to the middle, it can be laid down with the right hand; but if it is laid down before he goes to the middle, it will be more convenient to do so with the left hand. Others wish that the words Jesus Christus should be pronounced in the middle in order that the celebrant may make an inclination there: every one may suit his own convenience.

Having arrived at the middle and made the usual inclination towards the cross,[12607] he places his left hand on the altar, but with his right he takes the chalice at the knob so that he holds his thumb in front of the chalice and the rest of his fingers behind it. Then he supports the foot of the chalice with the longer fingers of his left hand underneath it; and thus holding it in a straight line over the place that it is afterwards to occupy, taking care that the top of the chalice be not higher than the eyes nor lower than the chin, he says the prayer Offerimus tibi Domine, etc. During the whole of this prayer he raises his eyes towards the cross and keeps his elbows more inclined towards his breast.

This prayer finished (and not before, as some wrongly do), he makes with the chalice which he holds erect a cross over the corporal, holding it in the same position as when the offering was made. He makes the cross, with the chalice raised four or five inches over the corporal: he makes it not by jerks, but in straight lines of about a palm in length, and may begin from the end of the corporal as far as the Host; but the chalice should not be moved over the Host. He puts the chalice behind the Host, but on the consecrated stone at the distance of about the size of another Host, and covers the chalice with the pall, while holding his left hand on the altar: this is to be done as often as he has to cover or uncover the chalice. Some put the hand on the foot of the chalice lest, they say, they should upset it; but to them we may reply, that the ceremonies should be performed quietly, not hurriedly: then there will be no reason to fear any accident.

4. THE PRIEST BLESSES THE BREAD AND THE WINE

"Deinde, junctis manibus super altari positis, aliquantulum inclinatus, dicit secreto, In spiritu humilitatis, etc. Postea erectus, elevans oculos, manusque expandens, et statim jungens ante pectus (quod semper facit quando aliquid est benedicturus) dicit Veni sanctificator, etc., cum dicit Et benedic, signat manu dextra communiter super hostiam et calicem, sinistra posita super altare."—(Rub. Miss. tit. VII. 5.)

Then he places his hands on the altar in such a way that the little fingers, being extended and united with the others (as has been said above[12608]), touch the front of the altar, and moderately inclined he says in a low tone of voice: In spiritu humilitatis, etc. Then standing erect, he raises his eyes towards the cross, while at the same time he extends his hands and raises them as high as his shoulders, then he immediately lowers his eyes, and joining his hands before his breast (as is done when Oremus is said before the prayer) he says: Veni sanctificator, etc.; and when he says Bene†dic, he makes the sign of the cross over the chalice and the Host at the same time, keeping his left hand on the altar.

1. When Veni sanctificator is said, at the word Deus the head is not inclined, as Merati and many others teach, because an inclination is made immediately after, when leaving the middle of the altar; and this inclination, as Sarnelli says, should properly be made while pronouncing the last words: Tuo sancto nomini præparatum.[12609]

2. In order to form well the cross over the oblata, he draws a straight line towards himself, but does not deflect the line over the Host, and he does so in such a manner that the extremity of the little finger begins from the middle of the chalice and finishes outside of the Host; then he draws a transverse line with the hand, likewise extended (not, however, with the fingers curved as the S. R. C. prescribed August 4, 1663) at the same height, namely, before the pall between the chalice and the Host; and in these crosses and in others of this kind he should not exceed the size of the pall. When the cross is to be made only over the chalice, it should be extended from one end of the pall to the other.

3. Every time anything is to be blessed, the hands should be first joined, as the Rubric indicates in this place; unless the left hand be hindered, as happens at the blessing of the water: Deus qui humanæ, etc., and at the blessing of the Host and of the chalice at the moment of the Consecration.

5. THE PRIEST WASHES HIS HANDS

"Tunc, junctis ante pectus manibus, accedit ad cornu Epistolæ ubi stans, ministro aquam fundente, lavat manus, id est, extremitates digitorum pollicis et indicis, dicens psalmum, Lavabo inter innocentes cum Gloria Patri, qui versus—Gloria Patri—prætermittitur in Missis de Tempore a Dominica de Passione usque ad Sabbatum Sanctum exclusive."—(Rub. Miss. tit. VII. 6.)

Having made the sign of the cross, he again joins his hands, inclines towards the cross,[12610] and with his hands joined goes to the Epistle corner, where he washes the extremities of four fingers, namely, of the two thumbs and forefingers, holding the two fingers of the right hand upon the other two fingers of the left hand, so that while the water is being poured on the fingers of the right hand the rest may be washed; and in the mean time he says in a low voice: Lavabo, etc. At the Gloria Patri he makes an inclination towards the cross, and then, while continuing Sicut erat, etc., he returns to the middle of the altar. Some are of opinion that if the priest has wiped his hands before finishing the psalm he may say the Gloria Patri in the middle of the altar and there make the inclination; but Merati rightly defends the contrary opinion, for such a thing seems to me not to be conformable to the Rubric. The Gloria Patri is omitted in the Masses of the Dead and in those Masses that are said from Passion Sunday to Holy Saturday inclusively; but in the votive Masses of the Passion and of the Cross the Gloria of this psalm is prescribed even in Passion Week.

6. THE PRIEST SAYS THE SUSCIPE SANCTA TRINITAS, THE ORATE FRATRES, AND THE SECRETA

"Celebrans, lotis manibus, eas tergit, et, illis ante pectus junctis, revertitur ad medium altaris, ubi stans, oculosque ad Deum elevans, et statim demittens, manibus junctis super altare aliquantulum inclinatus dicit secreto orationem, Suscipe sancta Trinitas, etc. Qua dicta, manibus hinc inde extensis, et super altare positis, osculatur illud in medio: tum junctis manibus ante pectus, demissisque oculis ad terram, a sinistra manu ad dextram vertit se ad populum, et, versus eum extendens et jungens manus, dicit voce aliquantulum elata Orate fratres, et secreto prosequens ut meum ac vestrum sacrificium, etc., perficit circulum, revertens junctis manibus ante pectus a manu dextra ad medium altaris. Et responso a ministro, Suscipiat Dominus sacrificium de manibus tuis, etc. (alioquin per seipsum, dicens Sacrificium de manibus meis), ipse celebrans submissa voce dicit Amen, et manibus ante pectus extensis, ut fit ad orationem, stans in medio altaris versus librum, dicit absolute sine Oremus, et sine alia interpositione, Orationem vel Orationes secretas. Cum dicit Per Dominum, jungit manus: cum dicit Jesum Christum, caput inclinat, quod facit in prima oratione, et in ultima, si plures sint dicendæ."—(Rub. Miss. tit. VII. 7.)

Then the priest with his hands joined returns to the middle of the altar, and when he has arrived there, without making an inclination, he raises and lowers his eyes towards the cross, and with his hands joined and placed on the altar he says, moderately inclined, in a low tone of voice: Suscipe sancta Trinitas, etc.; then he kisses the altar in the middle, again joins his hands, and turns towards the people in the same way that he does when he says the Dominus vobiscum; but he lingers somewhat, and extending his hands and again joining them, he says in a moderate tone of voice: Orate fratres; and while continuing in a low tone: ut meum ac vestrum, etc., he returns to the middle of the altar, on the Gospel side, not on the Epistle side, making a complete circle: and having turned towards the altar he makes an inclination towards the cross,[12611] according to the opinion of Merati, Bissus, Hippolytus, and Tonellius. When the server has finished Suscipiat Dominus, the priest answers in a low tone of voice: Amen.

Then he raises and extends his hands, and turning a little towards the book he says in a low tone of voice the orationes secretas without saying in the beginning Oremus; in regard to the conclusion he observes what was said above[12612] as to the prayers. In the conclusion of the first oratio secreta he says Amen; and if there be only one, he pronounces it in a subdued tone of voice as far as the words Per omnia, etc.

7. THE PRIEST SAYS THE PREFACE

"Pervento autem, in conclusione ultimæ Secretæ, ad verba illa, Per omnia sæcula sæculorum, exclusive, Sacerdos, stans in medio altaris depositis super eo manibus hinc inde extensis, dicit convenienti et intelligibili voce Præfationem—Cum dicit Sursum corda, elevat manus hinc inde extensas usque ad pectus, ita ut palma unius manus respiciat alteram. Cum dicit Gratias agamus Domino, jungit manus. Cum dicit Deo nostro, oculos elevat, et statim cruci caput inclinat. Responso, Dignum et justum est, elevatis et extensis ut prius manibus, prosequitur Præfationem, propriam, vel communem, ut tempus requirit. Cum dicit Sanctus, junctis ante pectus manibus, et inclinatus, voce mediocri prosequitur, ministro interim parvam campanulam pulsante. Cum dicit, Benedictus qui venit in nomine Domini, etc., erigit se, et signum crucis sibi producit a fronte ad pectus."—(Rub. Miss. tit. VII. 8.)

Having come as far as the words Per omnia sæcula sæculorum in the conclusion of the oratio secreta or of the last oratio secreta, the priest pronounces these words in a loud tone of voice (if there be several prayers he does the same at the end of the last), holding his hands extended on the altar outside of the corporal, and he thus holds them until he says Dominus vobiscum. But when he says Sursum corda he raises his hands as far as his breast, so that the palm of one hand looks towards the palm of the other hand; but the extremities of the fingers should be joined and erect. When he says Gratias agamus Domino he raises them a little higher,[12613] as far as the shoulders, and immediately joins them before his breast. When he says Deo nostro, he raises his eyes towards the cross and immediately inclines the head with a simple inclination that seems to me should be a simple minimarum maxima inclination. He therefore raises his hands and joins them at Domino, at Deo he raises his eyes, and at nostro he makes the inclination.

After the server has answered Dignum et justum est, the priest again disjoins his hands, and holding them open as at the prayers, he continues the Preface, common or proper according to the time, and remains in this posture as far as the Sanctus. It must be observed that Pope Clement XIII. in the year 1759 ordained that on all Sundays that have no proper Preface the Preface of the Blessed Trinity must be said. It was doubted whether on the Sundays within the octave, or on the Sundays of Lent, or of the Paschal time, the Preface is to be said of the saint of whom an octave is celebrated, or of the Sunday of Lent, etc.; but the custom which has the force of law, which exists both in Rome and in other places, has declared that within the octave the Preface of the octave is to be said, and on the Sundays of Lent and of the Paschal time the Preface of Lent or of the Paschal time is to be said.

When the priest has reached the Sanctus he inclines moderately and joins his hands before his breast, but he does not rest them on the altar, and he says in a moderate voice Sanctus, etc. At the words Benedictus qui venit, etc., he stands erect and makes the sign of the cross on himself, holding his left hand below his breast, and continuing in the same tone of voice. But he may distribute the words so that at the word Benedictus he touches his forehead, his breast when he says qui venit, his left shoulder at the words in nonine Domini, and his right shoulder when he says Hosanna in excelsis.

There are some who wish that the priest should here join his hands; but there are others who say that this is not prescribed by the Rubric. To me, however, it seems that the hands should be joined; for the Rubric at the beginning of the Canon, before Te igitur, says extendens manus; hence it supposes that the hands should have been joined before.[12614]

Chapter VIII

FROM THE CANON OF THE MASS TO THE CONSECRATION INCLUSIVELY

1. THE PRIEST RECITES THE PRAYER TE IGITUR

"Finita Præfatione, ut supra, Sacerdos stans ante medium altaris, versus ad illud, aliquantulum elevat manus, oculisque elevatis ad Deum, et sine mora devote demissis, ac manibus junctis, et super altare positis, profunde inclinatus incipit Canonem, secreto dicens, Te igitur, etc., ut in Ordine Missæ. Cum dicit, uti accepta habeas et benedicas, prius osculatur altare in medio, deinde erigit se, et stat, junctis manibus ante pectus. Cum dicit, Hæc do†na, hæc † munera, hæc sancta † sacrificia, dextra manu signat ter communiter super hostiam et calicem. Deinde, extensis manibus ante pectus, prosequitur, in primis, quæ tibi offerimus, etc.

"Ubi dicit, Una cum famulo tuo Papa nostro N., exprimit nomen Papæ: Sede autem vacante verba prædicta omittuntur. Ubi dicitur, Et Antistite nostro N., specificatur nomen Patriarchæ, Archiepiscopi, vel Episcopi, ordinarii in propria diœcesi, et non alterius superioris, etiam si celebrans sit omnino exemptus, vel sub alterius Episcopi jurisdictione. Si vero Episcopus ordinarius illius loci, in quo Missa celebratur, sit vita functus, prædicta verba omittuntur, quæ etiam omittuntur ab iis, qui Romæ celebrant."—(Rub. Miss. VIII. tit. 1 et 2.)

AFTER the Preface, the priest, standing in the middle of the altar, immediately extends his hands as high as his shoulders, raises his eyes towards the cross, and immediately lowers his hands and his eyes, and profoundly inclined before the altar, with his hands resting on it in the usual way, he says, in a low tone of voice: Te igitur, etc. And here it must be remarked that the entire Canon must be said in a low tone of voice, excepting those parts that are prescribed by the Rubric to be said in a loud voice. Gavantus with others asserts that as no movement should be made without being accompanied by words, the Te igitur should be said while the foregoing actions are performed, namely, when the hands are extended. But in this Merati, contrary to his custom, differs from Gavantus in opinion, and with many others rightly and clearly demonstrates that the Rubric prescribes that the Canon should begin after the hands have been placed upon the altar, and that this cannot be explained in any other sense; and he cites several actions, such as genuflections, the raising of the Host and of the chalice, etc., that are performed without words.

After the word petimus he kisses the altar, and then, standing erect, he joins his hands and says uti accepta habeas et benedicas; and having immediately placed his left hand on the altar outside of the corporal, he makes with his right hand a cross three times over the chalice and the Host, saying: Hæc † dona, hæc † munera, hæc sancta † sacrificia illibata. How these crosses are to be formed we have explained above.[12615] Then with his hands extended as in the Preface, he continues in a low tone of voice: In primis, quæ tibi offerimus. At the words Papa nostro N., the name of the reigning Pope is mentioned, and a simple minimarum minima inclination is made towards the Missal; and at the words Antistite nostro N., is mentioned the Bishop of the diocese in which he celebrates, but without making an inclination. If he does not know the name of the Bishop, he will say only Antistite nostro, mentally intending to mention the Bishop of the diocese. If the place belongs to no diocese, he acts as if the episcopal See were vacant; in which case the words Et pro Antistite nostro N. are to be omitted; for a church belonging to no diocese resembles a vacant See, because it has no Bishop to govern it. But if the Apostolic See is vacant the words Pro famulo tuo Papa nostro N. are omitted.

2. THE PRIEST MAKES THE MEMENTO FOR THE LIVING

"Cum dicit, Memento Domine, elevans et jungens manus usque ad faciem, vel pectus, sic junctis manibus stat paulisper in quiete, demisso aliquantulum capite, faciens commemorationem vivorum Christi fidelium ad suam voluntatem: quorum nomina, si vult, commemoret: non tamen necesse est ea exprimere, sed mente tantum eorum memoriam habeat. Potest etiam celebrans, si pro pluribus orare intendit, ne circumstantibus sit morosus, ante Missam in animo proponere sibi omnes illos tam vivos quam defunctos, proquibus in ipsa Missa orare intendit, et hoc loco generaliter, unico contextu, ipsorum vivorum commemorationem agere, pro quibus ante Missam orare proposuit in Missa."—(Rub. Miss. tit. VIII. 3.)

When he says Memento, etc., he raises and joins his hands, so that the extremities of the fingers reach as far as the mouth;[12616] he does not lower them before his breast, but holding them thus raised and joined, and with his head inclined a little, he remains quiet for a short time. In order to be more recollected, he may shut his eyes; but those that lower them would conform to the opinion of authors whom Merati regards as of the highest authority. And he keeps his eyes thus lowered or closed until he says the words Et omnium circumstantium. The letters N. N., that occur in the Canon, serve to express all the names of those for whom he wishes to pray. In olden times tablets called diptychs were used; they were double-folded, and on them were registered the names of those for whom prayers were to be said. It must be observed that the Memento is best made before Mass, in order that he may not become tedious to those that are present. Standing in the aforesaid way, the celebrant mentions all the living Christians according as his pious wish may inspire him. It must, however, be remarked, with Merati, Gavantus, and Tonellius, that in this prayer, which is private, the excommunicated, heretics, and infidels may be mentioned.

For the convenience of priests we add here the formula of this Memento, which Cardinal Bona gives in his treatise on the Sacrifice of the Mass:

"O God of heaven and earth, never-failing source of every good, I, a most miserable sinner and most unworthy minister of Thy Church, because this Sacrifice has an infinite power of impetration, I offer it for my necessities and those of all the living and the dead. And first, the fruit that I can and should derive from it I chiefly apply to him for whom I intend to celebrate; and if perchance it happens that he does not need it, or is incapable of it, I desire and wish that this fruit should be obtained by N., with the application of the indulgence to myself, or to such a deceased person. But, secondarily, without prejudice to him for whom I am primarily obliged or intend[12617] to offer it, I offer it for all those that are specially recommended to me, for N. and N., for obtaining such a grace, . . . and for all the living and the dead, for whom Thou wishest me, Thy unworthy servant, to exercise Thy ministry, in order that, granting rest to the dead, Thou mayest confer upon the living the grace of serving Thee and of persevering till the end in Thy love. Amen."[12618]

The same author says:

"In order that you may remember all for whom you must pray, after you have said MEMENTO, DOMINE, FAMULORUM FAMULARMUQUE TUARUM, and in order that the prayers may be more efficacious, it will be of great profit to unite them to the sufferings of Christ our Lord in the following manner: 1. You should pray for yourself by the blood that was shed for us, in order that through it you may atone for your sins and obtain those virtues that are most necessary for you and for final perseverance; 2. By the pierced side you should recommend the Church that came forth from it; 3. By the head crowned with thorns, the Sovereign Pontiff, all the princes, and the whole ecclesiastical hierarchy; 4. By the wound of the right hand, your friends, relatives, and benefactors; 5. By the wound of the left hand, all those that hate you, or have given you some trouble or scandal; 6. By his transpierced right foot, your Superiors and those things that you have confided to them; 7. By his transpierced left foot, those that are in mortal sin, that they may return to the right path; 8. By the scourges, spittle, and blows, the heathen, heretics, and the rest of unbelievers, who dishonor God; 9. By the crucifixion, the religious of all Orders, that they may voluntarily embrace with courage the sufferings of their martyrdom; 10. By his thirst, all those that have you to pray for them. 11. By his agony in the garden, all those that find themselves in any calamity, peril, necessity, temptation, or any trouble whatever; 12. By his death and burial, all the just, in order that, buried with Jesus Christ, they may persevere in justice. But above all, you should pray for those whom God wishes you to remember, and whom you do not know; for those whom God loves particularly, although you know not their number nor their name; for it is most pleasing to him that you are mindful of his friends."[12619]

3. THE PRIEST FINISHES THE PRAYER MEMENTO, AND SAYS THE FOLLOWING PRAYERS: COMMUNICANTES, HANC IGITUR, ET QUAM OBLATIONEM

"Commemoratione vivorum facta, demissis et extensis ut prius manibus, continuat, Et oumium circumstautium, etc. Similiter stans prosequitur, Conuuuicantes. Cum dicit. Jesu Christi, caput Cruci inclinat: in conclusione, quando dicit Per eumdem, jungit manus. Cum dicit, Hauc igitur oblationeu expandit manus simul super oblata, ita ut palmæ sint apertæ versus ac super calicem et hostiam, quas sic tenet usque ad illa verba, Per Christum Dominum nostrum, tunc enim jungit manus, et sic prosequitur, quam oblationem tu Deus iu omnibus quæsumus, et cum dicit, beue†dictam, adscri†ptam, ratam † communiter signat ter super hostiam et calicem simul deinde cum dicit, ut nobis corpus, separatim signat semel super hostiam tantum: et cum dicit, et sanguis, semel super calicem tantum, deinde elevans et jungens manus ante pectus, prosequitur fiai dilectissimi Filii tui Douiui nostri Jesu Christi, et inclinans caput Cruci."—(Rub. Miss. tit. VIII. 4.)

After having finished the commemoration of the living, and the application of the special fruit having been made, the priest extends and lowers his hands before his breast, and continues to say et omnium circumstantium as far as the words Per eumdem,[12620] etc. When he says communicantes at the name Maria he makes towards the book a simple minimarum media inclination, and at the name Jesus he makes towards the cross another simple minimarum maxima inclination; and also at the name of a saint whose feast is celebrated, if it is mentioned in the Canon, he makes towards the Missal a minimarum minima inclination.[12621]

It must be remarked that in the octaves that have a proper Communicantes and Hanc igitur oblationem, if perhaps there is to be celebrated pro re gravi a votive Mass that has a proper Preface, as when in the octave of Easter there is to be said a Mass of the Holy Ghost or of the Blessed Virgin, the Communicantes and Hanc igitur must be taken from the octave. So also if there is celebrated the feast of the apostles Sts. Philip and James, the Preface will be of the apostles and the Communicantes of the Ascension, as has been declared by the S. R. C. of August 7, 1627.

When he says Hanc igitur oblationem, etc., he extends both hands over the chalice and the Host, so that the palms are open over the chalice and the Host. He so extends his hands that the tips of the fingers reach as far as the middle of the pall, without, however, touching it; and that the thumbs be crossed, namely, the right be placed upon the left, as appears from a decree S. R. C., August 4, 1663.

He should take care not to raise his elbows, but he should keep them close to his body, toward his breast; and so he remains till Per Dominum, etc.; for when he says this conclusion he again joins his hands and continues Quam oblationem. Having said quæsumus, the priest places his left hand on the altar outside of the corporal, and with his right hand he makes three crosses over the chalice and the Host at the same time, saying: Bene†dictam, ad†scriptam, ra††tam, etc., in the same manner as has been mentioned above.[12622] Then he makes another sign of the cross over the Host, saying: Ut nobis cor†pus; while making this sign he does not lower the hand over the Host, as Merati remarks, as it is sufficient for him to draw his hand somewhat towards himself in order that he may form a transverse line over the Host. Afterwards he makes another cross over the chalice, saying San†guis. These two crosses over the Host and the chalice should be shorter than the usual crosses. As the Rubric indicates that the cross at the word ratam should be made in the middle of this word, an inconvenience seems to occur from being obliged to delay a little until the other cross at the word corpus is to be made over the Host; this has given rise to different opinions. I will only mention here the opinion that pleases me; it is this: after having with the right hand made the cross at the word ra†tam, it should slowly move towards the Host, so that when it begins to form the cross over the Host, the other words that follow the word ratam are already finished. But if the priest is slow in pronouncing, then, says Turrinus with others, according to Merati, he should place his right hand on the altar; for it is an inviolable rule of the Rubric that the hand should never remain suspended in the air.

After having made the five crosses in the manner indicated, the priest raises his hands and joining them before his breast, he continues fiat dilectissimi Filii tui, Domini nostri Jesu Christi; and when he says Jesu Christi he inclines his head towards the cross.

4. THE PRIEST CONSECRATES THE HOST

"Extergit, si opus fuerit, pollices et indices super corporale, et dicit secreto, ut prius, Qui pridie quam pateretur, et accipiens pollice et indice dextræ manus hostiam, et eam cum illis ac indice et pollice sinistræ manus tenens, stans erectus ante medium altaris, dicit, accepit panem in sanctas ac venerabiles mauus suas, elevansque ad cœlum oculos, et statim demittens, dicit, et elevatis oculis iu cœluu ad te Deum Patvem suum omnipoteutem, caputque aliquantulum inclinans, dicit. tibi gratias ageus, et tenens hostiam inter pollicem, et indicem sinistræ manus, dextra producit signum crucis super eam, dicens, bene†dixit, fregit, deditque discipulis suis, diceus: Accipite et manducate ex hoc omnes.

"Si adsit vas cum aliis hostiis consecrandis, antequam accipiat hostiam, discooperit manu dextra calicem seu vas aliarum hostiarum.

"Cum autem finierit supradicta verba, cubitis super altare positis, stans capite inclinato, distincte, reverenter et secreto, profert verba Consecrationis super hostiam, et simul super omnes si plures sint consecrandæ, et hostiam suis pollicibus et indicibus tantum tenens, dicit, Hoc est euim Corpus meum.

"Quibus prolatis, celebrans, tenens hostiam inter pollices et indices prædictos super altare, reliquis manuum digitis extensis et simul junctis (et Hostiis, si plures sint consecratæ, in loco in quo a principio Missæ positæ sunt, super corporali, vel in alio vase, seu calice demissis) genuflexus eam adorat; tunc se erigens, quantum commode potest, elevat in altum hostiam, et intentis in eam oculis (quod et in elevatione Calicis facit) populo reverenter ostendit adorandum, et mox sola manu dextra ipsam reverenter reponit super corporale in eodem loco unde eam levavit, et indices non disjungit, nisi quando Hostiam consecratam tangere vel tractare debet, usque ad ablutionem digitorum post Communionem.

"Reposita Hostia consecrata super corporale, genuflexus ipsam veneratur; si adsit vas aliarum Hostiarum, patena vel palla cooperit, ut supra.

Interim dum celebrans elevat Hostiam, accenso prius intorticio[12623] (quod non extinguitur, nisi postquam Sacerdos Sanguinem sumpserit, vel alios communicaverit, si qui erunt communicandi in Missa), minister manu sinistra elevat fimbrias posteriores planetæ, ne ipsum celebrantem impediat in elevatione brachiorum; quod et facit in elevatione Calicis; manu dextra pulsat campanulam, ter ad unamquamque elevationem, vel continuate quousque Sacerdos deponat Hostiam super corporale, et similiter postmodum ad elevationem Calicis."—(Rub. Miss. tit. VIII. n. 4, 5, and 6.)

At the words Qui pridie quam pateretur he wipes his fingers, namely, his thumbs and forefingers of both hands, on the extreme ends of the corporal, but not in the middle, where the consecrated Host is to be placed, and in the mean time with the forefinger and the thumb of the right hand he takes the Host, saying, accepit panem. In order that the Host may be more easily taken, he presses with the forefinger of the left hand the edge of the Host; and when he says in sanctas ac venerabiles manus suas, he takes it up with the thumb and forefinger of the left hand, extending and joining the other fingers. He should take care to hold the Host erect, not horizontally, as he himself should stand erect in the middle of the altar.

At the words et elevatis oculis in cœlum he raises his eyes to the cross, and he keeps them raised, says Bauldry, until he has said all the other words, ad te Deum Patrem suum omnipotentem; then he immediately lowers them, and inclining[12624] the head, he says, tibi gratias agens. While saying bene†dixit he makes with his right hand a cross over the Host, which, as has been said, he holds somewhat raised above the corporal. If there is behind the chalice a ciborium, he puts it by the side of the chalice and uncovers it before he begins Qui pridie, that is, before he wipes his fingers on the corporal. After saying the words deditque discipulus suis,[12625] the priest having becomingly placed his elbows on the altar, without however, touching the altar with his hands, and with his feet joined and equi-distant from the altar, he moderately inclines his head and shoulders, and distinctly and with reverence, without raising his voice, pronounces the words (profert secreto, says the Rubric), as it were, breathing them forth (a fiato), so that he may not be heard by the bystanders, saying, Hoc est, etc. The priest, when he consecrates the Host, should take care not to make any movement of the head or mouth, not to pronounce the form with a certain vehemence, not to bring the Host too near his mouth, or his mouth too near the Host; but he should pronounce the words distinctly, putting no interval between the words.

After the priest has pronounced the words of consecration of the Host, he holds the same consecrated Host between his thumbs and forefingers, the other fingers being at the same time joined and extended, and the hands also closely joined; he withdraws his elbows from the altar so that only his hands as far as the wrists remain on the altar at the extremity of the corporal. Then he genuflects only on one knee, without an inclination of the head; for it must be observed that when a genuflection is made the head must not be inclined, as some wrongly do. This genuflection should be made with greater reverence, and therefore with a slight pause,[12626] and the same thing should be observed in the adoration of the chalice. After having made this first adoration, and while holding his hands joined and his fingers extended, he raises the Host perpendicularly over the place where the corporal is, a little higher than his head so that his wrists are on a level with his eyes, without moving the Host over his head, but he elevates it so that it may be seen and adored by the people; and after having thus held it for a short time, he slowly lowers it and puts it in the place whence he took it. In order to do this more easily, he puts while laying down the Host the ends of his fingers on the corporal at a distance of about three inches from the place where the Host is to be put, and having thus placed his left hand, with his right he takes the Host in the middle, near the border and puts it in its place. The Host having been placed on the corporal, if there is present a ciborium or a chalice containing particles, he again covers the ciborium with its own cover, or the chalice with a pall, and places it behind the chalice where it had been before, and then having made a genuflection, he stands erect.[12627]

It must here be remarked that—

1. During the elevation of the Host as well as of the chalice the eyes should never be turned from them;

2. From the Consecration of the Host till the ablution, as often as a genuflection is to be made or the altar is to be kissed, the hands should be separated and extended upon the corporal; but the thumbs and the forefingers should remain joined, and should not be disjoined unless the Host is to be handled;

3. As often as the Host is to be taken up or laid down, the last three fingers should be extended, but should not be bent, so that there may be no danger of touching the Host with other fingers than the thumbs and forefingers;

4. Between the words of Consecration of the Host, as also of the chalice and the preceding words, namely, Qui pridie and Postquam cœnatum est, other prayers, though mental and devout, should not be inserted: for Le Brun[12628] defends at great length the opinion that the Consecration is accomplished not only by the words of our Saviour, but also by the preceding words, and especially by the prayer that precedes ut nobis Corpus et Sanguis fiat. And this he proves by citing the Council held in Rome by Gregory VII. against Berengarius, where it is said that bread and wine are changed into the body and the blood of Jesus Christ as well by the words of our Lord as by the holy prayer: Per mysterium sacræ orationis et per verba Redemptoris converti in carnem et sanguinem Jesu Christi; and he quotes in favor of this opinion the authority of twenty Doctors of the Sorbonne. Scotus, for some other reason, doubts whether the consecration is brought about solely by the words Hoc est corpus meum; for if (he says) the words qui pridie quam pateretur are not premised, it is not indicated that the words Hoc est, etc., are those that Jesus Christ has spoken. The contrary opinion, according to which only the words Hoc est corpus, etc., Hie est calix, etc., are sufficient for the consecration is common to Tournely, Juvenin, Gonet, Concina, Frassen, Lugo, and others, who prove it from a decree of Eugene IV. published in the Council of Florence, which reads thus: Forma hujus Sacramenti sunt verba Salvatoris, quibus hoc conficitur Sacramentum. The other opinion, however, does not seem to be altogether improbable; the more so since the Rubric prescribes for the case in which the form is to be repeated on account of a doubt in regard to the matter that one should begin at the words Qui pridie. Therefore the sense of the preceding words and of the words of Jesus Christ must not be interrupted by the insertion of vocal or mental prayers.

It must be observed that the thumbs and the forefingers should thenceforth remain joined till their ablution, which takes place after the receiving of the precious blood, and are opened only when the Host is to be taken up.

5. THE PRIEST CONSECRATES THE CHALICE

"Celebrans, adorato Sacramento, surgit et discooperit calicem m quem, si opus sit, extergit digitos; quod semper faciat, si aliquod fragmentum digitis adhæreat; et stans erectus, dicit: Simili modo postquam cœnatum est, et ambabus manibus accipiens calicem juxta nodum infra cuppam, et aliquantulum illum elevans, ac statim deponens dicit, Accipiens et hunc præclarum Calicem, etc., cum dicit, Item tibi gratias agens, caput inclinat, cum dicit, Bene†dixit, sinistra calicem infra cuppam tenens, dextra signat super eum; et prosequens Deditque discipulis suis, etc., et ambabus manibus tenens calicem, videlicet, sinistra pedem, dextra nodum infra cuppam, cubitis super altare positis, et capite inclinato, profert attente, continuate, et secreto, ut supra, verba Consecrationis Sanguinis: Hic est enim Calix, etc. Quibus dictis, reponit calicem super corporale, dicens secreto Hæc quotiescumque feceritis, etc., genuflexus Sanguinem reverenter adorat. Tum se erigit, et. accipiens Calicem discoopertum cum Sanguine ambabus manibus, ut prius, elevat eum, et erectum, quantum commode potest, ostendit populo adorandum, mox ipsum reverenter reponit super corporale, in locum pristinum, et manu dextra palla cooperit, genuflexus Sacramentum veneratur."—(Rub. Miss. tit. VIII. 7.)

After having raised the Host he makes a genuflection (but the genuflection is made with the right knee, which must touch the ground near the left foot). Then he rises, and with his right hand uncovers the chalice; he holds the left hand either on the corporal, or what is better, he holds it at the foot of the chalice, and takes the pall between the middle finger and the forefinger joined to the thumb. He places the pall on the end of the folded veil; then he purifies the forefingers and the thumbs, rubbing them together lightly over the mouth of the chalice, so that if there should be any fragments adhering to the fingers they may fall into the chalice: this should always be done when the Host has been touched. Standing erect, he says: Simili modo, etc.

He takes the chalice with both hands in the following manner: Four fingers, namely, the thumbs and forefingers joined should be put between the cup and the knob of the chalice in front, and the other fingers behind it (the Rubric says juxta nodum infra cuppam), and standing thus he raises the chalice over the corporal In a straight line about four inches, saying: Accipiens et hunc præclarum Calicem, and at once replaces it in the same place. At the words tibi gratias agens he makes a simple inclination of the head.[12629] At bene†dixit he makes with his right hand across over the chalice, holding the knob with his left hand.[12630] Then leaning with both elbows on the altar, he holds the chalice at the foot with three fingers of his left hand, and holds the knob with his right, so that the thumb and forefinger are placed in front, and the other fingers behind. Thus moderately inclined, and holding the chalice straight, but not inclined towards the mouth, and a little raised over the corporal, he attentively and without any interruption pronounces the words: Hic est enim, etc.

After having pronounced these words he again places the chalice on the corporal, and says: Hæc quotiescumque, etc., at the same time he devoutly genuflects and adores. Having risen, he takes hold of the chalice with the right hand at the knob in the above-mentioned way, namely, with the thumb and the forefinger in front, holding the foot with the three fingers of the left hand. He raises the chalice perpendicularly, always following it with his eyes, without, however, turning it around in a circle above his head, as many awkwardly do; he raises it so high that the eyes of the celebrant can see below the foot of the chalice, and that the chalice may be seen by the people; for a moment he holds the chalice thus raised, that the people may adore it. Then he again lowers it in following the same perpendicular line, and puts it in the place it occupied before.

Chapter IX

FROM THE CONSECRATION TILL THE PATER NOSTER EXCLUSIVELY

I. THE PRIEST SAYS THE PRAYERS UNDE ET MEMORES, SUPRA QUÆ, AND SUPPLICES

"Reposito Calice et adorato, Sacerdos, stans ante altare, extensis manibus ante pectus, dicit secreto, Unde et memores, etc. Cum dicit, de tuis donis ac datis, jungit manus ante pectus; et cum dicit, Hostiam pu†ram, Hostiam † sanctum, Hostiam im†macnlatam, manu sinistra posita super altare intra corporale, dextra signat ter communiter super Hostiam et Calicem, et semel super Hostiam tantum, et semel super Calicem tantum, dicens, Panem † sanctum vitæ æternæ, et Calicem † salutis perpetuæ. Deinde, stans ut prius, extensis manibus, prosequitur. Supra quæ propitio, etc. Cum dicit, Supplices te rogamus, etc., inclinat se ante medium altaris, manibus junctis super illo positis. Cum dicit, ex hac Altaris participatione, osculatur altare, manibus hinc inde super corporale positis. Cum dicit, sacrosanctum Filii tui, jungit manus; et, dextra signans semel super Hostiam tantum, et semel super Calicem, sinistra super corporale posita, dicit, Cor†pus, et San†guinem sumpserimus, et cum dicit, omni benediction † cælesti, seipsum signat a fronte ad pectus signo crucis, sinistra posita infra pectus, et prosequitur: et gratia repleamur. Cum dicit, per eumdem, jungit manus."-(Rub. Miss. tit. IX. c. I.)

HAVING replaced the chalice on the altar, and having adored it by making a genuflection, the celebrant rises, and standing erect, with his hands extended before his breast, and turned towards the Missal, he says: Unde et memores Domine, etc. At the words de tuis donis ac datis, he joins his hands, and then places his left hand on the corporal, and with his right hand he forms three crosses over the Host and the chalice together, saying: Hostiam † puram, Hostiam † sanctam, Hostiam † immaculatam, and he makes a cross once over the Host, saying, Panem † sanctum vitæ æternæ, and once over the chalice, saying: Et Calicem † salutis perpetuæ. Then with his hands extended he continues: Supra quæ, etc.

When he says Supplices te rogamus, he inclines profoundly, holding the hands joined and resting on the edge of the altar as at the Introit, that is to say, the small fingers should touch the front of the altar, with the other fingers resting on the altar and joined to the forefingers and thumbs.[12631] After the words Ut quotquot he kisses the altar while moving back a little, and on rising he joins his hands.[12632] Then having placed his left hand on the corporal, he makes with the right hand a cross over the Host, saying, Sacrosanctum Filii tui cor†pus; then he makes another cross over the chalice, saying: San†guinem sumpserimus. But when he says Omni benedictione † cælesti et gratia repleamur, he signs himself, holding his left hand below the breast; and at the words Per eumdem, etc., he joins his hands according to the Rubric.

2. THE PRIEST MAKES THE MEMENTO FOR THE DEAD

"Cum dicit, Memento etiam, Domine famulorum famularumque tuarum, etc., extensis et junctis manibus ante pectus, et usque ad faciem elevatis, et intentis oculis ad Sacramentum super altare, facit commemorationem fidelium defunctorum, de quibus sibi videtur, eodem modo ut dictum est de commemoratione vivorum. Qua commemoratione facta, stans ut prius extensis manibus prosequitur, Ipsis Domine, et omnibus in Christo, etc., et in fine, ad per eumdem jungit manus, et caput inclinat."—(Rub. Miss. tit. IX. 2.)

When he says Memento etiam Domine, etc., he separates his hands and joins them slowly, so that he finishes joining them at the words in somno pacis. Having joined his hands before his breast, as has been done and said at the Memento for the living, holding his head inclined, and his eyes fixed on the Blessed Sacrament, he makes for a short time a commemoration of the dead. After this he lowers his hands before his breast, and holding them disjoined, he continues: Ipsis, Domine, etc. At the words Per eumdem he again joins his hands, and when he says Christum he inclines the head. According to the general rule, the head is to be inclined only at the name Jesus; but in this place, and not elsewhere, it is prescribed by the Rubric. Bauldry wishes that the inclination should be continued until after the following words: Nobis quoque peccatoribus; but this opinion is singular, and does not seem to me to be in accordance with the Rubric.

3. THE PRIEST SAYS THE PRAYERS NOBIS QUOQUE PECCATORIBUS AND PER QUEM HÆC OMNIA

"Cum dicit, Nobis qnoqne peccatoribus, vocem aliquantulum elevat, et dextra manu pectus sibi percutit, sinistra posita super corporale, et prosequitur secreto, famulis tnis, etc., stans manibus extensis ut prius. Cum dicit, Per Christum Dominum nostrum. Per qnem hæc omnia Domine semper bona creas, jungit manus ante pectus; deinde manu dextra ter signans communiter super Hostiam et Calicem, dicit, san†ctificas, vivi†ficas, bene†dicis, et præstas nobis. Postea discooperit manu dextra Calicem, et genuflexus Sacramentum adorat: tum se erigit, et reverenter accipit Hostiam inter pollicem, et indicem dextræ manus; et cum ea super Calicem, quem manu sinistra tenet circa nodum infra cuppam, signat ter a labio ad labium, dicens, Per ip†sum, et cum † ipso, et in ip†so. Similiter cum Hostia signat bis inter Calicem et pectus, incipiens a labio Calicis, et dicit, est tibi Deo Pa†tri omnipotenti in unitate Spiritus † sancti. Deinde tenens manu dextra Hostiam super Calicem, sinistra Calicem, elevat eum aliquantulum simul cum Hostia, dicens omnis honor et gloria, et statim utrumque deponens, Hostiam collocat super corporale, et si opus sit, digitos extergit, ut supra; ac pollices et indices ut prius jungens, Calicem palla cooperit, et genuflexus Sacramentum adorat."—(Rub. Miss. tit. IX. 3.)

Then he puts his left hand upon the corporal, and standing erect, he strikes his breast with the extremities of his three fingers, saying in a moderate voice: Nobis quoque peccatoribus, and with his hands extended as before he continues, and again joins them when he says: Per Christum Dominum nostrum. And thus continuing in the same attitude he says: Per quem hæc omnia, Domine, semper bona creas, and then he forms three crosses conjointly, as has been explained above, saying: Sancti†ficas, vivi†ficas, bene†dicis, et præstas nobis. Afterwards with his right hand he uncovers the chalice, his left hand being placed on the corporal, or, as others wish, on the foot of the chalice, taking the pall between the middle and the forefinger that is joined to the thumb, and having placed it on the folded veil he genuflects.

Having risen he takes with the thumb and forefinger of his right hand the Host at the side a little below the middle, and holding the chalice by the knob with his left hand, he forms with the Host the sign of the cross three times over the chalice from rim to rim, without however touching the edges in Straight lines without any break, saying. Per ip†sum, et cum ip†so, et in ip†so. Then with the same Host he makes two other crosses between the chalice and his breast, saying: Est tibi Deo Patri † omnipotenti in unitate Spiritus † sancti. These two crosses are formed in the same direction, so that the height of the Host always corresponds with the height of the rim of the chalice; but the crosses should not extend beyond the corporal or pass beyond the left arm, which for this reason should be bent. He then with his right hand carries the Host over the chalice in a straight line, not in a circle, and raises a little the chalice together with the Host, saying at the same time in a low voice Omnis honor et gloria. Having then put the chalice on the corporal and the Host in its place, he purifies his thumbs and forefingers over the chalice, not on its rim, covers it again with the pall, and makes a genuflection.

Chapter X

FROM THE PATER NOSTER AND THE ACTS THAT FOLLOW TILL THE PRIEST'S COMMUNION, INCLUSIVELY

1. THE PRIEST RECITES THE PATER NOSTER, AND BEGINS THE LIBERA NOS QUÆSUMUS

"Celebrans, cooperto Calice, adoratoque Sacramento, erigit se, et manibus extensis hinc inde super Altare infra corporale positis, dicit intelligibili voce Per omnia sæcula sæculorum, et cum dicit Oremus jungit manus, caput Sacramento inclinans. Cum incipit Pater nosier extendit manus, et stans, oculis ad Sacramentum intentis, prosequitur usque ad finem. Responso a ministro Sed libera nos a malo, et a celebrante, submissa voce Amen, manu dextra, pollice et indice non disjunctis, patenam aliquantulum purificatorio extergens, eam accipit inter indicem et medium digitos; quam tehens super altare erectam, sinistra super corporale posita, dicit secreto libera nos quæsumus, etc."—(Rub. Miss. tit. X. 1.)

THE priest, standing erect, places his hands, now separated, on the corporal, and says in a loud voice: Per omnia sæcula sæculorum ; then raising his hands and joining them, and inclining his head towards the Blessed Sacrament, he says: Oremus, etc. Raising his head he holds his hands joined till the Pater noster; but when he says Pater noster, he extends his hands before his breast and fixes his eyes on the Blessed Sacrament up to the words Et ne nos inducas in tentationem; and the server having answered: Sed libera nos a malo, the priest says in a low tone of voice, Amen.[12633]

Afterwards,[12634] placing his left hand on the corporal, he takes with his right hand the purificator without separating the forefinger from the thumb, and slightly rubs the paten drawn from under the corporal; he leaves the purificator a short distance from the corporal on the Epistle side. Then taking the paten between the forefinger and the middle finger he holds it upright so that the gilt or concave side looks towards the Host, and its edge rests on the altar cloth, but not on the corporal; he keeps his hand on the upper part of the paten, and thus standing he says the prayer Libera nos, etc.

2. THE PRIEST CONTINUES UNTIL AFTER THE AGNUS DEI

"Antequam celebrans dicat Da propitius pacem, elevat manu dextra patenam de altari, et seipsum cum ea signat signo crucis a fronte ad pectus dicens, Da propitius pacem in diebus nosiris. Cum signat se, manum sinistram ponit infra pectus: deinde patenam ipsam osculatur, et, prosequens, ut ope misericordiæ tuæ, etc., submittit patenam Hostiæ, quam indice sinistro accommodat super patenam, discooperit Calicem et genuflexus Sacramentum adorat; tum, se erigens, accipit Hostiam inter pollicem et indicem dextræ manus et cum illis, ac pollice et indice sinistræ manus eam super Calicem tenens, reverenter frangit per medium, dicens, Per eumdem Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum Filium tuum, et mediam partem, quam inter pollicem et indicem dextræ manus tenet, ponit super patenam: de illa media, quam sinistra manu tenet, frangit cum pollice et indice dextræ manus particulam, prosequens, Qui tecum vivit et regnat, etc., et eam inter ipsos dextræ manus pollicem et indicem retinens, partem majorem, quam sinistra tenet, adjungit mediæ super patenam positæ, interim dicens, in unitate Spiritus sancti Deus, et particulam Hostiæ, quam in dextra manu retinuit, tenens super Calicem, quem sinistra per nodum infra cuppam retinet intelligibili voce dicit, Per omnia sæcula sæculorum. R. Amen, et cum ipsa particula signans ter a labio ad labium Calicis, dicit, Pax Domini sit semper vobiscum. Responso per ministrum, Et cum spiritu tuo, particulam, quam dextra manu tenet, immittit in Calicem, dicens secreto, Hæc commixtio et consecratio Corporis, etc. Deinde pollices et indices super Calicem aliquantulum tergit et jungit, Calicem palla cooperit, et genuflexus Sacramentum adorat, surgit, et stans junctis manibus ante pectus, capite inclinato versus Sacramentum, dicit intelligibili voce, Agnus Dei qui tollis peccata mundi, et dextra percutiens sibi pectus, sinistra super corporale posita, dicit, miserere nobis, et deinde non jungit manus, sed iterum percutit sibi pectus, cum dicit secundo, miserere nobis, quod et tertio facit, cum dicit, dona nobis pacem."—(Rub. Miss. tit. X. 2.)

After the words omnibus Sanctis and before he says Da propitius pacem, he makes with the paten the sign of the cross on himself, holding his left hand below his breast; he kisses the paten, and then says: Da propitius pacem, because the Rubric prescribes that after the words omnibus Sanctis: signat se cum patena a fronte ad pectus et eam osculatur; and after these words the prayer Da propitius pacem . . . is said. Some one has expressed the opinion that the paten should be kissed after the word pacem, saying that this is thus prescribed by the Ceremoniale Episcoporum.[12635] But I find nothing there that is different from the words of the Missal just quoted; for there we read: Antequam dicat verba: Da propitius, etc., signat se cum ea a fronte ad pectus, et reliqua dicit et facit, quæ in Missali ponuntur. The Ceremonial, therefore, says nothing about the kiss, but refers in all things to the Rubric of the Missal, according to which the kiss is prescribed before the celebrant says Da propitius pacem. The paten, however, should be kissed by him at the upper edge, near his hand. Tonellius and Bauldry say that the cross should be begun at the words cum beatis Apostolis. But when the priest says ut ope misericordiæ, etc., he puts the paten under the Host, using the forefinger of the left hand to bring the Host to the middle of the paten, and he shall take care to place the front part of the paten on the foot of the chalice in order that the Host and the paten may be taken more conveniently.

He then uncovers the chalice, places the pall on the veil, and while putting his hands on the corporal he makes a genuflection. He presses with the forefinger of the left hand on the side of the Host, and takes it in the middle with the forefinger and the thumb of the right hand, raises it over the chalice, and divides it reverently and by degrees with the thumbs and forefingers of both hands while holding it over the chalice; namely, he first bends it two or three times backwards and forwards, straight down the middle, beginning at the upper part, taking care that no particles fly off behind the chalice, thus he will be able more easily to divide it in the middle. The one half that he holds in his right hand he lays down on the paten, and of the other half that he holds in the left hand he detaches with the forefinger and thumb of the right hand a small particle, and with this particle he makes, as will presently be mentioned, the crosses over the chalice. When he divides the Host he says: Per eumdem Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum Filium tuum; after the word tuum he places the part that he holds in his right hand on the paten, and when he says: Qui tecum vivit et regnat, he detaches with his right hand, as has already been said, a particle of the other half; and while saying in unitate, etc., he joins this half to the other half that is on the paten. While with his right hand he still holds the particle over the chalice, and with his left hand the knob of the chalice, he says in a loud voice: Per omnia sæcula sæculorum; and after the server has answered Amen, he makes with this particle three crosses over the chalice, from rim to rim, in a straight line, without making pauses, and without touching with the Host the rim of the chalice, and he says at the same time. Pax † Domini sit † semper vobis†cum. The server having answered Et cum Spiritu tuo, the priest lets the particle fall into the chalice, saying in a low voice: Hæc commixtio, etc. At the name Jesu Christi he makes a simple minimarum maxima inclination. Then he rubs his fingers over the chalice, covers the chalice with the pall, genuflects, rises, and inclining only the head [Capite inclinato versus Sacramentum, says the Rubric] he says in a loud voice: Agnus Dei, etc.

While saying Miserere nobis he places his left hand on the corporal, and keeps it there until he has said Agnus Dei three times, and striking his breast three times with the last three fingers of his right hand, he says Miserere nobis and dona nobis pacem.

3. THE PRIEST RECEIVES THE SACRED HOST

"Tunc, manibus junctis supra altare positis, oculisque ad Sacramentum intentis, inclinatus dicit secreto, Domine Jesu Christe, etc., qua oratione finita, . . . statim subjungit alias orationes, ut in Ordine Missæ.

"Quibus orationibus dictis, genuflectens Sacramentum adorat, et; se erigens, dicit secreto, Panem cælestem accipiam, etc., quo dicto, dextra manu accipit de patena reverenter ambas partes Hostiæ, et collocat inter pollicem et indicem sinistræ manus, quibus patenam inter eumdem indicem et medium digitos supponit, et, eadem manu sinistra tenens partes hujusmodi super patenam inter pectus et Calicem, parum inclinatus, dextra tribus vicibus percutit pectus suum, interim etiam tribus vicibus dicens voce aliquantulum elevata, Domine non sum dignus, et secreto prosequitur, ut intres, etc.

"Quibus tertio dictis, ex sinistra accipit ambas partes prædictas Hostiæ inter pollicem et indicem dextræ manus, et cum illa super patenam signat seipsum signo crucis, ita tamen, ut Hostia non egrediatur limites patenæ, dicens, Corpus Domini nostri Jesu Christi custodiat animam meam in vitam æternam, Amen, et se inclinans, cubitis super altare positis, reverenter easdem ambas partes sumit: quibus sumptis, deponit patenam super corporale, et engens se junctis indicibus et pollicibus, ambas quoque manus ante faciem jungit, et aliquantulum quiescit in meditatione Sanctissimi Sacramenti."—(Rub. Miss. tit. X. 3, 4.)

Then holding his hands on the altar, as has been said at the beginning of Chapter IV, [12636] and inclining moderately, with his eyes fixed on the Blessed Sacrament, he says in a Low voice the three prayers of the Missal.[12637]

Having recited these prayers, he genuflects, and in a low voice says: Panem cœlestem accipiam, etc.; then with the thumb and forefinger of the right hand he reverently takes from the paten both parts of the Host, and holds them with his left hand in such a manner that they form a round figure or nearly so, and places that part which is towards the Gospel side a little over the other part, then below the Host that is thus held he puts the paten between the forefingers and the other fingers which are so extended that they support it. He should not rest the arm on the altar: however, as the Rubric is not opposed to this, it may be done in case he suffers from weakness, but only outside of the corporal. He holds the paten about four inches above the corporal, and inclining a little, he says three times Domine, non sum dignus, in a somewhat loud tone of voice, while striking his breast each time as at the Agnus Dei, and without turning sideways, as some do. The rest, Ut intres, etc., he says in a low voice. He next takes with the thumb and the forefinger of the right hand the two parts ot the Host by placing the part that is towards the Gospel side over the other part, and makes over himself with the Host the sign of the cross by drawing a perpendicular line of about a palm in length above the paten, which he holds in his left hand, taking care in making the cross that the Host does not pass beyond the limits of the paten, saying in the mean time: Corpus Domini nostri, etc., and inclining his head at the name Jesu Christi, etc. Then leaning his arms on the altar, and moderately inclining, he reverently receives Holy Communion, holding the paten under the Host. He should pay attention while taking the Host not to put his tongue out of his mouth, and not to chew the Host; and in order that it may not adhere to the roof of the mouth he should put it under his tongue, and there bend it. If it, however, adheres to the roof of the mouth, he should try to remove it with his tongue; but if some particle should remain, he should swallow it when taking the precious blood and the ablution.

After having received the sacred species he replaces[12638] the paten on the corporal, and standing erect and holding his thumbs and forefingers united, he joins his hands, raises them as far as his chin, and remains a short time in meditation on the Blessed Sacrament.

4. THE PRIEST TAKES THE PRECIOUS BLOOD

"Deinde, depositis manibus, dicit secreto, Quid retribuam Domino pro omnibus quæ retribuit mihi? et interim discooperit Calicem, genuflectit, surgit, accipit patenam, inspicit corporale, colligit fragmenta cum patena, si quæ sint in eo, patenamque diligenter cum pollice et indice dextræ manus super Calicem extergit, et ipsos digitos, ne quid fragmentorum in eis remaneat.

"Si vero adsint Hostiæ consecratæ super corporale positæ, pro alio tempore conservandæ, facta prius genuflexione, reponit eas in vas ad hoc ordinatum; et diligenter advertit, ne aliquod fragmentum, quantumcumque minimum, remaneat super corporale; quod si fuerit, accurate reponit in Calicem.

"Post extersionem patenæ, junctis pollicibus et indicibus, Calicem dextra manu infra nodum cuppæ accipit, sinistra patenam, dicens, Calicem salutaris, etc., et signans se signo crucis cum Calice, dicit, Sanguis Domini nostri, etc., et manu sinistra supponens patenam Calici, stans reverenter sumit totum Sanguinem cum particula in Calice posita."—(Rub. Miss. tit. X. 4 et 5.)

Then having disjoined his hands, he places his left hand on the corporal or on the foot of the chalice, and uncovers the chalice with his right hand, saying Quid retribuam Domino, etc.[12639] After these words, having placed his hands on the corporal, he genuflects with a pause,[12640] and then, holding his left hand on the corporal, he diligently gathers with the paten the fragments. If the priest has to remove the chalice in order to gather the fragments, he should do so before he genuflects. Then holding the paten with his left hand over the chalice, with the forefinger, which is no longer united with the thumb, but is entirely free, he causes the fragments to fall into the chalice, and then rubs the front parts of the fingers together, not at the edge, but over the mouth of the chalice, so that, should there be any fragment left, it may fall into the chalice.

Here the Rubric remarks that if there are consecrated particles 011 the corporal to be preserved, or if there is another Host for Exposition of the Blessed Sacrament,[12641] he must first put them into the ciborium or the monstrance, after having made a genuflection, and then the corporal should be purified and the precious blood should be received. The precious blood having been received and the first ablution having been made, the ciborium or monstrance is put back into the tabernacle. This is to be done only when the ciborium is outside of the tabernacle; for if it is in the tabernacle, the particles are to be put into the ciborium after receiving the precious blood. As to the manner in which Holy Communion is to be given both during Mass or outside of it, mention will be made in a following chapter.

Then the celebrant again joins the thumbs and the forefingers, places his left hand, which holds the paten, on the corporal, takes with his right hand the chalice below the knob, saying: Calicem salutaris accipiam, etc., and forming with the chalice a cross over himself, he says: Sanguis Domini nostri, etc., and inclining his head at the name Jesu Christi, he receives the precious blood. As the Rubric says: Manu sinistra supponens patenam Calici, it must be observed that the paten should be held under the chalice only when the precious blood is taken, and then the paten is placed under his chin.

Some say that the precious blood may be received in three draughts; others say that it is more becoming to take it in one draught; but Gavantus justly recommends that this should be done in two draughts; and this practice is praised by Merati.[12642] If a particle of the Host happens to adhere to the chalice, it should not be drawn up to the edge of the chalice with the finger, but should be consumed with the wine that is afterwards poured into the chalice.[12643] Gavantus adduces the ordinance of St. Pius V., by which it is prescribed that the ablution should be received in the same manner in which the precious blood is received.

5. THE PRIEST TAKES THE ABLUTIONS, THEN COVERS THE CHALICE WITH THE VEIL AND THE BURSE

"Quibus sumptis, dicit secreto, Quod ore sumpsimus, etc., et super altare porrigit calicem ministro in cornu Epistolæ. quo vinum fundente, se purificat; deinde vino et aqua abluit pollices et indices super calicem, quos abstergit purificatorio; interim dicens, Corpus tuum Domine quod sumpsi, etc., ablutionem sumit, et extergit os et calicem purificatorio; quo facto, purificatorium extendit super calicem, et desuper patenam, ac super patenam parvam pallam, et plicato corporali, quod reponit in bursam, cooperit calicem velo, et bursam desuper ponit, et collocat in medio altaris, ut in principio Missæ."—(Rub. Miss. tit. X. 5.)

Having taken the precious blood, the priest gives holy Communion if there should be persons present that wish to communicate. (About the manner of giving Communion, see Chapter XII.) Then he says: Quod ore sumpsimus, etc.; and at the same time with his right hand he holds out the chalice towards the server on the Epistle side in Older to receive the wine for ablution, keeping meanwhile on the corporal his left hand holding the paten; and he has as much wine poured into the chalice as has been consecrated. Some, such as Cabrinus and Tonellius, wish that the prayer Quod ore, etc., should be recited before, while presenting the chalice to receive the ablution; but this does not seem to be conformable to the little Rubric that is found in the Canon, which says: Postea dicit: Quod ore, etc., interim porrigit Calicem ministro, qui infundit in eo parum vini. The word interim clearly indicates that this prayer, Quod ore should be said while the wine is being poured into the chalice.

Then the celebrant slightly moves in a circle the wine that has been poured into the chalice in order to collect the rest of the precious blood, and he takes the ablution on the same side of the chalice at which he took the precious blood, as has been prescribed by St. Pius V., and also in the same manner by holding the paten under his chin with his left hand. It must, besides, be remarked with Merati, that the abstemious cannot without the permission of the Pope use water in this first ablution, but they must use wine.

After having purified the chalice, the priest puts the paten on the corporal towards the Epistle side; then taking the cup of the chalice between the last three fingers of both hands, and holding the forefingers and the thumbs over the mouth of the chalice he makes an inclination to the cross,[12644] and goes to the Epistle side; there, holding the chalice raised over the altar, he washes his forefingers and thumbs, and also the other fingers that might have touched the Blessed Sacrament, first with wine, and then with water, in a larger quantity.

He afterwards places the chalice outside of the corporal towards the Epistle side, and wipes his fingers with the purificator, saying in the mean time: Corpus tuum Domine, quod sumpsi, etc. This prayer having been finished in the middle of the altar, he makes an inclination to the cross,[12645] puts with his left hand the purificator under his chin, takes the chalice with his right hand, and drinks the ablution in one draught; then he wipes his mouth and the chalice with the purificator. If there remains in the chalice or on the paten some particle of the Host, he should consume it.

Having afterwards placed the chalice outside of the corporal, towards the Gospel side, he spreads over it the purificator, on which he puts the paten with the pall and the veil. He then folds the corporal, takes the burse with the left hand; with the right hand he puts into it the corporal, so that the opening of the burse looks towards himself (the celebrant). Then he takes the chalice by the knob under the veil, and while placing his right hand on the burse, he places the chalice in the middle of the altar, arranging the veil in such a manner that it covers at least the whole front part of the chalice, according to a decree of the Sacred Congregation of Rites (March 5, 1698), mentioned by Merati.

It should be observed that on Christmas, after having taken the precious blood at the first and the second Mass, the chalice should not be purified nor wiped with the purificator, and that the ablution of the fingers should be made in a special vessel. The prayers Quod ore and Corpus tuum are, however, to be said, after which the chalice is covered with the paten, on which another host is placed; over the chalice is spread the veil, but the purificator is left on the Epistle side.

Chapter XI

THE PRAYERS AFTER COMMUNION, AND THE END OF MASS

1. THE PRIEST RECITES THE COMMUNIO, THE POST-COMMUNIO, AND THE ITE MISSA EST

"Celebrante purificato, dum calicem collocat in altari, liber Missalis defertur per ministrum ad cornu Epistolæ, et collocatur ut in Introitu. Ipse autem minister genuflectit juxta cornu Evangelii, ut in principio Missæ. Deinde celebrans, stans junctis manibus, legit Antiphonam quæ dicitur Communio; qua lecta, junctis itidem manibus ante pectus vadit ad medium altaris, et, eo osculato, vertit se ad populum a manu sinistra ad dextram, et dicit Dominus vobiscum, et per eamdem viam redit ad librum, dicit Orationes post Communionem eisdem modo, numero, et ordine, ut supra dictæ sunt Collectæ.

"Quibus finitis, claudit librum, et, jungens manus ante pectus, revertitur ad medium altaris, ubi, eo osculato, vertit se ad populum, et dicit ut supra Dominus vobiscum. Quo dicto, stans junctis manibus ante pectus versus populum, dicit, si dicendum est Ite Missa est, et per eamdem viam revertitur ad altare. Si vero non sit dicendum, dicto Dominus vobiscum, revertitur eodem modo per eamdem viam ad medium altaris; ubi stans versus ad illud, junctis ante pectus manibus dicit Benedicamus Domino.

"In Quadragesima autem, a Feria quarta Cinerum usque ad Feriam quartam Majoris Hebdomadæ, in feriali Officio, postquam celebrans dixit orationes post Communionem cum suis solitis conclusionibus, antequam dicat Dominus vobiscum stans eodem loco ante librum dicit, Oremus. Humiliate capita vestra Deo, caput inclinans, et extensis manibus subjungit eadem voce Orationem super populum ibidem positam: qua finita, osculato altare; et, vertens se ad populum dicit Dominus vobiscum et alia ut supra."—(Rub. Miss. tit. XI. 1, 2.)

THE celebrant, after having finished the ablutions and arranged the chalice on the altar, as has been explained in Chapter X., holding his hands before his breast, goes to the Epistle side, where in a loud voice he reads the antiphon, which is called Communio; he returns immediately after to the middle of the altar, kisses it, and turning towards the people says as usual, Dominus vobiscum. Then he returns to the book, and recites the prayer called Post communio and all the other prayers that are to be recited on that day; the first and the second prayer are preceded by the word Oremus, with an inclination to the cross.

It must be remarked that, according to Merati, during Lent, in the Ferial Masses the words Humiliate capita vestra Deo, which precede the prayer super populum, are pronounced without an inclination; an inclination is made only at the word Oremus, which is said in the usual manner.

Having finished the prayers, he closes the Missal (if he has not a special Gospel to say) in such a way that the opening of the book be turned towards the chalice. He returns to the middle of the altar, kisses it, and turning to the people, he repeats, with his hands extended, Dominus vobiscum; then while turned towards the people, his hands being joined before his breast, without inclining his head, lie says: Ite Missa est. During the octave of Easter he adds two alleluias. The Ite Missa est is said at all the Masses in which the Gloria in excelsis is said; but if the Gloria in excelsis was not said, the priest after the Dominus vobiscum turns round to the altar, and standing erect, says Benedicamus Domino, or Requiescat in pace, in Masses of the Dead.

2. THE PRIEST RECITES THE PRAYER PLACEAT TIBI, AND GIVES THE BLESSING

"Dicto Ite Missa est, vel Benedicamus Domino, ut supra, celebrans, ante medium altaris, stans, junctis manibus super eo, et capite inclinato, dicit secreto Placeat tibi sancta Trinitas, etc.

"Quo dicto, extensis manibus hinc inde super altare positis, ipsum in medio osculatur; tum erigens se, adhuc stans versus illud, elevat ad cœlum oculos et manus, quas extendit et jungit, caputque Cruci inclinans, dicit voce intelligibili Benedicat vos omnipotens Deus, et junctis manibus, ac demissis ad terram oculis, vertens se ad populum a sinistro latere ad dextrum, extensa manu dextra, junctisque digitis, et manu sinistra infra pectus posita, semel benedicit populo, dicens Pater et Filius † et Spiritus sanctus. R. Amen."—(Rub. Miss. tit. XII. 1.)

Then holding his hands joined on the altar and inclining his head (capite inclinato, says the Rubric), he says in a low voice: Placeat tibi, sancta Trinitas, etc.; he lays his hands extended on the altar, kisses it in the middle, and having raised himself up, lifts his eyes to the cross; elevating his hands at the same time, joining them, and inclining his head, he says in a loud voice: Benedicat vos omnipotens Deus; then holding his hands joined and his eyes cast down (demissis ad terram oculis, says the Rubric), he turns round to the people by the Epistle side, and with his left hand below his breast he blesses the people with his right hand extended and his lingers united, saying: Pater, et Filius † et Spiritus Sanctus. While saying Pater, he begins to make the cross with his hand extended and raised to the height of the forehead; when he says Filius, he lowers it as far as the breast; and when he says Spiritus Sanctus, he forms a transverse line that does not exceed the width of the shoulders.

3. THE PRIEST READS THE LAST GOSPEL

"Circulum perficiens, accedit ad cornu Evangelii, ubi dicto Dominus vobiscum. R. Et cum spiritu tuo, pollice dextro signans primum signo crucis altare seu librum in principio Evangelii, deinde frontem, os, et pectus, dicit Initium sancti Evangelii secundum Joannem, vel Sequentia sancti Evangelii ut dictum est in Rubricis generalibus, et R. Gloria tibi Domine, junctis manibus legit Evangelium In principio, vel aliud ut convenit, Cum dicit Et Verbum caro factum est genuflectit versus cornu Evangelii, et surgens prosequitur ut prius: quo finito, minister stans a parte Epistolæ respondet Deo gratias."—(Rub. Miss. tit. XII. 1.)

The blessing having been given, the celebrant completes the circle and goes to the Gospel side; there, with his hands joined and his face turned towards the altar, he says: Dominus vobiscum. Then he makes with his right thumb the sign of the cross, at first on the altar (or on the book at the beginning of the Gospel), then on himself on his forehead, mouth, and breast, and says the Gospel of St. John: Initium sancti Evangelii (or another Gospel that is prescribed). When he pronounces the words Verbum caro factum est, he genuflects; holding his hands separated on the altar, and rising immediately, he recites the rest of the Gospel.

The Gospel being over, he does not kiss the altar card nor the Missal,[12646] but returns to the middle of the altar.

4. THE PRIEST LEAVES THE ALTAR AND RETURNS TO THE SACRISTY

"Quibus omnibus absolutis, exstinguntur per ministrum candelæ: interim Sacerdos accipit sinistra calicem, dextram ponens super bursam, ne aliquid cadat, descendit ante infimum gradum altaris; et ibi in medio vertens se ad illud, caput inclinat, vel, si in eo est tabernaculum Sanctissimi Sacramenti genuflectit, et facta reverentia, accipit birretum a ministro, caput cooperit, ac præcedente eodem ministro, eo modo quo venerat, redit ad sacristiam, interim dicens antiphonam Trium puerorum, cum cantico Benedicite et aliis orationibus, ut suo loco ponuntur.

"Si vero sit dimissurus paramenta apud altare ubi celebravit, finito Evangelio prædicto, ibidem illis se exuit, et dicit antiphonam Trium Puerorum, cum cantico et aliis orationibus, ut suo loco ponuntur."

Having arrived at the middle of the altar, the priest makes an inclination to the cross,[12647] turns the front part of the veil upon the burse. He takes with his left hand the chalice at the knob, holding his right hand on the burse; he turns towards the Epistle side and descends to the lowest step of the altar, and there, if the Blessed Sacrament is present, he genuflects on one knee on the step,[12648] or if the Blessed Sacrament is not there, he inclines his head to the cross (caput inclinet, says the Rubric). Merati with others wishes that a profound inclination should be made. He then covers his head with the biretta and returns to the sacristy, saying in the meanwhile the antiphon: Trium puerorum, etc., with the canticle Benedicite omnia opera, etc. If he meets another priest, they should salute each other with the head uncovered.

Having come to the sacristy, he makes a profound inclination to the principal image; then he takes off the vestments, one after the other, in the inverse order to that in which he put them on; namely, he first takes off the chasuble, then the stole, maniple, cincture, alb, and finally the amice, kissing the cross of the stole, maniple, and amice. In removing the alb, he draws off the left sleeve first, then passes the alb over his head. If the vestments are to be put on the altar, they should be placed at the Gospel side. Then the priest should retire to give thanks to the Divine Guest, who has deigned to enter his soul with so much love.

Chapter XII

THE MANNER OF GIVING COMMUNION DURING MASS

"Si qui sunt communicandi in Missa, Sacerdos, post sumptionem Sanguinis, antequam se purificet, facta genuflexione, ponat Particulas consecratas in pyxide, vel, si pauci sint communicandi, super patenam, nisi a principio positæ fuerint in pyxide, seu alio calice. Interim minister ante eos extendit linteum, seu velum album, et pro eis facit confessionem, dicens Confiteor Deo, etc. Tum Sacerdos iterum genuflectit, et manibus junctis, vertens se ad populum in cornu Evangelii, dicit, Misereatur vestri, et Indulgentiam, absolutionem et remissionem peccatorum vestrorum, etc., et manu dextra facit signum crucis super eos. Postea genuflectens, accipit manu sinistra pyxidem seu patenam cum Sacramento, dextra vero sumit unam Particulam, quam inter pollicem et indicem tenet aliquantulum elevatum super pyxidem seu patenam, et conversus ad communicandos in medio altaris dicit Ecce Agnus Dei, ecce qui tollit peccata mundi—Deinde dicit: Domine non sum dignus, ut intres sub tectum meum, sed tantum dic verbo, et sanabitur anima mea. Quibus verbis tertio repetitis, accedit ad eorum dextram, hoc est, ad latus Epistolæ, et unicuique porrigit Sacramentum, faciens cum eo signum crucis super pyxidem vel patenam, et simul dicens Corpus Domini nostri Jesu Christi custodiat animam tuam in vitam æternam, Amen. Omnibus communicatis revertitur ad altare, nihil dicens: et non dat eis benedictionem, quia illam daturus est in fine Missæ.

"Si particulæ positæ erant super corporale, extergit illud cum patena, et si quæ in eo fuerint fragmenta, in calicem immittit. Deinde dicit secreto, Quod ore sumpsimus Domine, etc., et se purificat, dicens Corpus tuum Domine quod sumpsi, et alia facit ut supra.

"Si in altari remaneant particulæ in calice, seu in alio vase usque ad finem Missæ, serventur ea, quæ in Feria quinta Cœnæ Domini præscribuntur circa finem Missæ."-(Rub. Miss. tit. X. 6, 7.)

1. THE MANNER OF GIVING COMMUNION WITH THE HOSTS CONSECRATED AT MASS

WHEN particles are placed on the altar for persons that desire to communicate, the priest, having taken the precious blood, and before taking the ablution, covers the chalice with the pall, puts the particles on the paten, makes a genuflection, and turning a little towards the people, with his shoulders towards the Gospel side, says the prayer Misereatur vestri, etc., even though there be only one person to receive Communion. Then he places his left hand below his breast, but with the right hand makes the sign of the cross over the communicants, saying: Indulgentiam, absolutionem, etc. Then he turns towards the altar,[12649] takes the paten,[12650] and with the forefinger and thumb of his right hand one of the particles, and turning entirely towards the people, although the Blessed Sacrament be exposed,[12651] he raises the Host a little, without, however, touching the paten with the other fingers, and he says: Ecce Agnus Dei, etc., and three times Domine non sum dignus. While distributing Communion he makes with the particle over the paten or ciborium the sign of the cross towards every one that communicates (the communicant kneeling on the step nearest to the altar rails), and says: Corpus Domini nostri Jesu Christi etc. Then, having returned to the altar, he purifies the corporal, and puts the fragments into the chalice, as has been said above.

2. MANNER OF GIVING COMMUNION WITH THE HOSTS KEPT IN THE TABERNACLE

If the particles have already been consecrated and are kept in the tabernacle, the celebrant, having taken the precious blood, places the chalice towards the Gospel side, and holding his thumbs and forefingers joined, he opens the tabernacle, genuflects, takes out the ciborium, and having placed it in the middle of the altar uncovers it, again genuflects, and with his hands joined before his breast waits till the server finishes the Confiteor. Then he turns around in order to say the prayers Misereatur and Indulgentiam, and gives Communion in the manner above mentioned.

Having returned to the altar, he puts down the ciborium, covers it, makes a genuflection,[12652] again takes it, and puts it back into the tabernacle: he does not, however, kiss it, as some do; and before closing the tabernacle he again genuflects, and then closes it. Merati, adding another genuflection, requires that in all we should make three genuflections: for he wishes that before covering the ciborium the first genuflection should be made; the second, before putting back the ciborium after opening the tabernacle; lastly, the third, before the tabernacle is closed. He cites for his opinion the Ceremonial of the private Mass; but the Ceremonial says nothing of the first genuflection required by Merati; for it merely says: Si remanserint particulæ, clausa pyxide et facta genuflexione reponit eam in custodiam, et antequam claudat illam, denuo genuflectat. It therefore prescribes the second and the third genuflection, but not the first before the priest covers the ciborium. Communion having been distributed, the priest does not give the blessing, because it is given at the end of Mass. He then consumes the drops of precious blood that still remain in the chalice; and afterwards purifies the chalice.

3. REMARKS IN REGARD TO THE HOSTS THAT ARE NOT CONSUMED

Here a few remarks should be made:

As to Hosts consecrated and not distributed: If there is in the tabernacle a ciborium, the priest puts them into the ciborium; but if there is no ciborium, the priest consumes them before purifying the chalice; and if there are still found in the chalice some drops of the precious blood, it is proper for him to consume them before purifying the chalice. In case the consecrated Hosts remain on the altar till the end of Mass, the priest should observe what is prescribed when the Blessed Sacrament is exposed on the altar.

4. COMMUNION IS GIVEN DURING AND EVEN AFTER MASS

As much as possible, Communion is to be given to the people during the Mass after the Communion of the priest, this is the intention of the Church, for it is said in the Roman Ritual: Communio autem populi intra Missam statim post communionem Sacerdotis fieri debet, nisi quandoque ex rationabili causa post Missam sit facienda. And the following reason is given: Cum orationes, quæ post communionem dicuntur, etiam ad alios communicandos spectent. . . . The same holds good for giving Communion before Mass. A reasonable cause would be either illness or necessary occupation in the case of those that wish to communicate. Gavantus adds that Communion may be given at the end of Mass if many are to communicate, in order that those not communicating may not grow weary. However, Benedict XIV., in his work on the Sacrifice of the Mass (lib. 3, c. 18 , n. 9), says that those manifestly err who without a reason give Communion after Mass. The same is said by Le Brun and Magri (vocab. eccl. verb. Communio), and the same was prescribed by St. Charles Borromeo for his diocese.

5. MANNER OF PURIFYING THE CIBORIUM

If the ciborium is to be purified[12653] (this should be done every fifteen days), the celebrant takes it from the tabernacle after having consumed the precious blood, and places on the paten all the Hosts that it contains [or he takes them out of the ciborium]; then he pours wine into the chalice for the first ablution, and with the forefinger lets the fragments that remain fall into the ciborium; and if necessary he also purifies the ciborium with a little wine, which he afterwards pours into the chalice. Having then wiped the ciborium with the purificator he puts into it the new particles, and consumes the old particles.

6. COMMUNION IN REQUIEM MASSES

According to a decree of the Sacred Congregation of Rites, of 1741, Communion may be given, but it is prohibited to give it with particles consecrated before Mass. This ordinance does not lose its binding force because Merati and Benedict XIV. (de Sacrif. Miss. lib. 3, c. 18, n. 10) assert that such a decree has never been published, for they speak of another decree of the year 1701. The decree of which mention is here made is of the year 1741, and has also been published. This decree, however, is to be understood as referring to the Mass that is said with black vestments, but not when it is said with violet vestments; for in the latter case Communion may be given according to a decree of June 21, 1670, quoted by Merati (in indice decretorum, n. 444).[12654]

Chapter XIII

COMMUNION GIVEN OUTSIDE OF MASS, EITHER BEFORE OR AFTER IT

MANNER OF GIVING COMMUNION

WHEN Communion is to be given outside of Mass, the priest, wearing a surplice and a white stole,[12655] goes to the altar. When he arrives there he takes off the biretta, genuflects on the first step,[12656] ascends the altar, takes the burse, takes out of it the corporal, and puts the burse in its place;[12657] then, having unfolded the corporal, he opens the tabernacle, genuflects, takes out the ciborium, opens it, and makes again a genuflection. Then, the Confiteor having been said by the server, the priest again genuflects,[12658] and with his hands joined he turns to the people and says: Misereatur, etc., as above, anti distributes Communion. This is to be observed when the celebrant gives Communion before or after Mass.

After Communion has been given, the priest, having returned to the altar, says in a low voice the antiphon (this is, however, only a counsel): O sacrum convivium, in quo Christus sumitur, recolitur memoria passionis ejus, mens impletur gratia, et futuræ gloriæ nobis pignus datur. In Paschal time and within the octave of Corpus Christi an alleluja is added.[12659] Then are recited the versicles: V. Panem de cælo præstitisti eis. R. Omne delectamentum in se habentem, with the prayer: Deus qui nobis sub Sacramento,[12660] etc., without saying previously Dominus vobiscum, according to a decree of S. R. C., June 16, 1660.[12661]

If any fragment should adhere to his fingers the priest shall let it fall into the ciborium. Then having covered the ciborium, he purifies his fingers in a vessel of water, and wipes them with the purificator; he genuflects, replaces the ciborium in the tabernacle, and closes it after having made another genuflection.[12662]

Finally, he raises his eyes to the cross, and extending his hands and again joining them, and making at the same time a simple minimarum maxima inclination, he says in a loud voice: Benedictio Dei omnipotentis; then with his hands joined he turns to those that have communicated, and holding his left hand below his breast, he gives the blessing with his right hand, saying: Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus Sancti, descendat super vos et maneat semper. And the server answers: Amen.

This blessing is given both before and after Mass; however, it is to be given with the hand, not with the ciborium, as some do, especially when they give Communion to nuns; such is the decision given by Benedict XIV., in a certain bull. If, therefore, Communion has been given to nuns, the ciborium having been covered, it is put into its place, and the blessing is given to the nuns with the hand.[12663]

Chapter XIV

WHAT IS OMITTED IN THE MASSES OF THE DEAD

"In Missa pro Defunctis, ante confessionem, non dicitur Psalmus Judica me Deus, sed, pronuntiata antiphona Introibo ad Altare Dei, et responso a ministro, Ad Deum qui lætificat, etc. dicitur V. Adjutorium nostrum, et Confessio, cum reliquis ut supra. Cum celebrans ad altare incipit Introitum, non signat se, sed manu dextra extensa, facit signum crucis super librum, quasi aliquem benedicens. Non dicitur Gloria Patri, sed post Psalmum repetitur Requiem æternam; nec dicitur Gloria in excelsis, nec Alleluja, nec Jube Domine benedicere, nec Dominus sit in corde meo; nec osculatur librum in fine. Non dicitur Credo, non benedicitur aqua in Calicem fundenda; dicitur tamen Oratio, Deus, qui humanæ substantiæ, etc. Cum lavat manus, in fine psalmi Lavabo inter innocentes, non dicitur Gloria Patri. Ad Agnus Dei, non dicitur miserere nobis, cujus loco dicitur dona eis requiem; nec tertio dona nobis pacem, cujus loco dicitur dona eis requiem sempiternam; nec percutitur pectus. Non dicitur prima Oratio ante Communionem, scilicet: Domine Jesu Christe, qui dixisti Apostolis tuis, etc., nec datur pax. In fine non dicitur Ite Missa est, nec Benedicamus Domino, sed Requiescant in pace. Et non datur benedictio; sed dicto Placeat, et osculato altari, dicitur, ut supra: In principio erat Verbum; et alia omnia ut in aliis Missis."—(Rub. Miss. tit. XIII. 1.)

AT THE FOOT OF THE ALTAR

IN the beginning of Masses for the Dead the psalm Judica me Deus is omitted. Ilence after the antiphon Introibo ad altare Dei, and after the server has answered Ad Deum qui lætificat, etc., the priest says: Adjutorium nostrum, and then he says the Confiteor, and what follows.

FROM THE INTROIT TO THE LAVABO

When beginning the Introit, he does not make the sign of the cross on himself, but having placed his left hand on the book,[12664] with his right hand extended he makes a sign of the cross in the air towards the book.

He does not say the Gloria, nor Jube Domine benedicere, nor Dominus sit in corde meo, nor is the book kissed at the end of the Gospel.[12665]

The Credo is not said, nor is the water that is poured into the chalice blessed, but the prayer Deus qui Humanæ substantiæ, etc., is said; nor is Gloria Patri said after the psalm Lavabo.

FROM THE AGNUS DEI TILL THE END OF MASS

At the Agnus Dei[12666] the priest says, not miserere nobis, nor dona nobis pacem, but twice dona eis requiem, and once dona eis requiem sempiternam; and the breast is not struck.

He omits the first of the three prayers that precede the Communion.

At the end of Mass, instead of the Ite Missa est or Benedicamus Domino, Requiescant in pace must be said.[12667] Then there is no blessing given, but after having said Placeat and kissed the altar, the priest goes to the Gospel side and says: Dominus vobiscum, and the Gospel of St. John In principio, and the rest as in other Masses.

Chapter XV

MASS CELEBRATED WHEN THE BLESSED SACRAMENT IS EXPOSED

ON entering the chapel where the Blessed Sacrament is exposed the celebrant gives his biretta to the server, and when he arrives at the middle of the altar he genuflects on both knees in plano, making also a profound inclination of the head.

Having ascended the altar and placed the chalice on the Gospel side, he genuflects on one knee, but does not incline the head. He then takes the corporal out of the burse and unfolds it, and having placed the chalice in the middle, he again genuflects and goes to the Epistle side to find the Mass.

Then he returns to the middle of the altar, and having made a genuflection (which is always to be made when he goes to the middle or when he leaves it) withdrawing a little towards the Gospel side with his face towards the Epistle side, he descends to the foot of the altar in plano, there he genuflects on one knee on the first step of the altar; then he rises and begins Mass.

After having again ascended the altar he genuflects, and then says the prayer Oramus te Domine, etc.; after having finished it, he kisses the altar, again genuflects and goes to read the Introit. He then returns to the middle of the altar, where, having made a genuflection, he says the Kyrie and the Gloria. Then having kissed the altar he genuflects, and turns towards the people, withdrawing a little towards the Gospel side, in order not to turn his back to the Blessed Sacrament, and says Dominus vobiscum. Thus he should always act as often as he has to turn towards the people, that is, he genuflects before and after. And then he continues to say Mass in the usual manner.

When he goes to wash his hands, lie descends to the foot of the altar in piano by the steps at the Epistle side, and turning to his left, lest his back be towards the Blessed Sacrament, while facing the people he washes and dries his hands, and returns by the same way to the altar.

Before saying the Orate Fratres he kisses the altar, genuflects, and turning a little towards the people, with his shoulders towards the Gospel side, he says Orate Fratres.

Then without completing the circle, so that he may not turn his back to the Blessed Sacrament, he turns towards the altar, again genuflects, and continues the rest till the Communion. At the Sanctus and at the Elevation the bell is not rung.

After the Communion, and after the first ablution has been taken, he places the chalice outside of the corporal towards the Epistle side, and having made a genuflection he goes to the Epistle corner to purify his fingers.

Having recited the Placeat, he says Benedicat vos omnipotens Deus; and having made a genuflection he turns a little towards the people, with his shoulders towards the Gospel side, and then gives the blessing; then he turns towards the altar on his right side, but does not complete the circle lest he should turn his back to the Blessed Sacrament; and without making another genuflection, he goes to the Gospel side to read the Gospel. It must be remarked that if the altar card is wanting, he signs with the sign of the cross, not the altar, but himself.

Having finished the Gospel, he returns to the middle of the altar, genuflects, takes the chalice, descends to the foot of the altar in plano, where, before leaving the altar, he genuflects on both knees, and inclines the head profoundly, as he did at the beginning of Mass; then he covers his head with the biretta and returns to the sacristy.

Chapter XVI

MASS CELEBRATED BEFORE A BISHOP

THE ceremonies that are here indicated should be observed before a bishop in his own diocese, and before an archbishop in his own province, and also before a consecrated abbot in his monastery, and before a bishop in private oratories, although outside of his diocese. Gavantus adds that the same thing should be observed if a prelate is in the church of exempt Regulars, provided he has a kind of jurisdiction over them.

After the celebrant, with his head covered, has arrived at the middle of the altar, before the lowest step, he uncovers his head, makes an inclination towards the cross or a genuflection if the Blessed Sacrament is kept there. Then he salutes the prelate with a profound inclination and goes to the Epistle side, standing in plano before the lowest step; after having received the sign, he again inclines towards the prelate, and turning a little towards the altar (the server kneeling on the Epistle side) he begins Mass. This holds good when the bishop hears Mass in front of the altar, but not when he is present at the side; in this case the priest may begin Mass in the middle, because then he does not turn his back to him and can conveniently make the usual inclinations that must be made to him.

At the Confiteor he does not say vobis fratres and vosfratres, but says only tibi pater and te pater. Having, said Oremus before he ascends the altar, he makes again, for the third time, a profound bow to the prelate, and when he reaches the middle of the altar before the lowest step, he begins Aufer a nobis, and ascends the altar.

The Gospel having been read, the priest does not kiss the Missal, nor does he say Per Evangelica dicta, because the server without making an inclination to the prelate must carry the Missal to him to be kissed; the prelate, however, having kissed the book, says Per Evangelica dicta. The server now closes the book, genuflects before the prelate, and carries back the Missal to the celebrant, who abstains from kissing it. If several prelates are present, the Missal is carried to the one superior in dignity, but if they are of equal dignity, it is carried to none of them. It is the practice of some that when before the offering water is poured into the wine, the server says: Benedic Illustrissime et Reverendissime Pater; and the bishop blesses the water; but as this is prescribed nowhere in the Rubric it should be omitted.

At the end of Mass the celebrant, having said Benedicat vos omnipotens Deus, makes a profound inclination to the prelate, and blesses those that are present, taking care to make the sign of the cross towards that place where the prelate is not. If the prelate is outside the place of his jurisdiction, the celebrant gives the blessing in the usual manner, when, namely, he celebrates in a public church; but in private oratories, as has been said above, the same ceremonies are observed towards him as if he were in his own diocese. After the last Gospel the celebrant, standing in the place where he is, turns towards the prelate and makes towards him a profound inclination, nor does he depart before the prelate has departed.

If Mass is celebrated before a prelate in a public church that does not belong to his jurisdiction, it is becoming that the priest, on going to the altar or leaving it, while passing before the prelate, should with head covered, if he carries the chalice, make towards him a moderate inclination; but if he does not carry the chalice, he uncovers his head and makes to him a profound inclination. And after the Mass is finished he makes to him from the altar a profound inclination. All that has been said in this chapter on this point is taken from Gavantus and Merati (on Rubric XI.).

It must, moreover, be observed that the priest celebrating before his own prelate on those days on which it is allowed to say a prayer ad libitum, cannot say the prayer pro se ipso.

Chapter XVII

THE FAULTS THAT ARE USUALLY COMMITTED IN CELEBRATING MASS

I

THE first fault is not to know well by heart the prayers which, in accordance with the precept of the Rubric, should be known, as the prayers that one should say in washing the hands and in putting on the sacred vestments. It is, moreover, a fault if one does not pronounce well the other prayers that are to be said by heart during the Mass; as Aufer a nobis, etc., Oramus te Domine, etc.

II

It is a very great fault to go to say Mass with little or no preparation; it would be worse to talk while putting on the vestments. St. John Chrysostom exclaims: Ad divina Christi mysteria negligenter accedens supplicium intolerabile meretur.[12668] Moreover, St. Bonaventure says: Cave, ne nimis tepidus et inordinatus atque inconsideratus accedes, quia indigne sumis, si non accedis reverenter.

III

It is a fault, worthy of reprehension, or rather it is a horrible sacrilege, to celebrate Mass too fast, for then it happens that the words are mutilated, the ceremonies are transposed so that they are performed either before or after the time prescribed; this would show little devotion, and scandalize those that are present. Of those that act in this way one may say: Non timent Dominum, neque custodiunt cæremonias ejus.[12669]

IV

It is also a great fault to omit the thanksgiving that should be made after Mass; and in this not a few imitate Judas, who, cum accepisset buccellam, exivit continuo.[12670]

V

It is a great sin to celebrate with torn vestments, with a dirty purificator and corporal. This is the general opinion of theologians.

VI

It is a fault to place on the chalice the handkerchief or any other thing (see Chap. II.); it is a great fault to place on the altar what does not belong to the Mass. The handkerchief may be fastened to the cincture at the right side under the chasuble, in such a way that it is hidden from view.

VII

It is a fault: 1. To sign one's self with the amice; 2. While leaving the sacristy to recite the psalm Miserere, although any prayer may be recited mentally; some, however, deny that it is a fault.[12671] 3. To make a reverence to the image in the sacristy while holding the biretta with the right hand and the chalice with the left; 4. To make an inclination, simple, moderate, or profound, after having made a genuflection on one knee; 5. To make 110 difference between the profound, moderate, and simple inclination.

The profound inclination should be made by the priest: (1) before leaving the sacristy; (2) while passing before the high altar if the Blessed Sacrament is not there; (3) when he arrives at the altar; (4) before he begins Mass if the Blessed Sacrament is not there; (5) when he says Munda cor meum, Te igitur, Supplices te rogamus.

The moderate inclination should be made in descending from the altar either to say Mass, or after Mass.[12672] Moreover: 1. At Deus qui conversus, etc.; 2. At Oramus te Domine; 3. At In spiritu humilitatis; 4. At the Sanctus; 5. At the Consecration; 6. At the Agnus Dei; 7. At the three prayers before Communion; 8. At the Domine non sum dignus; 9. At the Placeat tibi sancta Trinitas.

As for the simple inclination we must distinguish three kinds, as has been explained in Chapter II., page 92.

It should be made: 1. When Gloria Patri is said; 2. Every time Oremus is said; 3. At the name Jesus and Maria or of the saints whose Mass is celebrated or of whom a special commemoration is made; 4. When the name of the reigning Pope is mentioned; 5. In the hymn Gloria, at the words Deo, Adoramus te, Gratias agimus tibi, Jesu Christe, Suscipe deprecationem nostram; 6. When the Credo is said at the words In unum Deum, Jesum Christum, and simul adoratur; 7. In the Preface at Deo nostro; 8. In the Canon at Tibi gratias agens before each Consecration; 9. At Per eumdem Christum Dominum nostrum, before Nobis quoque peccatoribus; 10. At Benedicat vos omnipotens Deus. In accordance with a laudable custom an inclination is always made to the cross on arriving at the middle of the altar, or on leaving it.[12673]

VIII

It is a great fault not to make well the sign of the cross, by making it in the air, without touching the head, breast, and shoulders; and, moreover, it is also a fault to form the cross on the breast without carrying the hand to the left and the right shoulder, as some, even pious, priests do through negligence.

IX

It is a fault to genuflect at the prayer Aufer when the Blessed Sacrament is exposed; and so, too, it is a fault against the Rubric not to touch the floor with the knee while making genuflections.

X

It is a fault to go to the middle of the altar before repeating the Introit, or to say the Kyrie or the Munda cor meum while going there, or to recite the conclusion of the prayer while proceeding to the middle, because the Missal should be shut only after the conclusion has been finished. It is a fault if, when going to the altar or leaving it, or turning towards the people, saying Dominus vobiscum or Orate Fratres, the celebrant does not cast down his eyes, as is prescribed by the Rubric, which says: demissis oculis. It is a fault if, when putting his hands on the altar in order to kiss it or to make a genuflection, the celebrant places upon it only the half of his hands and not the entire palms, or when, genuflecting, he raises them towards heaven, since he should hold them flat on the altar. So, also, it is a fault, when the altar is to be kissed not to recede from it about the space of a foot so as not to be obliged to make contortions or to kiss it sideways.

XI

When there are several prayers, it is a fault to turn the leaves before having finished the conclusion of the first prayer.

XII

It is a fault not to raise the eyes at Munda cor meum, or not to incline profoundly, and not to hold the hands joined between the breast and the altar, or to begin it before one has arrived at the middle and raised the eyes towards the cross.

XIII

It is a very great fault not to make at the beginning of the Gospel the sign of the cross as one should make it, or to make it as some usually do, who, without forming a cross, draw only a serpentine line from the forehead to the breast.

XIV

It is a fault: 1. To recite the Offertory without joining the hands; 2. Not to read the Offertory at the Masses for the Dead, but to say it by heart while uncovering the chalice; 3. Not to fold the veil, but to let it fall behind the chalice on the corporal, and to leave it there; 4. While putting the chalice on the Epistle side, to take at the same time with the left hand the paten with the pall upon it; 5. Not to raise the eyes at the prayers Suscipe Sancte Pater, Offerimus tibi, Veni Sanctificator, and Suscipe Sancta Trinitas; 6. To wipe the paten with the chasuble; 7. To begin the prayer Deus qui humanæ substantiæ while taking the wine cruet, instead of waiting till the server presents the water cruet, on which the sign of the cross is to be made while pronouncing those words.

XV

It is a fault: 1. To begin the prayer In spiritu humilitatis before placing the hands joined on the edge of the altar; 2. To incline the head while making the genuflection; as at Incarnatus est, etc., or after the Consecration, etc., and generally when a profound or moderate inclination is to be made; 3. To confound the ceremonies at Sursum corda and at Gratias agamus Domino Deo nostro; but few perform them well. They are to be performed in the following manner: At Sursum corda the hands are raised as high as the breast, and are held apart in such a manner that they do not exceed the width of the breast, and one palm of the hand looks towards the other. At Gratias they are raised a little higher,[12674] and are then joined, but the eyes are raised and the head is inclined when the words Deo nostro are said.

XVI

It is a fault: 1. To incline the head at the words Per Christum Dominum nostrum, except after the Memento of the Dead; 2. To hold the hands joined on the altar at the Sanctus, because they should be held between the breast and the altar till the Benedictus qui venit, etc., and the body should be moderately inclined.

XVII

It is a fault to say the Te igitur while the hands are extended; for the Rubric prescribes that at first the hands should be separated and raised a little; and after the eyes are raised towards the crucifix, and the hands are joined and placed on the altar, the celebrant, profoundly inclined, begins the Canon, saying Te igitur.

XVIII

It is against the Rubric: 1. Not to join the hands before the crosses are made over the Oblata; namely, before the words Hæc dona, etc., and at the words Fiat dilectissimi Filii tui, etc., before he takes the Host to consecrate it; 2. Not to divide the crosses where the words have the sign †, for example, Bene†dictam, etc.; 3. To hold the Host only with the left hand till the cross is made over it; 4. To hold the Host inclined towards the corporal, and not erect, when the cross is made over it.

XIX

It is unbecoming to keep the feet in different directions or at a great distance from each other, or to place the tip of the right foot on the platform of the altar during the consecration or during any other action.

XX

It is unbecoming: 1. At the Consecration of the Host to place the arms entirely upon the altar; only the elbows should rest on it; 2. At the adoration to place on the altar not only the extremities of the hands, but also the elbows; 3. To incline the head at the adoration when the Host and the chalice should be looked at; 4. To raise the Host and the chalice above the head; 5. In the genuflections not to hold the hands entirely on the corporal; namely, as far as the wrists, or to raise the fingers towards heaven.

XXI

It is a fault: 1. In the Consecration of the chalice to hold the knob of the chalice with both hands, when the foot of it should be held with the left hand; 2. Not to say immediately after the Consecration, but at the Elevation, the words Hæc quotiescumque, etc.; 3. To kiss the foot of the chalice or to touch it with the forehead; 4. Not to raise in a straight line the Host as well as the chalice, so high that it can be seen by the people; 5. To say some vocal prayer at the elevation of the Host or chalice.

XXII

It is a fault to hold the hands joined on the corporal when they should be so placed that the small fingers touch the edge of the altar; for the Rubric makes only the distinction that before the Consecration the thumbs should be held in the form of a cross, but after Consecration they should not be separated from the forefingers.

XXIII

It is a fault: 1. To say either the one or the other Memento in a loud voice; as, Et omnium circumstantium, after the first, and Ipsis Domine after the second Memento; 2. It is a fault in the Memento for the Dead to make a pause before the words Qui nos præcesserunt, etc., have been said.

XXIV

It is a fault to keep one's head inclined, with the hands joined on the altar, when one says: Præceptis salutaribus moniti, as far as the Pater noster; for the hands should be held joined before the breast.

XXV

It is a fault to wipe the paten with the left hand or to wipe it on the chasuble after having kissed it.

XXVI

It is a fault: 1. To say Agnus Dei, etc., with the hands joined on the altar; 2. To stand sideways at Domine non sum dignus, which is contrary to what has been said in Chapter IV., and to strike the breast violently; 3. When signing one's self with the cross, saying: Corpus Domini nostri Jesu Christi, to make the transverse line exceed the width of the paten.

XXVII

It is a fault: 1. To say Quid retribuam Domino, etc., while collecting the fragments; for the Rubric says: Aliquantulum quiescit in meditatione Ss. Sacramenti; deinde depositis manibus dicit secreto: Quid retribuam Domino, et interim discooperit Calicem, etc.; 2. To hold the paten under the chin before taking the precious blood, or while taking it or taking the first ablution, to hold it near the breast; 3. To cover the paten with the pall or to put the paten upside down on the corporal; 4. To purify with the fingers the mouth, or the fingers on the edge of the chalice; 5. To rest the chalice on the altar in purifying the chalice and the fingers; 6. Not to purify the chalice with wine, unless one has a papal dispensation; or to take the ablution not from the part of the chalice where the precious blood was taken, as has been ordained by St. Pius V. (see Gavantus); 7. In purifying the fingers not to use a little wine and much water, so that the purificator may not be soiled.

XXVIII

It is a fault: 1. To place the chalice, after the ablutions, in the middle of the altar with the veil turned over the burse, so that the chalice may be seen uncovered; it is a greater fault to put the folded corporal on the chalice, and not into the burse. 2. To say the antiphon called Communio while arranging the chalice, or not to say it at the Epistle corner, or to finish it while on the way.

XXIX

It is a fault while saying Et Verbum caro factum est, to genuflect towards the cross and not towards the Gospel and to raise the front of the chasuble.

XXX

It is a fault if the celebrant takes the biretta before he descends from the altar, or before he makes a genuflection or a profound inclination, or to place it upon the burse, upon which nothing should be placed either in going to the altar or in leaving it. See Merati, p. 2, tit. 2, n. 1, where he cites a decree of September 1, 1703, which forbids the carrying of the Manutergium in this way; and the theologians say the same about any other thing.

APPENDIX.[12675]

I. NOTICE OF THE MISSAL

"Sacerdos, celebraturus, omnem adhibeat diligentiam, ne desit aliquid ex requisitis ad sacramentum Eucharistiæ conficiendum. Potest autem defectus contingere ex parte Materiæ consecrandæ, ex parte Formæ adhibendæ, et ex parte Ministri conficientis. Quidquid enim horum deficit, scilicet Materia debita, Forma cum intentione, et Ordo sacerdotalis in conficiente, non conficitur Sacramentum; et his existentibus, quibuscumque aliis deficientibus, veritas adest Sacramenti. Alii vero sunt defectus, qui in Missæ celebratione occurrentes, etsi veritatem Sacramenti non impediant, possunt tamen aut cum peccato aut cum scandalo contingere."—(De Defect. gen. tit. I.)

II. THE ALTAR AND ITS ORNAMENTS.[12676]

1. THE ALTAR

"Altare, in quo sacrosanctum Missæ Sacrificium celebrandum est, debet esse lapideum, et ab Episcope, sive Abbate facultatem a Sede Apostolica habente, consecratum; vel saltem Ara lapidea, similiter ab Episcopo vel Abbate, ut supra, consecrata, in eo inserta, quæ tam ampla sit, ut hostiam et majorem partem Calicis capiat."—(Rubric. Miss. gen. tit. XX.)

THE altar, of which mention is here made, consists of a stone that must under pain of a grave sacrilege be consecrated by a bishop, by an abbot, or a privileged priest, who has received the power of consecrating it. The altar is either fixed or portable. The portable altar, Ara lapidea, is a consecrated stone at least so large that it may be able to contain the sacred Host and the greater part of the foot of the chalice, as well as the other Hosts that may have to be consecrated either on the corporal or in the ciborium, which is to be left on it till the Communion.[12677] The altar stones, or portable altars are not validly consecrated unless the Sepulchre, the cavity in which the relics are placed, is covered with a stone (S. R. C., September 9, 1880).[12678]

2. THE ALTAR-CLOTHS AND THE ANTIPENDIUM

It would be at least a venial sin to celebrate Mass without the three altar-cloths required by the Rubric; it would be a mortal sin to celebrate Mass without any altar-cloth. However, there would be no fault if such a thing were done in a case of grave necessity. These altar-cloths should be blessed, and this under pain of venial sin, unless there be a case of necessity or a reasonable cause that permits the use of altar-cloths that are not blessed. They should be made of linen, or at least of hemp,[12679] and should be bleached and clean.[12680]

3. THE CROSS AND THE CANDLES

"Super altare collocetur Crux in medio, et candelabra saltem duo cum candelis accensis hinc et inde in utroque ejus latere; . . . et a parte Epistolæ paretur cereus ad elevationem Sacramenti accendendus."—(Rubric, gen. Miss. tit. xx.)

The cross is required at the altar during the celebration of Mass under pain of at least venial sin, except in a case of necessity. It should bear the image of Jesus crucified, although this is less rigorously exacted; and it should be placed in the middle and raised above the candles. The following is what Benedict XIV. says in regard to this matter: Nullo modo fiat Sacrificium nisi Crucifixus inter candelabra ita prominent, ut Sacerdos ac populus eumdem Crucifixum facile et commode intueri possit; et imago non sit ita tenuis et exigua, ut ipsius Sacerdotis et populi oculos pene effugiat. The Ceremonial of the Bishops prescribes the same thing.

A special cross is not necessary where there is on the altar a large statue representing our Lord crucified. It is believed that this holds good when our Lord is represented in a painting, provided his figure occupies the principal place in the picture.[12681]

It is not required that the cross on the altar should be blessed.[12682]

As for the lights, it is never allowed to celebrate Mass without lights, even in a case of necessity, when the Viaticum is to be administered. If the light goes out during Mass, it must not be continued unless this happens after Consecration. To celebrate only with one light would be, according to the most probable and most common opinion of theologians, only a venial sin.[12683] The candles used during the celebration of Mass should be of bees-wax.[12684]

4. ALTAR-CARDS, BOOK-STAND, CRUETS, ETC

"Ad Crucis pedem ponatur tabella Secretarum appellata; in cornu Epistolæ, cussinus supponendus Missali; . . . parva campanula, ampullæ vitreæ vini et aquæ cum pelvicula et manutergio mundo, in fenestella seu in parva mensa ad hæc præparata. Super altare nihil omnino ponatur, quod ad Missæ sacrificium vel ipsius altaris ornamentum non pertineat."—(Rubr. Miss. gen. tit. XX.)

It is not required that these different objects should be blessed. Instead of a cushion on which to place the Missal we may use a book-stand.[12685]

III. THE CHALICE AND ITS ACCESSORIES.[12686]

1. THE CHALICE AND THE PATEN

"Præparat calicem, qui debet esse vel aureus vel argenteus, aut saltem habere cuppam argenteam, intus inauratam, et simul cum patena itidem inaurata, ab Episcopo consecratus."—(Rit. celebr. tit. I. n. 1.)

"Adsit calix cum patena conveniens, cujus cuppa debet esse aurea, vel argentea, vel stannea; non ærea, vel vitrea."—(De Defect. tit. X. n. 1.)

The cup of the chalice and the paten should be of gold, or at least of silver gilt inside; they may be of tin or also alluminio aliis metallis commixto, when there exists some reasonable cause, as the poverty of the church or danger in time of persecution.[12687]

Consecration is required for the paten as well as for the chalice. It is lost as soon as the sacred vessel deteriorates in such a manner that it can no longer be decently used at the altar; for example, if the cup of the chalice be split or broken, has a hole in the bottom of it, or if it is dissevered from the foot by fracture, but not when it is simply divided, that is when (calix tornatilis) the cup and foot are joined by a screw. The vessel does not lose its consecration when the gilding wears off; but when it is regilt, it must be reconsecrated (S. R. C, 14 Jun., 1845).

2. THE PURIFICATOR, PALL, CORPORAL, VEIL, AND BURSE

"Ponit purificatorium mundum, . . . tegit parva palla linea, tum velo serico; super velo ponit hursam coloris paramentorum, intus habentem corporale plicatum, quod ex lino tantum esse debet, nec serico vel auro in medio intextum, sed totum album, et ab Episcopo, vel alio habente potestatem, simul cum palla benedictum."—(Rit. celebr. tit I. n. I.)

According to the most common and most probable opinion, the purificator need not be blessed.

It would be a mortal sin to celebrate Mass with a corporal that is not blessed. As for the pall, it is probable that the sin would not be mortal.

The purificator, pall, and corporal should be of linen or hemp. When these linens, after having been used, must be washed, this should be done for the first time by a cleric in the higher orders, or, according to present custom, by a cleric in minor orders. The water that has been used for this purpose should afterwards be poured into the Sacrarium.

The veil and the burse need not be blessed.

IV. THE VESTMENTS.[12688]

I. MATERIAL AND BLESSING

"Paramenta, . . . non debent esse lacera aut scissa, sed integra, et decenter munda ac pulchra, et ab Episcopo itidem, vel alio facultatem habente, benedicta."—(Rit. celebr. tit. I. n. 2.)

The priest's vestments, namely, the amice, alb, cincture, maniple, stole, and chasuble should be in a good condition and have been blessed by the bishop or by an authorized priest.

It is certainly a mortal sin to celebrate Mass without a chasuble, or with a chasuble not blessed; the same thing holds good In regard to the alb. Theologians agree more or less in saying the same thing in regard to the other vestments.[12689]

2. THE COLOR OF THE VESTMENTS

"Paramenta, . . . debent esse coloris convenientis Officio et Missæ diei, secundum usum Romanæ Ecclesiæ, quæ quinque coloribus uti consuevit: Alho, Rubeo, Viridi, Violaceo, et Nigro."—(Rub. gen. tit. xviii. n. 1.)

It is more probable that the Rubric concerning the color of the vestments is a matter of precept; however, it does not oblige one under pain of mortal sin, unless scandal may result therefrom. A reasonable cause, such as the want of the vestments of the color of the day, would then permit the taking of another color.[12690]

V. THE MATTER AND THE FORM OF THE SACRAMENT.[12691]

I. THE BREAD

"Si panis non sit triticeus, vel si triticeus, admixtus sit granis alterius generis in tanta quantitate ut non maneat panis triticeus, vel sit alioqui corruptus, non conficitur Sacramentum.

"Si sit confectus de aqua rosacea, vel alterius distillationis, dubium est an conficiatur.

"Si cœperit corrumpi, sed non sit corruptus; similiter, si non sit azymus, secundum morem Ecclesiæ latinæ, conficitur; sed conficiens graviter peccat.

"Si celebrans ante Consecrationem advertit hostiam esse corruptam, aut non esse triticeam, remota illa hostia, aliam ponat, et facta oblatione, saltem mente concepta, prosequatur ab eo loco, ubi desivit.

"Si id adverterit post Consecrationem, etiam post illius hostiæ sumptionem, posita alia, faciat oblationem ut supra, et a Consecratione incipiat, scilicet, ab illis verbis—Qui pridie quam pateretur—et illam priorem, si non sumpsit, sumat post sumptionem Corporis et Sanguinis, vel alii sumendam tradat, vel alicubi reverenter conservet. Si autem sumpserit, nihilominus sumat eam quam consecravit; quia præceptum de perfectione Sacramenti majoris est ponderis, quam quod a jejunis sumatur.

"Quod si hoc contingat post sumptionem Sanguinis, apponi debet rursus novus panis, et vinum cum aqua, et facta prius oblatione ut supra, Sacerdos consecret, incipiendo ab illis verbis.

1. Black is the color proper to death, which deprives us of the light of life, and plunges us into the darkness of the tomb. It is used on Good Friday in memory of the darkness that covered the whole earth when our Lord expired, and at all the Masses of the Dead.

The Church does not admit blue or yellow; however, the use of vestments in gold cloth having been introduced, the following doubt has been submitted to the Congregation of Rites: An sacra paramenta revera auro, maxima saltem ex parte, contexta, pro quocumque colore, exceptis violaceo et nigro, inservire possint? The Congregation answered, Apiil 28, 1866. Tolerandum esse locorum consuetudinem, relate tamen ad paramenta ex auro contexta.

—Qui pridie—ac statim sumat utrumque, et prosequatur Missam; ne Sacramentum remaneat imperfectum, et ut debitus servetur ordo.

"Si Hostia consecrata dispareat, vel casu aliquo, aut vento aut miraculo, vel ab aliquo animali accepta, et nequeat reperiri, tunc altera consecretur ab eo loco incipiendo—Qui pridie quam pateretur—facta ejus prius oblatione, ut supra."—(De Defect. tit. III.)

The matter essential to the divine Sacrifice is bread properly so called, made of the flour of pure wheat and of natural water. Any other kind of grain, as also any mixture of artificial liquor, as rose-water, would make the matter null, or at least uncertain, and gravely illicit.

Unleavened and leavened bread are both valid; but the former is permitted only in the Latin Church and the latter in the Greek Church, so that a priest of the Latin Church who would consecrate with leavened bread, and a Greek priest who would consecrate with unleavened bread, would both consecrate validly, but would commit a mortal sin. The common and more probable opinion is that a priest of the Latin Church could not consecrate with leavened bread even in a case of necessity when he wished to administer holy Viaticum.

It is a precept in the Latin Church that the Host that is to be consecrated should be of a circular form; but this is not the case in the Greek Church.

The Host that is consecrated for Mass should be larger than those that are distributed to the faithful; yet one may celebrate Mass with a small Host for want of another, provided no scandal be thereby given; one would even be obliged to do so in a case of necessity; for example, in order to administer the Viaticum.

The priest should communicate with the Host consecrated in the Mass that he celebrates; he would do wrong, when he renews the sacred Host for Exposition to use the old Host to communicate at Mass, and to replace it by the Host that he has just consecrated at his Mass.

2. THE WINE

"Si vinum sit factum penitus acetum, vel penitus putridum vel de uvis acerbis seu non maturis expressum, vel ei admixtum tantum aquæ, ut vinum sit corruptum, non conficitur Sacramentum.

"Si vinum cœperit acescere vel corrumpi, vel fuerit aliquantum acre, vel mustum de uvis tunc expressum, vel non fuerit admixta aqua, vel fuerit admixta aqua rosacea seu alterius distillationis, conficitur Sacramentum; sed conficiens graviter peccat.

"Si celebrans, ante consecrationem Sanguinis, quamvis post consecrationem Corporis, advertat, aut vinum, aut aquam, aut utrumque, non esse in calice, debet statim apponere vinum cum aqua, et facta oblatione, ut supra, consecrare, incipiendo ab illis verbis—Simili modo, etc.

"Si, post verba Consecrationis, advertat vinum non fuisse positum, sed aquam; deposita aqua in aliquod vas, iterum vinum cum aqua ponat in calice, et consecret, resumendo a verbis prædictis—Simili modo, etc.

"Si hoc advertat post sumptionem Corporis, vel hujusmodi aquæ, apponat aliam hostiam iterum consecrandam, et vinum cum aqua in calice, offerat utrumque; et consecret, et sumat, quamvis non sit jejunus; vel, si Missa celebretur in loco publico, ubi plures adsint, ad evitandum scandalum, poterit apponere vinum cum aqua, et, facta oblatione ut supra, consecrare, ac statim sumere, et prosequi cetera.

"Si quis percipiat, ante Consecrationem, vel post Consecrationem, totum vinum esse acetum, vel alias corruptum, idem servetur quod supra, ac si deprehenderet non esse positum vinum, vel solam aquam fuisse appositam in calice.

"Si autem celebrans, ante consecrationem calicis, advertat non fuisse appositam aquam, statim ponat eam, et proferat verba Consecrationis. Si id advertat post consecrationem calicis, nullo modo apponat; quia non est de necessitate Sacramenti.

"Si Materia quæ esset apponenda, ratione defectus vel panis, vel vmi, non posset ullo modo haberi, si id sit ante consecrationem Corporis, ulterius procedi non debet; si post consecrationem Corporis, aut etiam vini, deprehenditur defectus alterius speciei, altera jam consecrata, tunc, si nullo modo haberi possit, procedendum erit in Missa absolvenda, ita tamen ut prætermittantur verba et signa quæ pertinent ad speciem deficientem; quod si, expectando aliquamdiu, haberi possit, expectandum erit, ne Sacrificium remaneat imperfectum."—(De Defect. tit. IV.)

The wine proper for consecration must be natural wine produced from the grape (vinum de vite).[12692] Its color is immaterial.

The consecration would be null if one were to use sour grapes or vinegar, or wine adulterated by some mixture.

The must and the wine that begin to grow sour or to spoil would furnish valid but gravely illicit matter; and the sin would be still more grave if one were to use a doubtful matter. However, in case of necessity, one may use wine that is a little sour.

It is not permitted to consecrate frozen wine; nevertheless if one has done so, the consecration would still have to be regarded as valid.

There is an obligation, under pain of grievous sin, to put a little water into the wine, as is prescribed by the Rubric; but if one has omitted to do so, the consecration would nevertheless be valid.

In case one of the two species happens to be wanting, the other being consecrated, if it should be very difficult to procure what is needed, and considerable agitation would arise among the people, the Mass should be finished as the Rubric indicates; for the natural law obliging us to avoid giving scandal prevails over the positive divine law which ordains that the sacrifice should be completed.[12693]

3. THE SACRAMENTAL FORM

"Defectus ex parte formæ possunt contingere, si aliquid desit ex iis, quæ ad integritatem verborum in ipsa Consecratione requiruntur. Verba autem Consecrationis, quæ sunt forma hujus Sacramenti, sunt hæc: Hoc est enim Corpus meum, et Hic est enim calix Sanguinis mei, novi et æterni testamenti: mysterium fidei; qui pro vobis et pro multis effundetur in remissionem peccatorum. Si quis autem aliquid diminueret vel immutaret de forma consecrationis Corporis et Sanguinis, et in ipsa verborum immutatione verba idem non significarent, non conficeret Sacramentum. Si vero aliquid adderet, quod significationem non mutaret, conficeret quidem, sed gravissime peccaret.

"Si celebrans non recordetur se dixisse ea quæ in Consecratione communiter dicuntur, non debet propterea turbari. Si tamen certo ei constet, se omisisse aliquid eorum quæ sunt de necessitate Sacramenti, id est, formam Consecrationis, seu partem, resumat ipsam formam, et cetera prosequatur per ordinem. Si vero valde probabiliter dubitet se aliquid essentiale omisisse, iteret formam saltem sub tacita conditione. Si autem non sunt de necessitate Sacramenti, non resumat, sed procedat ulterius."—(De Defect., tit. V.)

One should pronounce each form of the consecration simul recitative et significative; that is to say, by reciting the words of Jesus Christ, and by applying their meaning to the matter that is present. It must be observed that, if one is voluntarily distracted at the moment of consecration, one would commit a grievous sin.[12694]

VI. THE DISPOSITION OF THE CELEBRANT

1. THE INTENTION.[12695]

"Si quis non intendit conficere, sed delusorie aliquid agere; item si aliquæ hostiæ ex oblivione remaneant in altari, vel aliqua pars vini, vel aliqua hostia lateat, cum non intendat consecrare nisi quas videt; item si quis habeat coram se undecim hostias, et intendat consecrare solum decem, non determinans quas decem intendit; in his casibus non consecrat, quia requiritur intentio. Secus si, putans quidem esse decem, tamen omnes voluit consecrare quas coram se habebat: nam tunc omnes erunt consecratæ: atque ideo quilibet Sacerdos talem semper intentionem habere deberet, scilicet, consecrandi eas omnes quas ante se ad consecrandum positas habet.

"Si Sacerdos, putans se tenere unam hostiam, post Consecrationem invenerit fuisse duas simul junctas, in sumptione sumat simul utramque. Quod si deprehendat post sumptionem Corporis et Sanguinis, aut etiam post ablutionem, reliquias aliquas relictas consecratas, eas sumat, sive parvæ sint, sive magnæ, quia ad idem sacrificium spectant.

"Si vero relicta sit Hostia integra consecrata,[12696] eam in tabernaculo cum aliis reponat; si hoc fieri nequit, seqnenti Sacerdoti ibi celebraturo, in altari supra corporale decenter opertam, sumendam una cum altera, quam est consecraturus, relinquat: vel, si neutrum horum fieri possit, in ipso calice, seu patena decenter conservet, quousque vel in tabernaculo reponatur, vel ab altero sumatur; quod si non habeat quomodo honeste conservetur, potest eam ipsemet sumere.

In regard to the fragments of the sacred Host or of the precious blood which the celebrant finds after the ablution, he may consume them even after he has reentered the sacristy, provided he is still vested; but he should not do so if the fragments belong to another sacrifice, provided there be no danger of irreverence. If the celebrant has already taken off his vestments when he discovers similar fragments, he should put them into the tabernacle, or reserve them for another priest who is to celebrate on the same day; and if this cannot be done, he should consume them himself.

As for the Hosts found outside of the corporal, in a doubt whether they are consecrated, one should consume them after the ablution of the chalice, or, better, with the ablution.

2. THE DISPOSITION OF THE SOUL.[12697]

"Si quis suspensus, excommunicatus, degradatus, irregularis, vel alias canonice impeditus celebret, conficit quidem Sacramentum, sed gravissime peccat, tam propter Communionem, quam indigne sumit, quam propter executionem Ordinum, quæ sibi erat interdicta.

"Si quis habens copiam confessoris celebret in peccato mortali, graviter peccat.

"Si quis autem in casu necessitatis non habens copiam confessoris, in peccato mortali absque contritione celebret, graviter peccat. Secus si conteratur, debet tamen, cum primum poterit, confiteri.

"Si in ipsa celebratione Missæ, Sacerdos recordetur se esse in peccato mortali, conteratur cum proposito confitendi, et satisfaciendi.

"Si recordetur se esse excommunicatum vel suspensum. aut locum esse interdictum, similiter conteratur cum proposito petendi absolutionem. Ante Consecrationem autem, in supradictis casibus si non timetur scandalum, debet Missam incœptam deserere."—(De Defect., tit. VIII.)

When, while celebrating, a priest remembers a mortal sin, if after consecration, he should continue; but if before consecration, and especially before the Canon, he should interrupt the Mass in order to confess, provided he can do so without dishonor. If in this last case the means of confessing were wanting, it is more probable that the priest would be obliged to leave the altar without finishing the Mass. This is more probable, but not certain; for it is not certain that the Rubric, by the word Debet, imposes a grave precept. Besides, it may be remarked, with reason, that it is hardly possible in a similar case to avoid dishonor.

We read in the Council of Trent: Si, necessitate urgente, Sacerdos (sibi conscius mortalis peccati), absque prævia confessione celebraverit, quamprimum confiteatur.[12698] And Alexander VII. has condemned the two following propositions: Mandatum Tridentini, factum Sacerdoti sacrificanti ex necessitate cum peccato mortali, confitendi quamprimum, est consilium, non præceptum. Illa particula QUAMPRIMUM intelligitur, cum Sacerdos suo tempore confitebitur.[12699] It is therefore a formal obligation, and, according to the opinion of theologians, it should be fulfilled within three days. Such is the best interpretation of the word quamprimum.[12700] It is understood that an accidental cause, such as the duty of celebrating Mass on the following day, may besides render this obligation more pressing.

3. THE DISPOSITION OF THE BODY.[1270I]

"Si quis non est jejunus post mediam noctem, etiam post sumptionem solius aquæ, vel alterius potus, aut cibi, per modum etiam medicinæ, et in quantacumque parva quantitate, non potest communicare nec celebrare.

"Si autem ante mediam noctem cibum aut potum sumpserit, etiamsi postmodum non dormierit nec sit digestus, non peccat; sed ob perturbationem mentis, ex qua devotio tollitur, consulitur aliquando abstinendum.

"Si reliquiæ cibi remanentes in ore transglutiantur, non impediunt communionem, cum non transglutiantur per modum cibi, sed per modum salivæ. Idem dicendum, si lavando os, deglutiatur stilla aquas praster intentionem.

"Si plures Missas in una die celebret, ut in Nativitate Domini in unaquaque Missa abluat digitos in aliquo vase mundo, et in ultima tantum percipiat purificationem.

"Si præcesserit pollutio nocturna, quæ causata fuerit ex præcedenti cogitatione quæ sit peccatum mortale, vel evenerit propter nimiam crapulam, abstinendum est a communione et celebratione, nisi aliud Confessario videatur. Si dubium est an in præcedenti cogitatione fuerit peccatum mortale, consulitur abstinendum, extra tamen casum necessitatis. Si autem certum est non fuisse in illa cogitatione peccatum mortale, vel nullam fuisse cogitationem, sed evenisse ex naturali causa, aut ex diabolica illusione, potest communicare et celebrare; nisi ex illa corporis commotione tanta evenerit perturbatio mentis, ut abstinendum videatur."—(De Defect. tit. IX.)

Although the precept of the Eucharistic fast is only an Ecclesiastical law, it admits of no lightness of matter; but, to violate it, three conditions are required: (1) that what we take be taken from without; (2) that we take it by way of eating or drinking; (3) that it be nourishment or drink.

When one swallows remnants of food taken the evening before and retained in the mouth,—if one does so, not inadvertently but designedly, the very probable opinion is that that is sufficient to break the fast. It is therefore prudent, when one feels such remnants coming upon the tongue, to reject it rather than to swallow it.[12702]

The drops of water that remain mixed with saliva after one has washed one's mouth,—if one swallows them designedly, also break the fast; such is the common opinion given about this matter.

The fast would be broken if one puts a piece of sugar into one's mouth before midnight and swallows it afterwards: if one swallows water, even involuntarily, having fallen, for instance, into the river; also if it is blood that one sucks from a wounded finger; but not if the blood came from the gums.

One does not break the fast if accidentally one swallows while breathing grains of tobacco taken into the nose, or dust or rain or snow-flakes, even a gnat. One may not say as much of tobacco juice; but all agree that it is unbecoming to chew tobacco before Mass. It would be a venial sin to do so without a reason.

Finally, the fast is not broken if one swallow's things that cannot be digested, such as hair, metal, glass, silk, wool, etc.; but this is not the case in regard to paper, straw, flax, wax, and other things that the stomach can decompose by drawing nourishment from them.

If one remembers after consecration that one is not fasting, one should finish the Mass; if before consecration, and, above all, before the Canon, one should leave the altar unless this could not be done without scandal; for in this case one should continue the Mass that is begun.[12703]

VII. ACCIDENTS.[12704]

1. PROFANATION OF THE CHURCH, AND IMMINENT DANGERS.[I2705]

"Si Sacerdote celebrante, violetur Ecclesia ante Canonem, dimittatur Missa; si post Canonem, non dimittatur. Si timeatur incursus hostium, vel alluvionis, vel ruina loci ubi celebratur, ante Consecrationem dimittatur Missa; post Consecrationem vero, Sacerdos accelerare poterit Sumptionem Sacramenti, omissis omnibus aliis."

The church is profaned or polluted in the following cases: 1. Voluntary homicide that is criminal or injurious to the holy place; 2. Suicide that is also voluntary and criminal; 3. A wound that causes considerable effusion of blood and that cannot be excused from mortal sin. The crime must have been committed in the interior of the church, and must be known to the public. One may say Mass in a profaned church when it is necessary; for example, if there is no other church where the people can hear Mass.

It is never permitted to mutilate intentionally the holy Sacrifice even for the purpose of avoiding death; but one may sometimes do so accidentally and indirectly; as, when one is surprised by a conflagration, or by an invasion, or by some other extreme peril. In this case the priest may at once consume the consecrated Host, or carry it away with him, without consecrating the chalice; for then he does not mutilate the Sacrifice, but he is dispensed from finishing it.[12706]

2. ILLNESS WITH WHICH THE CELEBRANT MAY BE SEIZED

"Si Sacerdos, ante Consecrationem, graviter infirmetur, vel in syncopen inciderit, aut moriatur, prætermittitur Missa; si post consecrationem Corporis tantum, ante Consecrationem Sanguinis, vel utroque consecrato id accidit, Missa per alium Sacerdotem expleatur ab eo loco ubi ille desiit, et in casu necessitatis etiam per non jejunum. Si autem non obierit, sed fuerit infirmus, adeo tamen ut possit communicare, et non adsit alia Hostia consecrata, Sacerdos qui Missam supplet, dividat Hostiam, et unam partem præbeat infirmo, aliam ipse sumat. Si autem, semiprolata forma Corporis obiit Sacerdos, quia non est consecratio, non est necesse, ut Missa per alium suppleatur. Si vero obierit semiprolata forma Sanguinis, tunc alter prosequatur Missam, et super eumdem calicem repetat integram formam, ab eo loco, Simili modo postquam cœnatum est—vel posset super alium Calicem præparatum integram formam proferre, et Hostiam primi Sacerdotis, et Sanguinem a se consecratum sumere, ac deinde Calicem relictum semiconsecratum.

"Si quis, extra hujusmodi casus necessitatis, integra Sacramenta non sumpserit gravissime peccat."—(De Defect. tit. X.)

It would be better for the celebrant who happens to become ill after the consecration, to resume and finish the Sacrifice himself, although lie is not fasting;[12707] but, if he is incapable of doing so, his place must be supplied by another priest, even though no one else could be had than a priest who is excommunicated and irregular.[12708]

3. HURTFUL THINGS THAT MAY FALL INTO THE CHALICE OR TOUCH THE HOST

"Si musca, vel aranea, vel aliquid aliud, ceciderit in calicem ante Consecrationem, projiciat vinum in locum decentem, et aliud ponat in calice, misceat parum aquæ, offerat ut supra, et prosequatur Missam. —Si post Consecrationem ceciderit musca, aut aliquid ejusmodi, et fiat nausea Sacerdoti, extrahat eam, et lavet cum vino; finita Missa comburat, et combustio ac lotio hujusmodi in sacrarium projiciatur; si autem non fuerit ei nausea, nec ullum periculum timeat, sumat cum Sanguine.

"Si aliquid venenosum ceciderit in Calicem, vel quod provocaret vomitum, Vinum consecratum reponendum est in alio calice,[12709] et aliud vinum cum aqua apponendum denuo consecrandum; et finita Missa, Sanguis repositus in panno lineo vel stuppa tamdiu servetur, donee species vini fuerint desiccatre, et tunc stuppa comburatur, et combustio in sacrarium projiciatur.

"Si aliquid venenatum contigerit Hostiam consecratam, tunc alteram consecret, et sumat eo modo quo dictum est, et illa servetur[12710] in tabernaculo in loco separato, donec species corrumpantur, et corruptæ deinde mittantur in sacrarium."[12711]—(De Defect, tit. X. 5, 6, et 7.)

4. THE HOST THAT IS BROKEN OR HAS FALLEN INTO THE CHALICE

"Si Hostia ante Consecrationem inveniatur fracta, nisi populo evidenter appareat, talis Hostia consecretur; si autem scandalum populo esse possit, alia accipiatur, et offeratur; quod si illius Hostiæ jam erat facta oblatio,eam post ablutionem sumat; quod si ante oblationem Hostia appareat confracta, accipiatur altera integra, si citra scandalum, aut longam moram fieri poterit.

"Si propter frigus, vel negligentiam, Hostia consecrata dilabatur in Calicem, propterea nihil est reiterandum; sed Sacerdos Missam prosequatur, faciendo cæremonias et signa consueta cum residua parte Hostiæ, quæ non est madefacta Sanguine, si commode potest; si vero tota fuerit madefacta, non extrahat eam, sed omnia dicat omittendo signa, et sumat pariter Corpus et Sanguinem, signans se cum Calice, dicens—Corpus et Sanguis Domini nostri, etc."—(De Defect. tit. X. 9, 10.)

5. PRECIOUS BLOOD FROZEN OR SPILT

"Si in hieme Sanguis congeletur in calice, involvatur Calix pannis calefactis; si id non proficeret, ponatur in ferventi aqua prope altare, dummodo in Calicem non intret, donec liquefiat.

"Si per negligentiam[12712] aliquid de Sanguine Christi ceciderit, siquidem super terram, seu super tabulam, lingua lambatur, et locus ipse radatur quantum satis est, et abrasio comburatur; cinis vero in sacrarium recondatur. Si vero super lapidem altaris ceciderit, sorbeat Sacerdos stillam, et locus bene abluatur, et ablutio in sacrarium projiciatur. Si super linteum altaris, et ad aliud linteum stilla pervenerit; si usque ad tertium: linteamina ter abluantur ubi stilla ceciderit, calice supposito, et aqua ablutionis in sacrarium projiciatur. Quod si in ipso solum corporali, aut si in vestibus ipsis sacerdotalibus ceciderit, debet similiter ablui, et ablutio in sacrarium projici. Si in substrato pedibus panno, vel tapeto, bene abluatur, ut supra.

"At si contingat totum Sanguinem post Consecrationem effundi, si quidem aliquid, vel parum remansit, illud sumatur, et de effuso reliquo Sanguine fiat, ut dictum est. Si vero nihil omnino remansit, ponat iterum vinum et aquam, et consecret ab eo loco,—Simili modo postquam cænatum est, facta prius tamen calicis oblatione, ut supra."—(De Defect. Tit. X. 11, 12, 13.)

6. VOMITING, AND THE HOST THAT HAS FALLEN

"Si Sacerdos evomat Eucharistiam, si species integræ appareant, reverenter sumantur, nisi nausea fiat; tunc enim Species consecratæ caute separentur, et in aliquo loco sacro reponantur, donec corrumpantur, et postea in sacrarium projiciantur. Quod si species non appareant, comburatur vomitus, et cineres in sacrarium mittantur.

"Si Hostia consecrata, vel aliqua ejus particula dilabatur in terram, reverenter accipiatur, et locus ubi cecidit, mundetur, et aliquantulum abradatur, et pulvis seu abrasio hujusmodi in sacrarium immittatur. Si ceciderit extra Corporale in mappam, seu alio quovis modo in aliquod linteum, mappa vel linteum hujusmodi diligenter lavetur, et lotio ipsa in sacrarium effundatur."—(De Defect, tit. X. 15.)

If, while one is distributing holy Communion, a Host happens to fall, after having picked it up, one should first cover the place with a clean linen cloth, and wash the place afterwards, as is prescribed by the Rubric, which, however, does not bind one Sub gravi. Usually one may even omit to wash the garment or the beard in order not to inconvenience the people. If the Host falls into the bosom of a woman, the priest should not take it from her himself; the woman should take it away with her own hand and replace it in the ciborium.[12713]

VIII. THE PLACE AND THE TIME IN WHICH ONE MAY CELEBRATE MASS

1. THE PLACE.[12714]

"Possunt etiam defectus occurrere in ministerio ipso, si aliquid ex requisitis ad illud desit, ut si celebretur in loco non sacro, vel non deputato ab Episcopo."—(De Defect, tit. X. 16.)

Generally, it is permitted to celebrate Mass only in churches and chapels that are consecrated or blessed, and that are not profaned, execrated, or interdicted.

The exceptions to this rule are the following:—1. In a case of necessity, as when the church is destroyed, inundated, threatened with ruin, or too Small for the crowd, one may celebrate Mass in a decent place, in order that the people may not be deprived of the Mass on days of precept. One should, however, in such cases ask the permission of the Ordinary, if this is possible.

2. In the camp, for the army.

3. In the harbor, on the arrival of a ship, for those that cannot go far away.

4. On the vessel at sea, but only by a Papal indult, granted with conditions and with prescribed precautions; namely, that the weather be fair and the sea tranquil; that the vessel be far away from the shore, and that there be at the side of the celebrant a second priest or a deacon who watches over the chalice.

One may say Mass in the churches or chapels of religious Communities, seminaries, colleges, hospitals, public prisons, and, generally, in all the chapels where divine worship is held, with the authorization of the bishop.

A privilege from the Pope is needed to authorize the celebration of Mass in a domestic oratory. There are, however, cases in which, for a grave and passing cause, the Ordinary may permit the saying of Mass in the house of one of the faithful.

2. THE TIME.[12715]

"Missa privata, post Matutinum et Laudes, quacumque hora ab aurora usque ad meridiem dici potest."—(Rub. gen. tit. XV. n. 1.)

"Tempus debitum celebrandi, quod est ab aurora usque ad meridiem communiter."—(De Defect, tit. X. n. 1.)

The aurora is of more or less extent, according to the degree of latitude and the season. Generally, in the United States it varies between one and two hours before the rising of the sun. Without a special privilege, it is not allowed to say Mass ante auroram or post meridiem. These two points of time, the aurora and midday, must be understood not mathematically but morally, so that it is permitted to finish Mass at the beginning of the aurora and to begin it a little before mid-day. Hence, Mass may be said nearly two hours before sunrise. The privilege is usually granted by the bishops to celebrate Mass per unam horam ante auroram et aliam post meridiem.

Such is the ordinary rule; but we may go beyond these limits in certain cases of necessity; for example, in order to give the Viaticum to the dying, it is permitted to say Mass at midnight; on account of a journey, we may say it an hour before the aurora or an hour after mid-day. Moreover, the Ordinary, whether a Bishop in his diocese or a Superior in a religious Order, has the faculty of dispensing in this respect in particular cases, for any reasonable cause.

One would commit a grave sin if, without a reasonable motive, one would celebrate Mass an hour before the aurora or an hour after mid-day.[12716]

IX. MASS WHEN CELEBRATED IN ALIENA ECCLESIA.[12717]

SUMMARY

By an Aliena Ecclesia is meant a church of seculars, or regulars, or of nuns who say the Office in choir, either in the diocese of the celebrant or out of it, in which a different Office, or, consequently, a different Mass, from that of a celebrant is prescribed.

A private oratory, or the chapel of nuns who do not celebrate the Office in choir, or the chapel of a seminary, is not an Aliena Ecclesia; and consequently the rules given below do not apply to them.

GENERAL PRINCIPLE.—THE MASS IS CONFORMABLE TO THE OFFICE OF THE CELEBRANT

RULES FOR MASS IN ALIENA ECCLESIA

I. When the Celebrant's Office is a Duplex, and the Office of the Aliena Ecclesia also is Duplex, the Celebrant—

(a) Should say his own Mass if his color is the same as that of the church;

(b) Should say the Mass of the church if his color is different.

II. When the Celebrant's Office is a Duplex, and that of the Aliena Ecclesia a Semiduplex or Simplex, the Celebrant should say his own Mass, no matter whether his color is the same as that of the church or not.

III. When the Celebrant's Office is a Semiduplex or Simplex, and the Office of the church a Duplex, the Celebrant—

(a) Will say his own Mass if his color is the same as that of the church;

(b) But the Mass of the church if the color is different.

IV. When the Celebrant's Office is a Semiduplex or Simplex, that of the church a Semiduplex or Simplex, the celebrant will say his own Mass, or Requiem Mass, or Votive Mass, as he would in his own church.

NOTANDA

In the following cases the Mass of the Aliena Ecclesia must always be said. Hence the foregoing Rules do not apply to them:

1. When the Aliena Ecclesia is celebrating a Feast cum solemnitate et concursu populi.
2. When the Celebrant says the Parochial Mass, as substitute for the Parish Priest, or the Community Mass in a convent of nuns bound to the choral recitation of the Office.
3. When he celebrates a High Mass or Missa Cantata.
4. When the Celebrant's Office is of a Beatus not included in the calendar of the Aliena Ecclesia.
5. When he celebrates in the church of Regulars who have the privilege permitting all priests celebrating there to conform to their calendar.

X. THE SERVER OF MASS.[12718]

"Sacerdos. . . . accedit ad altare, ministro cum Missali et aliis ad celebrandum necessariis (nisi ante fuerint præparata) præcedente, superpelliceo induto.—(Rit. celebr. tit. II. n. 1.)

"Defectus. . . . , si non adsit clericus vel alius deserviens in Missa, vel adsit qui deservire non debet, ut mulier."—(De Defect, tit. X. n. 1.)

It is certain that, without a special faculty usually granted by the bishops of this country, the priest would commit a mortal sin if he celebrated Mass without a server. However, it is permitted to do so in the case of necessity in order to administer the Viaticum; and then the priest himself serves. Many authors admit the same exception in order that the people may hear Mass on a day of precept.

When the Mass has begun, and especially after the Offertory, if the server absents himself and delays to come back, it is probable that the celebrant may continue without him.

It is also probable that the celebrant should not be scrupulous if the server pronounces the words badly, nor, in wishing to correct his faults, should he trouble himself or his assistants; however, he should supply what the server omits. There need be no such great necessity to say Mass with a server who cannot answer, as to say Mass without a server.

It would be a mortal sin to admit a woman to serve Mass; in a case of necessity, it would be better to celebrate without a server. When necessary, however, a woman, especially if she is a religious, may from her place answer the celebrant, but she cannot approach the altar to offer the cruets, etc.

It is proper, according to the Rubric, that the functions of the server be performed by a cleric, or one that has received at least the tonsure and wears the clerical dress; but a layman can supply his place. However, it is not permitted to the latter to touch the sacred vessels, nor the corporal, under pain of venial sin, unless there is a reasonable motive and it can be done with respect and without scandal. A cleric who has received the tonsure may touch the sacred vessels; and the same privilege is also granted to the religious of both sexes when they exercise the duties of sacristan.

THE HONORARIUM OF MASSES, OR THE ABUSES TO WHICH IT GIVES RISE.[12719]

REPLY TO AN ANONYMOUS BOOK ENTITLED "DISSERTATION ON THE HONORARIUM OF MASSES."

RECENTLY, during the year 1768, there was republished at Naples an anonymous book entitled "Dissertation on the Honorarium of Masses."[12720] The entire aim of the author is to exhibit the great disorders, the sins of simony, the sacrileges, and the scandals that arise from the custom of priests receiving honoraria, or stipends, from the faithful, with the obligation of applying Masses specially to the intention of the givers.

1. ANCIENT CUSTOM OF PUBLIC MASSES WITH OFFERINGS, AND ORIGIN OF PAID MASSES

It is certain that, during the first ages of the Church, there was nothing to fear from the abuses that were subsequently introduced with the custom of honoraria; for at that time a single priest, either the bishop or another, celebrated the Mass, during which all the faithful brought their offerings of bread and wine, with other eatables.[12721] Afterwards they also began to offer money. These offerings were put into little boxes and then presented; after this the minister of the celebrant-namely, the deacon in the Greek Church and the subdeacon in the Latin Church—made known to him the persons who had offered the gifts, that he might name them at the altar, or that he might recommend their wants to God. The Lord, according to his divine will and according to the disposition of these persons, dispensed to them his graces by virtue of the holy Sacrifice, each one participating in it as much as he was able conformably to his merit and to the divine judgments.

But, about the eighth century there began to be introduced the "manual" or "paid" Masses, as our author calls them; that is to say, it was agreed that the priest, by receiving a certain remuneration, pledged himself that he would apply the medium or special[12722] fruit of such a Mass to the profit or according to the intention of him who paid the money.

This new custom, little by little, supplanted the custom of making offerings. The usage of saying Mass specially for those that gave a contribution being always on the increase, it happened that in the twelfth century the making of offerings entirely ceased, since it was no longer the custom of celebrating those Masses the fruit of which might be applied in common.[12723]

2. ABUSES OCCASIONED BY THE ADMISSION OF HONORARIA, AND THE MEANS EMPLOYED TO REMEDY THEM

It cannot be denied that this change gave rise to different abuses, either on the part of the priests or on the part of those that gave contributions for Masses. Some priests, prompted by cupidity, endeavored to gain from this as much as they could. Some of them were seen to say Mass several times a day, not out of devotion, not through necessity, but only through avarice. Others obliged their penitents and the sick whom they assisted to give them or to bequeath them contributions for Masses. There were some who, as Cardinal Bona[12724] relates, went so far as to exact several contributions for the same Mass. They then said before the Offertory several Introits, several prayers, as many Epistles and Gospels, etc.; this was called a two-faced, a three-faced Mass—Missa bifaciata, trifaciata.[12725] The divine Sacrifice was thus made a shameful traffic; as the Council of Toledo calls it: "Super hoc, ac si vellent vendere rem profanam, impudenter mercantur."[12726]

This evil was the cause of much solicitude to the Church, either in order to hinder the avarice of priests and seculars or in order to discharge the intention of those that gave the honoraria. Ilence the Holy See, always watching with zeal and prudence over the extirpation of the abuses that crept into sacred things, did not cease to find out means to do away with those abuses which, in consequence of false opinions held by certain minds, had insinuated themselves into this matter of paid Masses.

Under Pope Urban VIII., from 1623 to 1644, the Congregation of the Council enacted, by several decrees, that the priest who has received from anyone a contribution to celebrate Mass is obliged to apply the Mass to this person, even though the contribution would be less than the tax established in the diocese. Moreover, it was ordained that the priest who receives from several persons various small sums to say Masses is obliged to celebrate as many of them as the times the established tax is contained in the sum total. It was also prescribed that he who receives a large contribution is obliged to give it entirely to the celebrant, without retaining any part of it, even when the celebrant is satisfied with what is remitted to him;[12727] and this was confirmed by Benedict XIV., in his Bull Quanta cura, in which he imposed excommunication upon laymen, and suspension upon ecclesiastics, who would retain a part of the contribution given.

In the decrees of Pope Urban VIII., it was also enacted that the administrators of churches cannot retain any part of the contributions for Masses in order to cover the expenses of the celebration, unless the churches, being quite poor, had not the means to provide for these expenses.[12728] Furthermore, the Congregation of the Council decreed, July 6, 1726, that the arch-priests are not obliged to furnish the wine, the candles, and the hosts to the ecclesiastics that say Mass in their churches, even though the latter must celebrate Mass there so as to fulfil the duties of chaplains. It is also decided at the same time that, in regard to adventitious[12729] Masses, the Rectors are not obliged to furnish these articles except to those priests that come to celebrate in their churches with their consent.[12730]

Under Pope Alexander VII., December 13, 1659, the Sacred Congregation forbade the receiving for one Mass of two contributions, one of which for the application of the satisfactory fruit, and the other for the impetratory fruit. The same Pope, September 7, 1665, through the Congregation of the Holy Office, condemned among others this proposition: "Duplicatum stipendium potest Sacerdos pro eadem Missa licite accipere, applicando petenti partem etiam specialissimam fructus ipsimet celebranti correspondentem." Also the following: "Non est contra justitiam, pro pluribus sacrificiis stipendium accipere, et sacrificium unum offerre; neque etiam est contra fidelitatem, etiamsi promittam, juramento pro—missione etiam firmata, danti stipendium, quod pro nullo alio offeram."

Under Pope Innocent XI., from 1676 to 1689, the Sacred Congregation forbade chaplains to celebrate Mass on the days of a permitted vacancy, for others than the founders. Besides, the chaplains that are obliged to celebrate Mass without having the obligation of satisfying through themselves, received the prohibition of abstaining at times from celebrating and of not satisfying their obligation.

As the Council of Trent[12731] forbids the receiving of anything for the first Mass of a newly ordained priest, the question has been discussed whether it is permitted him to receivc some offering during this Mass. Gregory XIII., in 1573: "Audita relatione Congregations Concilii, decrevit licere se vertere in medio altaris ad populum, et accipere oblationes, non autem circumire ecclesiam.

By the decrees of Urban VIII., it is also established that, when a testator has arranged to have a certain number of Masses without determining the contribution for them "esse ab Episcopo præscribendam eleemosynam congruam, quæ respondeat oneribus Missarum celebrandarum, secundum morem

The wish was expressed of forbidding laymen to give for the Mass a contribution above the tax fixed by the bishop, and priests to receive it, even when it is offered spontaneously. Hence a doubt arose, which was thus formulated: "An possit Episcopus prohibere sub pœna censurarum laicis, ne pinguius stipendium taxa solvant Sacerdotibus, tam sæcularibus quam regularibus, Missam celebrantibus, et quod iidem Sacerdotes illud acceptare non possint, etiam a sponte dantibus?" The Congregation of the Council answered, January 16, 1649: "Prohiberi non posse."—The following question was then asked: "An Episcopus statuere possit eleemosynam manualem unius integri julii[12732] pro qualibet Missa, imponendo pœnam celebrantibus pro minori quantitate?" To this the answer was given: "Affirmative quoad eleemosynam manualem."[12733]

It was, moreover, asked whether he that received a contribution only to celebrate Mass can receive a second contribution to apply the fruit of it. Passerinus holds the affirmative opinion, and it is also the opinion of the author of the "Instructions for New Confessors," printed at Rome. Resting on this opinion Gavantus cites the following resolution of the Congregation of the Council, dated July 13, 1630: "Quando, in fundatione beneficii seu capellæ, expresse cautum est non teneri celebrantem ad applicationem Sacrificii, eo casu poterit celebrans accipere novum stipendium."[12734] Nevertheless, Father Diana says that the Sacred Congregation, in the supposed case, has always judged that it is never permitted to priests to receive a double contribution; and in favor of this opinion another answer of the same authority is produced. This was the question: "An Sacerdotes qui nulla alia obligatione in confraternitatibus vel monasteriis monialium celebrant, quam pro ornatu ecclesiæ, vel ut confratres vel moniales satisfaciant præcepto audiendi Missam, possint, ultra stipendium quod recipiunt a confraternitate vel monialibus, aliud recipere?" To this the Congregation of the Council gave answer, July 9 and February 6, 1627: "Non posse."

Cardinal Lambertini (Benedict XIV.) says, on this subject: "Attamen experientia compertum habemus, in errorem non semel eos adduci, qui Sacrarum Congregationum sententias usurpant; eos pariter plane novimus, qui in hoc negotio periti satis existimari debent. Quamobrem, cum tot annis, quibus Congregationis Concilii secretarium egimus, nulla usquam nobis occurrerit sententia ex iis quæ ab utraque parte feruntur, ut pateat an Sacerdoti, ad celebrandum unice addicto, liceat duplex stipendium percipere, pro celebratione atque applicatione, hanc quæstionem non diremptam relinquemus, donec magis tuta monumenta deprehendantur." Then he adds: "Neque enim res ita facilis ad judicandum videri potest; nam, pro Sacrificii applicatione obtinenda, satis est ut ipsius celebratio indicatur. Si quis autem se applicationis onere prorsus immunem esse contendat, apertissime docere debet, a pio testatore Missæ celebrationem unice requiri, et Sacerdotis arbitrio permitti ut fructum Sacrificii, cui libuerit attribuat." He moreover says that this is conformable to the decision rendered March 18, 1668, by the Congregation, which he assures us has always followed the same opinion in like cases; namely, a chaplaincy has been founded by testament with the charge of celebrating Mass without any declaration in whose favor the Mass was to be applied. Having been consulted as to what was to be done, the Congregation answered: "Applicandum esse Sacrificium pro anima testatoris."

Among the abuses that had to be remedied, the greatest that ever prevailed (would to God it did not exist at the present day!) was the habit that certain priests had of accumulating Mass stipends without ever saying the Masses. Hence, by the decrees of Urban VIII. it was forbidden to receive new stipends before having discharged those that had been received before. Afterwards, by an interpretation of this decree it was permitted to receive new stipends "dummodo infra modicum tempus posset omnibus satisfied;" and, finally, July 17, 1655, the Congregation of the Council added this other explanation: "Modicum tempus intelligi infra mensem."[12735],[12736]

3. VARIOUS MEANS DEVISED TO ABOLISH THE HONORARIUM, AND THE REMEDY PROPOSED BY THE ANONYMOUS AUTHOR

Such are the measures adopted to correct the abuses that have arisen on account of the admission of honoraria; but this did not satisfy the zeal of our anonymous author, and he set to work to find out other means.

He at first exposes the project of Peter Cantor,[12737] according to whom we should diminish the number of churches and priests so that there would be in every place only the absolutely necessary number of priests. But I do not know how this could be consistent with piety.

He then gives the idea of John Gerson, who wished that all the priests should live by following some profession or honest trade, like St. Paul, without exacting any contribution for the Masses that they celebrate. Our anonymous author does not himself approve of this means. This is what he says: "It seems to me that this way is not very practicable; for, after all, all the priests have not the science and the lights, much less the zeal, of St. Paul; all cannot at the same time gain a living by the work of their hands and discharge the duties of an office that demands their whole attention. Application, study, and prayer are absolutely necessary for this formidable employment; whoever desires to fulfil its duties as he should will have no time to spare. All traffic is forbidden to ecclesiastics by the holy Canons; St. Paul prohibited secular occupations as opposed to the recollection, the gravity, and the sanctity of their state: 'Nemo, militans Deo, implicat se negotiis sæcularibus, ut ei placeat, cui se probavit.'"[12738] Distraction and dissipation are obstacles to study and to prayer, both public and private. Add to all this the want of the means to perfect themselves and to be successful, the difficulty of finding a market for the work that they have done, and, finally, the little profit that they would make thereby. If the artisans of a village, and sometimes even those of cities, find it very difficult to derive from their work a simple and frugal living, what can be gained by a vicar or a country curate with his lathe, his brush, his spade, and the other tools of his trade? It is therefore impossible for a man occupied with the care of instructing himself and of instructing others to contribute by his work to his own support. At most, this could be done by certain priests who are isolated and without occupation, or certain religious excluded from the discharge of priestly functions and but little engaged in study."

Our author also indicates other different means devised by others, but even they do not satisfy him. He therefore arrives at this conclusion, that, in order to put an end to so many disorders, sacrileges, and abuses, the true and only means is to abolish "manual," or paid, Masses, as they call them. Consequently he offers the advice to resume the custom of olden times, when the bishop or one of the priests said Mass, and those that were present made their offerings, which served for the support of the priests, the churches, and the poor.

4. EXAMINATION OF THE AUTHOR'S VIEWS; FIRST, AS TO PRIVATE MASSES

We have now to examine whether the means proposed by the author would be useful or hurtful to the welfare of the faithful.

It is certain that private Masses are permitted, whatever may be said by the innovators of the sixteenth century who reject them according to their principle, namely, that in Mass not a true sacrifice is offered, because, according to them, it was instituted only in order that the faithful might receive Communion in the common Mass. Hence, they conclude that all the private Masses have been introduced only for their own private gains. But this subject has been treated against them at length by very grave authors, such as Cochleus, Cardinal Bellarmine,[12739] Estius,[12740] Cardinal Bona,[12741] Sylvius,[12742] and Father Berti.[12743]

And, in fact, nothing authorizes any one to say that private Masses are unlawful; for there was never a law of the Church ordaining that Mass should be celebrated only in public. On the contrary, ecclesiastical history shows us that many saints, even in the first ages, had the custom of celebrating private Masses. The Acts of Pope St. Marcellus inform us that he celebrated Mass in the house of St. Lucina. St. Gregory of Nazianzen[12744] relates that St. Gregory, Bishop of Nazianzen, and his father privately celebrated Mass in his room. St. Ambrose also said Mass in a house in Rome, beyond the Tiber, as is related by Paulinus of Milan.[12745] Uranius[12746] attests that St. Paulinus of Nola celebrated Mass, a few hours before his death, on an altar prepared before his bed. Philostorgius[12747] relates that St. Lucian, martyr, covered with wounds, and dying, having no altar, said Mass on his own breast. We read in St. Gregory the Great,[12748] that Cassius of Narni celebrated Mass every day, although he had no one present at it. Dom Mabillon[12749] proves that St. Goar, anchorite, St. Germer, and Licinius, Bishop of Angers, as well as many others in the sixth and seventh centuries celebrated Mass every day; and thus there were said at that time many private Masses.

Cardinal Bona,[12750] in like manner, shows that even in olden times a great number of Masses was celebrated every day. In the Justinian Code[12751] we read that, under the Emperors Honorius and Theodosius junior, the Church of Constantinople counted nine hundred and fifty priests who were called Decani. Moreover, at the beginning of the Church it was customary to ordain other priests besides curates. Now, these priests would have been useless if it had been obligatory to say only one public Mass which was celebrated only by the curates. We must add what we read in Allacci,[12752] namely, that the Greeks, as well as the Latins, often celebrated Mass in private, without there being any one to receive Communion during its celebration.

The innovators object that Jesus Christ, after having celebrated the Last Supper, said: Hoc facite in meam commemorationem. This means, according to them, that the priests should celebrate as Jesus Christ did, by distributing Communion. We reply to them that the words Hoc facite have reference to the substance, and that the substance of the Mass consists only in offering the Sacrifice, in not refusing Communion to him who asks for it, provided he be not unworthy.

They object, besides, that the Apostle calls the Mass Participatio Corporis Domini,—Dominicam cœnam manducare.[12753] But all that we may infer from these texts is that it is not forbidden to refuse the Sacrament of the Altar to any one that desires to participate in it. Moreover, we know that even when no one communicates at Mass the priest always uses these words: Ut quotquot ex hac altaris participatione, etc.; for it is sufficient that several participate in it, if not really, at least spiritually; whence we also draw this conclusion, that, by virtue of the general fruit in which all the faithful in the state of grace participate, every Mass is a public sacrifice.

Here is what the Emperor Charles V. and the other Catholic princes have said on the subject of the article of the Confession of Augsburg, in which private Masses were interdicted: Hac enim abrogatione Missarum, cultus Dei minuitur, Sanctis subtrahitur honor, ultima voluntas defunctorum corruit, debitis defuncti spoliantur suffragiis et vivorum devotio aufertur aut frigescit.[12754]

5. THE USE OF UNLEAVENED AND OF LEAVENED BREAD

While speaking of "paid" Masses,—that is to say, Masses that are applied, not gratuitously, but in consideration of stipends given,—the anonymous author says that during eleven centuries they were not in use in the Church, because only Masses with offerings were celebrated. At the same time, he assures us, as a certain thing, that the celebration of the Mass with unleavened bread began only about the ninth century, and that before this epoch Mass had always been celebrated with leavened bread.

I find, however, that many trustworthy authors are actuated by strong arguments to regard it as probable that during the first six centuries Mass was said, without distinction, either with unleavened or with leavened bread; and even Juvenin expressly says: 1. Per sex priora sæcula, Latinos fermentatum et azymum indifferenter consecrasse. 2. Circa septimum, aliquas ecclesias occidentales adhibere cœpisse solum azymum. 3. Illarum ecclesiarum usum alias occidentales, ante nonum sæculum, ubique amplexas fuisse.[12755]

We read, in Tournely,[12756] that St. Thomas, Alexander of Hales, and other ancient scholastics were of opinion that in the first ages the Greek and the Latin Church always celebrated Mass with unleavened bread. This is what the heretic Elbion himself did, wishing to unite the observances of the Old Law with those of the New Law. Tournely says that formerly there were other opinions that have not been sustained in the schools. He adds that at the present time there are three celebrated opinions on this subject, namely:

The tirst opinion is that of James Sirmond. He says that the Latin Church employed leavened bread during more than eight centuries, but that between 887 and 1054 she began to use unleavened bread.

The second opinion is that of Mabillon and of Lupus, who say that since the time of the apostles the Latin Church has always used unleavened bread. The same opinion is held by Cardinal Humbert, Abbot Rupert, James of Vitrai, Innocent III., and other authors.

The third opinion is that of Cardinal Bona. According to him, the Greeks always employed leavened bread, but the Latins in the first ages admitted now one, now the other, according to the circumstances of times and places. It was not before the tenth century that the use of unleavened bread became common in the Latin Church.

From all these authorities, joined to other documents, Tournely concludes that one may probably say that in the first ages the Greeks also used unleavened bread, according to the opinion of St. Thomas; and that the Latins till the ninth century employed, indifferently, unleavened and leavened bread. Hence, from the various opinions of so many learned authors it follows that the quoted opinions on this so much discussed question are all uncertain.

6. THE ORIGIN OF HONORARIA.[12757]

As to the origin of Masses said on account of stipends paid, I find that this custom dates from several centuries before the eleventh. Cardinal Bona[12758] writes that, from the time of Peter Damian, "paid" Masses were begun to be said, the faithful believing that by having Mass said specially for themselves they would derive a particular advantage; and then the custom of making offerings at the common Masses was discontinued. We also know, from history, that in the middle of the eighth century St. Chrodegang, Bishop of Metz, who is regarded as the restorer of the common life among clerics, permitted his priests to receive and to employ, each one for himself, what was offered to him for his own Mass. Mabillon[12759] says that this custom became general about the twelfth century. Moreover, we read, in Thomassinus, that, from the time of Pepin and Charlemagne, Masses were said for stipends: "Pipini et Caroli Magni ævo, jam cœperant fideles singuli suam privatim presbytero cuipiam stipem erogare, ut ejus Sacrificii exuberantem fructum in se derivarent, in proximos, in amicos, vitæ compotes adhuc vel defunctos."[12760] Besides, Cardinal Lambertini[12761] quotes Father Francis Berlendi, a Theatine, who, in his learned dissertation on the offerings at the altar, asserts that the use of these honoraria reaches farther back than the eighth century.

7. THE VALUE AND APPLICATION OF THE FRUIT OF THE MASS

The anonymous author says: "It is temerity to affirm that a Mass said for one person cannot also be applied and be profitable to all." His authority for this statement is Gerson,[12762] whose opinion he gives in the following words: "Gerson does not hesitate to assure us that a church that is accustomed to satisfy by a single Mass for several anniversaries may continue without needing the consent of those that have founded them." As far as I am concerned, I do not understand how this doctrine of Gerson can be approved by others; nor do I understand in what the "temerity" consists, of him who says that the Mass applied to any one in particular is more profitable to him than to others.

The anonynxous author speaks according to the opinion that fruit of the Mass is of an infinite value; yet it is the opinion that is held by Cajetan,[12763] Melchior Canus,[12764] and others. Nevertheless, the contrary opinion is more common: it is that of St. Thomas,[12765] of St. Bonaventure,[12766] of Scotus,[12767] of Suarez,[12768] of Dominic Sotus.[12769] The same doctrine is taught by Bellarmine,[12770] Gabriel,[12771] Durandus,[12772] Major,[12773] and other theologians. The latter say that the value of the Sacrifice that has reference to the Victim offered is one thing, and another thing is the effect of the Sacrifice; which effect belongs, not to the sufficiency of the Sacrifice, but to the efficacy that Jesus Christ has wished to give to it by limiting it according to his own will. This is what Father Natalis Alexander seems to hold for certain, since he expressly says, in speaking of the holy Sacrifice: "Non æque prodest singulis, ac si pro uno solum offerretur. Virtus enim illius, secundum hanc rationem spectata, finita est; quod autem est finitum, si dividatur inter plures, non æque prodest singulis, ac si uni tantum applicaretur."[12774] Cardinal Bona says that the common opinion is that the fructus medius, or special fruit, of which we speak, is not extensively infinite: "De hoc fructu medio, communis sententia est non esse infinitum extensive."[12775]

Dominic Sotus, speaking of the contrary opinion, writes that he has always regarded it not only as false, but also as opposed to the very ancient practice of the Church: "Semper sum arbitratus, non solum falsam esse, verum antiquissimo Ecclesiæ usui contrariam."[12776] We read the same thing in Du Hamel, who says of the Mass: "Vim habet bona impetrandi, pro quibus offertur;" and then: "Id probat perpetuus Ecclesiæ usus."[12777] He adds that, although the Mass is of an infinite value in view of the dignity of the Victim offered, yet our Lord has wished that the effect of it should be finite, according to his own will; and this for several reasons, but especially for this: "Ut, per reiteratas oblationes, frequentius recoleremus memoriam mortis quam pro nobis passus est in cruce." Tournely expresses the same thought in these terms: "Studium, laborem, ac vigilantiam nostram, hac ratione Deus excitare voluit, nempe, ut, pro mensura nostræ pietatis ac religionis, majorem vel minorem Sacrificii fructum perciperemus." In support of what he says, he quotes the doctrine of St. Thomas: "Quamvis hæc oblatio, ex sui quantitate, sufficiat ad satisfaciendum pro omni pœna, tamen fit satisfactoria illis pro quibus offertur, vel etiam offerentibus, secundum quantitatem suæ devotionis, et non pro tota pœna."[12778]

It is useless to say that the Sacrifice of the Mass is the same as that of the Cross, from which it differs only in the manner in which it is offered, as the Council of Trent teaches; hence, both being of an infinite value, a single Mass produces as much good as ten. We answer that the Sacrifice of the Cross had for its object to satisfy for the sins of men, and that this satisfaction, having been accomplished, it is not necessary to repeat it; but the Sacrifice of the Mass has for its object, not to bring about this satisfaction, but to apply the Sacrifice of the Cross; that is, to apply its fruit which we receive every time we renew the Sacrifice.[12779]

8. THE MASSES SPECIALLY APPLIED, FOR WHICH STIPENDS ARE GIVEN

It cannot be called in question that the custom of applying Masses to those that have them celebrated in order that they may profit by them in a special manner is approved by the Church, according to Cardinal Lambertini,[12780] who says: "Stipendium, quod, ex communi Ecclesiæ disciplina, Sacerdotibus traditur pro comparando fructu medio Sacrificii." It is for this reason that in the Missal there are found votive Masses for certain persons in particular, such as for a bishop, for a sick person, for a person deceased. The Council of Constance condemned, among others, this proposition of Wycliffe: "Speciales orationes, applicatæ uni personæ per prælatos vel religiosos, non plus prosunt eidem, quam generales, cæteris paribus."[12781] Moreover, the Council of Trent[12782] ordains that, in reducing the number of Masses, there remains the obligation of always making a special memento for old benefactors; hence, according to the Council, this memento is of greater profit to the benefactors than a general application.

The anonymous author says that the Eucharist, belonging to charity, and containing in itself the object of charity, which is Jesus Christ, the suffrages offered through charity in Mass are as profitable to all as to one; and to prove this he thus quotes St. Thomas: "Si valor suffragiorum consideretur secundum quod valent ex virtute charitatis unientis membra Ecclesiæ, suffragia pro multis facta tantum singulis prosunt, ac si pro uno tantum fierent."[12783] Now, he himself adds, in the same place, that the holy Doctor afterwards writes that this kind of satisfaction offered for the dead, with the intention of helping some of them more than others, because of such an intention profits more those for whom it is offered than others; and he quotes the following words of St. Thomas: "Tunc magis valet suffragium alicui, quod pro eo singulariter fit, quam quod fit pro eo communiter et multis aliis." But this reasoning of the angelic Doctor does not please our author; he claims that it will always be difficult, not to say impossible, to determine what amount of fruit may be derived by the individual. And yet St. Thomas says: "Tunc magis valet suffragium alicui, quod pro eo singulariter fit, quam quod fit pro eo communiter et multis aliis." At least, St. Thomas having written this, it cannot be looked upon as "temerity," as our author calls it, to say that a Mass applied to any one in particular does not equall profit others.

We must add what has been said on this point at the Council of Lambeth, namely: "Absit enim ne a quoquam catholico credatur, tantum intentione prodesse Missam unam devote celebratam mille hominibus, pro quibus forsan dicitur, quantum si mille Missæ pro eis devotione simili canerentur."[12784] This is what I read in the anonymous author himself; and he answers that this is a metaphysical distinction that he does not find in other Councils. But if he does not find this distinction, one must not conclude that it is false. If he does not find it expressed, he will find it at least indicated: certainly he will not find any Council that says the contrary, namely, that a single Mass, applied to any one, is worth to him as much as a thousand; for this is offensive to the common sense of the faithful.

The following is the conclusion that Father Collet, the continuator of Tournely, speaking of the honorarium of Masses, draws from all that has been said on the subject: "Citra summam temeritatem, aut quid temeritate pejus, culpari non potest, quod tota per orbem frequentat Ecclesia." He adds that the faculty of Paris, in 1521, condemned six propositions that were directed against Mass stipends.

Cardinal Lambertini[12785] also says that it is temerity to condemn the practice of giving stipends for Masses. This is what he says: "Satis erit innuere receptam ab universa Ecclesia consuetudinem ut pro Sacro dentur et accipiantur stipendia, cum ex altari vitæ sustentationem merito desumere minister altaris debeat; ideoque non sine imprudentia mos ejusmodi damnari potest." Yet this is what our anonymous author seems to wish to condemn. He says that the text of St. Paul "Qui altari deserviunt, cum altari participant"[12786] should not be understood of stipends given for Masses to be said for individuals. But it is thus that Gerson understands it; for he says: "Sufficere debet, ad consensum hujus veritatis, usus totius communis Ecclesiæ qui sic habet et recipit; cui si quis detrahit, imprudenter se decipit. Nihil æquius secundum legem esse deducit Apostolus, quam, qui altari deservit, de altari vivat."[12787] The same is taught by St. Thomas, as we shall see further on, and by all theologians.

9. THE CONTRACTS MADE IN REGARD TO THE HONORARIUM

It is not true that all the contracts that are made in regard to Mass stipends are illicit, simoniacal, or shameful, as is said by our anonymous author. As a proof of what he advances, he quotes the following text of the Council of Trent: "Quod ad avaritiam pertinet, cujusvis generis mercedum conditiones, pacta, et quidquid pro Missis novis celebrandis datur, necnon importunas atque illiberales eleemosynarum exactiones potius quam postulationes, aliaque hujusmodi, quæ a simoniaca labe, vel certe a turpi quæstu, non longe absunt, omnino pro hibeant (Episcopi)."[12788] He thence concludes that all the Mass stipends about which a contract is made are simoniacal or tainted with filthy lucre. We must, however, carefully consider the words that are quoted. The Council at first says: "Quod ad avaritiam pertinet, cujusvis generis mercedum conditiones, pacta . . ." The Council wishes, therefore, that one should prohibit all conditions and contracts that are related to avarice Now, avarice is a sin against justice. We distinguish a covetous man from one that is avaricious: the covetous man is one that always desires to amass riches; the avaricious is one that wishes to take what does not belong to him;—hence all contracts and all conditions that relate to avarice, that are unjust, are forbidden to us. As to the words, "Et quidquid pro Missis novis celebrandis datur." To understand this passage, we must know that it was doubted whether a newly-ordained priest could receive offerings for his first Mass; the Sacred Congregation decided, as we have seen above,[12789] that it could be done, but without going about in the church to collect the offerings. The Council finally says: "Necnon importunas atque illiberales eleemosynarum exactiones potius quam postulationes, aliaque hujusmodi, quæ a simoniaca labe vel a turpi quæstu non longe absunt." Simoniacal or shameful are therefore only those sums of money that are obtained through importunate means, but not those that are given freely and spontaneously.

Let us note the following words of Cardinal Lambertini [Benedict XIV.]: "Every priest should have before his mind this maxim that the honorarium of the Mass is not the price of the consecration of the Eucharist, but a means of subsistence conformably to the doctrine of St. Thomas." This is what St. Thomas teaches: "Dispensantur autem Sacramenta per Ecclesiæ ministros, quos oportet a populo sustentari, secundum illud: 'Nescitis quoniam, qui in sacrario operantur, quæ de sacrario sunt, edunt; et qui altari deserviunt, cum altari participant?'[12790] Sic ergo dicendum est quod, accipere pecuniam pro spirituali Sacramentorum gratia, est crimen simoniæ; accipere autem aliqua ad sustentationem eorum qui Sacramenta Christi ministrant, secundum ordinationem Ecclesiæ et consuetudines approbatas, non est simonia, neque peccatum; non enim sumitur tamquam pretium mercedis, sed tamquam stipendium necessitatis." We find quoted in the same place these words of St. Augustine: "Accipiant sustentationem necessitatis."[12791] Speaking specially of the honorarium of the Mass, St. Thomas adds: "Sacerdos non accipit pecuniam quasi pretium consecrationis Eucharistiæ, aut Missæ decantandæ, hoc enim esset simoniacum, sed quasi stipendium suæ sustentationis."[12792]

In the following article, the angelic Doctor gives the reason of this honorarium, and says: "Oportet Sacerdotes a populo sustentari, cui spiritualia administrant, secundum illud: 'Quis militat suis stipendiis unquam? . . . Quis pascit gregem, et de lacte gregis non manducat?'[12793] Et ideo, vendere quod spirituale est, in hujusmodi actibus, aut emere, simoniacum est; sed accipere aut dare aliquid pro sustentatione ministrantium spiritualia, secundum ordinationem Ecclesiæ et consuetudinem approbatam, licitum est; ita tamen quod desit intentio emptionis vel venditionis, et quod ab invitis non exigatur, per spiritualium subtractionem, quæ sunt exhibenda."

He, moreover, says in speaking of contracts. "Facere pactionem de Missa celebranda, est simoniacum. . . ." But he adds: "Si tamen non habet alios sumptus, et non tenetur ex officio Missam cantare, potest accipere denarios, sicut conducti Sacerdotes faciunt, non quasi pretium Missæ, sed quasi sustentamentum vitæ."[12794] Hence those that make themselves guilty of simony are only those priests who, already provided by the Church with an income, with the obligation by virtue of their office to celebrate Mass or to administer the sacraments, still exact another salary; but those that are not bound by such a charge can ask for a honorarium to say Mass, not as the price of the Sacrifice, but as a means of subsistence. Such is the answer given by Tournely to those that say: "Omnis pactio in rebus sacris reprobanda est, quæ veram redolet simoniam, in qua spirituale pro temporali datur." He answers them in the words of St. Thomas: "Stipendium non datur tamquam pretium operis, sed tamquam sustentatio operantis."[12795]

10. THE ABOLITION OF HONORARIA AND THE RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF MASSES WITH OFFERINGS

The Masses said for honoraria or stipends are, therefore, certainly allowed, and they are even approved by the practice of the universal Church, being exempt from every reproach of simony and of filthy lucre, when the contributions are given altogether spontaneously, as we have above demonstrated in accordance with the opinion of St. Thomas, Gerson, Juvenin, Tournely, Thomassinus, Lambertini (Benedict XIV.), Bellarmine, and others. As for the plan of the anonymous author who wishes to abolish them and to re-establish the use of public Masses with the common offerings of the faithful, it seems that, under the present circumstances, such a thing would be more hurtful than useful.

Thomassinus[12796] says, that if it were re-established according as the anonymous proposes, one should see in the Church disorders and injuries more grave than the abuses that my opponent points out. In fact, now that the ancient charity has ceased, as well as the ancient necessity to support the churches, which have been suitably provided by the faithful, it is certain that if the use of honorarium were suppressed, one would not see the ancient offerings revive; and then to what would the large number of priest be reduced who now live on the stipends that they receive for Masses! What employments, what ignoble trades would they be forced to adopt in order to make a living! What scandals and what disorders would be the result!

Even the censor of the anonymous book, while praising it, does not admit of the efficacy of the means proposed. "But this practice," he says on the subject of public Masses with offerings, "is very difficult to re-establish, and would not be a sufficient means to support so many curates, priests, secular and regular."

11. THE CARE OF EXCLUDING UNWORTHY SUBJECTS FROM HOLY ORDERS

The best means, after all, of remedying the abuses resulting from "paid" Masses seems to be that indicated by St. Thomas, namely, that the bishops should strictly observe what is prescribed by the Council of Trent of admitting to Holy Orders all those clerics that have a real intention of devoting themselves to the service of God; of not procuring for themselves, by means of Holy Orders, earthly honors and comforts in order to live more at their ease. St. Thomas says: "Accurate investigandum num, videlicet, Dei causa tantum, aut potius suæ commoditatis gratia, ad Ordines capessendos aspirant, quærentes quæ sua sunt, non quæ Jesu Christi, lucris inhiantes, et honores ab hominibus expetentes; quisquis talis est, nec Dei filius, nec ovilis Christi idoneus pastor futurus, sed mercenaries est."

Thereupon, however, the anonymous author asks how the bishop can assure himself of this good intention of his subjects; and, supposing that he is certain of it for the moment, he cannot assure himself of their perseverance. "Thus," he concludes, "it is impossible not to be deceived on this point." We should therefore, in future, I say to him in reply, never more ordain priests; since one has no certainty of their good intention, and much less of their perseverance! But every one knows that on this earth of ours, in which we walk in darkness, men can act only in a human way; one cannot obtain a physical certainty of their good intention, but one may have a moral certainty. This is sufficient to quiet the consciences of bishops; the same holds good as to perseverance.

It has not been denied, nor is it denied, that with the increase of "paid" Masses many abuses have crept in; but it must be considered that, in all that men do,—in all their functions, in the magistracy as well as in commerce, whatever may be the integrity of the laws that govern them,—abuses have always in the course of time been introduced. Human malice has rendered them inevitable. It is seen that even the holiest things are often subject to abuses; still they are none the less holy. We should therefore try as much as possible to hinder the evil, but not to abolish the thing itself. St. Augustine observes that in every state, in every condition of life, there are good and bad Christians, good and bad religious; there are such, and there will always be such.

12. PRIVILEGED ALTARS

Something still remains to be said about privileged altars, in reference to which the anonymous author does wrong to speak contemptuously; for, in treating of the abuses that are committed on the subject of honoraria, he says: "There are those that wish Masses to be said on a privileged altar, as if the source of graces flowed therefrom more abundantly."

We answer that the abundance of graces does not proceed from this altar, but from the concession of the Sovereign Pontiff, who, by virtue of the supreme power that Jesus Christ has given to the universal Church, as the Council of Trent has declared in these words: "Pro suprema potestate sibi in Ecclesia universali tradita,"[12797] may apply, to the souls for whose benefit the Mass is celebrated,—a part of the treasure of merit of Jesus Christ and of the saints,—as much as is necessary to efface their faults. Let us hear what the learned Cardinal Lambertini[12798] says about this in his work that we have quoted several times. He thus expresses himself: "Certum et commune est apud theologos, indulgentias defunctis prodesse, non tamquam ex potestate judiciaria, uti contingit cum indulgentiæ degentibus adhuc inter vivos conceduntur, sed per modum suffragii, quemadmodum Gabriel Biel fuse demonstrat. Hoc fundamento innititur Summus Pontifex, cum privilegiatas aras declarat, ac pro Missæ celebratione, quæ in illis indicitur ad expiandam defuncti alicujus animam, Thesauri Ecclesiastici eam partem attribuit per modum suffragii, quæ satis est ut eadem anima, si Deo placitum sic fuerit, e purgatorii cruciatibus eripiatur, uti Gregorius XIII. explicat, cum privilegiatum altare metropolitanæ nostræ Sancti Petri largitus est: 'Eam a pœnis purgatorii, quantum divinæ bonitati placuerit, per modum suffragii liberare possit.' " Bellarmine observes that, from the time of Paschal I., who reigned from 817 to 824, concessions of this kind in reference to privileged altars were already in use: "Pascalis I.," he says, "indulgentiam ita concessit, ut, qui, pro anima alicujus particularis personæ defunctæ, tot Missas celebraverit in capella Sancti Zenonis, quæ est in Ecclesia Sanctæ Praxedis, animam illam purgatorii pœnis eripiat."[12799]

Cardinal Lambertini (Benedict XIV.) adds, in regard to privileged altars, several things worthy of note. He relates that under Clement XI. a Congregation of Cardinals established the rule to grant the favor of the privileged altar once a week only to the churches where there would be every day at least five fixed Masses; twice for those where there would be ten Masses; and three times for those where there would be fifteen. It, however, ordained that, in order to enjoy the daily indulgence of the privileged altar, forty Masses would be necessary every day. Innocent XII., on the advice given, June 5, 1694, by the Congregation of the Council, had before decreed that the Masses, the number of which is thus determined in order to enjoy the privilege, should be celebrated every day: "Celebrationem Missarum Indultis præfinitarum omnino necessariam esse singulis diebus in eadem ecclesia." Under Clement XI., July 30, 1706, the Sacred Congregation decided that the indulgences of the privileged altar are suspended when the number of Masses requisite is not said on account of the absence of the religious sent to preach during Advent or Lent, but not, "quando occasione festivitatum, vel funerum, aut similium, ad celebrandum alibi transmittuntur, dummodo raro contingat;" nor are they suspended in case of the sickness of the priests, regular or secular, who are charged with the celebration of the Masses.[12800]

We here put in the first place the prayers that our Holy Mother the Church herself gives us in the Missal. To these prayers we join prayers to which indulgences are attached.—Ed.

PRÆPARATIO AD MISSAM

PRO OPPORTUNITATE SACERDOTIS FACIENDA

ANTIPHONA

NE reminiscaris, Domine, delicta nostra vel parentum nostrorum, neque vindictam sumas de peccatis nostris.

Quæ Antiphona in Festis duplicibus tantum duplicatur; et Tempore Paschali, additur in fine: Alleluia. Deinde dicuntur sequentes Psalmi.

Quam dilecta tabernacula tua, Domine virtutum: * concupiscit et deficit anima mea in atria Domini.

Cor meum et caro mea * exultaverunt in Deum vivum.

Etenim passer invenit sibi domum: * et turtur nidum sibi, ubi ponat pullos suos.

Altaria tua, Domine virtutum: * Rex meus et Deus meus.

Beati qui habitant in domo tua, Domine: * in sæcula sæculorum laudabunt te.

Beatus vir, cujus est auxilium abs te: * ascensiones in corde suo disposuit, in valle lacrymarum, in loco quem posuit.

Etenim benedictionem dabit legislator, ibunt de virtute in virtutem: * videbitur Deus deorum in Sion.

Domine Deus virtutum, exaudi orationem meam: * auribus percipe, Deus Jacob.

Protector noster aspice Deus: * et respice in faciem Christi tui.

Quia melior est dies una in atriis tuis * super millia.

Elegi abjectus esse in domo Dei mei, * magis quam habitare in tabernaculis peccatorum.

Quia misericordiam et veritatem diligit Deus: * gratiam et gloriam dabit Dominus.

Non privabit bonis eos, qui ambulant in innocentia: * Domine virtutum, beatus homo qui sperat in te.

PSALMUS 84

Benedixisti, Domine, terram tuam: * avertisti captivitatem Jacob.

Remisisti iniquitatem plebis tuæ: * operuisti omnia peccato eorum.

Mitigasti omnem iram tuam: * avertisti ab ira indignationis tuæ.

Converte nos, Deus salutaris noster: * et averte iram tuam a nobis.

Numquid in æternum irasceris nobis? * aut extendes iram tuam a generatione in generationem?

Deus, tu conversus vivificabis nos: * et plebs tua lætabitur in te.

Ostende nobis, Domine, misericordiam tuam: * et salutare tuum da nobis.

Audiam quid loquatur in me Dominus Deus: * quoniam loquetur pacem in plebem suam.

Et super Sanctos suos, * et in eos qui convertuntur ad cor.

Verumtamen prope timentes eum salutare ipsius: * ut inhabitet gloria in terra nostra.

Misericordia et veritas obviaverunt sibi: * justitia et pax osculatæ sunt.

Veritas de terra orta est: * et justitia de cœlo prospexit.

Etenim Dominus dabit benignitatem: * et terra nostra dabit fructum suum.

Justitia ante eum ambulabit: * et ponet in via gressus suos.

Gloria Patri.

PSALMUS 85

Inclina, Domine, aurem tuam, et exaudi me: * quoniam inops et pauper sum ego.

Custodi animam meam, quoniam sanctus sum: * salvum fac servum tuum, Deus meus, sperantem in te.

Miserere mei, Domine, quoniam ad te clamavi tota die: * lætifica animam servi tui, quoniam ad te, Domine, animam meam levavi.

Quoniam tu, Domine, suavis et mitis: * et multæ misericordiæ omnibus invocantibus te.

Auribus percipe, Domine, orationem meam, * et intende voci deprecationis meæ.

In die tribulationis meæ clamavi ad te: * quia exaudisti me.

Non est similis tui in diis, Domine: * et non est secundum opera tua.

Omnes gentes quascumque fecisti venient et adorabunt coram te, Domine: * et glorificabunt nomen tuum.

Quoniam magnus es tu et faciens mirabilia: * tu es Deus solus.

Deduc me, Domine, in via tua, et ingrediar in veritate tua: * lætetur cor meum, ut timeat nomen tuum.

Confitebor tibi, Domine Deus meus, in toto corde meo, * et glorificabo nomen tuum in æternum.

Quia misericordia tua magna est super me: * et eruisti animam meam ex inferno inferiori.

Deus, iniqui insurrexerunt super me, et synagoga potentium quæsierunt animam meam: * et non proposuerunt te in conspectu suo.

Et tu, Domine Deus, miserator et misericors, * patiens, et multæ misericordiæ, et verax.

Respice in me, et miserere mei: * da imperium tuum puero tuo, et salvum fac filium ancillæ tuæ.

Fac mecum signum in bonum, ut videant qui oderunt me, et confundantur: * quoniam tu, Domine, adjuvisti me, et consolatus es me.

Gloria Patri.

PSALMUS 115

Credidi, propter quod locutus sum: * ego autem humiliatus sum nimis.

Ego dixi in excessu meo: * Omnis homo mendax.

Quid retribuam Domino * pro omnibus quæ retribuit mihi?

Calicem salutaris accipiam, * et nomen Domini invocabo.

Vota mea Domino reddam coram omni populo ejus: * pretiosa in conspectu Domini mors Sanctorum ejus.

O Domine, quia ego servus tuus: * ego servus tuus, et filius ancillæ tuæ.

Dirupisti vincula mea: * tibi sacrificabo hostiam laudis, et nomen Domini invocabo.

Vota mea Domino reddam in conspectu omnis populi ejus: * in atriis domus Domini, in medio tui Jerusalem.

Gloria Patri.

PSALMUS 129

De profundis clamavi ad te, Domine: * Domine, exaudi vocem meam.

Fiant aures tuæ intendentes * in vocem deprecationis meæ.

Si iniquitates observaveris, Domine: * Domine, quis sustinebit?

Quia apud te propitiatio est, * et propter legem tuam sustinui te, Domine.

Sustinuit anima mea in verbo ejus: * speravit anima mea in Domino.

A custodia matutina usque ad noctem * speret Israel in Domino.

Quia apud Dominum misericordia, * et copiosa apud eum redemptio.

Et ipse redimet Israel * ex omnibus iniquitatibus ejus.

Gloria Patri.

Deinde repetitur Antiphona:

Ne reminiscaris, Domine, delicta nostra vel parentum nostrorum, neque vindictam sumas de peccatis nostris. (Alleluja.)

OREMUS

Aures tuæ pietatis, mitissime Deus, inclina precibus nostris, et gratia Sancti Spiritus illumina cor nostrum: ut tuis mysteriis digne ministrare, teque æterna charitate diligere mereamur.

Deus, cui omne cor patet, et omnis voluntas loquitur, et quem nullum latet secretum; purifica per infusionem Sancti Spiritus cogitationes cordis nostri: ut te perfecte diligere et digne laudare mereamur.

Ure igne Sancti Spiritus renes nostros et cor nostrum, Domine: ut tibi casto corpore serviamus et mundo corde placeamus.

Mentes nostras, quæsumus, Domine, Paraclitus, qui a te procedit, illuminet, et inducat in omnem, sicut tuus promisit Filius, veritatem.

Adsit nobis, quæsumus, Domine, virtus Spiritus Sancti: quæ et corda nostra clementer expurget et ab omnibus tueatur adversis.

Deus, qui corda fidelium Sancti Spiritus illustratione docuisti; da nobis in eodem Spiritu recta sapere, et de ejus semper consolatione gaudere.

Conscientias nostras, quæsumus, Domine, visitando purifica: ut veniens Dominus noster Jesus Christus Filius tuus paratam sibi in nobis inveniat mansionem. Qui tecum vivit et regnat in unitate Spiritus Sancti Deus, per omnia sæcula sæculorum. Amen.

ORATIONES

PRO OPPORTUNITATE SACERDOTIS ANTE CELEBRATIONEM ET COMMUNIONEM DICENDÆ

I. ORATIO SANCTI AMBROSII EPISCOPI

DIE DOMINICA

SUMME Sacerdos et vere Pontifex, Jesu Christe, qui te obtulisti Deo Patri hostiam puram et immaculatam in ara crucis pro nobis miseris peccatoribus, et qui dedisti nobis carnem tuam ad manducandum, et sanguinem tuum ad bibendum, et posuisti mysterium istud in virtute Spiritus Sancti tui, dicens: Hæc quotiescumque feceritis, in mei memoriam facietis: rogo per eundem sanguinem tuum, magnum salutis nostræ pretium: rogo per hanc miram et ineffabilem caritatem, qua nos miseros et indignos sic amare dignatus es, ut lavares nos a peccatis nostris in sanguine tuo: doce me servum tuum indignum, quem inter cetera dona tua etiam ad officium sacerdotale vocare dignatus es, nullis meis meritis, sed sola dignatione misericordiæ tuæ: doce me, quæso, per Spiritum Sanctum tuum, tantum tractare mysterium ea reverentia et honore, ea devotione et timore, quibus oportet et decet. Fac me per gratiam tuam semper illud de tanto mysterio credere et intelligere, sentire et firmiter tenere, dicere et cogitare, quod tibi placet et expedit animæ meæ. Intret Spiritus tuus bonus in cor meum, qui sonet ibi sine sono, et sine strepitu verborum loquatur omnem veritatem. Profunda quippe sunt nimis, et sacro tecta velamine. Propter magnam clementiam tuam concede mihi Missarum solemnia mundo corde et pura mente celebrare. Libera cor meum ab immundis et nefandis, vanis et noxiis cogitationibus. Muni me beatorum Angelorum pia et fida custodia ac tutela fortissima, ut hostes omnium bonorum confusi discedant. Per virtutem tanti mysterii, et per manum Sancti Angeli tui repelle a me et a cunctis servis tuis durissimum spiritum superbiæ et xenodoxiæ, invidiæ et blasphemiæ, fornicationis et immunditiæ, dubietatis et diffidentiæ. Confundantur, qui nos persequuntur: pereant illi, qui nos perdere festinant.

FERJA SECUNDA

Rex virginum, et amator castitatis et integritatis, cœlesti rore benedictionis tuæ extingue in corpore meo fomitem ardentis libidinis: ut maneat in me tenor castitatis corporis et animæ. Mortifica in membris meis carnis stimulos omnesque libidinosas commotiones, et da mihi veram et perpetuam castitatem cum ceteris donis tuis, quæ tibi placent in veritate: ut sacrificium laudis casto corpore et mundo corde valeam tibi offerre. Quanta onim cordis contritione et lacrymarum fonte, quanta reverentia et tremore, quanta corporis castitate et animæ puritate istud divinum et cœleste sacrificium est celebrandum, ubi caro tua in veritate sumitur, ubi sanguis tuus in veritate bibitur, ubi ima summis, terrena divinis junguntur, ubi adest sanctorum Angelorum præsentia, ubi tu es sacrificium et sacerdos mirabiliter et ineffabiliter constitutus!

FERIA TERTIA

Quis digne hoc celebrare poterit, nisi tu Deus omnipotens offerentem feceris dignum? Scio, Domine, et vere scio, et idipsum pietati tuæ confiteor, quia non sum dignus accedere ad tantum mysterium propter nimia peccata mea et infinitas negligentias meas. Sed scio, et veraciter ex toto corde meo credo et ore confiteor, quia tu potes me facere dignum, qui solus potes facere mundum de immundo conceptum semine, et de peccatoribus justos et sanctos. Per hanc omnipotentiam tuam te rogo, Deus meus, ut concedas mihi peccatori hoc sacrificium celebrare cum timore et tremore, cum cordis puritate et lacrymarum fonte, cum lætitia spirituali et cœlesti gaudio. Sentiat mens mea dulcedinem beatissimæ præsentiæ tuæ, et excubias sanctorum Angelorum tuorum in circuitu meo.

FERIA QUARTA

Ego enim, Domine, memor venerandæ passionis tuæ accedo ad altare tuum, licet peccator, ut offeram tibi sacrificium, quod tu instituisti, et offerri præcepisti in commemorationem tui pro salute nostra. Suscipe illud, quæso, summe Deus, pro Ecclesia sancta tua et pro populo, quem acquisisti sanguine tuo. Et quoniam me peccatorem inter te et eundem populum tuum medium esse voluisti, licet in me aliquod boni operis testimonium non agnoscas, officium saltem dispensationis creditæ non recuses: nec per me indignum, eorum salutis pereat pretium, pro quibus victima salutaris dignatus es esse redemptio. Profero etiam, Domine (si digneris propitius intueri), tribulationes plebium, pericula populorum, captivorum gemitus, miserias orphanorum, necessitates peregrinorum, inopiam debilium, desperationes languentium, defectus senum, suspiria iuvenum, vota virginum, lamenta viduarum.

FERIA QUINTA

Tu enim misereris omnium, Domine: et nihil odisti eorum quæ fecisti. Memorare, quæ sit nostra substantia: quia tu Pater noster es, quia tu Deus noster es, ne irascaris satis, neque multitudinem viscerum tuorum super nos contineas. Non enim in justificationibus nostris prosternimus preces ante faciem tuam, sed in miserationibus tuis multis. Aufer a nobis iniquitates nostras: et ignem Sancti Spiritus in nobis clementer accende. Aufer cor lapideum de carne nostra: et da nobis cor carneum, quod te amet, te diligat, te delectetur, te sequatur, te perfruatur. Oramus, Domine, clementiam tuam, ut sereno vultu familiam tuam, sacri tui nominis officia præstolantem, aspicere digneris; et ut nullius sit irritum votum, nullius vacua postulatio, tu nobis preces suggere, quas ipse propitius audire et exaudire delecteris.

FERIA SEXTA

Rogamus etiam te, Domine Sancte Pater, et pro spiritibus fidelium defunctorum, ut sit illis salus, sanitas, gaudium et refrigerium hoc magnum pietatis Sacramentum. Domine Deus meus, sit illis hodie magnum et plenum convivium de te pane vivo, qui de cœlo descendisti, et das vitam mundo, de tua carne sancta et benedicta, Agni videlicet immaculati, qui tollis peccata mundi, quæ de sancto et glorioso Beatæ Virginis Mariæ utero est assumpta, et de Spiritu Sancto concepta; ac de illo pietatis fonte, qui per lanceam militis ex tuo sacratissimo latere emanavit: ut exinde refecti et satiati, refrigerati et consolati exultent in laude et gloria tua. Peto clementiam tuam, Domine, ut descendat super panem tibi sacrificandum plenitudo tuæ benedictionis et sanctificatio tuæ Divinitatis. Descendat etiam, Domine, illa Sancti Spiritus tui invisibilis incomprehensibilisque majestas, sicut quondam in patrum hostias descendebat, qui et oblationes nostras, Corpus et Sanguinem tuum efficiat, et me indignum sacerdotem doceat tantum tractare mysterium cum cordis puritate et lacrymarum devotione, cum reverentia et tremore, ita ut placide ac benigne suscipias sacrificium de manibus meis ad salutem omnium tam vivorum quam defunctorum.

Rogo etiam te, Domine, per ipsum sacrosanctum mysterium Corporis et Sanguinis tui, quo quotidie in Ecclesia tua pascimur et potamur, abluimur et sanctificamur, atque unius summæ divinitatis participes efficimur, da mihi virtutes tuas sanctas, quibus repletus, bona conscientia ad altare tuum accedam, ita ut hæc cœlestia sacramenta efficiantur mihi salus et vita. Tu enim dixisti ore tuo sancto et benedicto: Panis, quem ego dabo, caro mea est pro mundi vita: Ego sum panis vivus, qui de cœlo descendi: si quis manducaverit ex hoc pane, vivet in æternum. Panis dulcissime, sana palatum cordis mei, ut sentiam suavitatem amoris tui. Sana illud ab omni languore, ut nullam præter te sentiam dulcedinem. Panis candidissime, habens omne delectamentum et omnem saporem, qui nos semper reficis, et numquam in te deficis: comedat te cor meum, et dulcedine saporis tui repleantur viscera animæ meæ. Manducat te Angelus ore pleno, manducet te peregrinus homo pro modulo suo, ne deficere possit in via, tali recreatus viatico. Panis sancte, panis vive, panis munde, qui descendisti de cœlo, et das vitam mundo, veni in cor meum, et munda me ab omni inquinamento carnis et spiritus. Intra in animam meain, sana et munda me interius et exterius. Esto tutamen et continua salus animæ et corporis mei. Repelle a me insidiantes mihi hostes: recedant procul a præsentia potentiæ tuæ, ut foris et intus per te munitus, recto tramite ad tuum regnum perveniam, ubi non in mysteriis, sicut in hoc tempore agitur, sed facie ad faciem te videbimus, cum tradideris regnum Deo et Patri, et eris Deus omnia in omnibus. Tunc me de te satiabis satietate mirifica, ita ut nec esuriam nec sitiam in æternum. Qui cum eodem Deo Patre et Spiritu Sancto vivis et regnas per omnia sæcula sæculorum. Amen.

II. ALIA ORATIO ANTE MISSAM

Ad mensam dulcissimi convivii tui, pie Domine Jesu Christe, ego peccator de propriis meritis nihil præsumens, sed de tua confidens misericordia et bonitate, accedere vereor et contremisco. Nam cor et corpus habeo multis criminibus maculatum, mentem et linguam non caute custoditam. Ergo, O pia Deitas, O tremenda Majestas, ego miser inter angustias deprehensus, ad te fontem misericordiæ recurro, ad te festino sanandus, sub tuam protectionem fugio: et quem judicem sustinere nequeo, Salvatorem habere suspiro. Tibi, Domine, plagas meas ostendo: tibi verecundiam meam detego. Scio peccata mea multa et magna, pro quibus timeo. Spero in misericordias tuas, quarum non est numerus. Respice ergo in me oculis misericordiæ tuæ, Domine Jesu Christe, Rex æterne, Deus et homo, crucifixus propter hominem. Exaudi me sperantem in te: miserere mei pleni miseriis et peccatis, tu qui fontem miserationis numquam manare cessabis. Salve salutaris victima, pro me et omni humano genere in patibulo crucis oblata. Salve nobilis et pretiose Sanguis, de Vulneribus crucifixi Domini mei Jesu Christi profluens et peccata totius mundi abluens. Recordare, Domine, creaturæ tuæ, quam tuo Sanguine redemisti. Pœnitet me peccasse, cupio emendare quod feci. Aufer ergo a me, clementissime Pater, omnes iniquitates et peccata mea: ut purificatus mente et corpore, digne degustare merear Sancta Sanctorum: et concede, ut sancta prælibatio Corporis et Sanguinis tui, quam ego indignus sumere intendo, sit peccatorum meorum remissio, sit delictorum perfecta purgatio, sit turpium cogitationum effugatio ac bonorum sensuum regeneratio, operumque tibi placentium salubris efficacia, animæ quoque et corporis contra inimicorum meorum insidias firmissima tuitio. Amen.

III. ORATIO SANCTI THOMÆ AQUINATIS

Omnipotens sempiterne Deus, ecce accedo ad sacramentum unigeniti Filii tui Domini nostri Jesu Christi: accedo tamquam infirmus ad medicum vitæ, immundus ad fontem misericordiæ, cæcus ad lumen claritatis æternæ, pauper et egenus ad Dominum cœli et terræ. Rogo ergo immensæ largitatis tuæ abundantiam, quatenus meam curare digneris infirmitatem, lavare fœditatem, illuminare cæcitatem, ditare paupertatem, vestire nuditatem: ut panem Angelorum, Regem regum, et Dominum dominantium, tanta suscipiam reverentia et humilitate, tanta contritione et devotione, tanta puritate et fide, tali proposito et intentione, sicut expedit saluti animæ meæ. Da mihi, quæso, Dominici Corporis et Sanguinis non solum suscipere sacramentum, sed etiam rem et virtutem sacramenti. O mitissime Deus, da mihi Corpus unigeniti Filii tui Domini nostri Jesu Christi, quod traxit de Virgine Maria, sic suscipere, ut corpori suo mystico merear incorporari, et inter ejus membra connumerari. O amantissime Pater, concede mihi dilectum Filium tuum, quem nunc velatum in via suscipere propono, revelata tandem facie perpetuo contemplari. Qui tecum vivit et regnat in unitate Spiritus Sancti Deus, per omnia sæcula sæculorum. Amen.

INDULGENCED PRAYERS FOR PRIESTS

I. PRAYER BEFORE MASS

(Indulgence of fifty days.—Gregory XIII.—This indulgence, as also the following indulgences, are applicable to the souls in purgatory.)

EGO volo celebrare Missam, et conficere Corpus et Sanguinem Domini nostri Jesu Christi, juxta ritum Sanctæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ, ad laudem omnipotentis Dei totiusque curiæ triumphantis, ad utilitatem meam totiusque curiæ militantis, pro omnibus, qui se commendarunt orationibus meis in genere et in specie, et pro felici statu Sanctæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ. Amen.

Gaudium cum pace, emendationem vitæ, spatium veræ pœnitentiæ, gratiam et consolationem S. Spiritus, perseverantiam in bonis operibus tribuat nobis omnipotens et misericors Deus. Amen.

II. PRAYER IN HONOR OF ST. JOSEPH

(Indulgence of 100 days, if one recites this prayer before celebrating Mass.—Pius IX., 4 Febr. 1877.)

O felicem virum beatum Joseph, cui datum est Deum, quem multi reges voluerunt videre et non viderunt, audire et non audierunt, non solum videre et audire, sed portare, deosculari, vestire, et custodire!

V. Ora pro nobis, beate Joseph.

R. Ut digni efficiamur promissionibus Christi.

OREMUS

Dens, qui dedisti nobis regale sacerdotium, præsta, quæsumus, ut sicut beatus Joseph unigenitum Filium tuum natum ex Maria Virgine suis manibus reverenter tractare meruit et portare, ita nos facias cum cordis munditia et operis innocentia tuis sanctis altaribus deservire, ut sacrosanctum Filii tui Corpus et Sanguinem hodie digne sumamus, et in futuro sæculo præmium habere mereamur æternum. Per Christum Dominum nostrum. Amen.

III. ANOTHER PRAYER TO ST. JOSEPH

Virginum custos et pater, sancte Joseph, cujus fideli custodiæ ipsa Innocentia Christus Jesus et Virgo virginum Maria commissa fuit, te per hoc utrumque carissimum pignus Jesum et Mariam obsecro et obtestor, ut me ab omni immunditia præservatum, mente incontaminata, puro corde et casto corpore Jesu et Mariæ semper facias castissime famulari. R. Amen.

GRATIARUM ACTIO

POST MISSAM

Benedicat terra Dominum: laudet et superexaltet eum in sæcula.

Benedicite montes et colles Domino: benedicite universa germinantia in terra Domino.

Benedicite fontes Domino: benedicite maria et flumina Domino.

Benedicite cete, et omnia quæ moventur in aquis, Domino: benedicite omnes volucres cœli Domino.

Benedicite omnes bestiæ et pecora Domino: benedicite filii hominum Domino.

Benedicat Israel Dominum: laudet et superexaltet eum in sæcula.

Benedicite sacerdotes Domini Domino: benedicite servi Domini Domino.

Benedicite spiritus et animæ justorum Domino: benedicite sancti et humiles corde Domino.

Benedicite Anania, Azaria, Misael Domino: laudate et superexaltate eum in sæcula.

Benedicamus Patrem et Filium cum Sancto Spiritu: laudemus, et superexaltemus eum in sæcula.

Benedictus es, Domine, in firmamento cœli: et laudabilis et gloriosus et superexaltatus in sæcula.

Psalmus 150.

Laudate Dominum in Sanctis ejus: laudate eum in firmamento virtutis ejus.

Laudate eum in virtutibus ejus: laudate eum secundum multitudinem magnitudinis ejus.

Laudate eum in sono tubæ: laudate eum in psalterio et cithara.

Laudate eum in tympano et choro: laudate eum in chordis et organo.

Laudate eum in cymbalis benesonantibus: laudate eum in cymbalis jubilationis: omnis spiritus laudet Dominum.

Gloria Patri.

OREMUS

Deus, qui tribus pueris mitigasti flammas ignium; concede propitius, ut nos famulos tuos non exurat flamma vitiorum.

Actiones nostras, quæsumus, Domine, aspirando præveni et adjuvando prosequere: ut cuncta nostra oratio et operatio a te semper incipiat, et per te cœpta finiatur.

Da nobis, quæsumus, Domine, vitiorum nostrorum flammas extinguere, qui beato Laurentio tribuisti tormentorum suorum incendia superare. Per Christum Dominum nostrum. Amen.

ORATIONES

POST CELEBRATIONEM ET COMMUNIONEM DICENDÆ

I. ORATIO SANCTI THOMÆ AQUINATIS

GRATIAS tibi ago, Domine sancte, Pater omnipotens, æterne Deus, qui me peccatorem indignum famulum tuum, nullis meis meritis, sed sola dignatione misericordiæ tuæ satiare dignatus es pretioso Corpore et Sanguine Filii tui Domini nostri Jesu Christi. Et precor, ut hæc sancta communio non sit mihi reatus ad pœnam, sed intercessio salutaris ad veniam. Sit mihi armatura fidei, et scutum bonæ voluntatis. Sit vitiorum meorum evacuatio: concupiscentiæ et libidinis exterminatio: caritatis et patientiæ, humilitatis et obedientiæ, omniumque virtutum augmentatio: contra insidias inimicorum omnium, tam visibilium quam invisibilium, firma defensio: motuum meorum, tam carnalium quam spiritualium, perfecta quietatio: in te uno ac vero Deo firma adhæsio: atque finis mei felix consummatio. Et precor te, ut ad illud ineffabile convivium me peccatorem perducere digneris, ubi tu cum Filio tuo et Spiritu Sancto, Sanctis tuis es lux vera, satietas plena, gaudium sempiternum, jucunditas consummata, et felicitas perfecta. Per eumdem Christum Dominum nostrum. Amen.

II. ORATIO SANCTI BONAVENTURÆ

Transfige, dulcissime Domine Jesu, medullas et viscera animæ meæ suavissimo ac saluberrimo amoris tui vulnere, vera serenaque et apostolica sanctissima caritate, ut langueat et liquefiat anima mea solo semper amore et desiderio tui, te concupiscat et deficiat in atria tua, cupiat dissolvi et esse tecum. Da, ut anima mea te esuriat, panem Angelorum, refectionem animarum sanctarum, panem nostrum quotidianum supersubstantialem, habentem omnem dulcedinem et saporem et omne delectamentum suavitatis: te, in quem desiderant Angeli prospicere, semper esuriat et comedat cor meum, et dulcedine saporis tui repleantur viscera animæ meæ: te semper sitiat fontem vitæ, fontem sapientiæ et scientiæ, fontem æterni luminis, torrentem voluptatis, ubertatem domus Dei: te semper ambiat, te quærat, te inveniat, ad te tendat, ad te perveniat, te meditetur, te loquatur, et omnia operetur in laudem et gloriam nominis tui, cum humilitate et discretione, cum dilectione et delectatione cum facilitate et affectu, cum perseverantia usque in finem: et tu sis solus semper spes mea, tota fiducia mea, divitiæ meæ, delectatio mea, jucunditas mea gaudium meum, quies et tranquillitas mea, pax mea, suavitas mea, odor meus, dulcedo mea, cibus meus, refectio mea, refugium meum, auxilium meum, sapientia mea, portio mea, possessio mea, thesaurus meus, in quo fixa et firma et immobiliter semper sit radicata mens mea et cor meum. Amen.

III. RHYTHMUS S. THOMÆ A.D. SACRAM EUCHARISTIAM

(Indulg. 100 dierum, Leo PP. XIII., 20 Dec. 1884.)

Adoro te devote, latens Deitas,
Quæ sub his figuris vere latitas;
Tibi se cor meum totum subjicit:
Quia te contemplans totum deficit.
Visus, tactus, gustus in te fallitur,
Sed auditu solo tuto creditur.
Credo quidquid dixit Dei Filius:
Nil hoc verbo Veritatis verius.
In cruce latebat sola Deitas;
At hic latet simul et humanitas.
Ambo tamen credens atque confitens,
Peto quod petivit latro pœnitens.
Plagas, sicut Thomas, non intueor;
Deum tamen meum te confiteor:
Fac me tibi semper magis credere,
In te spem habere, te diligere.
O memoriale mortis Domini!
Panis vivus, vitam præstans homini:
Præsta meæ menti de te vivere,
Et te illi semper dulce sapere.
Pie Pelicane, Jesu Domine,
Me immundum munda tuo sanguine:
Cujus una stilla salvum facere
Totum mundum quit ab omni scelere.
Jesu, quem velatum nunc aspicio,
Oro, fiat illud, quod tam sitio;
Ut te revelatâ cernens facie,
Visu sim beatus tuæ gloriæ.
Amen.

INDULGENCED PRAYERS FOR PRIESTS

I. PRAYERS AFTER MASS

(Indulgence of three years.—This indulgence, as also the following indulgences, are applicable to the souls in purgatory.—Pius IX., Dec. 11, 1846.)

OBSECRO te, dulcissime Domine Jesu Christe, ut Passio tua sit mihi virtus, qua muniar, protegar, atque defendar: vulnera tua sint mihi cibus potusque, quibus pascar, inebrier, atque delecter; aspersio Sanguinis tui sit mihi ablutio omnium delictorum meorum, mors tua sit mihi gloria sempiterna. In his sit mihi refectio, exultatio, sanitas, et dulcedo cordis mei. Qui vivis et regnas in sæcula sæculorum. Amen.

II. INVOCATION OF ST. IGNATIUS

(Post Missam Indulg. 7 annorum semel in die; aliter 300 dierum toties quoties. Indulg. plenar. semel in mense, si hæc Oratio quotidie recitatur.—Pius IX., 9 Jan. 1854.)

Anima Christi, sanctifica me; Corpus Christi, salva me; Sanguis Christi, inebria me; Aqua lateris Christi, lava me; Passio Christi, conforta me. O bone Jesu, exaudi me; intra Vulnera tua absconde me; ne permittas me separari a te; ab hoste maligno defende me; in hora mortis meæ voca me, et jube me venire ad te, ut cum Angelis tuis laudem te in sæcula sæculorum. Amen.

III. PRAYER BEFORE THE CRUCIFIX

(Plenary indulgence for those that recite it after Confession and Communion, and who add some other prayer to the intention of His Holiness.—Pius IX., July 31, 1858.)

En ego, O bone et dulcissime Jesu, ante conspectum tuum genibus me provolvo ac maximo animi ardore te oro atque obtestor, ut meum in cor vividos fidei, spei et caritatis sensus, atque veram peccatorum meorum pœnitentiam, eaque emendandi firmissimam voluntatem velis imprimere: dum magno animi affectu et dolore tua quinque Vulnera mecum ipse considero ac mente contemplor, illud præ oculis habens, quod jam in ore ponebat suo David propheta de te, O bone Jesu: “Foderunt manus meas et pedes meos, dinumeraverunt omnia ossa mea.”

PREPARATION FOR MASS AND THANKSGIVING AFTER IT

ConsiderationS AND AFFECTIONS. VARIOUS PRAYERS

We do not precisely know when St. Alphonsus composed and published this little work; but it is probably that which is found in the collection printed in 1758 under the title of Novena of Christmas, and which Cardinal Villecourt (1. 6, p. I., ch. v. et vi. 1 Tableau chron.) mentions in these words: "Acts for preparation and thanksgiving, preceded by a few considerations on the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass."—Ed.

INTRODUCTION

1. IMPORTANCE OF THE HOLY SACRIFICE

MAN cannot perform a more holy, a more grand, and a more sublime action than to celebrate a Mass, in regard to which the Council of Trent says: "We must needs confess that no other work can be performed by the faithful so holy and divine as this tremendous mystery itself."[12801] God himself cannot cause an action to be performed that is holier and grander than the celebration of Mass. All the sacrifices of the Old Law were but a shadow, a figure, of our divine Sacrifice. The sacrifice of the lives of all the saints, of all the angels, of the Mother of God herself, would certainly never procure for God the honor that a single Mass procures, because only the Mass renders to God an infinite honor.

The Mass is therefore an action that renders to God the greatest honor that can be rendered to him, and that obtains the most powerful suffrage for the souls in purgatory. It is also an action that breaks most triumphantly the powers of hell, that most efficaciously appeases the anger of the Lord against sinners, and that obtains for us most abundant graces. For what is the good thing of him, and what is his beautiful thing, but the corn of the elect, and wine springing forth virgins?[12802] At the Mass the Son of God himself sacrifices himself to his eternal Father and gives himself to us in the Holy Sacrament, which contains all that is good and beautiful in the Church; for, as St. Thomas says, all the other sacraments have as their end the Eucharist —"Nearly all the sacraments are brought to perfection in the Eucharist."[12803]

Every Mass that is celebrated procures for the world the greatest benefits that the Sacrifice on the cross procured for it, according to the teaching of the angelic Doctor who says: "Whatever is the effect of the Passion of our Lord, is also entirely the effect of this sacrament."[12804] The holy Church also assures us of this when she says: "As many times as this commemorative sacrifice is celebrated, so often is the work of our redemption performed."[12805] In fact, it is the same Redeemer who is the Victim offered on the altar where he offers himself as a sacrifice by the ministry of the priests; and the Council of Trent teaches: "For the victim is one and the same—the same now offering by the ministry of priests, who then offered himself on the cross, the manner alone of offering being different."[12806] Thus, as the Doctors teach, if Jesus Christ had not yet come into the world, the priest would make him come by pronouncing the form of Consecration according to the celebrated sentence of St. Augustine: "O sublime dignity of priests, in whose hands, as in the womb of the Virgin, the Son of God became incarnate!"[12807] The sacrifice of the cross is applied to us by a Sacrifice of the altar. The Passion of our Lord renders us capable of redemption; Mass puts us in possession of it, and makes us participate in the merits of Jesus Christ.

We are then incapable, by any work that we may perform, of thanking God for the innumerable benefits that he has conferred upon us; but by offering to him Jesus Christ at the Sacrifice of the Mass, we render him worthy thanksgiving. St. Irenæus says: "The divine Sacrifice was instituted that we might not be ungrateful to God."[12808] Moreover, by this sacrifice we can obtain all graces. It has been promised us that we shall obtain all that we shall ask of God in the name of Jesus Christ: If you ask the Father anything in My name, he will give it to you;[12809] how much more confidently should we hope to obtain what we ask, when we offer him Jesus Christ himself! Our loving Redeemer is continually making intercession for us in heaven: Who also maketh intercession for us.[12810] But this is done more especially at the time of the Sacrifice of the Mass, in which, by the hands of the priest, he presents himself to his Father to obtain graces for us. If we knew that all the saints, with the Blessed Virgin, were praying for us, what confidence would we not have to obtain favors! Now, a single prayer of Jesus Christ can effect infinitely more than all the prayers of the saints.

Poor, wretched sinners, what would become of us if we had not this divine Sacrifice to appease the Lord? "For the Lord," says the Council of Trent, "appeases by the oblation thereof, and, granting the grace and gift of penitence, forgives even heinous crimes and sins."[12811] In a word, as the Passion of Jesus Christ was sufficient to save the whole world, so is a single Mass sufficient to save it. Hence, while offering the chalice, the priest says: "We offer unto Thee, O Lord! the chalice of salvation, . . . for our salvation, and for that of the whole world.[12812]

2. THE MASS THAT IS CELEBRATED WITH BUT LITTLE RESPECT AND DEVOTION

Let us thence conclude what will be the account that will have to be rendered by priests who celebrate this great sacrifice without reverence. The Venerable Father John d'Avila, hearing that a priest had died after having celebrated his first Mass, cried out: "O what a terrible account will this priest have to render for this first Mass!" Alas! where do we find devotion, reverence, among the priests that say Mass? Mass is, as we have said, the sublimest, the holiest action; so that, according to the Council of Trent, we should perform it with as much devotion and purity of conscience as possible: "It is sufficiently clear that all industry and diligence are to be applied to this end; that it be performed with the greatest possible inward cleanness and purity of heart, and outward show of devotion and piety."[12813] Nevertheless, this action is the most neglected by many priests. Certainly, they would use more care in performing a part in a comedy than they would in celebrating Mass. There are some that go so far as to say Mass in less than a quarter of an hour. This cannot be excused from a mortal sin even when it would be a Mass for the dead, as we have proved in our Moral Theology,[12814] for it is impossible to celebrate Mass in so short a time without neglecting in a serious manner the words and the ceremonies; without gravely failing in the respect and gravity that such a Sacrifice demands; and, moreover, without giving great scandal to seculars.

In speaking of this subject, one should shed tears, and tears of blood. On the day of judgment, priests that celebrate in this manner will be greatly to be pitied. But greatly are also to be compassionated bishops that permit them to celebrate Mass; for bishops, as in the common opinion of Doctors, and as is certain according to the Council of Trent, are strictly obliged to forbid priests to celebrate Mass if they say it with such an irreverence (called impiety by the Council), which, while speaking of this divine Sacrifice, expresses itself thus: "The holy Synod decrees that the ordinary bishops of places shall take diligent care, and be bound, to prohibit all those things that irreverence (which can hardly be separated from impiety) has introduced."[12815] To fulfil this precept of the Council conformably to the terms quoted, "they shall take diligent care, and be bound, to prohibit." The bishops are therefore obliged continually to watch and to gather information in regard to the manner in which the Masses are celebrated in their dioceses, and to suspend from celebrating Mass those that perform this duty without due care and without befitting gravity. Besides, this obligation imposed on the bishops regards, not only secular priests, but also religious; for by the same decree the bishops are in this respect appointed apostolic delegates—"As delegates of the Apostolic See, they may prohibit, ordain, reform, and establish, and may compel the faithful people inviolably to observe them, by ecclesiastical censures and other penalties."[12816]

However, notwithstanding all this, we must say that it is a pity to see priests ordinarily holding in contempt Jesus Christ when they celebrate this august mystery; and what causes most astonishment is to see even religious belonging to the reformed Orders, in which regular observance should reign, saying Mass in such a way that they would scandalize even Turks and idolaters.

It is true that the Sacrifice of the altar suffices to pacify God for all the sins of the world; but how can it pacify him for the injuries that priests heap upon him during the time that they offer the sacrifice to him? In celebrating Mass with so little respect, they on their part cause God more dishonor than honor; they offend him then by outraging the divine Victim even though they offer him to God. The heretic who does not believe in the real presence of Jesus Christ in the holy Sacrifice is guilty; but more guilty is he who believes in it and manifests no respect for it. Moreover, the priest who celebrates Mass with little respect causes those that are present to lose the esteem and the veneration due to the majesty of so great a sacrament. The Jewish people had at first great veneration for Jesus Christ; but when they saw him despised by the priests, they lost all the esteem that they had entertained for him. So, also, at present the people lose the respect that they had for Mass when they see it treated with so much negligence and indevotion by priests. As a Mass celebrated devoutly inspires devotion, so, on the contrary, the irreverence of the priest diminishes the veneration and even the faith of those that are present. In fact, how could the indevotion of the priest, who is the minister of this divine Sacrifice and the guardian of the body of Jesus Christ, inspire others with sentiments of respect and devotion? What idea can a priest give to others, of the sanctity and the majesty of so august a mystery, who shows for it contempt rather than veneration?

But one will say: Seculars complain of priests when the Mass is long. What! is the little devotion that seculars have, to be the rule governing the amount of respect with which the priest should celebrate Mass? I add that if all the priests would celebrate with the respect and the gravity that are due to this great sacrifice, seculars would assuredly be penetrated with a quite different veneration for Mass; and they would not complain of being obliged to hear a Mass that lasts half an hour. But usually seeing only Masses that inspire anything but respect and devotion, they assume the habit of indevotion and languor in the faith. Then if they see a priest celebrate Mass with befitting reverence, that bad habit makes them feel annoyed, and they complain; and those that do not grow tired by remaining several hours at a gaming-table, or in an ante-chamber to pay court to a man of this world, find it irksome to spend half an hour in a church in order to hear Mass. If all the priests, says an author, would celebrate Mass as priests, seculars would hear Mass devoutly as Christians.

How astonishing! God enjoined upon priests of the Old Law to tremble at the mere sight of the sanctuary—Pavete ad sanctuarium meum;[12817] and the priests ot Jesus Christ should dare to remain at the altar in the presence of the incarnate Word to offer him as a sacrifice, to hold him in their hands, and to nourish themselves with his adorable flesh,—to do all this with little respect!

For my part, says one of them, I do not fail in what is essential; to fail in the ceremonies is a trifling matter. Let him who speaks in this manner listen to the words that the Lord addressed to those that neglected the ceremonies of the ancient sacrifices: But if thou wilt not hear the voice of the Lord thy God, to keep and to do all his commandments and ceremonies which I command thee this day, all these curses shall come upon thee, and overtake thee. Cursed shall thou be in the city, cursed in the field. . . . [12818] St. Teresa used to say: "For the least of the ceremonies of the Church I would lay down my life a thousand times."[12819] And the priest should set little value on the ceremonies of Mass! Father Suarez[12820] teaches that the omission of any ceremony in the Mass is a sin; and Doctors agree in saying that a notable negligence in the ceremonies, which must necessarily be the case if one celebrates Mass too hurriedly, is a mortal sin, as well on account of the great irreverence that one commits against the holy Sacrifice as on account of the scandal given thereby to those that are present by making them lose the veneration that is due to the Mass. To you, O priests, that despise My name, and have said: Wherein have we despised Thy name? . . . In that you say: The table of the Lord is contemptible.[12821] The contempt that priests have for the altar is the cause why others also show contempt for it.

Because Mass is so badly celebrated, we see that among so many priests there are so few saints. Moses did not emerge from the interview that he had with God without being entirely inflamed with love so that his face was resplendent with light; in the same way no priest should leave the altar without being inflamed with new fervor. But experience shows that the priests who celebrate Mass with little devotion always continue in the same faults. They are seen to be always lukewarm, always impatient, proud, envious, always attached to their own honor, to their own interest, to the pleasures and pastimes of the world. Where is therefore the fruit of so many divine Sacrifices that they offer every day on the altar of the Lord, and of so many Communions in which every day they nourish themselves with the flesh of Jesus Christ?

3. PREPARATION FOR MASS

Cardinal Bona gives us this advice: "The defect is not in the food, but in the disposition of the one that eats it."[12822] Hence, to come to the point, I say that the first cause why priests commit so many faults and celebrate with so little devotion and respect is that they go to the altar without thinking of what they are going to do; one goes to the altar through a motive of self-interest, through habit, without the proper disposition, and without preparation.

As for the disposition: in order to derive benefit from the Mass two things are necessary—the desire to advance in divine love, and detachment from earthly affections. Divine love finds no room in a heart filled with the things of the earth; it cannot enter there.

As for the preparation: at least a half-hour's, or, at the very least, a quarter of an hour's, meditation should be devoted to it. What devotion can be brought to the Mass by a priest who goes to celebrate Mass without preparation, passing at once to the altar from worldly occupations and discourse, without even thinking of what he is going to do?

It is indeed remarkable that so many excellent authors—Cardinal Bona, Fathers Molina, Mansi, and Sabatini, and many others—earnestly recommend the preparation for Mass, and have written for this purpose so beautiful considerations and affections; and yet how many are there that make this preparation? I have therefore thought of publishing the following Considerations and Affections as a preparation for Mass for every day of the week. I have tried to make them very short, so that priests who cannot spend much time in preparation may at least read these few reflections before celebrating, and recite the acts that follow them.

4. THANKSGIVING

At the end I have added some other Affections and Prayers for thanksgiving after Mass; for the neglect of making the thanksgiving is also a very deplorable disorder, which is the cause why priests derive so little benefit from the holy Sacrifice. What a pity to see so many priests who, having scarcely said Mass, leave the church or begin to speak about useless things! Authors also strive to recommend the union with God after Communion; but who are the priests that observe this practice? There are some; but they are rare. We even see religious who, living in solitude, say many prayers at other times, but who are careless about uniting themselves to God after Mass.

Many grave authors, however, teach that holy Communion, as long as the sacramental species last, produce more and more fruit in the soul, according as we multiply the acts by which we dispose ourselves to receive graces. Besides, they say that the good acts after Communion are of much more value and merit before God than if they were made at some other time; and with reason, for then the soul is united with Jesus Christ, according to what he himself has said: He that eateth My flesh, and drinketh My blood, abideth in Me, and I in him.[12823] On his part our Lord, at this moment, seems to be more disposed to distribute his graces. St. Teresa assures us that Jesus Christ after Communion places himself in our soul as upon a throne of grace, and he says to it: What wilt thou that I should do to thee?[12824] Dear soul, ask graces of me; I have expressly come to do thee favors; ask of me now what thou wishest of me, and thou wilt obtain it. In the same manner Father Balthasar Alvarez and all the mystical Doctors recommend that one should set a high value on the time that follows Communion. The Venerable John d'Avila, even during his missions, as is related in his life, spent at least two hours in prayer after Mass.

5. A WORD TO THOSE THAT ABSTAIN FROM SAYING MASS THROUGH HUMILITY

Before coming to the Considerations, it seems fitting to add here the opinion expressed by a wise author in regard to those who through humility abstain from celebrating Mass. These priests say: I abstain from celebrating Mass often, because I know that I am unworthy of such a privilege. The author answers them, that it is well to abstain from saying Mass out of humility, but that to do so is not the best act: the acts of humility procure honor to God, but it is a finite honor, which comes from us; while the honor that we render to him in celebrating Mass is an infinite honor, because it is given to God by a divine Person. When, therefore, we take care to prepare ourselves to celebrate Mass with such a devotion as our weakness will permit us, we procure much more glory to God by celebrating Mass than by abstaining from doing so through humility.

PREPARATION FOR MASS

CONSIDERATIONS AND AFFECTIONS FOR EVERY DAY IN THE WEEK

I. FOR SUNDAY

CONSIDERATION

De stercore erigens pauperem, ut collocet eum cum principibus populi sui.

Ps. cxii. 7, 8.

CONSIDER, O priest, that God could not have made you greater in this world than he has done. For to what greater dignity could he have raised you, than to make you his minister on earth for those things that belong to his greater glory? He has allowed you to ascend the altar, to sacrifice thereon his own Son. In how many ways has he not chosen you, in order to make you a priest! Out of innumerable creatures whom he might have made, he has chosen you, and has placed you in the world. Again, from the midst of millions of infidels and heretics he has chosen to place you in the true Church: he has made you a Christian and a Catholic. Moreover, out of so many millions of believers he has made you a priest.

Ah! if God should have honored but one man in the world with the priesthood, with the power of causing the Incarnate Word to descend upon this earth and of delivering souls from hell by absolving them from their sins, in what estimation would not such a priest be held by all? and what thanksgivings would not this priest offer to God? What would he not do out of love for him, in seeing himself chosen before all other men for so great an honor? But consider here, O priest, that the number of other priests in no way diminishes your own dignity and your own obligations.

It is with reason, then, that Almighty God expects every priest to belong entirely to himself. The Holy Scriptures call a priest homo Dei, that is, a man who belongs to God alone. The priests of the Old Law extended their hands over the victims to signify that they themselves offered their own lives in sacrifice, in the same way as they sacrificed the lives of the animals: and so in like manner, when the priests of the New Law extend their hands over the oblata they likewise declare that they are bound to offer their lives and their entire selves to God, in union with the life of Jesus Christ, whom they offer in the Holy Sacrifice.

Behold, then, you are now about to approach the altar, where by a few words you will call down the divine Word into your hands, and at the sound of your voice the substance of the bread and of the wine will be changed into the body and blood of Jesus Christ. You are going, moreover, to the altar as the ambassador of the human race, to intercede with God for the Church and for all mankind. Prepare yourself, then, by the following affections.

AFFECTIONS

O my God! it is in me indeed that the words of David have their proper fulfilment: De stercore erigens pauperem, ut collocet eutti eum principibus populi sui. For see how I, a miserable sinner, who for my sins have deserved these many years to be imprisoned in hell beneath the devil's feet, abandoned by ail and by Thee my beloved Lord, am now about to celebrate, that is to offer Thee in sacrifice Thine own Son. Behold, in a few moments the King of Heaven, the Eternal Word, will at my word come down upon the altar. He will come into my hands, to be offer ed by me, and then to feed me with his own most holy flesh.

God of my soul, I, a priest! I, who have so often turned my back upon Thee! I, who for a mere trifle, or for a brief and empoisoned pleasure, have bartered Thy friendship and renounced Thy grace and Thy love. Ah! how wert Thou able to choose me among so many faithful and innocent souls to be Thy priest?

Enlighten me, I beseech Thee, O Lord; increase my faith: Noverim te, noverim me. Make me know who Thou art, who wiliest to give Thyself to me this morning; and who I am, who am about to receive Thee. I pray Thee, through the merits of Thy blood, cleanse my soul from its many stains before I ascend the altar. Pardon me, O my Jesus! before Thou comest into my hands and into my breast. I have offended and displeased Thee, the Sovereign Good: I am sorry for this with all my soul.

I believe, my Redeemer, that Thou art the Son of God; that Thou didst die for me, and that Thou hast left Thyself in the most Holy Sacrament to be sacrificed by Thy priests, and to become our food.

I hope of Thee, through Thy Passion and Thy promises, to love Thee always for the time to come, and to possess Thee in eternity. I love Thee, my dear Redeemer—I love Thee more than myself; and because I love Thee, I repent with my whole heart of all my offences against Thee, because by them I have offended Thee who art infinite goodness.[12825]

I love Thee, my God; but I love Thee too little.

I would wish to love Thee as much as a priest is bound to love Thee. I desire to receive Thee with that love with which so many loving souls receive Thee. Inflame me, I beseech Thee, with Thy love, and make me all Thine own.

Eternal Father, I offer Thee this Sacrifice in thanksgiving for all Thy benefits to mankind, especially for those conferred on the sacred humanity of Jesus Christ, the most Blessed Virgin, on my guardian angel, and on all my patron saints: and I beg of Thee, through the merits of Jesus Christ, holy perseverance, Thy love, and all those other graces that Jesus, Mary, and my holy Advocates ask of Thee for me.

With regard to prayers for others, it will be well for the priest to recommend in the holy Mass those who are named in the following Memento:

MEMENTO OF THE LIVING

I. O Lord! I recommend to Thee the Sovereign Pontiff, and all prelates, confessors, preachers, and priests: grant them zeal and the spirit of their state, that they may give themselves to the salvation of souls.

II. My relatives, friends, and enemies; the dying who are on the point of leaving this world; and all the faithful who are in Thy grace: give them, O Lord, perseverance and the fervor in Thy love.

III. All infidels, heretics, and sinners: give them light and strength, that they may all know and love Thee.

MEMENTO OF THE DEAD

I. I recommend to Thee, O Lord! the souls of my parents, benefactors, friends, and enemies; and of those who are in Purgatory through my fault.

II. The souls of the priests, and especially of those who labored for souls.

III. The souls of those who were most devout to the Passion of Jesus Christ, to the most Holy Sacrament, and to the divine Mother; the souls who are the most forgotten; those who are suffering the most; and those who are nearest to the gate of Paradise.

Each Memento may be repeated every day; at least the intention may be made of recommending those here specified.

FORMA INTENTIONIS A.D. MISSAM CELEBRANDAM

Ad laudem et gloriam Sanctissimæ Trinitatis, in memoriam benedicti Salvatoris nostri Jesu Christi, vitæ, passionis, mortis, et resurrectionis, ac in operum et meritorum suorum omniumque Sanctorum unionem; ad laudem quoque et exaltationem Beatissimæ semper Virginis ejus matris Mariæ, cœlestium Angelorum, Sanctorum atque Sanctarum, et signanter N. N. et aliorum devotorum meorum; offero, etiam cum ipsorum beatorum spirituum laudibus, Sanctorum omnium precibus et meritis, nunc et semper, hoc et omnia alia sacrificia, officia, orationes, et bona opera totius mundi, pro meis præsentibus et futuris animæ et corporis necessitatibus; in auxilium et consolationem meam, et in remissionem omnium peccatorum meorum, quorum veram contritionem semper habeo et habere intendo, Conor et cupio; omniumque vivorum et defunctorum meorum parentum, fratrum, sororum, consanguineorum, amicorum, inimicorum, benefactorum in spiritualibus et temporalibus, superiorum, subditorum, ac illorum, quibus fui gravamen, scandalum, et occasio peccandi; pro omni gradu Sanctæ Catholicæ Ecclesiæ ac illius conservatione, augmento et exaltatione; christianorum principum unione et concordia, hæresum exstirpatione, summi Pontificis salute, et animarum in purgatorio existentium liberatione; pro conservatione et augmento omnium observantium religionum, pro conversione omnium infidelium nationum, pro mihi commissis et commendatis. Denique pro illis omnibus vivis atque defunctis, pro quibus Dominus noster Jesus Christus et ejus Beatissima Mater et Virgo Maria sciunt et volunt me debere orare: sic oro et obsecro, sic consecrare et sacrificare intendo et propono, ac juxta intentionem Sanctæ Catholicæ Ecclesiæ et meorum Superiorum pro debito voluntatem.

Ego N. minister, licet indignus. In nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti. Amen. Cum intentione lucrandi et acquirendi omnes quascumque possum indulgentias.

II. FOR MONDAY

CONSIDERATION

Hoc facite in meam commemorationem.—Luc. xxii. 19.

It is the opinion of sound theologians that by these words priests are bound, when celebrating Mass, to call to mind the Passion and death of Jesus Christ. And it seems the Apostle requires the name of those who communicate: Quotiescumque manducabitis panem hunc et calicem bibetis, mortem Domini annuntiabitis (I Cor. xi. 26). St. Thomas writes that for this very end the Redeemer has left us the most Holy Sacrament, namely, that we might ever remember the blessings that he has obtained for us and the love he has shown in dying for us: Ut autem tanti beneficii jugis in nobis maneret memoria, Corpus suum in cibum et Sanguinem in potum fidelibus reliquit (Off. Ss. Sacr. lect. 4). And hence the most holy Sacrament is called, by the same holy Doctor, Passionis memoriale.

Consider, therefore, O priest, that this most Holy Victim which you are about to sacrifice is that same Lord who gave his blood and his life for you. But the Holy Mass is not only the memorial of the Sacrifice of the Cross, it is the very same Sacrifice; for he who offers it, and the Victim offered, are the same, namely, the Incarnate Word. The manner alone is different. The one was a sacrifice of blood, this is unbloody; in the one Jesus Christ really died, in the other he dies mystically: Una eademque hostia, sola offerendi ratione diversa (Trident Sess. xxii. c. 2). Imagine, therefore, when you celebrate, that you are on Calvary, and that you are offering to God the blood and the life of his Son. And when you communicate, imagine that you are drawing from the wounds of the Saviour his precious blood.

Consider, moreover, that in every Mass the work of Redemption is renewed; so much so, that if Jesus Christ had not died once upon the Cross, the celebration of one Mass would procure for the world the very same blessings that we have received from the death of our Redeemer. Tantum valet (says St. John Chrysostom) celebratio Missæ quantum mors Christi in cruce. So that all the merits of the Passion are applied to men by means of the Sacrifice of the altar, and more abundantly to the priests who offer it.

Hence St. Francis of Assisi (who considered himself unworthy of the priesthood, and therefore would never become a priest) exhorted priests to detach themselves from the things of the world, and to give themselves solely to the love and honor of their God, who had so greatly love and honored them; and he added that those priests were indeed exceedingly unhappy who, whilst they have Jesus so near to them on the altar, cherish in their hearts an attachment for anything of this world: Videte sacerdotes (these are the saint's words) dignitatem vestram; et sicut super omnes propter hoc mysterium honoravit vos Dominus, ita et vos diligite eum, et honorate. Magna infirmitas, quando Jesum sic præsentem habetis, et aliud in toto mundo curatis.[12826]

AFFECTIONS

O Lord! I am unworthy to appear before Thee; but encouraged by Thy goodness, who has chosen me in spite of my unworthiness to be Thy priest, I come this morning to offer unto Thee Thy Son. I offer Thee, then, O my God! the spotless Lamb, in satisfaction for my sins and for those of all mankind.

Ecce Agnus Dei. Here is the Lamb Thou didst behold one day sacrificed for Thy glory and for our salvation upon the altar of the Cross. For the love of this Victim, so dear to Thee, apply his merits to my soul, and pardon me all the offences, great and small, that I have committed against Thee. I grieve with my whole heart for having offended Thee, the Infinite Goodness.

And Thou, my Jesus, come and wash away in Thy blood all my stains, ere I receive Thee this morning. Domine, non sum dingus, ut intres sub tectum meum; sed tantum dic verbo, et sanabitur anima mea. I am not worthy to receive Thee; but Thou, O heavenly physician, art able with one word to heal all my wounds. Come and heal me.

Erravi sicut ovis quæ periit. I am that sheep who have wilfully chosen to damn myself, by flying away from Thee, my Redeemer; but Thou art the good shepherd, who hast given Thy life to save me. Quære servum tuum, quia mandata tua non sum oblitus. Seek me, O my Jesus; do not abandon me. Seek me, and bind me on Thy shoulders, for I firmly purpose to serve and love Thee as much as I am able.

Thou has said, Oves meæ vocem meam audiunt, et non rapiet eas quisque de manu mea. Thou art calling me to love Thee: behold, I leave all and come to Thee, my Life. I desire to obey Thee in all things. I renounce all the pleasures of the world, since Thou dost deign to give me this morning Thy most holy flesh to be my food.

I love Thee, O my Jesus, above every good; and I desire to receive Thee, in order to love Thee more. Thou givest Thyself wholly to me; I give mvself all to Thee. Thou shalt be always my all, my only good, my only love.

O Mary, my Mother, obtain for me a portion of that humility and fervor with which thou didst receive Jesus in thy Holy Communions.

III. FOR TUESDAY

CONSIDERATION

Hic est Filius meus dilectus, in quo mihi bene complacui.—Matt. xvii. 5.

(This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased).

In the Old Law, men honored God by many sacrifices; but in the New, God is more honored by one single Mass than by all the old sacrifices, for these were but the shadow and type of our Sacrifice of the altar.

In the Holy Mass, God is honored as much as he deserves to be honored, since the same infinite honor is paid to him again that Jesus Christ paid to him when he sacrificed himself upon the Cross. One single Mass gives more honor to God than have given to him, or will give him all the prayers and penances of the saints, the labors of the apostles, all the torments of the martyrs and all the burning love of the seraphim and of the divine Mother. Now, it is this honor, O priest, which God desires to receive this morning from you.

It is also just that God should be thanked for all the immense blessings which, in his infinite goodness, he has conferred upon us. But what fitting thanksgiving can we miserable creatures offer to him? If the Lord had only but once shown us one single mark of affection, even then he would deserve an infinite thanksgiving from us, inasmuch as that affection is the gift and favor of an infinite God. But see he has given us a way of not remaining overwhelmed with confusion in the midst of such obligations, and of thanking him worthily. And how? By offering to him Jesus in the Mass. In this way God is fully thanked and satisfied.

This great Victim which is offered to him is his own very Son, in whom he finds his delight. The sacrifice is of the life of a God, who in the Consecration and in the Communion is sacrificed by a mystical death. It was in this way that David thanked God for all the graces he had received: Quid retribuam Domino pro omnibus quæ retribui t mihi? calicem salutaris accipiam (Ps. cxv. 13). And so Jesus himself thanked his divine Father for all the blessings conferred upon mankind: Et accepto calice gratias egit et dixit: Accipite, et dividite inter vos (Luke, xxii. 17).

AFFECTIONS

O my God and my Creator, how couldst Thou choose me to honor Thee by means of the Sacrifice of Thy Son, when in past times I have so dishonored Thee by the insults I have offered Thee? Instead of punishing me in hell, Thou hast honored me in making me a priest and the minister of Thy glory.

Since, then, Thou dost deign and art pleased to receive this great Sacrifice from my hands, I unite my poor heart to the Heart of Jesus Christ, and in his name I offer it to Thee, in acknowledgment of Thy supreme dominion.

Would that I could see Thy infinite majesty adored and loved by all men! May the honor that I pay Thee this morning, in sacrificing to Thee Thy Son, make amends for all the dishonor that men have shown and show Thee by their sins!

I intend at the same time to thank Thee by this Mass for all the blessings conferred upon the world, and especially on me a miserable sinner, who have deserved for my ingratitude to be abandoned by Thee, for I have gone on multiplying my sins, and Thou hast continued to increase Thy graces to me. I thank Thee, O infinite Goodness; rather I will say, Jesus Christ thanks Thee for me.

Enlighten me, I beseech Thee, O Lord, this morning, through the merits of Jesus Christ; inflame me with Thy love, and detach me from the earth: do not allow me any longer to resist so many winning arts of Thy love. I love Thee, O Sovereign Good, with all my heart. I desire to leave all, in order to please Thee. O God, worthy of infinite love, make known to me, I pray Thee, more and more the greatness of Thy goodness, so that I may become evermore enamoured of Thee, and may labor to please Thee in all things without reserve.

Thou hast shown Thyself enamoured of my soul, and shall I be able to love any but Thee? No, my Lord; henceforward I will live for Thee alone: I will love Thee only, who indeed deservest all my love. O Eternal Father, I hope in the blood of Jesus Christ that Thou by Thy grace wilt carry this my desire into effect. Thou hast shown me so many favors when I was flying away from Thee; much more then am I bound to hope from Thee, now that I seek and desire nought but Thy love. O Mary, my Mother, who carried in thy bosom that God whom I am going this morning to receive, help me to receive him with humility and love.

IV. FOR WEDNESDAY

CONSIDERATION

Ipse est propitiatio pro peccatis nostris.—I John, ii. 2.

(He is the propitiation for our sins.)

Consider that the punishment due to sins is remitted by the Sacrifice of the altar, and immense benefits are obtained in favor of sinners. Unhappy should we be were there not this great Sacrifice to withhold the divine justice from inflicting those just chastisements that our sins deserve. It is certain that all the victims of the Old Law were not able to appease the indignation of God against sinners. Numquid placari potest Dominus in millibus arietum? (Mich. vi. 7.) Even had the lives of all men and all angels been sacrificed, the divine justice would not have been worthily satisfied for one single sin committed by a creature against its Creator. Jesus Christ alone was able to make satisfaction for our sins. Ipse est propitiatio pro peccatis nostris. And for this end the eternal Father sent him into the world, that by becoming mortal man he might appease for sinners. And this sacrifice is renewed in every Mass that is celebrated.

Consider, therefore, O priest, your great office, to be the mediator between God and sinners, by offering upon the altar the life and merits of Jesus Christ, for the sake of which the Lord is moved to grant to sinners light and strength, and then the pardon of their sins: Hac oblatione placatus Dominus, gratiam et donum pœnitentiæ concedens, crimina et peccata etiam ingentia dimittit (Trid. Sess. xxii. c. 2). Oh, how much more powerfully does the voice of the innocent blood of the Redeemer cry out for pity on us, than did the blood of Abel cry out for vengeance against Cain! Accessistis ad Mediatorem Jesum, et sanguinis aspersionem melius loquentem quam Abel (Heb. xii. 22.)

AFFECTIONS

O great God, Thou art indignant against sinners, and with too great reason; for they repay Thee with ingratitude for all that great love Thou hast shown them. But if the sins of the world are great, greater is the offering and the gift which this morning I am about to present to Thee: Non sicut delictum, ita et donum (Rom. v. 15). I offer to Thee this morning the Sacrifice of Thine own Son: mav this Victim, so dear to Thee, appease Thee, and move Thee to have pity on all poor sinners, who either know Thee not, or if they know Thee, will not love Thee, and live deprived of Thy grace. Give them light and strength to come out of the miserable state in which they are blindly living.

I pray to Thee for all, but especially for myself who have been favored by Thee more highly than others, and who have been more ungrateful than others in offending and despising Thee. For the love of Jesus Christ, pardon me, O my God! all my sins, mortal and venial: all acts of impatience, my untruths, my intemperance, the distractions and negligences at Mass, in my Office, and in prayer. I repent of them all, because they have offended Thee, the infinite Goodness, who dost deserve from all men, but especially from me, a priest, infinite love.

I love Thee, infinite Goodness; I love Thee above all things; and I promise Thee to be willing to die rather than wilfully to give Thee the slightest displeasure. Ah, my Jesus, Thy death, Thy blood, are my hope. By Thy merits I ask of Thee and I hope for the grace to be faithful to Thee, and to love Thee with all my heart, and to love none but Thee. Most holy Mary, may thy assistance accompany me now that I go to offer this great Sacrifice to God.

V. FOR THURSDAY

CONSIDERATION

In omnibus divites facti estis in illo.—I Cor. i. 5.

(In all things you are made rich in Him.)

Consider that by means of the Holy Mass Almighty God hears more quickly the prayers of his priests. God indeed at all times, as soon as he is asked through the merits of Jesus Christ, dispenses his graces; but St. John Chrysostom says that during the Holy Mass he dispenses them more abundantly at the prayers of the priest, because it is then that these prayers have greater weight, from being united to the prayers of Jesus himself, who is the chief priest, and who offers himself in this Sacrifice in order to obtain graces for us.

According to the Council of Trent,[12827] the time of the celebration of Mass is precisely that time in which the Lord is on the throne of grace, to which we are exhorted by the Apostle to have recourse, that we may obtain the Divine mercy and find grace: Adeamus ergo cum fiducia ad thronum gratiæ, ut misericordiam consequamur, et gratiam inveniamus in auxilio opportuno (Heb. iv. 16).

St. John Chrysostom[12828] says that the angels also wait for the time of Mass to intercede with greater efficacy in our favor; and he adds, that what is not obtained during Mass is with difficulty obtained at any other time.

Oh, what treasures of graces may a priest obtain for himself and others if he beseeches the Lord with confidence when he celebrates at the altar! The Venerable Father Antony de Colellis said: "When I am celebrating and hold in my hands my Jesus Christ, I obtain of him whatever I desire."

In a word, St. Paul declares that in Jesus Christ we obtain all riches and every grace, if we ask the Father for them through his merits: In omnibus divites facti estis in illo; ita ut nihil vobis desit in ulla gratia (I Cor. i. 5, 7). But this is especially the case when the priest honors Almighty God and propitiates him by the sacrifice of his own Son. And if the Father precisely by means of the Mass gives us in the most Holy Sacrament this same Son who has been sacrificed to him, how can he, having given us his Son, deny us any other grace? Quomodo non etiam cum illo omnia nobis donavit? (Rom. viii. 32.)

AFFECTIONS

O miserable being that I have been! how many graces have I lost, O my God, from having neglected to ask Thee for them in the Masses that I have celebrated! But since Thou now givest me light, I will no longer be negligent in this respect. I unite, then, O eternal Father, my prayers with those of Jesus Christ; and for the love of this Thy Son, whom this morning I am going to sacrifice to Thee, I pray Thee, in the first place, to grant me pardon for all my sins, of which I repent with my whole heart: and then make me know how infinitely Thou art deserving of being loved, and the immense obligation I am under of loving Thee for Thy goodness and the love Thou hast borne me: and give me strength to detach myself from all earthly affections, and to occupy my heart in the love of Thee alone, the sovereign Good, who hast loved me so much.

I pray Thee also to enlighten those who know Thee not, and who are living deprived of Thy grace. Give to all the gift of Thy grace. Give to all the gift of Thy holy fear. O infinite love of my God, make Thyself known, make Thyself loved.

And do Thou, my dear Saviour, make me wholly Thine before I die, and do not allow me to be ever again separated from Thee. Ah, my Jesus, as long as I live I am in this danger. I do not wish to lose Thee more. Beg of Thy Father to let me die sooner than to turn my back on Thee again. Beg of him to bind me ever more closely to Thyself, who hast in so many ways obliged me to love Thee. My Jesus, Thou art my love and my hope. Grant that every time I behold Thee on the altar I may say to Thee with my whole heart that which St. Philip Neri said when he saw Thee in the most Holy Sacrament —"Behold my love, behold my love, behold all my love." Most Holy Mary, do thou also pray for me. I am a priest. Make me by thy intercession that which a priest ought to be, all for Jesus Christ.

VI. FOR FRIDAY

CONSIDERATION

Accipite et comedite; hoc est corpus meura.—Matt. xxvi. 26.

(Take ye, and eat: This is My body.)

Consider that a priest who says Mass with devotion is in a special manner sanctified by it; for in the Mass he is admitted to an audience with the divine Majesty, and he converses familiarly with the Incarnate Word: it is then that he holds him in his hands, and speaks to him confidentially, without ceremony and without attendants.

Moreover, it is then that he is allowed to feed himself with his own hands on the most holy flesh of Jesus Christ, and to drink his blood; since it was to priests especially that the Redeemer said: Accipite et comedite; hoc est corpus meum.

The holy Communion is given also to lay persons, but they are not allowed to take the most holy Sacrament themselves, and to communicate whenever they please: they are obliged to receive Communion from the hands of the priest, and when the priest is pleased to give it to them; but the priest can take Jesus Christ and communicate himself when he pleases.

Our Lord when speaking of the Sacraments, and especially of the Eucharist, forbade his priests to give it to sinners: Nolite dare sanctum canibus, neque ponatis margaritis vestras ante porcos (Matt. vii. 6). Margaritas vestras: by pearls are signified the consecrated particles—but observe the word vestras: this shows that the Sacrament of the Altar is, as it were, the property of the priest; for the priest takes it out of the tabernacle when he pleases, carries it where he likes; he feeds himselt on it when he wills, and gives it to whom he wills. In a word, the priest holds the keys of all the divine treasures, to make use of them when he likes; for as St. John Chrysostom says, in the most Holy Sacrament there is the whole treasure of the goodness of God: Dicendo Eucharistiam, omnem benignitatis Dei thesaurum aperio. So that it seems when the priest celebrates he makes himself in a certain way the master of Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament: De toto Deo dives est.

Jesus Christ, then, belongs wholly to priests: but how many priests are there who belong wholly to Jesus Christ? O God! the greater number of them, how do they love their Saviour who has so loved and exalted them? O God, how many poor country people are there, poor peasants, who love Jesus Christ more than so many priests! Alas, what suffering for a priest who is damned, when in hell he shall find himself forever at a distance and separated from Jesus Christ, who on this earth was so near to him, and belonged entirely to him!

AFFECTIONS

O my dear Jesus, Thou didst make Thyself a Victim on the Cross that Thou mightest be sacrificed by me upon the altar, and mightest fill me with Thy divine blood. In short, in making me Thy priest, Thou hast made Thyself all mine; Thou hast given Thyself entirely to me; so that I can take Thee when I will, and feed myself on Thee when I will.

My beloved Redeemer, increase my faith; make me know who Thou art, when I hold Thee hidden in the Sacrament in my hands; when Thou art close to me on the altar; when I place Thy body in my mouth, and approach my lips to Thy blood. How is it that I do not burn with love in thinking of Thee who art my God, and who art pleased to be treated with such familiarity by me, as even to become my meat and drink? Thou wert not satisfied in giving all Thy blood and Thy life upon the Cross for love of me: it is Thy will that I should drink this very blood, in order to unite myself and to become one with Thee. Ipsa re nos suum efficit corpus, says St. John Chrysostom.[12829]

Enlighten me, I beseech Thee, O my God, and help me to be no longer ungrateful to Thine exceeding love. Detach me from the earth. Grant that I may no longer put any obstacles to the abundance of graces which Thou dost dispense to those who receive Thee with love in holy Communion. I love Thee, my Jesus, who died for me and hast become my food. Eternal Father, by the merits of Jesus Christ, whom I am about to offer to Thee this morning, give me, all those graces which I require in order to be wholly Thine. And do thou, most holy Mary, pray to Jesus for me.

VII. FOR SATURDAY

CONSIDERATION

Festinans descende; quia hodie in domo tua oportet me manere.—Luc. xix. 5.

(Make haste and come down, for this day I must abide in thy house.)

Imagine that Jesus Christ says to you this morning those very words which he once addressed to Zaccheus: "Be quick, come to the altar; for I desire this day to enter into the house of your soul, to preserve its life, to heal its wounds, to inflame it with My love." All this is done by the divine Sacrament. It is this bread that gives life to the soul: Panis quem ego dabo, caro mea est pro mundi vita (John, vi. 52). It is the medicine that frees and preserves us from sins. Antidotum quo liberemur a culpis quotidianis, et a peccatis mortalibus præservemur (Trid. Sess. xiii. c. 2). It is the fire that inflames the soul with holy love, so that we all (as St. John Chrysostom says), if only we place no obstacle, should leave the altar flammam spirantes, terribiles effecti diabolo.[12830]

But, O my God, how is it that so many priests who every morning feed on this heavenly bread, instead of burning with divine love, are seen to be always more attached to the world, and go always to the altar with the very same wilful venial sins? All proceeds from this, that they go to say Mass without the intention and the desire of becoming saints, or else for interested motives, or by way of routine. And therefore they always commit the same faults; and so they approach their death, and go to give an account to Jesus Christ of the lukewarm and disorderly way in which their whole priestly life was passed.

O priest! if you are one of these, consider that this heavenly bread will not help you to become a saint, but will, through your own fault, make you more guilty before the divine tribunal. Amend your life; consider that death is nigh. Consider those attachments and those faults that hinder your progress in the divine love, and do away with them. Remember that you are a priest; remember that God has chosen you for his favorite, and that he could not have made you greater.

AFFECTIONS

O God of infinite majesty, Thou wiliest to come this morning to lodge in my soul; but those houses in which Thou art pleased to dwell ought to be holy: Domum tuam decet sanctitudo, Domine (Ps. xcii. 5). How shall I, who am so imperfect and so full of faults, be able to receive Thee? Domine, non sum dignus ut infres sub tectum meum.

Ah, my Redeemer, if I had now to appear before Thy judgment-seat, what good account could I render Thee of so many Masses said, and of the years during which I have been a priest? Wait, O Lord, do not judge me yet: Non intres in judicium cum servo tuo. For pity's sake, wait for me yet a little while: Dimitte me, ut plangam paululum dolorem meum, antequam vadam, et non revertar. Prolong my life still a while, that I may weep over the ingratitude with which I have treated Thee, O my Jesus, up to the present time. Thou hast made me a priest; but what kind of priestly life have I hitherto led? With so many Masses and Communions, I ought to have become all on fire with Thy love, all pure and holy. Thou hast not failed on Thy part; the failure has been through my own fault, and because of the obstacles I have thrown in the way of Thy grace. My life has not honored Thee—no, but has dishonored Thee in the sight of heaven and earth. Thou hast snatched me out of the world, and I have loved the world more than worldlings themselves. Have mercy on me, O my God! Do not abandon me, for I desire to amend my life. I repent with my whole heart of all the displeasure I have given Thee. I will begin to love Thee truly; I will begin this very morning, on which I am again about to receive Thee.

I love Thee, O God of my soul; I love Thee, my Saviour, who, in order to save me, and to make me Thy priest, didst give Thy life: Domine, non sum dignus ut intres sub tectum meum, sed tantum dic verbo et sanabitur anima mea. Pardon me, O my Jesus, and heal me. Detach me from the world, and bind me closely to Thyself; make me live as a priest, Thou who hast made me a priest. Thy merits, my dear Redeemer, are my hope. Eternal Father, this morning I offer to Thee Jesus Christ, that Thou mayest make me all Thine own. Most holy Mary, pray to Jesus for me.

THANKSGIVING AFTER HOLY MASS FOR EVERY DAY IN THE WEEK AFFECTIONS FOR EACH DAY OF THE WEEK

I. FOR SUNDAY

MY dear Jesus, my Redeemer and my God! before celebrating I adored Thee in heaven, considering Thee in Thy glory enthroned at the right hand of Thy eternal Father: now I adore Thee hidden within my breast under the humble appearances of bread and wine, and thus made the meat and drink of my soul.

Welcome, my Lord, to my soul. I thank Thee with my whole heart: would that I could thank Thee as Thou deservest! But what fitting thanksgiving could a poor peasant offer who should behold his king enter into his cabin to visit him? he could but cast himself at his feet, and remain there prostrate in silence, in astonishment, and in thankfulness for this condescension. I cast myself, therefore, at Thy feet, O my divine King, O my Jesus, and I adore Thee from the depths of my misery. I unite my adoration to that which the Most Holy Mary offered Thee when she received Thee into her most sacred womb: and would that I could also love Thee as she loved Thee!

Ah, my Redeemer, in obedience to my words, Thou hast this morning come down from heaven into my hands; and I, how often by disobeying Thy commandments have I ungratefully turned my back upon Thee, and have renounced Thy grace and Thy love! My Jesus, I hope that now at this moment Thou hast forgiven me; but if through my fault Thou hast not yet pardoned me, pardon me this morning; for I repent with my whole heart of having offended Thee, O Infinite Goodness.

O my Jesus, would that I had always loved Thee! At least from the day 011 which I said my first Mass I should have burned with love for Thee. Thou hast chosen me from the midst of so many millions of men to be Thy priest, Thy favorite: what couldst Thou have done more to make Thyself beloved by me? But I thank Thee, my love, that Thou givest me time to do that which I have not done. I wish to love Thee with all my heart. No, I will not cherish in my heart any affection save for Thee, who hast so greatly obliged me to love Thee.

Deus meus et omnia. O my God, what are riches, honors, the pleasures of the world! Thou art my All. Thou shalt be henceforth my only good, my only love. I will say to Thee with St. Paulinus, Sibi habeant divitias suas divites, regna sua reges: mihi Christus gloria et regnum est. Let the kings and rich ones of this world delight indeed in their kingdoms and in their riches; Thou alone, O my Jesus, shalt be my treasurer and my kingdom.

Eternal Father, for the love of that Son whom I have this morning sacrificed to Thee and received into my heart, give me holy perseverance in Thy grace and the gift of Thy holy love. I recommend to Thee again all my relatives, friends, and enemies. I recommend to Thee the souls in Purgatory, and all poor sinners.[I2831]

Most Holy Mary, my Mother, do thou obtain for me holy perseverance and the love of Jesus Christ.

INVOCATIONS

Anima Christi sanctissima, sanctifica me
Corpus Christi sacratissimum, custodi me
Sanguis Christi pretiosissime, inebria me
Aqua lateris Christi purissima, lava me.
Passio Christi amarissima, conforta me.
O bone Jesu! exaudi me:
Intra vulnera tua absconde me.
Ne permittas me separari a te.
Ab hoste maligno defende me.

In hora mortis meæ voca me.

Et jube me venire ad te.

Ut cum Sanctis et Angelis tuis collaudem te.

Per infinita sæcula sæculorum. Amen.

VARIOUS PRAYERS

1. PRECATIUNCULA SACERDOTIBUS QUOTIDIE LEGENDA, UT IN DIES DEO FERVENTIUS DESERVIANT.[12832]

ADJUVET nos gratia tua, omnipotens Deus, ut, qui officium sacerdotale suscepimus, digne ac devote tibi in omni puritate et conscientia bona famulari valeamus; et si non possumus in tanta innocentia vitæ conversari ut debemus, concede nobis tamen, digne flere mala, quæ gessimus, et, in spiritu humilitatis ac bonæ voluntatis proposito tibi ferventius de cætero deservire.

2. A.D. BEATISSIMAM VIRGINEM MARIAM PRECATIO

O serenissima et inclyta Virgo Maria, Mater Domini nostri Jesu Christi, Regina cœli et terræ, quæ eumdem Creatorem omnium creaturarum in tuo sancto utero digna fuisti portare, cujus idem veracissimum corpus et sanguinem ego indignus sumere præsumpsi! rogo te, per virginalem humilitatem tuam et per passionem et mortem ejusdem Filii tui, ut apud ipsum pro me misero peccatore intercedere digneris: ut quidquid in hoc sacrosancto Sacrificio irreverenter, ignoranter, negligenter, vel incaute commisi, aut etiam omisi, tuis sanctissimis precibus mihi dignetur indulgere. Amen.

3. A.D. VULNERA CHRISTI ORATIO

Rogo te, Domine Jesu, per illa salutifera vulnera tua, quæ passus es in cruce pro salute nostra, ex quibus emanavit ille pretiosus sanguis, quo sumus redempti, vulnera hanc animam meam peccatricem, pro qua etiam mori dignatus es; vulnera eam igneo et potentissimo telo tuæ nimiæ charitatis. Confige cor meum jaculo tui amoris, ut dicat tibi anima mea: Charitate tua vulnerata sum, ita ut ex ipso vulnere amoris tui uberrimæ fluant lacrymæ die ac nocte. Percute, Domine, percute, obsecro, hanc durissimam mentem meam pia et valida cuspide dilectionis tuæ, et altius ad intima penetra potenti virtute. Qui vivis et regnas Deus, in sæcula sæculorum. Amen.

4. SALUTATIONES A.D. OMNIA MEMBRA CHRISTI ET SUI IPSIUS A.D. EUM COMMENDATIO

Salve, tremendum cunctis potestatibus Caput Domini nostri Jesu Christi, Salvatoris nostri, pro nobis coronatum et arundine percussum! Salve, pretiosissima Salvatoris nostri Jesu Christi Facies, pro nobis sputis et alapis cæsa! Salvete, benignissimi Domini Jesu Christi, Salvatoris nostri, Oculi, pro nobis lacrymis perfusi! Salve, mellifluum Os, guttuque suavissimum Domini nostri Jesu Christi, pro nobis felle et aceto potatum! Salvete, Aures nobilissimæ Domini Jesu Christi, Salvatoris nostri, pro nobis contumeliis et opprobriis affectæ! Salve, Collum humile Jesu Chiisti, pro nobis colaphyzatum, Dorsumque sanctissimum, pro nobis flagellatum! Salvete, venerabiles Domini nostri Jesu Christi Manus et Brachia, pro nobis in cruce extensa! Salve, Pectus mitissimum Domini nostri Jesu Christi, Salvatoris nostri, pro nobis in passione conturbatum! Salve, Latus gloriosum Domini nostri Jesu Christi, pro nobis lancea militis perforatum! Salvete, Domini Jesu Christi, Salvatoris nostri, sacra misericordiæ Genua, pro nobis in orationibus flexa! Salvete, Domini Jesu Christi, Salvatoris nostri, Pedes adorandi, pro nobis clavis affixi! Salve, totum Corpus Jesu Christi, pro nobis in cruce suspensum, vulneratum, mortuum et sepultum! Salve, Sanguis pretiosissime, de corpore Jesu Christi, Salvatoris nostri pro nobis effusus! Salve, sanctissima Domini nostri Jesu Christi Anima, in cruce pro nobis in manus Patris commendata!

In eadem commendatione tibi commendo hodie et quotidie animam meam, vitam meam, cor et corpus meum, omnes sensus et actus meos, omnes amicos, benefactores et consanguineos meos, animas parentum, fratrum, sororum, et omnium amicorum, ac inimicorum meorum: ut nos protegere, liberare et defendere digneris ab omnibus insidiis inimicorum nostrorum, visibilium et invisibilium, nunc et in perpetuum. Amen.

II. FOR MONDAY

O infinite Goodness! O infinite Love! A God has given himself wholly to me, and has made himself all mine! Unite, O my soul, all thy affections and bind thyself to thy Lord, who has come on purpose to unite himself to thee and to be loved by thee.

My dear Redeemer, I embrace Thee; my treasure, my life, I bind myself to Thee; do not Thou disdain me. Miserable being that I am, hitherto I have driven Thee from my soul, and have separated myself from Thee. But for the future I will rather lose my life a thousand times than lose Thee, my sovereign Good. Forget, O Lord, my many offences against Thee, and pardon me. I repent with my whole soul; would that I could die with grief!

But notwithstanding my offences, I feel that Thou art bidding me to love Thee: Diliges Dominum Deum tuum ex toto corde. Ah, my Lord, who am I, that Thou dost so greatly desire to be loved by me? But if this indeed be Thy desire, I wish to please Thee. Thou didst die for me, Thou hast given Thy flesh to be my food. I leave all; I bid farewell to all; and I embrace Thee, my beloved Saviour: Quis me separabit a caritate Christi?

My beloved Redeemer, and whom shall I desire to love, if I love not Thee, who art infinite Beauty, infinite Goodness, worthy of infinite love? Quid mihi est in cœlo? et a te quid volui super terram? Deus cordis mei, et pars mea Deus in æternum. Yes, my God, where can I find in heaven or on earth a good greater than Thyself, or one who has loved me more than Thou?

Adveniat regnum tuum. Take possession, I beseech Thee, my Jesus, this very morning, of my whole heart; give it all to Thee. Do Thou possess it always and entirely: banish from it every love that is not for Thee. Thee alone do I choose for my portion and my riches. Deus cordis mei, et pars mea Deus in æternum. Suffer me to beg and to ask of Thee always with St. Ignatius Loyola, Amorem tui solum cum gratia tua mihi dones, et dives sum satis. Give me Thy love and Thy grace; that is, grant that I may love Thee and be loved by Thee, and with this I am rich enough; I desire and ask Thee for nothing more.

But Thou knowest my weakness, Thou knowest my past treachery; help me with Thy grace, and do not allow me ever again to separate myself from Thy holy love: Ne permittas me separari a te. I say it to Thee now, and I desire to repeat it always; and do Thou give me the grace to be able always to repeat it: Ne permittas me, ne permittas me separari a te.

Mary, most holy, my hope, do thou obtain for me from God these two graces—holy perseverance and holy love. I ask thee for nothing more.

III. FOR TUESDAY

Ah, my Lord, how could I have so many times offended Thee by my sins, when I knew that sin so greatly displeased Thee! Pardon me, I beseech Thee, by the merits of Thy Passion, and bind me by Thy love wholly to Thyself: let not the stench of my sins drive Thee from me. Make me, I pray Thee, know always more and more how great a good Thou art, the love Thou deservest, and the affection Thou hast borne me.

I desire, my Jesus, to sacrifice myself entirely to Thee, who didst sacrifice Thyself wholly for me. Thou by so many artifices hast bound me to Thyself; do not allow me ever again to disjoin myself from Thee. I love Thee, my God, and I will love Thee always. And now that I have known Thy love, how should I be able to live any longer at a distance from Thee and deprived of Thy grace?

I thank Thee for having borne with me when I was not in Thy grace, and for now giving me time to love Thee. If I had died then, I could never have loved Thee more. But now that I am able to love Thee, I have the will to love Thee, O my Jesus, as much as I am able and I desire to do everything to please Thee. I love Thee, infinite Goodness, I love Thee more than myself; and because I love Thee I give Thee my body, my soul, and my whole will. Do with me and dispose of me, O Lord, as Thou wilt: I accept all. Enough, if Thou allowest me to love Thee always; I ask Thee for nothing more. Give to those who wish for them the goods of this earth: I desire and seek for nought but perseverance in Thy grace, and Thy holy love.

O eternal Father, trusting in the promise made me by Thy Son, Amen, amen, dico vobis, si quid petieritis Patrem in nomine meo, dabit vobis (John, xvi. 23), I ask of Thee, in the name of Jesus Christ, holy perseverance, and the grace to love Thee with my whole heart, and perfectly to fulfil henceforward Thy will. O my Jesus, Thou hast sacrificed Thyself wholly for me, and hast given me Thyself, in order that I should give myself to Thee, and sacrifice my entire will to Thee: for I hear Thee saying to me, Præbe, fili mi, cor tuum mihi (Prov. xxiii. 26).

Behold, O Lord, behold my heart, my will; I give and sacrifice it all to Thee. But Thou knowest how weak I am: come to my assistance; suffer me not to take back again my will from Thee, by sinning against Thee. No, do not let it be: make me love Thee always, make me love Thee as much as a priest ought to love Thee: and as Thy Son when dying was able to say, Consummatum est, grant that I also at my death may be able to say, that from this day forward I have fulfilled Thy holy will. Grant that in all temptations and danger of offending Thee, I may never cease to have recourse to Thee, and to beg Thee to assist me by the merits of Jesus Christ.

O Mary, most holy, obtain for me this grace, to recommend myself always in temptations to God and to thyself, who art all-powerful with God.

IV. FOR WEDNESDAY

Ah! my Jesus, I see how much Thou hast done and suffered for me, to put me under the necessity of loving Thee; and I have been so ungrateful to Thee! How many times, for the sake of some miserable pleasure or fancy, have I bartered away Thy grace, and have lost Thee, O God of my soul! I have been grateful enough to creatures; to Thee alone have I shown ingratitude. My dear God, pardon me: I am sorry; I grieve with my whole heart, and I hope for pardon from Thee, because Thou art infinite goodness. If Thou wert not infinite goodness, I should lose hope, and I should not even have the courage to ask Thee to have mercy on me.

I thank Thee, my love, for not having sent me to hell, as I deserved; and for having borne with me so long a time. Ah, Thy patience with me, O my God, should alone suffice to fill me with love to Thee. And who indeed but Thou, who art a God of infinite mercy, would have borne with me? I see that Thou hast been following me for so long, in order that I should love Thee. I will no longer resist Thy love: behold, I give myself up entirely to Thee. I have offended Thee enough; now I wish to love Thee. I love Thee, my sovereign Good; I love Thee, infinite Goodness; I love Thee, my God, worthy of infinite love; and I desire to repeat, in time and in eternity, I love Thee, I love Thee.

Alas, O God, how many years have I lost, in which I might have loved Thee and have gained an increase of Thy love; and I have spent them in offending Thee! But Thy blood, O my Jesus, is my hope. I hope it will never be my lot again to cease to love Thee. I know not how long I have still to live; but the years that remain to me, be they few or many, I consecrate entirely to Thee. For this end Thou hast waited for me until now. Yes, my beloved Lord, I wish to please Thee; I wish to love Thee always, and to love Thee alone. What are pleasures, riches, honors? Thou alone, my God, Thou alone, art and shalt be always, my love, my all.

But I can do nothing except Thou helpest me by Thy grace. Wound, I beseech Thee, my heart; inflame it wholly with Thy holy love, and bind it entirely to Thyself; but so bind it that it can never separate itself again from Thee. Thou hast promised to love those who love Thee: Ego diligentes me diligo (Prov. viii. 17). Now I love Thee: forgive my boldness, love me in return, and do not allow me to do anything that would force Thee to cease to love me: Qui non diligit, manet in morte (I John, iii. 14). Deliver me from this death, to remain deprived of the power of loving Thee. Make me love Thee always, in order that Thou mayest be always able to love me: and thus may our love be everlasting, and may no breach occur between me and Thee. Grant it, O eternal Father, for the love of Jesus Christ. Grant it, my Jesus, by Thy merits: through them I hope to love Thee always, and to be always loved by Thee. Mary, Mother of God and my Mother, do thou also pray to Jesus for me.

V. FOR THURSDAY

O God of infinite Majesty, behold at Thy feet a traitor who has so often offended Thee. Thou hast so many times pardoned me, and I, notwithstanding the graces and lights that Thou hast given me, have begun again to offend Thee. Others have sinned in the midst of darkness, I in the midst of light: but listen to this Thy Son, whom I have this morning sacrificed to Thee, and who now is reposing within my breast. He is asking of Thee mercy and pardon for me. Pardon me for the love of Jesus Christ; for I repent with my whole heart of having offended Thee, the infinite Goodness.

I know that, for the love of Jesus Christ, Thou art pleased to make peace with sinners: Complacuit per eum reconciliare omnia in ipsum (Coloss. i. 20). For the love, then, of Jesus Christ, be reconciled also to me: Ne projicias me a facie tua : Drive me not away from Thy face, as I should have deserved; pardon me, and change my heart: Cor mundum crea in me, Deus. Do so at least for Thine honor's sake, since Thou hast made me Thy priest, Thy minister, whose office it is to sacrifice to Thee Thine own Son. Make me live as a priest. Consume, I pray Thee, in the flames of Thy holy love, and destroy within me, all earthly affections. Grant that henceforth I may be grateful for the many graces Thou hast bestowed on me, and for the exceeding love Thou hast borne me. If in past time I have despised Thy friendship, now I value it more than all the kingdoms of the world, and I prefer that which pleases Thee to all the riches and pleasures of heaven and earth.

O my Father, for the love of Jesus Christ, detach me from all things. It is Thy will that Thy priests should be wholly separated from the world, in order to live for Thee alone, and for the things of Thy glory: Segregate mihi Saulum et Barnabam in opus ad quod assumpsi eos (Acts, xiii. 2). The same I know is Thy will for me. I resolve to do it; but do Thou help me with Thy grace. Draw me wholly to Thyself. Give me patience and resignation in difficulties and in contradictions. Give me the spirit of mortifying myself for Thy love. Give me the spirit of true humility, that I may even rejoice in being considered vile and full of faults: Doce me facere voluntatem tuam: Teach me to do Thy will, and then tell me what Thou willest of me, for I will do all. Allow, O my God, a sinner to love Thee, who in past times has offended Thee too much, but who now desires to love Thee truly, and to be wholly Thine. O eternal God, I hope to love Thee forever; and therefore also I wish to love Thee exceedingly in this life, that I may love Thee exceedingly in eternity.

And because I love Thee, I would see Thee known and loved by all. And therefore, O Lord, since Thou hast made me Thy priest, give me the grace to labor for Thee, and to gain Thee souls. I hope for all, through Thy merits, O my Jesus Christ, and through thy intercession, O my Mother Mary.

VI. FOR FRIDAY

My Jesus, how couldst Thou choose me for Thy priest from the midst of so many men?—me, who have so often turned my back on Thee and despised Thy grace for a mere nothing? I am sorry for it, my beloved Saviour, from my whole soul. Tell me, hast Thou pardoned me? I hope so. Yes, Thou hast been my Redeemer, not once only, but as often as Thou hast pardoned me. O my Saviour, would that I had never offended Thee! Let me hear those words Thou didst say to Magdalene: Remittuntur tibi peccata tua. Let me hear that Thou hast reinstated me in Thy grace, in giving me a great sorrow for my sins.

In manus tuas commendo spiritum meum; redemisti me, Domine, Deus veritatis. Ah, my divine Shepherd, Thou didst come down from heaven to seek after me, the lost sheep; and every day Thou descendest 011 the altar for my good. Thou hast given Thy life to save me. Do not abandon me. I commend my soul into Thy hands: receive it in Thy mercy, and never allow it to be separated again from Thee.

Thou didst shed all Thy blood for me: Te ergo, quæsumus, tuis famulis subveni, quos pretioso sanguine redemisti. Thou art now my advocate. Thou hast not yet become my judge. Obtain for me pardon from Thy Father. Obtain for me light and strength to love Thee with my whole soul. Give me the grace so to pass the remaining days of my life, that when I behold Thee as my judge I may behold Thee appeased with me.

Reign over my heart, I beseech Thee, with Thy love; make me wholly Thine; and for this end, recall to me always, my dear Saviour, the love Thou hast borne me, and all that Thou hast done to save me, and to make Thyself loved by me. It was for this that Thou hast made me a priest, that I should think of loving none but Thee.

Yes, my Jesus, I desire to please Thee: I love Thee, and will love none but Thee. Give me humility, resignation in the trials of this life, meekness when I am despised, mortification to earthly pleasures, and detachment from creatures, and grant that I may banish from my heart every affection that does not tend to Thee. I ask and hope for all through the merits of Thy passion. My dear Jesus, my beloved Jesus, O my good Jesus, hear Thou me: O bone Jesu, exaudi me.

And do thou, O Mary, my Mother and my hope, hear me, and pray to Jesus for me.

VII. FOR SATURDAY

My dear Jesus, Thou hast come again this morning to visit my soul: I thank Thee with all my heart. Since Thou hast come, speak to me, tell me what Thou willest of me, for I desire to do all. I should deserve that Thou didst no longer speak to me, for having so many times been deaf to Thy voice, which called me to love Thee, and for having ungratefully turned my back upon Thee. But I have already repented of my offences against Thee: I repent anew, and I hope that Thou hast already pardoned me. Tell me, then, what Thou desirest of me, for I will fulfil all.

Oh, would that I had always loved Thee, my God! Unhappy that I am, how many years have I lost! But I hope, through Thy blood and Thy promises, to make up in future for the time I have lost, by attending solely to Thy love and pleasure.

I love Thee, my Redeemer; I love Thee, my God; I long for nothing but to love Thee with all my heart, and even to die for the love of Thee, who died for love of me. I will say to Thee with St. Francis: Amore amoris tui moriar, qui amore amoris mei dignatus es mori. Thou, my Jesus, hast given Thyself wholly to me; Thou hast given me all Thy blood, Thy life, all Thy sweat, all Thy merits. Thou hast nothing left to give me: I give myself all to Thee. I give Thee all my satisfactions, all the pleasures of the earth, my body, my soul, my will. I have nothing more to give Thee: had I more, I would give Thee more. My dear Jesus, Thou art sufficient for me.

But do Thou, O Lord, make me faithful to Thee: do not let me change my will and leave Thee. I hope through Thy Passion, O my Saviour, that this will never happen. Thou hast said, Nullus speravit in Domino et confusus est (Ecclus. ii. 11). I also, therefore, may resolutely say: In te, Domine, speravi; non confundar in æternum. I hope, and I will always hope, O God of my soul, that I shall never suffer the confusion of seeing myself separated from Thee, and deprived of Thy grace: In te, Domine, speravi; non confundar in æternum.

Thou, my God, art all-powerful. Make me holy: grant that I may love Thee exceedingly, that I may never neglect anything that I know to be for Thy glory. Grant that I may overcome all, in order to please Thee. Happy shall I be, if I lose all, to gain Thee and Thy love. For this end Thou hast given me my life. Grant that I may spend it wholly for Thee. I do not deserve graces, but punishments: and I say to Thee, punish me as Thou wilt, but do not deprive me of Thy love. Thou hast loved me without reserve. I wish to love Thee without reserve, O infinite Good, infinite love. O will of God, thou art my love. O my Jesus, Thou didst die for me. O would that I could die for Thee, and by my death cause all men to love Thee! O infinite Good worthy of infinite love, I prize Thee and love Thee above all things. O Mary, draw me wholly to God; give me confidence in thyself, and make me have continual recourse to thee. Thou, by thy prayers, must make me holy. So I hope.

PREPARATION FOR MASS AND THANKSGIVING

ConsiderationS AND AFFECTIONS ON THE PASSION OF JESUS CHRIST. ACTS. ASPIRATIONS. PRAYERS

These exercises, put into the last place, were added by the saintly author as a "second part" to the treatise on the Ceremonies of the Mass, and appear to have been composed at the same time. We give here the full title: "The respect, the preparation, and thanksgiving that priests should practise in order to derive fruit from the celebration of Mass." To this we subjoin Acts, Aspirations, and Prayers.—ED.

INTRODUCTION

THE RESPECT WITH WHICH ONE SHOULD CELEBRATE MASS

ALL the great good that the Passion of Jesus Christ has procured for the world is also procured, according to St. Thomas, by each Mass that is celebrated: "Whatever is the effect of the Passion of our Lord, is also the effect of this sacrament."[12833] This the Church confirms by her prayer: "As many times as this commemorative sacrifice is celebrated, so often is the work of the redemption performed."[12834] In fact, the Council of Trent adds that it is the same Saviour who is offered for us on the cross, and who offers himself on the altar through the ministry of the priest: "For the victim is one and the same—the same now offering by the ministry of priests, who then offered Himself on the cross, the manner alone of offering being different."[12835] Hence, as the Passion of our Saviour was sufficient to save the whole world, so one single Mass is sufficient for this end; the priest, therefore, says in offering the chalice: "We offer unto Thee, O Lord, the chalice of salvation, . . . for our salvation, and that of the whole world."[12836]

By the sacrifice on the cross our Lord has obtained for us all the graces of the redemption; but it is by the sacrifice of the altar that the fruit of the sacrifice of the cross is applied to us. The Passion has rendered us capable of participating in the merits of Jesus Christ, but the Mass has put us in possession of them: it applies to us the fruits of the Passion, as is taught us by the Council of Trent.[12837]

We should therefore be convinced that the Mass is the greatest and the holiest action that we can perform upon earth, and that it is at the same time the most useful for our spiritual good. But as it is the holiest action, it is also that which we should perform with the greatest purity of intention and the greatest interior devotion of which we may be capable. The Council of Trent itself gives us this admonition: "It is also sufficiently clear, that all industry and diligence are to be applied to this end, that it be performed with the greatest possible inward cleanness and purity of heart, and outward show of devotion and piety,"[12838]

Hence we may infer how great is the chastisement that priests merit if they say Mass with grave irreverence. Now one renders one's self culpable of this grave irreverence when one celebrates Mass with great haste, as one would do if one finished Mass in less than a quarter of an hour. This, according to the opinion of Doctors, cannot be excused from mortal sin, even when the Mass is short, as in a Mass of the Dead or of the Blessed Virgin.

Benedict XIV.[12839] teaches with Clericatus, Roncaglia, Bissus, Gobat, Quarti, and others, that the Mass should not last more than half an hour, nor less than twenty minutes; for in a less space of time one cannot perform, with the respect that is due to them, all the prescribed ceremonies; and if one goes beyond that time one cannot avoid wearying those that are present. Hence Roncaglia,[12840] Quarti,[12841] and Gobat[12842] rightly say that he who celebrates Mass infra quadrantem, that is to say, in less than a quarter of an hour, cannot be exempt from a grave fault. In fact, it is certain that all the Rubrics relative to what is done during the Mass is preceptive, as we have proved in our Moral Theology;[12843] for St. Pius V., in his Bull placed at the beginning of the Missal, ordains districte, in virtute sanctæ obedientiæ, that the Mass should be celebrated juxta ritum, modum, ac normam, quæ per Missale traditur. This being established, each time that one omits a ceremony, or that one does not perform it as one should, one commits at least a venial fault; and Concina,[12844] Wigandt,[12845] Roncaglia,[12846] and Lacroix[12847] rightly say that if one offends against many ceremonies, even if they do not belong to the most important, such negligence could amount even to a mortal sin.

We thence conclude, with the common opinion of the Doctors named above, that he who says Mass in less than a quarter of an hour sins grievously; for one cannot finish Mass in so short a time without falling into two grave disorders: namely, a grave irreverence in regard to the divine Sacrifice, and a grave scandal in regard to the people.

In regard to irreverence towards the holy Sacrifice, it is certain, according to what is declared by the Council of Trent in the decree cited above, that the malediction which God pronounces by the mouth of Jeremias[12848] against those that exercise negligently the functions that concern divine worship, applies precisely to those priests that celebrate Mass without due respect. He that celebrates Mass in less than a quarter of an hour must necessarily commit many faults by mutilating the words, by mixing them up pell-mell with the ceremonies, by not following the order prescribed by the Rubric, or by awkwardly making through excessive precipitation the blessings and genuflections;—faults which, though each one may be light in itself, will when taken together be the cause why the Mass is said with grave irreverence.

In the second place, as to the scandal given to the people, we must consider what the Council of Trent[12849] says; namely, that the ceremonies of worship, and especially those of the Mass, have been instituted to inspire the people with esteem and veneration for this august mystery. These ceremonies the heretics despise and ridicule; but God wishes that we should be exact in their observance. In the Old Law our Lord threatened to let all the maledictions fall upon him who should neglect the ceremonies prescribed in the sacrifices; yet these sacrifices were only a shadow and a figure of the great sacrifice of the altar; how much greater will be the punishment that God will inflict upon those that are careless about the ceremonies of the Mass! St. Teresa used to say: "For the least ceremony of the Church I would lay down my life a thousand times."[12850]

Why should we set so great a value on ceremonies? We have already indicated the reason. The Council of Trent says that the cere monies of the Mass have been instituted by the Church to make the faithful understand by these exterior signs the majesty of the divine sacrifice and the grandeur of the mysteries contained therein: "The Church has employed ceremonies, . . . whereby both the majesty of so great a sacrifice might be recommended, and the minds of the faithful be excited, by those visible signs of religion and piety, to the contemplation of those most sublime things which are hidden in this sacrifice."[12851] But when the ceremonies are hastily performed, as they must be in order to finish them in so short a time as in less than a quarter of an hour, far from inspiring veneration for the Mass, they become the cause why people esteem so little so great a sacrifice. This conduct cannot be excused from a grave fault by reason of the grave scandal that the priest gives thereby to the people; for instead of inspiring them with a great veneration for the holy sacrifice he makes them lose it by showing them the contempt in which he himself holds this sacrifice. The Council of Tours ordained in 1583 that the priests should be fully instructed in the ceremonies of the Mass. Why? "Lest," says the Council, "instead of urging the people to venerate the sacred mysteries, they cause them to make little account of them."[12852]

It is also for this reason that the Council of Trent has strictly enjoined upon the priests that they should not celebrate Mass irreverently; this, says the Council, can hardly be exempt from impiety. These are the words of the Council: "The holy Synod decrees that the ordinary bishops of places shall take diligent care, and be bound to prohibit and abolish all those things that . . . irreverence (which can hardly be separated from impiety) may have introduced."[12853] We should note the words: "shall take diligent care, and be bound." It follows that the bishops are obliged, sub gravi, attentively to watch and to ask information about the manner in which the Masses are celebrated in their dioceses, and that they should suspend from the celebration of Mass all those that discharge this duty with but little care and respect. Moreover, the Council has made the bishops apostolic delegates in reference to this point, even as to the religious that are exempt. They can and should correct them; and if any subject neglects to amend, they can forbid him to celebrate Mass, and can even constrain him by censures and other punishments in order to force him to do his duty.

It is certain that a Mass celebrated with devotion will inspire with devotion those that hear it; on the contrary, a Mass said in haste and without gravity makes them lose devotion; and what is worse, it diminishes the respect, and chills at the same time the faith, in the divine Sacrifice. In fact, when a priest says Mass without devotion and with little respect, hastening and mutilating the ceremonies, the genuflections, the sign of the cross, the raising of the hands, the kissing of the altar, and other similar movements, or mixing them with the words which he precipitates so as to mutilate a great part of them,—can he inspire with devotion and respect those that are present, and see him? Most of the seculars are pleased to rid themselves as soon as possible of the duty of hearing Mass; but after having been present at a Mass celebrated in this hurried way they are scandalized at the priest who has celebrated it.

There are some who excuse themselves, saying: For myself, I do not fail either in the words or in the ceremonies: I omit nothing. We must, however, understand that in order to say Mass well, one should, it is true, pronounce all the words and perform all the ceremonies prescribed by the Rubric, not only the most essential, but also the least important, because all concur to exalt the dignity of the sacrifice. Hence the Church wishes that all the ceremonies that are performed during Mass should be regarded as preceptive and obligatory, as we have proved above; but all must be performed with the gravity suitable to an action so holy. It is, therefore, not sufficient to say Mass by pronouncing all the words and by performing all the ceremonies; it is also necessary that one should celebrate Mass gravely and sedately, so as to inspire those that are present with veneration towards the holy sacrifice; otherwise, when everything is done with much haste, one inspires them rather with contempt than with esteem for so grand a mystery. Thence comes that the priest who says Mass in less than a quarter of an hour, should he even have pronounced all the words and performed all the ceremonies, makes himself guilty of a grievous sin; for such a priest by not celebrating Mass with the requisite gravity cannot be excused from a grave irreverence.

The first thing that makes priests celebrate with so much irreverence is that they go to the altar without thinking of what they are going to do: one goes there either for a wretched remuneration, or on account of some other human motive. Before going, therefore, to the altar, it is proper, it is even necessary, to prepare one's self, by making a half-hour's meditation, or at least a meditation of a quarter of an hour; which, however, is not enough; and it would be well to take for the subject of meditation the Passion of Jesus Christ, since the priest is going to renew on the altar the sacrifice of the cross.

It is then with this view that I have here placed the following Considerations with various pious acts; before going to celebrate Mass one should at least read some one of these considerations.

I have added at the end some Affections with prayers, that may serve as thanksgiving after Mass. One should remember that the pious acts, after Communion, as writers teach us, have more value and merit before God than if they were made at any other time, because then the soul is united with Jesus Christ.

PREPARATION FOR MASS

CONSIDERATIONS ON THE PASSION OF JESUS CHRIST, IN PREPARATION FOR MASS, FOR EVERY DAY OF THE WEEK

I. FOR SUNDAY

Jesus goes to meet His enemies, is taken, and bound.

JESUS being in the garden, and knowing that Judas with the soldiers was now drawing nigh to seize and carry him off to death, does not wait until they come, but goes forth himself to meet them and to give himself into their hands. Our loving Redeemer was still bathed in that deadly sweat caused by the agony he had suffered in the garden, but his Heart was burning with love, and panting to suffer for us; and so he calls his disciples who were asleep, and says to them: Surgite, eamus; ecce qui me tradet prope est (Mark, xiv. 42).

So great, then, was Thy desire, my Saviour, to die for us, that Thou goest forth Thyself to meet Thy death. Ah, my Jesus, behold I am now going to the altar to renew the very same sacrifice of the Cross which Thou didst once consummate on Calvary. How I grieve for having despised Thee, who hast loved me so much as even to make me Thy priest! In past times I have turned my back upon Thee; but now I only desire to be united to Thee. Pardon, I beseech Thee, this morning, before Thou enterest into my breast, all the bitterness I have caused Thee, which I abhor above every other evil. Ah, do not allow me, my beloved Redeemer, to displease Thee again. I love Thee, my Jesus, dead for me; I love Thee, my God, worthy of infinite love. I love Thee, my only Good: I leave all for Thy love. Deus meus et omnia. Thou alone art sufficient for me.

Eternal Father, I offer Thee this sacrifice in thanks—giving for all the gifts conferred on Jesus as Man, on the Blessed Virgin, and on all my patron saints. I recommend to Thee the Sovereign Pontiff, my relatives, benefactors, friends, and enemies. I recommend to Thee, moreover, infidels, heretics, and all sinners who are living in Thy displeasure: give them light and help to come out of so miserable a state. And to me—since, as I hope, Thou hast restored me to Thy grace—give holy perseverance.

And thou, O Mary, Mother of perseverance, do not cease to pray to Jesus for me.

II. FOR MONDAY

Jesus is brought before Caiphas, and is condemned to death.

The iniquitous high-priest, finding no proof wherewith to condemn the innocent Lord, endeavored to gain from his own words the declaration of his guilt, and therefore he asked him in the name of God: Adjuro te per Deum vivum, ut dicas nobis, si tu es Christus Filius Dei (Matt. xxvi. 63). Jesus, on hearing himself conjured by the name of God, declared the truth, and replied: Ego sum: et videbitis Filium hominis sedentem a dextris virtutis Dei, et venientem cum nubibus cœli (Mark, xiv. 62). On hearing this, Caiphas rent his garments, and said: "What need have we of further witnesses? Have you heard the blasphemy which he has uttered?" Tunc princeps sacerdotum scidit vestimenta sua, dicens: Blasphemavit: quid adhuc egemus testibus? (Matt. xxvi. 65.) He then asked the other priests, Quid vobis videtur? and they answered, Reus est mortis. But this sentence had already been given by the Eternal Father when Jesus offered himself to pay the penalty of our sins. My Jesus, I thank Thee, and I love Thee.

As soon as this unjust sentence was proclaimed, all, during that night, labor to torment him. One spits in his face; another strikes him with his fists; another gives him many blows on the face, deriding him as a false prophet: Tunc expuerunt in facicm ejus, et colaphis eum ceciderunt; alii autem palmas in faciem ejus dederunt, dicentes: Prophetiza nobis, Christe, quis est qui te percussit? (Matt. xxvi. 67, 68.) And as St. Mark adds, they cover his sacred countenance with a miserable rag, and so they strike him by turns.

Ah, my Jesus, how many insults hast Thou suffered for me to satisfy for the insults I have offered Thee! I love Thee, infinite Goodness. I grieve above all things for having so despised Thee. Pardon me, and give me the grace to be wholly Thine: I wish to belong wholly to Thee; it is for Thee to grant it.

Thou too, O Mary, my advocate and my hope, must obtain this favor for me by thy prayers.

III. FOR TUESDAY

Jesus is despised by Herod, and Barabbas preferred to Him.

When the morning was come, the Jews lead Jesus to Pilate that he may condemn him anew, and cause him to die. Pilate, after having examined all the crimes of which they accused the innocent Lord, replied that he found no cause of condemnation: Ego nullam in eo invenio causam. But to free himself from the insults of the priests, who persisted in wishing his death, and hearing that Jesus was a Galilean, and so subject to Herod, he sent him to Herod. Herod desired to see Jesus, with the hopes of beholding some miracle, of which he had heard that so many had been worked by our Saviour: so that when he was brought before him he asked him many questions; but the Lord answered him not a word. And therefore Herod, with his court, treated him as a fool, and in mockery clothed him with a white garment; and so sent him back to Pilate: Sprevit autem illum Herodes cum exercitu suo, et illusit indutum veste alba, et remisit ad Pilatum (Luke, xxiii. 11).

With reason, then, my Jesus, did Isaias foretell that Thou wert to be treated on this earth as the last and vilest of men, novissimum virorum. But since Thou, my Redeemer and God, wert pleased to be so despised for me, I accept and embrace all the scorn I may receive from men; and I will no longer resent it, as I have hitherto done, to Thy great displeasure.

Miserable Herod! by his impiety he made himself unworthy that Jesus should speak to him. My Jesus, I have in like manner deserved that Thou shouldst no longer speak to me, and shouldst abandon me; but no; in Thy mercy, speak to me: Loquere, Domine, quia audit servus tuus. In past times I have not been willing to listen to Thee; but now, because I love Thee, I wish to obey Thee in all things. Tell me what Thou willest of me, for I desire to please Thee in all things. Ah, Lord, when shall it be that I see myself wholly Thine, and no longer my own? No, I will no longer resist Thy loving calls.

O Mary, thy prayers are all-powerful; ask thy Son to make me as he desires me to be.

IV. FOR WEDNESDAY

Jesus is scourged and crowned with thorns.

Pilate acknowledges the innocence of Jesus, but, to please the Jews, condemns him to be scourged, hoping in this way to deliver him at least from death. Jesus accepts this excessive torture to make satisfaction for the sins we have committed with the senses. In this the words of the Prophet were fulfilled: Ipse autem vulneratus est propter iniquitates nostras, attritus est propter scelera nostra (Is. liii. 5).

I then, my Saviour, by my sins, and not the scourges, have torn Thy flesh. If I had sinned less, Thou wouldst have suffered fewer torments. I love Thee, my sovereign Good; and I repent with my whole heart of having so despised Thee.

The Jews, not satisfied with this, persuade the soldiers to crown him with thorns, and to treat him as a mock king. They strip him again of his garments; they throw over his shoulders a purple cloak, and place a reed in his hand, and a bundle of thorns upon his head. My beloved Redeemer, my evil consentings to sin were the cruel thorns that pierced Thee with so much pain. I now detest them and hate them above every evil.

Then they mocked him, and saluted him as King of the Jews; and then smiting him on the face, illudebant ei, dicentes: Ave rex Judæorum (Matt, xxvii. 29). St. John adds, Et dabant ei alapas (John, xix. 3). Ah, my Jesus, now Thou hast only the semblance of a king of mockery and of pain; but I acknowledge Thee for my true King and Lord, and I thank Thee and love Thee above every good. I love Thee, my Jesus; scourged for me, and crowned with thorns for me. Grant, I pray Thee, that I may quit all to love none other than Thee.

O Mary, Mother of God, pray to Jesus for me.

V. FOR THURSDAY

Pilate shows Jesus to the people, saying, Ecce Homo!

Jesus is conducted back again to Pilate, who, seeing him so torn by the scourges, thinks to move the Jews to compassion by letting them see him. He goes out then on the balcony, and takes with him the afflicted Saviour, and says to the people, Ecce Homo! Jesus then appeared, crowned with thorns, and his shoulders covered with the purple cloak: Exivit ergo Jesus, portans coronam spineam et purpureum vestimentum (John, xix. 5). Do thou, O my soul, look at thy Redeemer upon that balcony, and consider to what a state thy Good Shepherd is reduced, in order to save thee, the lost sheep. My Jesus, I thank Thee. Misericordias Domini in æternum cantabo.

But the Jews, when they saw him, instead of pitying him, began to cry out, Crucifige, crucifige eum! Pilate, nevertheless, seeks to deliver him, acknowledging his innocence; but they continue to cry, Tolle, tolle, crucifige eum! Ah, my Jesus, I too once, in a certain way, wished Thee to die when I drove Thee from my soul; but Thou nevertheless, to pardon me, didst will to give Thy life upon the Cross. My dear Redeemer, I acknowledge the wrong I have done Thee, and would die of sorrow for it. I am sorry with my whole soul, O infinite Goodness, for having in past times so despised Thee; but now I love Thee above all things, and I prize Thy grace more than all the goods of heaven and earth. And of what profit are all the goods of the world without Thy grace? Thou hast loved me even unto death; I also will love Thee unto death. Give me holy perseverance, give me Thy holy love; grant that during the days that await me I may never displease Thee again, and may think of nothing but of loving Thee.

O blood of Jesus, inebriate me thoroughly with holy love. O death of Jesus, make me die to every earthly love. My beloved Saviour, deliver me from hell, which have so often deserved. In hell I could no longer love Thee, and should be obliged to curse Thy blood, Thy death, and the graces Thou hast given me. No, my Jesus, I wish to love Thee, and to love Thee alone. Give me the grace to love Thee, and then do with me as Thou wilt.

O Mary, Mother of sinners, help a sinner who wishes to love God, and who recommends himself to thee. Thou listenest to all who pray to thee; listen then to me, for the love of Jesus Christ, whom thou lovest so much.

VI. FOR FRIDAY

Jesus is condemned by Pilale to death, and carries the Cross to Calvary.

Behold, Pilate is now on his judgment-seat, and condemns Jesus to die the death of the Cross. The unjust sentence given by Pilate is read out; but it has already been determined by the eternal Father, who willed the death of his Son for our salvation. Jesus listens to it, and, in perfect resignation to the divine will, humbly accepts it, in order that by his death he might deliver us from the eternal death which we had deserved: Humiliavit semetipsum, factus obediens usque ad mortem, mortem autem crucis (Phil. ii. 8).

My beloved Redeemer, Thou acceptest death to give me eternal life: if Thou hadst not died for me, I should now have been lost forever. I thank Thee for it, my love; Thy death is my hope. And since Thou, my God, hast accepted death for love of me, I for love of Thee accept of my death in the way and time most pleasing to Thee, together with all the pains that shall accompany it. I beseech Thee to give me the grace to die with the desire of pleasing Thee and of doing Thy will.

Behold, Jesus is leaving the house of Pilate with the Cross on his shoulder, and goes to Calvary, the place of his execution. This is the great sight which the world one day beheld,—a God, the Creator of all things, dying for his creatures!

Ah, Jesus, my Saviour; O love of my soul! Thou art taking this journey to die for me. I will not leave Thee; I will follow Thee, and die with Thee. Wretch that I am, in past times I have despised Thee; and have turned my back upon Thee; but now I love Thee above every good, and I repent with my whole heart of having offended Thee, and I promise never to leave Thee again until death. I embrace Thee with all affection, and in that embrace I wish to live and die. Do not, I pray Thee, abandon me with Thy grace.

And thou, O Mary, my dear advocate and protectress, do not cease to intercede for me.

VII. FOR SATURDAY

Jesus dies upon the Cross, consumed with sorrows, in the presence of his afflicted Mother.

As soon as Jesus had arrived on Calvary, the executioners strip him once more of his garments, and throw him upon the Cross. Jesus stretches out his hands, and offers to the eternal Father the great sacrifice of himself for the salvation of men.

Behold, they now take the nails and the hammers, and piercing through the hands and feet, they fix him to the Cross, and leave him there to die. O men, O men! how, I ask you, when you behold your God dying for love of you on that shameful wood, how can you behold him and live without loving him?

Jesus on the Cross! See the last appearance of the Lord of the world upon this earth! Behold the proof of God's love towards us! St. Francis of Paula, when one day contemplating Jesus on the Cross, began to exclaim: "O God, Love! O God, Love! O God, Love!" Ah, no one indeed will ever be able to explain or to comprehend the greatness of the love of this God for us, seen as it is in his willing to die for us, his miserable and ungrateful creatures.

And nevertheless, knowing this, my Jesus, I have despised Thy love and renounced Thy grace But Thy blood is my hope. I am sorry above every evil for having turned my back upon Thee, my Jesus. I love Thee with my whole soul, I love Thee above all things; and I promise from this day forth to love none but Thee.

Draw near, my soul, humbled and softened, to that Cross on which thy dying Lord is hanging. Kiss the altar on which thy very Creator is pleased to die for thee, sacrificed and consumed with sorrows. Bathe thyself in the blood which is running down from those sacred feet; in it wash away thy sins, and from it hope for every good. My dear Jesus, I will no longer belong to myself; I will be Thine, and Thine only. Tell me what Thou wiliest of me, for I desire to fulfil all. I hope for every thing from Thy goodness; and I also hope for all from thy protection, O my Mother Mary.

AFFECTIONS FOR EVERY DAY OF THE WEEK

I. FOR SUNDAY

MY beloved Jesus, I adore Thee; come into my breast under the humble appearances of bread and wine, and I cast myself at Thy feet and thank Thee for so great goodness in being pleased to come and visit me, a poor sinner, who have so often driven Thee from my soul.

I could dje of grief, my Redeemer, in thinking of the many insults I have offered Thee during my life. I thank Thee for giving me time to remedy the evil I have done. In past time I despised Thy love; but from this day forward I desire to love none but Thee, and to seek nothing but that which pleaseth Thee: Deus mens et omnia. Thou henceforth shalt be my only good, my only love.

O Love of my soul, I desire to give myself wholly to Thee: if I know not how to give myself as I ought, do Thou Thyself take me: Trahe me post te in odorem unguentorum tuorum. O incarnate Word, O God enamoured of men, detach me by Thy sweet and powerful drawings from all earthly affections, and draw me wholly to Thy holy love. Grant that I too may be able to say with truth: Quid mihi est in cœlo, et a te quid volui super terram? Deus cordis met, et pars mea Deus in æternum. Do Thou, O my Jesus, I pray Thee, dispose of my whole heart, of my whole will, so that I have no will but Thine, that I seek for nothing but to give Thee pleasure, and that nothing may please me save that which is pleasing to Thee; Deus cordis mei, et pars mea Deus in æternum. Let others choose what portion they please in this world, Thou art, and shalt always be, my only portion.

I can do nothing of myself, but with Thy grace I can do all: Omnia possum in eo qui me confortat. Thou hast promised to hear those who pray to Thee: Petite, et accipietis. These are the graces that I beg of Thee: give me holy perseverance, give me holy love, and I ask for nothing more. Hear me, O my Jesus, by the merits of Thy Passion.

Mary, my Queen and Advocate, thy prayers can obtain all. Pray to Jesus for me. Hear me, O my Mother, for the love which thou bearest to Jesus.

II. FOR MONDAY

O my divine shepherd, Thou didst come down from heaven to save me, the lost sheep, and I, by turning my back upon Thee, have gone again to destruction: Erravi sicut ovis quæ periit; quære servum tuum (Ps. cxviii. 176). I hope, my Jesus, that Thou hast pardoned my offences against Thee: but if Thou hast not yet pardoned me, do so now that Thou art come into my breast. I repent with my whole heart of having in past time so despised Thy grace: now I value it above every good, and I would, rather than lose it, lose my life a thousand times. And what profit is it to live in this world without Thy grace?

My beloved Redeemer, Thou hast died for all, in order that no one should live to himself, but to Thee who hast given Thy life for him: Pro omnibus mortuus est Christus, ut et qui vivunt, jam non sibi vivant, sed ei qui pro ipsa mortuus est (2 Cor. v. 15). Hitherto I have lived for myself, forgetful of Thee: henceforward I wish to live for Thee alone, who didst die for me: I desire to forget all, in order to think of loving Thee alone, who hast loved me so much. But in order to do this, Thou must help me, and this I most certainly hope for from Thy promise to grant that which is asked for in Thy name: Si quid petieritis me in nomine meo, dabo vobis (John, xiv. 14). I ask and hope for it through the merits of Thy Passion. Adveniat regnum tuum. Reign, my Jesus, reign over my whole soul, and never more let it rebel against Thee. I love Thee, infinite Goodness, and I beseech Thee, Ne permittas me separari a te. Let me die rather than see myself deprived of Thy friendship: In te, Domine, speravi; non confundar in æternum.

O Mary, O powerful advocate of those who trust in thy intercession, I trust in thee, and hope for eternal life. I say to thee then with St. Bonaventure, full of joy: In te, Domina, speravi; non confundar in æternum.

III. FOR TUESDAY

Grant, I beseech Thee, my Jesus and my God, that I may always know more and more how infinite a good Thou art, and the immense love Thou hast shown me in having willed to suffer all Thy life and to die for me; and more than this, in having given Thyself to me so often in the holy Communion. St. John Chrysostom writes: Semetipsum nobis immiscuit, ut unum quid simus; ardenter enim amantium hoc est. In short, Thine ardent love for me, my Saviour, has forced Thee to make Thyself my food, in order that I might become one with Thee.

Come then, come, O God of my soul, and make it all Thine own: come and drive from it all earthly affections, so that I may love Thee alone, think of Thee alone, speak of Thee alone, desire Thee alone, and seek for Thee alone. And whom shall I love, if I love not Thee, who art infinite goodness, and hast loved me even so far as to die for me? Ah, my Jesus, how couldst Thou choose me, an ungrateful one, from the midst of so many of Thy faithful servants, to be Thy priest? I have so often turned my back upon Thee, and Thou every morning dost vouchsafe to come into my hands and into my breast. Unhappy shall I be, if, after the many graces Thou hast given me, I go back again and lose Thy grace. O Lord, I love Thee now with all my soul, and I am heartily sorry for having despised Thee: I will not offend Thee more, and I will love Thee with all my strength. Help me, and do not abandon me. Vulnera tua merita mea (St. Bern.). Thy wounds, Thy blood, Thy death, are my hope. Give me holy perseverance; grant that in all my temptations I may have recourse to Thee: increase in me Thy love; and then do with me what Thou wilt.

Mary, my Oueen, obtain for me the grace to recommend myself always to thee: he who .has recourse to thee never remains overcome by the devil.

IV. FOR WEDNESDAY

O incarnate Word! what greater proofs hast Thou to make us understand the great love Thou dost entertain towards us, miserable and sinful worms?

Tell us, is there anything else Thou canst discover in order to force us to love Thee? Unhappy is he who lives deprived of Thy love; and unhappy me, who hitherto not only have not loved Thee, but have so greatly outraged Thy patience by the many insults I have offered Thee. How many times, O God of my soul, have I exchanged Thy grace for a miserable pleasure, and have told Thee to Thy face that I would not serve Thee! I repent of it, O God of my soul, from my whole heart. I hope for pardon from Thee through the merits of Thy death, and I hope for perseverance in Thy love. It is for this that Thou hast been following me for so many years. I will resist no longer: and, in truth, do I wish to wait until Thou Thyself shalt send me to hell? I love Thee, infinite Goodness; I love Thee, my God, worthy of infinite love; I love Thee, and I wish to repeat always in this life and in the next, I love Thee, I love Thee, I love Thee.

In manus tuas commendo spiritum meum; redemisti me, Domine, Deus veritatis. My Jesus, do not Thou abandon me. Thou comest down every day from heaven to unite me to Thyself, and to feed me with Thy flesh. Ah, do not let me see myself separated again from Thee. Jesus, my love and my hope, now I desire nothing, save to be Thine, and wholly Thine, without reserve. Give me strength, my Redeemer, to execute this desire. O bone Jesu, exaudi me.

O Mary, my Mother, if thou prayest for me, I shall certainly obtain this grace. O Maria, exaudi me.

V. FOR THURSDAY

An nescitis quoniam . . . non estis vestri? Empti enim estis pretio magno. Such is the warning of the Apostle. So it is, my Jesus; but nevertheless I have forgotten Thee so many times for a mere nothing, and have renounced Thy grace and Thy love. All this is true; but it is likewise true that I am ono of those sinners who have been purchased with Thy blood: Te ergo quæsumus tuis famulis subveni, quos pretioso sanguine redemisti. I love Thee, my Jesus, above every good; and because I love Thee, I repent with my whole heart of having displeased Thee.

Miserable being that I am, how many years have I lost, in which I could have served Thee and have become holy! Instead of which, I have squandered them away in despising Thee, and in sending my soul to perdition But Thy goodness makes me hope that I may make up for lost time by redoubling the love that I owed Thee. My Jesus, Thou hast given Thyself to me upon the Cross, and in the most Holy Sacrament; and what shall I, a miserable sinner, give to Thee? I give Thee all my earthly satisfactions: I give Thee my body, my soul, my will, my liberty. If Thou foreseest that I shall ever take back again my will by sinning against Thee, let me die now that I hope I am in Thy grace. Eternal Father, Thou dost grant all graces which are asked of Thee in the name of Jesus Christ: I beseech Thee, in the name of Jesus Christ, give me holy perseverance, and Thy holy love.

O Mary, thou art the Mother of perseverance; thou listenest to those who pray to thee. I ask of thee, and I surely hope from thee, this holy perseverance.

VI. FOR FRIDAY

Christus dilexit nos, et tradidit semetipsum pro nobis (Ephes. v. 2). Jesus Christ, then, the Son of God, has loved us so much that he has been pleased to die of sorrow for us upon a cross. And who could ever have caused a God to die, if he himself had not willed to die? Ego pono animam meam, He said: nemo tollit eam a me; sed ego pono eam (John, x. 17).

O my soul, if you doubt your Saviour's love for you, look at him dead upon that Cross for you; and what greater proof could he give of his love for you, than to give his life for love of you? In hoc cognovimus caritatem Dei, quoniam ille animam suam pro nobis posuit (I John, iii. 16).

My Jesus, Thou hast given Thy life for my salvation, and I have exchanged Thy friendship for nothing—for the satisfaction of a passion, for a miserable pleasure! I am sorry for it above every evil: would that I could die of sorrow! Pardon me, I beseech Thee, by the merits of Thy death; and in pledge of my pardon, give me a great sorrow for my sins and a great love for Thee. I feel within me, by Thy grace, a lively desire to love Thee, and a resolution to belong wholly to Thee; but I see my own weakness, I see my past treachery. Thou alone canst make me strong and faithful. Help me, O my love; make me love Thee: I ask Thee for nothing more.

In hoc enim Christus mortuus est et resurrexit, ut et mortuorum et vivorum dominetur (Rom. xiv. 9). So, then, my Saviour, Thou didst die in order to make Thyself the master of our hearts. Yes, my Jesus, I will that this heart of mine, which once was a rebel against Thee, be now wholly Thine: do Thou henceforward take the dominion of it, and let it be obedient to all Thy will. Tell me what Thou willest of me; for with the help of Thy grace I desire to do all.

O Mary, pray to Jesus for me: thou must make me faithful to God.

VII. FOR SATURDAY

Animam meam pono pro ovibus meis (John, x. 15). O divine Shepherd, who wert pleased, for the love of Thy sheep, to die upon an infamous gibbet consumed with sorrows, do not abandon me, as I have deserved by reason of my offences against Thee. I have been a sinner, but I will be so no longer. Now I love Thee, my dear Jesus, above all things; and there is no sorrow that afflicts me so much as the remembrance of having so greatly despised Thee in past years. I thank Thee for not having sent me to hell, and for having waited for me with so much patience. Ah, my true Lover, instead of abandoning me, Thou hast followed me, and hast knocked at the door of my heart with such sweet loving calls, that at length Thou hast drawn me to Thy love. My Jesus, I thank Thee, and I pray Thee to perfect the work. Give me light and strength to detach myself from all that does not tend to Thy love.

Thou hast said that Thou lovest him who loves Thee: Ego diligentes me diligo. Formerly I turned my back on Thee, and then I justly deserved Thy hatred; but now that I love Thee, my dear God, hate me no longer. Do Thou also love me: I prize Thy love more than the love of the whole world. Let all men look on me with horror; it is enough for me if Thou dost look on me with love. Provided I lose not Thy love, I am content to suffer every pain. Bind me, and press me to Thyself, so that I may never see myself separated again from Thee. Jesu dulcissime, ne permittas me separari a te.

Mary, Virgin most holy, thou must obtain for me this grace, never again to separate myself from the love of my God.

ACTS BEFORE COMMUNION

I. AN ACT OF FAITH

Behold, He cometh leaping upon the mountains, skipping over the hills.[12854] Ah, my most amiable Saviour, over how many, what rough and craggy mountains, hast Thou had to pass in order to come and unite Thyself to me by means of this most holy sacrament! Thou, from being God, hadst to become man; from being immense, to become a babe; from being Lord, to become a servant. Thou hadst to pass from the bosom of Thy eternal Father to the womb of a Virgin; from heaven into a stable; from a throne of glory to the gibbet of a criminal. And on this very morning Thou wilt come from Thy seat in heaven to dwell in my bosom.

Behold He standeth behind our wall, looking through the windows, looking through the lattices.[12855] Behold, O my soul, thy loving Jesus, burning with the same love with which he loved thee when dying for thee on the Cross, is now concealed in the Most Blessed Sacrament under the sacred species; and what is he doing? Looking through the lattices. As an ardent lover, desirous to see you correspond to his love, from the Host, as from within closed lattices, whence he sees without being seen, he is looking at you, who are this morning about to feed upon his divine flesh; he observes your thoughts, what it is that you love, what you desire, what you seek for, and what offerings you are about to make him.

Awake, then, my soul, and prepare to receive thy Jesus; and, in the first place, by faith, say to him: So, then, my beloved Redeemer, in a few moments Thou art coming to me! O hidden God, unknown to the greater part of men, I believe, I confess, I adore Thee in the Most Holy Sacrament as my Lord and Saviour! And in acknowledgment of this truth I would willingly lay down my life. Thou comest to enrich me with Thy graces and to unite Thyself entirely to me; how great, then, should be my confidence in this Thy so loving visit!

II. AN ACT OF CONFIDENCE

My soul, expand thy heart. Thy Jesus can do thee every good, and, indeed, loves thee. Hope thou for great things from this thy Lord, who, urged by love, comes all love to thee.

Yes, my dear Jesus, my hope, I trust in Thy goodness, that, in giving Thyself to me this morning, Thou wilt enkindle in my poor heart the beautiful flame of Thy pure love, and a real desire to please Thee; so that, from this day forward, I may never will anything but what Thou willest.

III. AN ACT OF LOVE

Ah, my God, my God, true and only love of my soul, and what more couldst Thou have done to be loved by me? To die for me was not enough for Thee, my Lord; Thou wast pleased to institute this great sacrament in order to give Thyself all to me, and thus bind and unite Thyself heart to heart with so loathsome and ungrateful a creature as I am. And what is more, Thou Thyself invitest me to receive Thee, and desirest so much that I should do so! O boundless love! incomprehensible love! infinite love! a God would give himself all to me!—My soul, believest thou this? And what doest thou? what sayest thou? O God, O God, O infinite amiability, only worthy object of all love, I love Thee with my whole heart, I love Thee above all things, I love Thee more than myself, more than my life! Oh, could I but see Thee loved by all! Oh, could I but cause Thee to be loved by all hearts as much as Thou deservest! I love Thee, O most amiable God, and I unite my miserable heart in loving Thee to the heart, of the seraphim, to the heart of the most blessed Virgin Mary, to the Heart of Jesus, thy most loving and beloved Son. So that, O infinite Good, I love Thee with the love with which the saints, with which Mary, with which Jesus, love Thee. And I love Thee only because Thou art worthy of it, and to give Thee pleasure. Depart, all earthly affections, that are not for God, depart from my heart. Mother of fair love, most holy Virgin Mary, help me to love that God whom Thou dost so ardently desire to see loved!

IV. AN ACT OF HUMILITY

Then, my soul, thou art even now about to feed on the most sacred flesh of Jesus! And art thou worthy? My God, and who am I, and who art Thou? I indeed know and confess who Thou art that givest Thyself to me; but dost Thou know what I am who am about to receive Thee? And is it possible, O my Jesus, that Thou who art infinite purity desirest to come and reside in this soul of mine, which has been so many times the dwelling of Thy enemy, and soiled with so many sins? I know, O my Lord, Thy great Majesty and my misery; I am ashamed to appear before Thee. Reverence would induce me to keep at a distance from Thee; but if I depart from Thee, O my life, whither shall I go? to whom shall I have recourse? and what will become of me? No, never will I depart from Thee; nay, even I will ever draw nearer and nearer to Thee. Thou art satisfied that I should receive Thee as food, Thou even invitest me to this. I come then, O my amiable Saviour, I come to receive Thee this morning, all humbled and confused at the sight of my defects; but full of confidence in Thy tender mercy, and in the love which Thou bearest me.

V. AN ACT OF CONTRITION

I am indeed grieved, O God of my soul, for not having loved Thee during the time past; what is still worse, so far from loving Thee, and to gratify my own inclinations, I have greatly offended and outraged Thy infinite goodness: I have turned my back upon Thee, I have despised Thy grace and friendship; in a word, O my God, I was deliberate in my will to lose Thee. Lord, I am sorry, and grieve for it with my whole heart. I detest the sins which I have committed, be they great or small, as the greatest of all my misfortunes, because I have thereby offended Thee, O Infinite Goodness. I trust that Thou hast already forgiven me; but if Thou hast not yet pardoned me, oh, do so before I receive Thee: wash with Thy blood this soul of mine, in which Thou art so soon about to dwell.

VI. AN ACT OF DESIRE

And now, my soul, the blessed hour has arrived in which Jesus will come and take up his dwelling in thy poor heart. Behold the King of Heaven, behold thy Redeemer and God, who is even now coming; prepare thyself to receive him with love, invite him with the ardor of thy desire.

Come, O my Jesus, come to my soul, which desires Thee. Before Thou givest Thyself to me, I desire to give Thee, and I now give Thee, my miserable heart; do Thou accept it, and come quickly to take possession of it. Come, my God! hasten; delay no longer. My only and Infinite Good, my treasure, my life, my Paradise, my love, my all, my wish is to receive Thee with the love with which the most holy and loving souls have received Thee; with that with which the most blessed Virgin Mary received Thee; to their Communions I unite this Communion of mine.

Most holy Virgin and my Mother Mary, behold, I already approach to receive thy Son. Would that I had the heart and love with which thou didst communicate! Give me this morning thy Jesus, as thou didst give him to the shepherds and to the kings. I intend to receive him from thy most pure hands. Tell him that I am thy servant and thy client; for he will thus look upon me with a more loving eye, and now that he is coming, will press me more closely to himself.

ACTS AFTER COMMUNION

BEHOLD, my God is even now come to visit me; my Saviour to dwell in my soul. My Jesus is even now within me. He has come to make himself mine, and at the same time to make me his. So that Jesus is mine, and I belong to Jesus: Jesus is all mine, and I am all his.

O infinite Goodness! O infinite Mercy! O infinite Love! that a God should come to unite himself to me, and to make himself all mine! My soul, now that thou art thus closely bound to Jesus, that thou art thus one with him, what doest thou? Hast thou nothing to say to him; dost thou not converse with thy God, who is with thee? Ah, yes, renew thy faith; remember that the angels now surround thee adoring their God, who is within thy breast; do thou also adore thy Lord within thyself. Enter into thyself, and banish thence every other thought. Unite all thy affections, and, clinging closely to thy God, say:

II. AN ACT OF WELCOME

Ah, my Jesus, my love, my infinite good, my all, be ever welcome in the poor dwelling of my soul! Ah, my Lord, where art thou! to what a place art Thou come! Thou hast entered my heart, which is far worse than the stable in which Thou wast born; it is full of earthly affections, of self love, and ot inordinate desires. And how couldst Thou come to dwell there? I would address Thee with St. Peter: Depart from me, for I am a sinful man.[12856] Yes, depart from me, O Lord, for I am indeed unworthy to receive a God of infinite goodness; go and find repose in those pure souls who serve Thee with so much love. But no, my Redeemer; what do I. say? Leave me not; for if Thou departest, I am lost. I embrace Thee, my life; I cling to Thee. Mad indeed have I been in having separated myself from Thee for the love of creatures; and in my ingratitude I drove Thee from me. But now I will never more separate myself from Thee, my treasure; I desire to live and die ever united to Thee. Most blessed Virgin Mary, Seraphim, and all souls, do ye who love God with pure love lend me your affections, that I may worthily attend on my beloved Lord.

III. AN ACT OF THANKSGIVING

My God and Lord, I thank Thee for the grace which Thou hast this morning bestowed upon me, of coming to dwell in my soul; but I would wish to thank Thee in a manner worthy of Thee and of the great favor which Thou hast done me. But what do I say? how can so miserable a creature as I am ever worthily thank Thee?

Father Segneri says, that the feeling most becoming a soul that communicates is that of wondering astonishment at the thought, and to repeat, "A God is united to me; a God is mine!" David said, What shall I render to the Lord for all the things that He hath rendered to me? [12857] But I! what return shall I make to Thee, my Jesus, who, after having given me so many of Thy good things, hast this morning, moreover, given me Thyself? My soul, bless, then, and thank thy God as best thou canst. And thou, my Mother Mary, my holy advocates, my guardian angel, and all ye souls who love God, Come and hear, all ye that fear God, and I will tell you what great things He hath done for my soul.[12858] Come and bless and thank my God for me, admiring and praising the indeed great graces which he has granted me.

IV. AN ACT OF OBLATION

My Beloved to me, and I to Him.[12859] Should a king go to visit a poor shepherd in his hut, what can the shepherd offer him other than his whole hut, such as it is? Since, then, O Jesus, my divine king, Thou hast come to visit the poor house of my soul, I offer and give Thee this house and my entire self, together with my liberty and will: My Beloved to me, and I to Him. Thou hast given Thyself all to me; I give myself all to Thee. My Jesus, from this day forward I will be no longer mine; I will be Thine, and all Thine. May my senses be Thine, that they may only serve me to please Thee. And what greater pleasure, says St. Peter of Alcantara, can be found, than that of pleasing Thee, most amiable, most loving, most gracious God? I at the same time give Thee all the powers of my soul, and I will that they shall be all Thine; my memory I will only use to recall to mind Thy benefits and Thy love; my understanding I will only use to think of Thee, who always thinkest of my good; my will I will only use to love Thee, my God, my all, and to will only that which Thou willest.

My most sweet Lord, I offer, then, and consecrate to Thee this morning all that I am and have-my senses, my thoughts, my affections, my desires, my pleasures my inclinations, my liberty; in a word, I place my whole body and soul in Thy hands.

Accept, O Infinite Majesty, the sacrifice of the hitherto most ungrateful sinner Thou hast ever had on earth; but who now offers and gives himself all to Thee. Do with me and dispose of me, O Lord, as Thou pleasest.

Come, O consuming fire, O divine love! and consume in me all that is mine, and that is displeasing in Thy most pure eyes, so that henceforward I may be all Thine, and may live only to execute, not Thy commands and counsels only, but also all Thy holy desires and Thy good pleasure. Amen.

O most holy Mary, do thou present this offering of mine to the Most Blessed Trinity with thine own hands; and do thou obtain their acceptance of it, and that they may grant me the grace to be faithful unto death. Amen, amen, amen.

V. AN ACT OF PETITION

O my soul, what art thou doing? The present is no time to be lost: it is a precious time, in which thou canst receive all the graces that thou askest. Seest thou not the Eternal Father, who is lovingly beholding thee? for within thee he sees his beloved Son, the dearest object of his love. Drive, then, far from thee all other thoughts; rekindle thy faith, enlarge thy heart, and ask for whatever thou willest.

Hearest thou not Jesus himself who thus addresses thee: What wilt thou that I should do to thee?[12860] O soul, tell me, what dost thou desire of me? I am come for the express purpose of enriching and gratifying thee; ask with confidence, and thou wilt receive all.

Ah! my most sweet Saviour, since Thou hast come into my heart in order to grant me graces, and desirest that I should ask Thee for them, I ask Thee not for the goods of the earth—riches, honors, or pleasures; but grant me, I beseech Thee, intense sorrow for the displeasure that I have caused Thee; impart to me so clear a light, that I may know the vanity of this world, and how deserving Thou art of love. Change this heart of mine, detach it from all earthly affections; give me a heart conformable in all things to Thy holy will, that it may seek only that which is more pleasing to Thee, and have no other desire than Thy holy love: Create a clean heart in me, O God.[1286I]

I deserve not this; but Thou, my Jesus, deservest it, since Thou art come to dwell in my soul: I ask it of Thee through Thy merits, and those of Thy most holy Mother, and by the love which Thou bearest to Thy Eternal Father.

Here pause, to ask Jesus for some other particular grace for yourself and for your neighbors. Do not forget poor sinners, or the souls in Purgatory; and pray also for me, who composed this little book for your good.

Eternal Father, Jesus Christ himself, Thy Son, has said, Amen, amen, I say to you, If you ask the Father anything in My Name, He will give it you.[12862] For the love, then, of this Son, whom I now hold within my breast, do Thou graciously hear me and grant my petition.

Amores mei dulcissimi, Jesu et Maria! pro vobis patiar, pro vobis moriar; sim totus vester, sim nihil meus. [12863] ("My most sweet Loves, Jesus and Mary, may I suffer for you, may I die for you; may I be all yours, and in nothing my own!")

Loving Aspirations TO JESUS IN THE BLESSED SACRAMENT.

They can be used either before or after Communion, or in visiting the Blessed Sacrament.

I

Egredimini et videte, filiæ Sion, regem Salomonem in diademate, quo coronavit illum mater sua in die desponsationis illius (Cant. iii. 11). O daughters of grace, O ye souls who love God, quit the darkness of earth, and behold Jesus, your king, crowned with a crown of thorns; the crown of contempt and suffering with which the impious synagogue, his mother, crowned him on the day of his espousals,—that is to say, on the day of his death, by the means of which he espoused himself on the Cross to our souls. Go forth again, and behold him all full of compassion and love, now that he comes to unite himself to thee in this sacrament of love.

Has it indeed, then, cost Thee so much, my beloved Jesus, before Thou couldst come and unite Thyself to souls in this most sweet sacrament? Wert Thou indeed obliged to suffer so bitter and ignominious a death? Oh, come then, without delay, and unite Thyself to my soul also. It was at one time Thy enemy by sin; but now Thou desirest to espouse it by Thy grace. Come, O Jesus, my spouse; for never more will I betray Thee; I am determined to be ever faithful to Thee. As a loving spouse, my whole thought shall be to find out Thy pleasure. I am determined to love Thee without reserve; I desire to be all Thine, my Jesus—all, all, all.

II

Fasciculus myrrhæ Dilectus meus mihi inter ubera mea commorabitur (Cant. i. 12). The myrrh plant when pricked sends forth tears, and a healthful liquor from the wounds. Our Jesus, from the beginning of his Passion, determined to pour forth his divine blood from his wounds with so much pain, in order to give it afterwards all to us for our salvation in this bread of Life.

Come, then, O my beloved bundle of myrrh, O my enamoured Jesus; Thou art indeed a subject of grief and pity to me when I consider Thee all wounded for me on the Cross; but then, when I receive Thee in this most sweet sacrament, Thou becomest indeed to me more sweet and delicious than a bunch of the choicest grapes can be to one who is parched with thirst: Botrus Cypri dilectus meus mihi in vineis Engaddi (Cant. i. 13). Come, then, to my soul, and revive and satiate me with Thy holy love. Ah, what sweetness do I feel in my soul at the thought that I have to receive within myself that same Saviour of mine, who for my salvation was pleased to be drained of all his blood, and sacrificed on across! Inter ubera mea commorabitur. No, my Jesus, never more will I drive Thee hence; and Thou shalt never more have to leave me. I am determined ever to love Thee, and to be always united to and closely bound up with Thee. I will always belong to Jesus, and Jesus will be always mine: forever, forever, forever inter ubera mea commorabitur.

Dum esset Rex in accubitu suo, nardus mea dedit odorem suurn (Cant. i. 11). When Jesus comes to dwell in a soul in holy Communion, oh how clearly does she see and know her own nothingness by the bright light which the King of heaven brings with him! As the spikenard is the most lowly among plants, so does the soul confess herself the most vile of all creatures; and when thus humbled, oh how sweet is the odor that she breathes forth to her beloved King! and for this reason he invites her to unite herself to him in closer and closer bonds.

If, then, my soul, thou desirest that thy Jesus should repose in thee, consider thy own nothingness. Who art thou? what dost thou deserve? Humble thyself as thou shouldst do, by casting away from thyself all selfesteem, which may keep Jesus at a distance from thee, or prevent his coming to repose in thee. Come to me, my dear Redeemer, come; and by Thy divine light make me see my own lowliness, my misery, my nothingness, that Thou mayest be enabled to repose in me with satisfaction to Thyself, to separate Thyself no more from me.

Sentite de Domino in bonitate (Sap. i. 1). My soul, why art thou so timid and fearful at the sight of the goodness and infinite love of thy Lord? why such distrust? Now that thou art made worthy to receive within thee Jesus Christ, let thy sentiments correspond to this grace, by confiding in that goodness of God, who gives thee all himself. Truly his judgments are terrible, but they are terrible only to the proud and to the obstinate; but to the humble and penitent, who desire to love and please him, his judgments are all mercy and love, flowing from a heart full of compassion and kindness. So that David, considering these judgments of God, superabounds with hope: In judiciis tuis supersperavi (Ps. cxviii. 43). These judgments made him happy and consoled him: Judicia tua jucunda (Ib. 39): Memor fui judiciorum tuorum et consolatus sum (Ib. 52).

Ah, this great God is only too loving and generous to those who seek him with love: Bonus est Dominus animæ quærenti illum (Lam. iii. 25). How good is God to those who seek to unite their will with the divine will! Quam bonus Israel Deus his qui recto sunt corde! (Ps. lxxii. 1). My God, my love, my hope, my all, I desire Thee, and Thee alone,—to love Thee, to please Thee, and to do Thy will in all things. Let me always find Thee; make me agreeable to Thee; and never let me leave Thee again. Fiat, fiat. Amen, amen.

Vox dilecti mei pulsantis: aperi mihi, soror mea, amica mea, columba mea, immaculata mea (Cant. v. 2). Such are the words which Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament speaks to those who love and desire him. Open to me, he says, O soul, thy heart, and there I will come to unite myself to thee; so that, being one with me, thou mayest become my sister by resemblance, my friend by participation in my riches, my dove by the gift of simplicity, my undefiled by the gift of purity, which I shall communicate to thee.

And then he goes on to say, Open to me, Quia caput meum plenum est rare, et cincinni mei guttis noctium (Ib.). As if he said: Consider, my beloved, that I have waited for thee all the night of the bad life thou hast led in the midst of darkness and error. Behold now, instead of bringing scourges to chastise thee, I come in the Blessed Sacrament, with my hair full of heavenly dew, to extinguish in thee all impure desires towards creatures, and to kindle in thee the happy fire of my love. Come, then, O my beloved Jesus, and work in me what Thou wilt. I renounce the love of all things, in order to be all Thine, and that Thou mayest make me as Thou wouldst have me, entirely united to Thy will.

Veniat dilectus meus in hortum suum, et comedat fructus pomorum suorum (Cant. v. 1). Cornelius à Lapide says that this is precisely the invitation that a soul desirous of the holy Communion makes to Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament. Come, my Beloved, she says, into my poor heart, which at one unhappy time did not belong to Thee; but which now, by the help of Thy grace, has returned to Thee. Veniat, et comedat fructus pomorum suorum: Come and taste in me those virtues which Thou dost bring with Thyself when Thou comest to me. O my Lord, at least for the honor of Thy majesty, purify my heart, adorn it, inflame it with Thy love, and make it beautiful in Thy sight, that it may be a worthy dwelling-place for Thee.

VII

Ad ubera portabimini (Is. lxvi. 12). It is thus that Jesus from the sacred altars invites our souls. Come, he says, and suck my divine milk, which I give you in this Sacrament, wherein I offer you my own blood to drink. But what shepherd, says St. John Chrysostom, ever feeds his sheep with his own blood? Even mothers give their children to nurses to be fed. But Thou, O divine Pastor, art so enamoured of our souls as to wish to nourish them with Thine own blood. St. Catharine of Sienna, then, might well, in approaching holy Communion, pant, as it were, to suck the divine milk, in the same way as an infant presses anxiously to suck the milk from its mother's breast. And well might the sacred spouse say to her beloved, Meliora sunt ubera tua vino (Cant. i. 1); signifying that she esteemed the milk of this sacrament, as the sacred interpreters explain it, above all the pleasures of the world, which are transitory and vain, as are transitory and vain also the joys and pleasures of wine.

O my beloved Jesus, since Thou wilt feed me this morning with Thine own blood in holy Communion, it is but reasonable that I should willingly renounce all the delights and pleasures that the world might give me. Yes, I give them all up; I protest that I choose rather to suffer all evils united to Thee, than to enjoy all the goods of the world away from Thee. It is sufficient happiness for me to please Thee, who art worthy of all that we can do to please Thee. I will say, then, with St. Ignatius of Loyola: Amorem tuum solum cum gratia tua mihi dones, et dives sum satis.

VIII

Comedite, amici, et bibite, et inebriamini, carissimi (Cant. v. 1). The "friends," that is beginners who scarcely enjoy the divine friendship, when they receive holy Communion feed indeed on the flesh of Jesus Christ, but they eat with labor; while those who are on the way to perfection eat with less difficulty. But by the "dearly beloved" are meant the perfect, who, inebriated with holy love, live almost out of the world, forgetting all things, even themselves, and think only how they may love and please their God.

My beloved Jesus, I am not yet perfect; but Thou canst make me perfect. I am not dear to Thee, and it is my own fault, because I have been ungrateful and unfaithful; but Thou canst make me become so, by inebriating me this morning with Thy love: Adveniat regnum tuum. Come, my beloved Lord, and take possession of my whole soul. Establish Thy kingdom in me; so that Thou alone mayst reign in me, that Thy love alone may command me, and that Thy love only may I obey. Inebriate me, inebriate me entirely; make me forget all creatures, myself, my interests, and all, that I may love nothing but Thee, my God, my treasure, all my good, my all; may I sigh for Thee alone, seek Thee alone, think of Thee alone, and please Thee alone. Do this by the merits of Thy Passion. This only do I ask of Thee: this I hope.

Fulcite me floribus, stipate me malis; quia amore langueo (Cant. ii. 5). The languor of the soul is when, forgetful of herself and her affairs, she thinks only of seeking refreshment for her languishing love by holy desires, which are the flowers, and by good works, which are the fruits, of Divine love.

O my God, O Blessed Sacrament, since Thou wilt have me to be all Thine, make me what Thou wouldst have me. Make me forget everything that does not belong to Thy love. Increase in me always more and more the desire of pleasing Thee. Grant that these flowers may not always remain flowers; make them also become fruits, by my doing and suffering something for Thee, who hast done and suffered only too much for me. O God, O God of my soul, make Thyself loved, but really loved, by me—not only in word, but in deed—before death comes upon me.

Dilectus meus candidus et rubicundus, electus ex millibus (Cant. v. 10). Our beloved Jesus is all white by his purity, and all red by the flames of his divine love. My spotless Lamb, all burning with love for me, when wilt Thou make me like to Thyself? pure as Thou art, O purest lily? burning with love of Thee as Thou dost burn with love of me? Yes, I do renounce all other love, and choose for myself Thy sweet love, my God, my all. Begone, ye creatures; what do you want with me? Go and enjoy the love of those who seek you. I wish only for my God; for God alone will I keep all my heart and all my affections.

XI

Benignitas et humanitas apparuit Salvatoris nostri Dei (Tit. iii. 4). St. Paul says, that God, by making himself man, showed the world how far his goodness towards us went. But by giving himself in this sacrament he makes us know the depth of the tenderness of his love towards our souls: Nonne insania videtur dicere: Manducate meam carnem, bibite meum sanguinem? St. Augustine says, does it not seem a madness, Jesus Christ saying to us, as he said in that blessed night: Accipite et comedite: hoc est corpus meum? O men, he says, to make you understand how much I love you, I will that you should come and feed on my very flesh. O holy faith! And who among us would have been able to demand so much? Who could have even thought of it, if Jesus had not thought it and done it? Some of the followers of Jesus Christ, when they heard this from his mouth, that is, that he wished to give them his body to eat, said that this was too hard a thing, and that they could neither believe nor hear it: Durus est hic sermo, et quis potest cum audire? (John, vi. 61). And they went so far as to leave him, because they would not believe it: but yet it is of faith that so it is.

But what else does Jesus Christ ask of us by all this he has done for us, but that we should love him? as the Lord had once before instructed his people: Et nunc, Israel, quid Dominus Deus tuus petit a tc nisi ut . . . diligas eum ac servias Domino Deo tuo in toto corde tuo ?

O my most loving Jesus, what dost Thou not give, what dost Thou not promise to those that love Thee? Thou dost promise them Thy love: Ego diligentes me diligo (Prov. viii. 17). Thou dost promise them Thy caresses, even when they have already turned their backs upon Thee: Convertimini ad me . . . et convertar ad vos (Zach. i. 3). Thou dost promise to come with the Father and the Holy Spirit to abide forever in their souls: Qui autem diligit me, diligetur a Patre meo . . . et ad eum veniemus, et apud eum mansionem faciemus (John, xiv. 21, 23).

And what more hast Thou to promise and to give to entice men to love Thee? My dearest Lord, I see how it is; Thou dost wish also to be loved by me:

yes, I love Thee with all my heart; and if I do not love Thee, do Thou teach me to love Thee; make me to love Thee, and to love Thee above all things: Da quod jubes, et jube quod vis.

XII

Nolite vie considerare, quod fusca sim, quia decoloravit me sol (Cant. i. 5). The heat of my passions, said the sacred spouse (and still more ought I to say it, O my dear Jesus), has deformed and blackened me: Nigra sum, sed formosa (Cant. i. 4). But if I am black by my own works, I am beautiful by Thy merits, O my Redeemer. I was black at one time, when I was alone and separated from Thee; but now that I am united to Thee, Thy grace, Thy beauty, Thy love has made me beautiful. Yes, my Jesus, so do I hope. Mayest Thou be blessed forever. Never permit me to lose Thee again, and to return to my former depravity. I love Thee, O infinite beauty; I wish also that my soul should be beautiful, always beautiful, that it may be always pleasing in Thy divine sight, and that Thou mayest always love it.

AFTER HOLY COMMUNION

I

Trahe me: post te curremus in odorem unguentorum tuorum (Cant. i. 3). Since, then, O my dear Jesus, I cannot, while in this life, ascend to Thee, Thou hast willed to descend to me, to unite Thyself to me in this sacrament of love: draw me, my Lord, all to Thee. I do not wish to draw Thee to me, that Thou shouldst do my pleasure; but I desire that Thou shouldst draw me so entirely to Thee by Thy sweet attractions, that I may not be able to desire or do anything else but Thy most holy will. It is just that my inclinations should yield to Thy holy dispositions. Unite me wholly to Thyself; and so united, and free from earthly affections, I will run with Thee in the path of virtue, and so shall be able to repose wholly in Thy divine will both in this life and in the next: In pace in idipsum dormiam et requiescam.

II

Introduxit me rex in cellam vinariam; ordinavit in me caritatem (Cant. ii. 4). It is precisely by this cellar of wine that St. Bonaventure understands holy Communion, which introduces and then unites the soul to its divine king, and gives it to taste that wine of love which destroys the desire of created things, and infuses a well-regulated love, that is just towards itself, charitable towards its neighbor, supreme towards God, loving him above all things, who above all things deserves to be loved.

O Jesus, my King, only Lord of my heart, Thou hast already brought me into the beautiful cellar of Thy love, that is, into Thyself, uniting me to Thee by means of this sacrament of love. Yes, my Lord, I already feel my heart changed. I feel a holy desire, which gives me peace, and makes me loathe all impure affections, and enkindles in me the pure love of Thee. O my Jesus, since Thou hast given me an entrance to this beautiful cellar, let me no more depart from it. Since Thou hast united Thyself to me, do not leave me again. Detach me from the love of all creatures. Unite me to Thee continually more and more on this earth, that I may one day come to be perfectly united to Thee in heaven; where I shall love Thee face to face with all my strength, without interruption and without imperfection throughout all eternity.

Dilectus meus descendit ad hortum suuvi . . . ut pascatur in hortis, et lilia colligat (Cant. vi. 1). My sweetest Saviour, since Thou dost descend from heaven to come into my soul, by Thy grace do Thou make it become Thy garden, that Thou mayest gather in it lilies and fruits which are agreeable to Thee. Pardon me, if I have offended Thee. Receive me, if I have left Thee, now that I return penitent to Thee. Give me that purity which Thou dost desire to see in me. Give me strength to do what Thou desirest. Grant me Thy true love, and then shall I become pleasing to Thee. I sacrifice to Thee all my inclinations, and I desire and wish for nothing but to please Thee.

The sacred spouse called her beloved Totus desiderabilis. Jesus, to those souls who love him as spouses, makes himself altogether desirable, whether he chastises or consoles them, whether he appears near or distant, because he does it all for love, and that he may be loved. Treat me, then, O my Jesus, as Thou wilt, I will always love Thee; whether Thou dost give me sweetness or tribulations, I know that all will come to me from Thy loving Heart, and that all will be for my greater good: Paratum cor meum, Deus, paratum cor meum. Behold my will is ready, O Lord, to accept all that Thou shalt ordain. Benedicam Dominum in omni tempore. At all times, whether prosperous or adverse, I will bless Thee and love Thee, O my Creator. I neither seek nor merit any consolation from Thee; for I have given Thee nothing but bitterness by my sins: I seek only Thy good pleasure. Provided Thou art satisfied with me, I shall be content with any punishment. My Jesus, my Jesus, whether far off or near Thou shalt always be desirable to me, always dear; whether Thou dost console or afflict me, I will always love Thee, always thank Thee.

Quæ est ista, quæ ascendit de deserto, deliciis affluens, innixa super dilectum snum? (Cant. viii. 5.) Who, then, are those souls who, living on the earth, esteem it a desert; so that, detached from visible things, they live only to God, as if there was no one else but God, whom alone they love and desire to please, and in this way they almost go out of the world, and raise themselves above it, enjoying the delights which are experienced by those who wish for God alone, and who place in God all their hopes?

Who, then, are these faithful souls, if not those who often and with pure love unite themselves to Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament? Yes, my God, such do I also desire to be by the means of Thy grace, detached from all things, and all Thine. Henceforth the world shall be to me a desert, where, flying from all attachment to creatures, I will think of nothing but Thee; as if Thou and I were the only persons there. In Thee alone will I put all my confidence, all my love, O God, O beloved God, my hope, my love, my all.

VI

Si murus est, ædificemus super eum propugnacula argentea: si ostium est, compingamus illud tabulis cedrinis (Cant. viii. 9). This is precisely what Jesus does when he comes to a soul in holy Communion. He sees that she is a wall too weak to be able to resist the assaults of hell; therefore, by the virtue of the sacrament, he fortifies her with bulwarks of silver, that is, with his divine light. He sees that she is a door inclined easily to be corrupted, and he renews it, adjusting it with planks of strength and perseverance, as is signified by cedar, which is a strong and incorruptible wood; that is, with the gifts of holy fear, with detachment from creatures, with the love of prayer, with supplications, with holy desires, and still more with the gift of divine love, which are the support of holy perseverance. Panis cor hominis confirmat. Jesus teaches us, that as earthly bread preserves the life of the body, so the heavenly bread of holy Communion preserves the life of the soul: Qui manducat me, et ipse vivet propter me. Qui manducat meam carnem, et bibit meum sanguinem in me manet, et ego in illo. Such are the gracious promises which Jesus makes to him who receives him in the Blessed Sacrament.

Ah, my Jesus, who is weaker and more unfaithful than I? Thou knowest well how many times I have yielded to my enemies, and how many times they have seized the gate, that is, my will, by which they have entered to ruin me by causing me to lose Thy friendship. Oh, fortify me with Thy light and strength, that I may no more lose Thee or drive Thee from me. My Lord and my Redeemer, if I am to turn back and offend Thee again, oh! let me die now, while I hope that I am in Thy grace and united to Thee. I trust not myself, no; nor will I ever, my dear Jesus, live without Thee. But as long as I live I am in danger of changing my will and betraying Thee, as I have done before; do Thou help me. Help me also, most holy Mary; have pity on me: thou, who art the Mother of perseverance, obtain for me this gift from thy Jesus. Of thee I seek it, of thee I hope it, of thee I ask it.

Inveni quem diligit anima mea; tenui eum, nec dimittam (Cant. iii. 4). So ought every soul to say who is united with Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament: Creatures, depart from me; go out altogether from my heart. I loved you once, because I was blind; now I love you not, nor can I ever love you again. I have found another good, infinitely more delightful than you: I have found in myself my Jesus, who has enamoured me by his beauty; to this my beloved one I have given myself entirely. He has already accepted me, so that I am no longer my own. Creatures, farewell: I am not, nor shall I ever again be yours; but I am and shall be always Christ's. He, too, is mine, and will always be mine: Tenui eum, nec dimittam. Now I have pressed him to my heart, receiving him in holy Communion; for the future I will hold him with my love, and will not let him leave me any more.

Permit me, O my most amiable Saviour, to embrace Thee so closely, that I may never more be separated from Thee. Behold, I press Thee to myself, my Jesus; I love Thee, I love Thee; and O that I could love Thee worthily! I wish that my only happiness and repose should be to love Thee and please Thee. Do Thou command all creatures to leave me, and not to disturb me; say to them: Adjuro vos . . . ne suscitetis, neque evigilare faciatis dilectam. Ah, if I do not wish it, creatures cannot enter in to disturb and divide me from Thee. Strengthen, then, my will, unite my miserable heart to Thy divine Heart, that it may always will what Thou wilt. Do this, Lord, by Thy merits. Amen, amen. So do I hope; so may it be.

VIII

Surge, aquilo, et veni, auster; perfla hortum meum, et fluant aromata illius (Cant. iv. 16). Fly from me, O north wind, hurtful and cold wind of earthly affections, and come, thou soft warm breeze of the sacred love of the Holy Spirit, which comes from the Heart of my Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament. Do thou alone breathe through my soul, which has been chosen by Jesus for his garden of delights. Blow; for by thy breath how many fresh and sweet odors of holy virtues shalt thou draw forth from me!

My Jesus, my Jesus, Thou canst do this; and this do I hope from Thee.

IX

Messui myrrham meam cum aromatibus meis (Cant. v. 1). A soul that has received Jesus must be careful to gather myrrh, that it may always offer the sweet odor of those virtues which arise from mortification. Comedi favum cum melle meo (Ib.). In like manner, the soul that loves God alone is not satisfied with the honey, but will also have the honeycomb; therefore she says to Jesus:

O Lord, Thy consolations are not sufficient for me unless Thou givest me Thyself, who art the fountain of consolation; the fruits of love are not enough for me, if Thou dost not give me also Thyself, who art the object of my love. So say I to Thee, my Jesus, that Thou alone wilt suffice for me; I am ready to renounce all Thy delights, provided I possess Thee alone, my God and my only good. I love Thee, not to please myself, but to please Thee; for Thou dost desire to be loved by me, and Thou art worthy of all our love, whether Thou dost console or try us.

X

Nihil mihi deerit; in loco pascuæ ibi me colocavit (Ps. xxii. 1, 2). Ah! my beloved Jesus, since Thou dost invite me in this feast of love to feed on Thy divine flesh, what more can I ever want? Dominus illuminatio mea et salus mea; quem timebo? (Ps. xxvi. 1.) Whom shall I fear, if Thou, O God omnipotent, art my light and my salvation? I give myself all to Thee. Accept me, and then do with me what Thou wilt; chastise me, show Thine indignation towards me when Thou wilt; kill me, destroy me, and I will say always with Job: Etiam si occiderit me, in ipso sperabo (Job, xiii. 15). Whilst I am Thine, and Thou lovest me, I am content to be treated by Thee with every hardship; to be even annihilated, if it so pleases Thee.

In manibus meis descripsi te: muri tui coram oculis meis semper (Is. xlix. 16). See the loving care that God takes of a soul that he wishes to have to himself. He carries it written in his hands, so that he may never forget it, and says, that sooner would a mother forget her own son than he a soul in grace: Et si illa oblita fuerit, ego tamen non obliviscar tui (Ib. 15).

Et muri tui coram oculis meis semper. His eyes are always open to watch over that soul, so that its enemies do it no harm: Scuto bonæ voluntatis tuæ coronasti nos (Ps. v. 13). Our good God surrounds us with the protection of his good-will, wholly solicitous for our good; and so he delivers us from all dangers. Ah, my God, infinite goodness, who more than any other lovest me and desirest my good, I abandon myself entirely to Thee: let every other hope fail me, provided Thou dost not fail me. I know that I also must co-operate by obeying Thy holy will: Domine, quid me vis facere? Nothing else can I say; behold me ready and determined, my sweet Saviour, to do what Thou pleasest: Fiat voluntas tua. Nothing else do I desire but to accomplish Thy will. But do Thou help me, otherwise I shall do no good at all. Teach me not only to know, but also to do, all that pleases Thee: Doce me facere voluntatem tuam. Eternal Father, grant that I may be able to say with truth, as Thy Jesus did whilst he was on earth: Ego quæ placita sunt ei facio semper. My God, this I desire, this I pray for, and this I hope, through the merits of Thy Son and the most holy Mary.

XII

Præbe, fili mi, cor tuum mihi (Prov. xiii. 26). O my soul, behold this is all that thy Lord asks of thee, when he comes to visit thee; he would have thy heart and thy will. He gives himself to thee without reserve; it is but reasonable that thou shouldst also give him all thyself without reserve, taking care to follow his will in all things: Revertetur enim Dominus, ut gaudeat super te in omnibus bonis (Deut. xxx. 9). Act in such a manner that Jesus, when he comes to thee again, may find that thou hast executed all his designs.

My Jesus, I wish to please Thee; help Thou my desire. Give me strength, and do with me whatsoever Thou pleasest.

XIII

Quid est quod debui ultra facere vineæ meæ et non feci? (Is. v. 4.) My soul, hear what thy God says to thee: what ought I to do more for thee than I have done? For love of thee I became man: Verbum caro factus sum. Instead of Lord, I have become servant: formam servi accipiens. I went so far as to be born in a stable, like a worm—for worms are born in stables: vermis sum, et non homo. I died for thee, I died upon the tree of shame: Factus obediens usque ad mortem, mortem autem crucis. What remained more for me to do, but to give my life for thee? Majorem hac dilectionem nemo habet, ut animam ponat quis pro amicis suis. But my love has invented and done more for thee. After my death, I have chosen to leave myself in the most Blessed Sacrament, to give my whole self as food. Tell me what more could I have done to gain thy love?

It is true, my Lord and my Redeemer; what can I answer? I have nothing to say. Thou hast been too good to me, and I have been too ungrateful towards Thee. I wonder at Thy immense goodness; I see my own baseness, and I throw myself at Thy feet, and say: Have pity on me, my Jesus, though I have repaid Thy love with so much ingratitude. Avenge Thyself, therefore, I pray Thee, avenge Thyself upon me, and chastise me; but do not abandon me; chastise me and change me. Let me not live any longer ungrateful to Thee. Grant that I may love Thee at least out of gratitude, and that before I die I may make Thee some recompense for Thy love.

XIV

Pone me ut signaculum super cor tuum (Cant. viii. 6). Yes, my beloved Jesus, since I have consecrated to Thee all my heart, it is but just that I should put Thee as a seal of love upon it, to close the entrance against any other affection; and thus to make known to all that my heart is Thine, and that Thou alone possessest dominion over it. But, my Lord, what dost Thou hope from me, if Thou dost not do the work Thyself? I can do nothing but give Thee my poor heart, that Thou mayest dispose of it according to Thy pleasure. Behold, I give it all to Thee, I consecrate it to Thee, I sacrifice it to Thee. Do Thou possess it forever; I will no longer have any part in it. If Thou lovest it, Thou knowest how to preserve it for Thyself. Leave it no longer in my hands, lest I should again take it from Thee. O God most loving, O infinite love, since Thou hast so constrained me to love Thee, I pray Thee make Thyself loved by me. I only wish to live that I may love Thee, I only wish to love Thee in order to please Thee. Thou who dost work so many miracles to be able to enter into my heart in this sacrament, work also this one, make my heart all Thine; but all, all, all, without division, without reserve, so that I may say, both in this life and in eternity, that Thou art the only Lord of my heart, and my only treasure: Deus cordis mei, et pars mea Deus in æternum.

Most holy Mary, my Mother and my hope, do thou help me, and I shall certainly be heard. Amen, amen. This I wish, this I hope. So be it.

Aspirations of Love to Jesus FOR MEDITATION AND HOLY COMMUNION.[12864]

MY well-beloved, my love, my life, my repose, my only good. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

The grace that we should ask of God above all graces, says St. Francis de Sales, is the grace or gift of love. Hence we should endeavor in all our prayers, all our actions, all our sighs, all our intentions, to obtain from God this holy love, which is the gift of all gifts.

We shall here find many aspirations that a loving soul can make to God; but it must be observed, first, that the best are those that love itself infuses into our heart; and secondly, that when the soul feels itself united with God by anyone of the following inspirations, or by any other, one should not go farther, but should dwell upon it and repeat it as long as one finds therein nourishment and feeling.

My God, prostrate at Thy feet, I ask of Thee, not pleasures, nor riches, nor honors, but only Thy love; and at each step that I take, at each look, at each respiration, I intend to ask for Thy love.

My dearly beloved Jesus, Thou hast said that Thou wouldst permit Thyself to be found even by him who is seeking Thee, and Thou hast even gone so far as to seek me when I fled from Thee, wilt Thou flee from me now that I seek Thee, and I seek only Thee?

Ah! deign to bind me to Thee by these sweet bonds with which Thou bindest those that love Thee; but bind me in such a manner that I may never more be separated from Thee.

Inflame me with Thy love. Ah! one spark of this divine fire would be sufficient to make me forget everything; but I am not content with only a spark; I wish to have a flame, I wish to have a thousand flames, I wish to have a conflagration that will instantly destroy in me all affection for creatures, and make me burn entirely for Thee, O infinite and only good!

I give myself entirely to Thee. Dost Thou not accept me? Thou hast said that Thou dost not know how to repel him that comes to Thee: Him that cometh to me, I will not cast out.[12865] Ah! my God, receive me, take me entirely and unite me to Thee in such a manner that I may think only of Thee, that I may love only Thee, that I may seek and desire only Thee; be Thou the only object of all my thoughts, of all my love, of all my desires.

Ah! Thou who truly lovest me, tell me, what dost Thou intend to obtain from me by so many mercies that Thou heapest upon me, by so many invitations that Thou dost address to me, by so many lights that Thou givest me? Dost Thou wish to have my heart? Here it is: take it; I give it entirely to Thee.

Vain creatures, leave me; you shall see me no more. Ask me no more to have affection for you, since I desire to have nothing more from you. Give to whomsoever asks for them, your pleasures, your goods, your honors; as for myself, I have found him whom I love, I am satisfied with having him: I found Him whom my soul loveth.[12866] He who alone merits my affections has taken them all for himself.

My well-beloved! detach me from all that is not God. Console me Thyself when I am afflicted; sustain me, when I am losing courage; and chastise me also Thyself when necessary. I will kiss Thy lovely hand that strikes me through kindness towards me. Provided only that Thou dost not deprive me of the happiness of loving Thee, send me all chastisements.

Loving souls, you that live in this beautiful country of love, where everything breathes love! Qualis est Dilectus vester, et quæremus eum vobiscum: Tell us something of the beauties of your well-beloved, whom you now contemplate unveiled; inflame us with love, we who are poor exiles here below, in order that we also may seek him through love.

But I should rather say with the sacred Spouse: Come, O south wind, blow through my garden, and let the aromatical spices thereof flow.[12867] Come from the middle of the day, O breath of the Holy Spirit! Come, let me feel thy powerful influence in the garden of my soul, and then its perfumes of love will spread, and will satisfy the heart with my God.

O Jesus, sweet object of my love! wound my heart with one of these fiery darts that cause souls to die to all that is not Thee, and make them live only with Thy love.

My well-beloved, since Thou callest me again to Thy love by enlightening me with Thy light and making me hear Thy voice, Trahe me post te: for pity's sake, draw me to Thyself, and do not abandon me before Thou dost not see me belong entirely to Thee.

My God, I already feel a great desire to love Thee; but I feel myself too weak to accomplish this. O Lord! Thou who inspirest me with this good desire, grant me strength to accomplish this; give me all the love that Thou askest of me. Thou who by Thy grace makest me know the riches of Thy goodnes, lead me to love Thee as much as I can, and as much as I desire to love Thee.

Loving souls, you who in this world seek only God, raise your voice, and make intelligible to poor foolish worldlings how much Jesus, even in this valley of tears, obtains more contentment for his servants by the gift of his love than this world is able to give to its followers by bestowing upon them its goods.

O Lord! grant me Thy love, and I renounce all the other goods that Thou canst give me. Help me to love Thee, and I consent to be deprived of everything, to be despised, abandoned by every one, weighed down by all evils; for there is no sorrow capable of afflicting a soul that loves Thee with her whole heart.

BROTHER ALFONSUS.

DEVOUT ASPIRATIONS

TO BE MADE BEFORE AND AFTER COMMUNION, DRAWN FROM THE MANUSCRIPTS OF ST. FRANCIS DE SALES

I. BEFORE COMMUNION

O MY true and perfect Love! what affection is this that brings Thee to such a miserable thing as I? Come, yes come, desired of my heart; my soul sighs for Thee; I offer to Thee, O my God, this Communion, to satisfy the desire Thou hast to come and unite me to Thyself, my God and my all. Oh, what a wonder! A God descends from heaven for me, and hides his majesty under the vile clothing of the species of bread and wine! Oh, how true it is, my Lord, that having always loved Thine own, Thou hast loved them especially at the end, when Thou didst institute this divine sacrament.

O my God! Thou art goodness itself; how, then, is it possible that I can love anything else but Thee? Ah, Lord, draw me always closer and closer into Thy Heart. I prefer Thy love and Thy goodness above all that is to be found in the world. Thou art the only object of my affections. I wish for none other but Thee. I will leave all in order to love Thee. Give me grace to do it; without that I can do nothing.

Ah, my beloved, if Thou wouldst have me look to Thee, do Thou first turn to me, and by Thy spirit draw mine to Thee. I am nothing, I can do nothing, I am worth nothing; therefore let me not be ungrateful for all the graces that Thou hast deigned to grant me. I offer myself for Thy love, to be entirely deprived of every sensible consolation, and to suffer all the afflictions Thou shalt be pleased to send me, whether in time or eternity. I am, and will be all Thine; I dare to ask Thee not only for Thy gifts, but also for Thyself. I desire to receive Thee, to be more united to Thee.

O Eternal Father, I offer to Thee the Passion of Thy Son for my salvation and that of the whole world. Look not at my sins; but look at the love of Thy beloved Son towards us, which has drawn him into this sacrament. By this love, my God, have pity on me!

My Redeemer, I acknowledge myself to be infinitely unworthy of approaching to receive Thee, by reason of my sins and my want of purity. Therefore I say to Thee, Lord, I am not worthy. Even if I had all the love of the seraphim, I should still be unfit to receive Thee; again, then, I repeat, Lord, I am not worthy.

Come, O my sweet Saviour, and work in me that which Thou dost come to me to do. I am nothing but wretchedness; but Thy goodness does not let Thee see my misery. Come into my soul and sanctify it; take possession of my heart and purify it; enter into my body and keep it; and never separate me from Thy love.

Burn, O consuming fire, all Thou dost see in me unworthy of Thy presence, and that may put an obstacle to Thy grace and love. O Mother of my Redeemer, have compassion on me a poor sinner; pray for me, that by thy help I may embrace thy Son with perfect love, and become a soul after his own Heart.

II. AFTER COMMUNION AND AT THE VISIT TO THE MOST HOLY SACRAMENT

O excess of love! Sacred Host, I adore Thee within me. One heart is too little to love Thee, my Jesus; one tongue is not enough to praise Thy goodness. O my Saviour, how great are my obligations to Thee, for visiting such a poor creature as I am! I offer myself all to Thee, in gratitude for so great a favor.

No, I will no longer live in myself, but that Jesus alone should live in me. He is mine, and I am his, for all eternity. Oh, love, love; no more sins! I will never forget the goodness and mercy of God, my Saviour and my guest. Yes, my God, I firmly believe that Thou, body and soul, art in my breast: Thy divinity is now within me, and united to me.

I adore Thee, and I venerate Thee, as if I were the smallest worm crawling along in the dust of its own nothingness, to testify the desire I have to give Thee glory. But is it possible that Thy infinite Majesty should have deigned to visit the least of Thy creatures? With a softened heart, my dear Saviour, I thank Thee for this great gift. I thank Thee for it a thousand times. Grant that I may thank Thee for it as Thou dost deserve. May Thy most holy Mother, and all the angels and saints, give Thee thanks for it! On my part I offer Thee all the praises and thanksgivings that have been and ever shall be offered to Thee by all creatures.

O my God, Thou dost come to unite Thyself to me, to apply to my soul more abundantly the merits of Thy Passion, and to sanctify me. Accomplish in me, then, all that Thou didst come to do. My God, Thou art all-wise and all-powerful, let not the fruit of Thy coming be lost: unite Thyself to me, and me to Thee, by an inseparable union and a perfect love. Unite the abyss of Thy mercy with the abyss of my misery, and make me live a life all divine.

My Jesus, Thou knowest what is wanting in me; Thou knowest that without Thee I can do nothing; Thou knowest my weakness: have pity on me; give me humility, purity of heart, love, and conformity to Thy holy will, strength against my bad habits, remission of my sins, and grace never more to commit them. Give me a thorough contempt for all things, so that I may love none other but Thee. Give me patience to suffer for Thy love all that may happen to me. I hope all from Thee. O most holy Virgin, my dear Mother, beg of thy Son, by the love he bears thee, to grant me, for thy sake, all I ask.

My God, and my only good, I am more pleased in Thy infinite perfections than if they were my own. I rejoice that nothing in the world can take them from Thee, or diminish them. Come, then, Thou art always welcome; always perfect and infinite in Thy majesty, O my Jesus, my Love and my God. Come and make me all Thine.

My Saviour, by that infinite goodness which made Thee come down to this earth, I pray Thee, let me experience the effects of Thy love, in feeling my soul so absorbed in Thee, that, despising all earthly things, it may see nothing but Thee, and think of nothing but Thee; that the same love which made Thee die for me on the cross may make me in like manner die in Thee, to live in Thee for all eternity.

O God of my soul, who meritest to be loved above all creatures, I protest that I hold Thee as the only object of my affections, and I prefer Thee to all the goods of the world, and to myself. I desire to be faithful to Thee, and never more to see myself separated from Thee.

I resign and abandon myself entirely to Thee, embracing with all affection and respect Thy will, and Thy just designs over me. And I pray that whatever Thou hast ordained concerning me in time and in eternity may be accomplished; but I hope one day to see Thy divine face and Thy infinite beauty. My God, draw me to Thee, to love Thee and to burn with Thy love, by which I would be entirely consumed. Hide me, I pray Thee, in Thyself, that no creature may ever be able to find me again. O eternal Father, for the love of Thy Son, fill my memory with holy thoughts, which shall constrain it to have a continual remembrance of Thee and of Thy Son. Oh make me know and do all that Thou desirest of me. And Thou, O Holy Spirit, fill my will with holy affections, that shall bring forth all those fruits which proceed from Thy love. Illuminate me with Thy light; so shall I walk straight to Thee, and my will shall be no longer free to give itself to any but Thee.

My God and my all, I will no more seek anything out of Thee, now that I can find all things in Thee. O merciful Father, make me have a care for Thy service, as Thou hast had so much for my good. I wish to employ all my thoughts in seeking ways to please Thee, and in preserving me from offending Thee any more.

O incarnate Lord, make me love Thee, and none other than Thee. Remove from me all occasions that might drive me from Thy love. Let my heart be always occupied in contemplating Thee and serving Thee, Thou that art the master-love of all hearts. Thou didst but come into the world to dwell in the hearts Thou hadst redeemed with Thy blood; then may my heart be all Thine, do Thou possess it. See, then, all my wants, and enlighten me; excite me, and make me prompt to obey Thy will.

O Jesus Almighty, take from me all that can hinder the effects of Thy power and goodness. I renounce my liberty, and consecrate it entirely to the designs of Thy will. Have pity on me, and cure me of all my impurities and infidelity; fill me with Thy grace and wisdom. I abandon myself wholly to Thee, O my Jesus; I wish to be all Thine, I wish to employ myself with fervor for Thy glory, and to suffer patiently all tribulations at the sight of Thy sufferings. Enable me to employ myself solely in things that are pleasing to Thee. My God, let me discern Thee with a true faith, to know Thee and love Thee; let me know Thy will to fulfil it, let me see myself to confess my deformity, to abhor and humble myself; and in the end let me see Thy divine face in all eternity. Lord, I have wasted my substance, like the prodigal son; but I have not been able to exhaust Thy mercies. Grant that I may take Thy will for the sole guide of my life, and not my own senses nor human respect. Write in my heart the law of Thy love so deeply, that it may never be effaced.

My God, even if there were no place of torment for the wicked, I would not leave off loving Thee and suffering for Thee. Make me correspond to Thy desires. From this time forth Thou shalt be my portion forever. I submit myself with confidence to all that Thou shalt ordain for me in time and in eternity. O incarnate Word, wash my heart with Thy blood, and imprint there, as a sign of Thy love, Thy holy name of Jesus.

Lord, abandon me not into the power of my vices; remember that I am the work of Thy hands; permit me not to become the prey of demons. I am a sinner, it is true; but I have been redeemed by Thy blood. Eternal Father, look at the Passion of Thy Son, whose merits sue mercy for me: these I offer to Thee; by these do Thou detach me from worldly affections, and fill me with Thy love, and make me die with resignation, with faith, with confidence, and with perfect love.

O my Jesus, by that eternal love which Thou hast borne me, give me grace to love Thee during the short time that remains for me to live on this earth, that I may afterwards love Thee eternally in heaven. O God of love, make me live only for Thee. When shall I be all Thine, as Thou art all mine? When shall I die to myself, to live only for Thy love? I do not even know how to give myself to Thee as I ought. Ah, my God, take me, and make me all Thine!

My God, I wish for my eyesight only to look at Thee; for my tongue only to speak of Thee; for my heart only to love Thee; for my body only to offer it to Thee; for my life only to sacrifice it to Thee. O God of love, give me Thy love. Infinite Power, help my weakness. Eternal Wisdom, enlighten my darkness. Immense Goodness, pardon my malice. O infinite Goodness, too late have I loved and known Thee: do with me what Thou pleasest; I wish for nothing but what Thou shalt do.

O Blessed Virgin, I rejoice with thee in that thou hast gained the heart of thy God; ah, unite me wholly to thy Son, speak to him for me, and obtain for me the grace of following all his inspirations. Thou must teach me to practice the virtues thou didst exercise on earth, and detach me from affection to all that is not God, that I may love him with all my strength.

My God, enkindle Thy love in me, so that I may seek nothing else but Thy pleasure; so that nothing may please me that does not please Thee; and drive from my heart all things that are not agreeable to Thee. May I always be able to say with true affection: My God, Thee alone do I desire, and nothing more. My Jesus, give me a great love for Thy Passion, that, Thy sufferings and Thy death being always before my eyes, they may continually excite my love towards Thee, and make me desirous of rendering Thee some token of gratitude for so much love. Give me also a great love to the Most Holy Sacrament of the Altar, in which Thou hast revealed the great affection Thou dost bear us. Besides this, I beg of Thee to give me a tender devotion to Thy most holy Mother: give me grace always to love and serve her; always to have recourse to her intercession, and to induce others to honor her; and give to me and to all men a great confidence, first in the merits of Thy Passion, and next in the intercession of Mary.

I pray Thee to grant me a holy death. Enable me at that moment to receive Thee with great love in the most holy Viaticum; so that, united to Thee, burning with a holy fire, and with a great desire of seeing Thee, I may go forth from this life to embrace Thy feet the first time it shall be given me to see Thee.

O my King, come and reign alone in my soul; do Thou possess it entirely, that it may not serve nor obey anything but Thy love.

O my Jesus, would that I could annihilate myself all for Thee, who hast annihilated all Thy life for me!

O Lamb of God, sacrificed on the Cross, remember that I am one of those souls that Thou hast redeemed with so much suffering and grief. Let me never lose Thee. Thou hast given Thyself all to me, let me be all Thine; let all my eagerness be to please Thee. I love Thee, O immense Good, in order to please Thee; I love Thee because Thou art worthy of it: my greatest sorrow is to think I have been so long in the world without loving Thee.

My beloved Redeemer, make me feel the grief Thou hadst for my sins in the garden of Gethsemani. O my Jesus, would that I had died before, and had never offended Thee! Oh, love of my Jesus, Thou art my love and my hope! I will rather lose my life a thousand times than lose Thy grace.

My God, if I had died when I was in sin, I could never love Thee again: I thank Thee for giving me time, and calling me to love Thee. Now, then, that I can love Thee, I will love Thee with all my soul. For this reason hast Thou borne with me, that I should love Thee; yes, I will love Thee.

Ah, by the blood which Thou hast shed for me, permit me not to betray Thee again: "In Thee, O Lord, have I hoped; I shall not be confounded forever." What is the world? what are riches? what are pleasures? what are honors? God, God, I will have God alone. My God, Thou art sufficient for me, Thou art an infinite Good.

O my Jesus, bind me altogether to Thy love, and draw all my affections to Thee, that I may love none other but Thee: make me all Thine before I die.

Ah, my God, as long as I live I am in danger of losing Thee. When shall the day come that I can say to Thee: My Jesus, I cannot lose Thee more?

O Eternal Father, for the love of Jesus Christ, despise me not; accept of me to love Thee, and do Thou give me Thy love. I wish to love Thee much in this life, that I may love Thee much in the next.

O infinite Good, I love Thee; but make me know the great Good that I love, and give me such a love as Thou dost desire. May I conquer all things to please Thee!

O Mary, of thee, who so much desirest to see thy Son beloved, do I ask this grace, to love him during all the remainder of my life; and I desire nothing more. My Lady and my Mother, I trust in thee; thou dost obtain all thou dost ask of thy God; thou dost pray for all who are devoted to thee, pray also for me.

VARIOUS PRAYERS

I. PETITIONS TO JESUS CHRIST RECEIVED IN HOLY COMMUNION

O MY Jesus, now that Thou, who art the true Life, art come to me, make me die to the world, to live only to Thee, my Redeemer; by the flames of Thy love, destroy in me all that is displeasing to Thee, and give me a true desire to gratify and please Thee in all things.

Give me that true humility which shall make me love contempt and self-abjection, and take from me all ambition of putting myself forward, Give me the spirit of mortification, that I may deny myself all those things that do not tend to Thy love, and may lovingly embrace that which is displeasing to the senses and to self-love.

Give me a perfect resignation to Thy will, that I may accept in peace, pains, infirmities, loss of friends or property, desolations, persecutions, and all that comes to me from Thy hand. I offer Thee all myself, that Thou mayest dispose of me according to Thy pleasure. And give me grace always to repeat this entire offering of myself, especially at the time of my death. May I, then, so sacrifice my life to Thee, with all my affection, in union with the sacrifice that Thou didst make of Thy life for me to the eternal Father. My Jesus, enlighten me, and make me know Thy goodness, and the obligation I am under to love Thee above all, for the love Thou hast borne me in dying for me, and in leaving Thyself in the Most Holy Sacrament.

I pray Thee to give Thy light to all infidels who know Thee not, to all heretics who are out of the Church, and to all sinners who live deprived of Thy grace. My Jesus, make Thyself known, make Thyself loved. I recommend to Thee all the souls in purgatory, and especially N. N.; alleviate the pains they suffer, and shorten the time of their banishment from Thy sight; do this through Thy merits, and those of Thy most holy Mother and all the saints.

My God, enkindle the flame of Thy love within me, so that I may seek nothing but Thy pleasure; that nothing may please me but pleasing Thee. I drive from my heart everything which is not agreeable to Thee. May I always be able to say with real affection: O God, my God, I wish for Thee alone, and nothing more. My Jesus, give me a great love for Thy most sacred Passion, that Thy sufferings and death may be ever before my eyes to excite me to love Thee always, and to make me desire to give Thee some grateful compensation for Thy so great love. Give me also a great love for the Most Holy Sacrament of the Altar, in which Thou hast made known the exceeding tenderness Thou hast for us. I also beg of Thee to give me a tender devotion to Thy most holy Mother: give me grace always to love and serve her, always to have recourse to her intercession, and to induce others to honor her and confide in her patronage; and grant to me and to all men ever to have a great confidence, first in the merits of Thy Passion, and then in the intercession of Mary.

I pray Thee grant me a happy death. Grant that I may then receive Thee with great love in the most holy Viaticum, that in Thy embrace, burning with a holy fire, and a great desire of seeing Thee, I may quit this life to throw myself at Thy feet the first time it shall be my lot to see Thee.

Above all, I pray Thee, O my Jesus, to give me the grace of prayer, that I may recommend myself always to Thee and Thy most holy Mother, especially in time of temptation; and I pray Thee, by Thy merits, to grant me holy perseverance and Thy holy love.

Bless me, my Jesus, and bless me altogether—my soul, my body, my senses, and my faculties. Bless especially my tongue, that it may only speak for Thy glory. Bless my eyes, that they may not look at anything that might tempt me to displease Thee. Bless my taste, that it may not offend Thee by intemperance; and bless all the members of my body, that they may all serve Thee and not offend Thee. Bless my memory, that it may always remember Thy love and the favors Thou hast accorded me. Bless my understanding, that it may know Thy goodness, and the obligation I have of loving Thee; and that it may see all that I must avoid, and all that I must do to conform myself to Thy holy will. Above all, bless my will, that it may love no other but Thee, the infinite Good; that it may seek for nothing but to please Thee and may take delight in nothing but what conduces to Thy glory.

O my King, come Thou and reign alone in my soul; take entire possession of it, that it may neither serve nor obey anything but Thy love.

Oh, my Jesus, that I might spend myself all for Thee, who hast spent all Thy life for me!

O Lamb of God, sacrificed on the Cross, remember that I am one of those souls which Thou hast redeemed with so much labor and sorrow. Never let me lose Thee again. Thou hast given Thyself all to me; make me to be all Thine, and let my only wish be to please Thee. I love Thee, O immense Good, in order to give Thee pleasure. I love Thee, because Thou art worthy of my love. I have no greater grief than that of thinking that I have been so long in the world without loving Thee.

My beloved Redeemer, give me a portion of that grief which Thou didst feel for my sins in the garden of Gethsemani. O my Jesus, would that I had died and never offended Thee! O love of my Jesus, Thou art my love and my hope! I will rather lose my life, and a thousand lives, than lose Thy grace.

My God, if I were to die in sin, I could no more love Thee. I thank Thee that Thou givest me time, and dost call me to love Thee. Now, then, that I can love Thee, I will love Thee with all my soul. Thou hast borne with me so long, that I might love Thee. Yes, and I will love Thee. Ah, by the blood that Thou hast shed for me, suffer me not to betray Thee again. In Thee, O Lord, have I hoped, let me not be confounded forever. [12868] What is the world? what are riches? what are pleasures? what are honors? God, God, I wish for God alone. My God, Thou art sufficient for me; Thou art an infinite Good.

O my Jesus, bind me wholly to Thy love, and draw all my affections to Thyself, so that I may love none other but Thee. Make me all Thine before I die.

Ah, my God, as long as I live I stand in danger of losing Thee. When shall the day come that I can say: My Jesus, I can no longer lose Thee?

O Eternal Father, for the love of Jesus Christ, despise me not; suffer me to love Thee, and give me Thy holy love. I wish to love Thee greatly in this life, that I may love Thee greatly in the next.

O infinite Good, I love Thee; but do Thou make me know the great good that I love, and give me the love Thou dost desire to see in me. Enable me to overcome all things to please Thee.

II. PRAYER OF ST. BONAVENTURE TO THE MOST HOLY SACRAMENT.[12869]

Wound, O my most tender Jesus, the inmost of my soul with the sweet dart of Thy love, that through Thy love and the desire of possessing Thee my soul may languish and melt within me, and so long to quit this life, to come and unite itself perfectly with Thee in a happy eternity. Make my soul always to hunger after Thee, the bread of angels, my Jesus, in the Blessed Sacrament. May it ever thirst after Thee, O fountain of life and light! May it ever desire Thee, seek Thee, speak to Thee alone, find Thee, and do all things to Thy praise and glory to the end! Thou, my Redeemer, art my only hope, my riches, my consolation, my peace, my refuge, my wisdom, my portion, and my treasure. On Thee may my heart and my mind be ever fixed! Amen.

III. PRAYER TO THE MOST HOLY MARY, TO OBTAIN THE LOVE OF JESUS, AND LOVE TOWARDS HER

O Mary, thou dost so much desire to see this thy Son Jesus loved; if thou lovest me, this is the grace I ask of thee, and which thou must procure for me; obtain for me a great love for Jesus Christ, and not to love any other than him. Thou obtainest from him all that thou dost wish; listen to me, then, pray for me and comfort me; bind me in such a manner to Jesus, that I shall no longer be able to leave off loving him. Obtain for me also a great love toward thee, who art of all creatures the most loving, the most lovely, and the most loved by God. I rely greatly on thy compassion, and I love thee, my Lady; but I love thee only a little: ask thy God to give me a greater love; for to love thee is a grace which God grants only to those whom thou dost wish to be saved.

THE MASS AND THE OFFICE THAT ARE HURRIEDLY SAID

OR, ADMONITIONS TO PRIESTS TO INDUCE THEM NOT TO RENDER THEMSELVES GUILTY OF THE CRIME OF SHOWING CONTEMPT FOR THE SACRIFICE OF THE ALTAR AND FOR THE PRAISES DUE TO GOD

The present little work appeared in 1760 (Villecourt, 1. 6, p. 1, ch. 5 et 6). It has for its Italian title the words: La Messa e l'Officio strappazzati. The participle strappazzati expresses the idea of contempt, negligence, and especially precipitation. This treatise is a pressing exhortation to priests to celebrate Mass well, and to recite well the divine Office. We have put it at the end of the volume, because the first part of it is, as it were, the peroration or natural conclusion, and the second part may serve as a preface or transition to the following volume, which treats of the divine Office.—ED.

THE HOLY SACRIFICE OF THE MASS HURRIEDLY SAID

I. IMPORTANCE OF THE HOLY SACRIFICE

UNLESS a priest esteems the holy Sacrifice as it deserves, he can never celebrate it with suitable devotion.

Assuredly there is no action which man can perform so sublime, so sacred, as the celebration of Mass. "We must needs confess," says the Council of Trent, "that no other work can be performed by the faithful so holy and divine as this tremendous mystery itself."[12870] God himself could not enable man to perform anything greater than the celebration of Mass.

All the ancient sacrifices, by which God was so much honored, were but shadows and figures of our sacrifice of the altar. All the honor that angels by their adorations, and men by their good works, austerities, and even martyrdoms, have ever rendered or will ever render to God, never could, and never will, give him so much glory as one single Mass; for, while the honor of all creatures is only finite, that which accrues to God from the holy Sacrifice of the altar is infinite, inasmuch as the victim which is offered is of infinite value. The Mass, therefore, offers to God the greatest honor that can be given him, subdues most triumphantly the powers of hell, affords the greatest relief to the suffering souls in purgatory, appeases most efficaciously the wrath of God against sinners, and brings down the greatest blessings on mankind.

If, as it is promised, we may confidently hope to obtain from God whatever we ask in the name of Jesus: If you ask the Father anything in My name, He will give it to you,[12871] how much more confidently may we hope to obtain what we ask for, when we immolate to the Father Jesus himself? Our loving Redeemer is continually making intercession for us in heaven: Who also maketh intercession for us.[12872] But this he does more especially in the sacrifice of the Mass, in which, by the hands of the priest, he presents himself to his eternal Father, to obtain graces for us. Were we assured that all the saints and the blessed Mother of Christ were praying for us, with what great confidence should we expect to receive all graces necessary for us? But it is certain that one prayer of Jesus Christ will avail infinitely more than all the prayers of the saints. Poor, wretched sinners, what would become of us without this sacrifice to appease the Lord! "For the Lord, appeased by the oblation thereof, and granting the grace and gift of penitence, forgives even heinous crimes and sins,"[12873] says the Council of Trent. In a word, as the Passion of Jesus Christ was sufficient to save the whole world, so is a single Mass sufficient to save it. Hence, at the offertory of the chalice the priest says: "We offer unto Thee, O Lord, the chalice of salvation, . . . for our salvation, and for that of the whole world."[12874]

The Mass is the good thing and the beautiful thing of the Church, according to the prediction of the prophet: For what is the good thing of Him, and what is His beautiful thing, but the corn of the elect, and wine springing forth virgins?[12875] In the Mass, the Word incarnate offers himself in sacrifice to his eternal Father, and gives himself to us in the Blessed Sacrament of the Eucharist, which is the end and aim of almost all the other sacraments, as the angelic Doctor teaches.[12876] Hence St. Bonaventure says, that in the Mass God manifests to us all the love that he has borne us, and includes in it, as in a compendium, all his benefits.[12877] On this account the devil has always endeavored to abolish the Mass throughout the world by means of heretics, making them the precursors of Antichrist, who before all things will endeavor to abolish, and in fact will, in punishment of the sins of men, succeed in abolishing the holy sacrifice of the altar, according to the prediction of Daniel: And strength was given him against the continual sacrifice because of sins.[12878]

The same St. Bonaventure says, that the Son of God in every Mass confers a benefit on the world not less than that which he conferred in taking upon himself our human nature.[12879] So that, as the learned teach, if Jesus Christ had never appeared in the world, a priest, by pronouncing the words of consecration, would bring him down from heaven upon the earth, according to that celebrated sentence of St. Augustine: "O venerable dignity of the priests in whose hands as in the womb of the Virgin the Son of God became incarnate!"[12880]

Moreover, as the sacrifice of the altar is the application and renewal of the sacrifice of the cross, the angelic Doctor teaches, that the Mass procures for man the same benefits and salvation that the sacrifice of the cross procured for him.[12881]

St. John Chrysostom says the same: "The celebration of Mass is of as much value as the death of Christ on the cross."[12882] And of this the Church still further assures us, saying: "As many times as this commemorative sacrifice is celebrated, so often is the work of our redemption performed."[12883] As the same Saviour, who offered himself for us on the cross, offers himself in sacrifice on the altar by the hands of the priest, as the Council of Trent teaches: "For the victim is one and the same, the same now offering by the ministry of priests, who then offered Himself on the cross, the manner alone of offering being different;"[12884] so the sacrifice of the cross is applied to our souls by the sacrifice of the altar. The Passion of Jesus Christ rendered us capable of redemption; the Mass puts us in possession of it, and enables us to enjoy its merits.

II. THREE THINGS NECESSARY TO CELEBRATE WELL

The Mass, then, being the most holy and divine action in which we can be engaged, it plainly follows, says the Council of Trent, that all diligence ought to be used in order that so great a sacrifice may be celebrated with the greatest possible interior purity and exterior devotion.[12885] And it says that the malediction fulminated by Jeremias against those who performed negligently their sacred functions is especially to be directed against priests who irreverently say Mass, which sacrifice is the greatest and most sublime action that man can perform for the honor of his Creator; adding, that such irreverence cannot well be less than impiety. The words of the Council are: Quæ ab impietate vix sejuncta esse potest.

In order, therefore, that the priest of God may avoid such irreverence, and with it the malediction of heaven, let us see what he must do before he celebrates Mass, what during the celebration, and what after he has celebrated. Before he celebrates he must prepare himself. During the celebration he must behave with suitable reverence. After having celebrated he must make a thanksgiving.

1. PREPARATION BEFORE MASS

It has been said by a servant of God that the whole life of a priest ought to be a preparation and thanksgiving for Mass. It is true that the most holy Eucharist was instituted for the benefit of all the faithful, but it was especially bestowed upon priests. Give not, says our Lord, speaking to priests, that which is holy to dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine.[12886] Mark the words your pearls. In Greek the consecrated particles are called pearls; now these are here spoken of by our Blessed Saviour as belonging particularly to priests, margaritas VESTRAS. Hence, according to St. John Chrysostom, a priest leaving the altar ought to be so inflamed with divine love as to be the terror of hell.[12887] But do we see this exemplified? On the contrary, the greater number of priests leave the altar even more tepid, more impatient, proud, jealous, and more attached to their own interests, to self-esteem, and to worldly pleasures. "The defect is not in the food, but in the disposition of the one that eats it,"[12888] says Cardinal Bona. The fault is not in the food of which they partake at such a table, since such food, only once eaten, according to St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi, is sufficient to make them saints; but in the neglect of preparation on the part of those who celebrate the holy Sacrifice.

Preparation for Mass is twofold—remote and immediate.

The remote consists in a pure and virtuous life, which a priest ought always to lead in order to celebrate worthily. If God required purity of the priests of the Old Law, to qualify them for the carrying only of the sacred vessels: Be you clean that carry the vessels of the Lord,[12889] how much greater purity must he require of a priest for bearing in his hands and in his breast the Word incarnate? says Peter of Blois.[12890] In order to be thus pure and holy, a priest should not only be free from mortal sins, but also from deliberate venial sins: otherwise, says St. Bernard, Jesus Christ will not allow him to have part with him.[12891] All the actions, therefore, of a priest, all his words, all his thoughts, ought to be so holy as to dispose him remotely for the worthy celebration of Mass.

The immediate preparation consists first in mental prayer. How can a priest celebrate Mass devoutly who does not prepare himself beforehand by meditation? Father Avila says that a priest ought to make an hour and a half's meditation before celebrating the holy Sacrifice. I should be satisfied with half an hour, and, for the more tepid, with even a quarter of an hour; but I cannot help saying that a quarter of an hour is too little. O God, how many beautiful books are there of meditation by way of preparation for Mass! but how few make use of them! Hence is Mass so frequently celebrated with such grievous negligence and want of devotion. St. Thomas says[12892] that our Blessed Redeemer instituted the most holy sacrament of the altar in order to keep alive within us the remembrance of his love shown to us in his Passion, and of the great benefits obtained for us by the sacrifice of himself on the altar of the cross; and hence the Apostle admonishes us that, as often as we receive the holy Communion, we should do so in remembrance of the death of our Lord.[12893] Now, if all the faithful are required to commemorate the Passion of Jesus Christ as often as they communicate, how much more is a priest required to do this, when he celebrates Mass; in which he not only receives the most sacred body and blood of Christ, but also represents and renews upon the altar, although in a different manner, the sacrifice itself of the cross!

Besides making his meditation, a priest should also, before he celebrates, recollect himself, at least for a short time, and reflect on the greatness of the action which he is about to perform. Thus it was ordained by the Council of Milan, in the time of St. Charles: "Before celebrating Mass, priests should become recollected, and praying should fix their thoughts upon the great mystery."[12894] When a priest enters the sacristy to say Mass, let him leave behind him all worldly thoughts, saying to them with St. Bernard: Wait here all earthly cares and solicitude until after I have celebrated Mass, which will require all my attention. St. Francis de Sales writes in one of his letters to St. Jane Frances de Chantal: "When I approach the altar to begin Mass, I banish all temporal affairs from my mind." Let a priest, therefore, consider that he is going to call down from heaven the Word incarnate, to treat familiarly with him, to offer him again in sacrifice to his eternal Father, and to nourish himself with his divine body and blood; after the example of the Venerable John of Avila, who was accustomed to excite himself to devotion by saying: "I am going to consecrate, to call down the body and blood of the Son of God; I am going to take him into my hands, to speak to him, and to treat with him, and to receive him into my breast."

Let the priest also reflect that he is going to the altar to make intercession for all sinners. "The priest while celebrating," says St. Laurence Justinian, "performs the office of mediator; wherefore he should be an intercessor for all those that commit sin."[12895] So that a priest at the altar, according to St. John Chrysostom, stands between God and his creatures, offers up their prayers, and obtains for them the graces of heaven.[12896] In the Old Law the high-priest was permitted only once in the year to enter into the "Holy of Holies," to pray for the people; but now every priest is permitted to offer the Lamb without spot to the eternal Father every day, to obtain for himself and for the whole Church all necessary graces and favors. Hence the Council of Basel observes that if a subject when he is to ask a prince for some favor does not fail to present himself in the best possible manner, in decent attire, with an humble countenance, modest language, suitable attention, how much more should the priest act in this way when he presents himself before the divine Majesty to pray for himself and for others![12897]

2. THE REVERENCE WITH WHICH MASS OUGHT TO BE CELEBRATED

In the second place, a priest celebrating Mass ought to behave with all the reverence due to so great a sacrifice. To induce him to do this is the intent, or at least the principal point, of this treatise. Let us then see what is meant by reverence. It means, first, a proper attention to the words of the Mass; and secondly, an exact observance of the ceremonies prescribed by the rubrics.

As regards attention to the words, a priest sins by being voluntarily distracted during Mass; and as divines say, if it be during the consecration and elevation, or during a notable part of the canon, he sins mortally; such is the opinion of Roncaglia,[12898] of Concina,[12899] and of Tamburini, of whom the latter, although lenient, even too lenient, in his opinions, yet speaking on this point says: "If a priest while voluntarily distracted during a considerable time, recites those parts of Mass that contain the Canon, he will sin mortally. On the other hand, it seems to me to be a grave irreverence if any one, while professing that God should be venerated in the highest degree, should behave irreverently towards him by voluntary distraction."[12900] And I am of the same opinion, whatever certain authors may say to the contrary: because, waiving the question whether the interior intention is or is not the essence of prayer, I maintain that the holy Sacrifice is not only an act of prayer, but also a most sublime act of religious worship, in which a priest appears to commit great irreverence if, while he actually professes religiously to honor God, he is voluntarily distracted with thoughts of other subjects. Hence this admonition of the Rubric: "The priest should take the greatest care to utter distinctly and fitly the words that are to be said in a loud voice, and not too fast, so that he may advert to what he reads."[12901]

As regards the performing of the ceremonies prescribed by the Rubric for the celebration of Mass, St. Pius V. in the Bull inserted in the Missal commands, districte, et in virtute sanctæ obedientiæ, Mass to be celebrated according to the rubrics of the Missal: Juxta ritum, are the words, modum, et normam in Missali præscriptam. Hence Suarez very properly says that the omission of any ceremony prescribed in the rubrics, such as a sign of the cross, genuflection, inclination, etc., cannot be excused from venial sin. And this is declared by Benedict XIII. in the Roman Council, which says, that in the celebration of Mass, Ritus in minimis etiam, sine peccato negligi, vel mutari haud possunt. St. Teresa said: "I would lay down my life for only one of the ceremonies of the Church;"[12902] and shall a priest slight them?

La Croix[12903] says the same with Pasqualigo, if the said ceremonies are performed in too hurried a manner, or carelessly, as says Father Concina[12904] also very properly, speaking of those who in saying Mass do not touch the ground with one knee when they genuflect, or who, when they should kiss the altar, only make an appearance of kissing it, or who do not properly form the crosses at the benedictions as prescribed in the rubrics; because, as Gavantus[12905] says with Ledesma, it is the same thing as to omit the ceremonies prescribed, to perform them improperly; according to the axiom of jurists: Paria sunt non facere, et facere male.

Moreover, the learned in general, Wigandt,[12906] Roncaglia,[12907] Concina,[12908] and La Croix[12909] in the places already cited, say, that if any one omits a notable part of the ceremonies of the Mass, although not of the most important, he cannot be excused from grievous sin. Such omissions, when repeated in the same Mass, amount to something grievous; and therefore are grievously irreverent to the Holy Sacrifice.

We know that even in the Old Law the Lord threatened with many maledictions those priests that were careless of the ceremonies of their sacrifices, which were but figures of ours: But if thou wilt not hear the voice of the Lord thy God to keep and to do all His . . . ceremonies . . . all these curses shall come upon thee. . . . Cursed shalt thou be in the city, cursed in the field; . . . cursed shalt thou be coming in, and cursed going out. . . . [12910]

Hence, seeing the greater part of priests say Mass with so much hurry and carelessness in the performance of the ceremonies, one ought to weep even with tears of blood. Well might be applied to such the reproach of Clement of Alexandria to the Gentile priests, that they made heaven a theatrical scene, and God the subject of a comedy: O impietatem! Scenam cælum fecistis, et Deus factus est actus.[12911] But why should I say a comedy? Oh, what attention would not such pay if they had to recite a part in a comedy! And in saying Mass what attention do they pay? Words mutilated, genuflections half made, acts of mockery rather than of reverence: crosses so formed that it would be impossible to know what they meant: such movements about the altar, and turnings, as even to excite ridicule and laughter: handling the consecrated Host and the consecrated chalice as though they were a piece of bread and a glass of wine: confounding the words and ceremonies together, placing the one before or after the other, contrary to the order prescribed by the rubrics; the whole Mass, in a word, from beginning to end, nothing but a tissue of carelessness, confusion, and irreverence.

And whence comes all this? It arises partly from ignorance of the rubrics, which they neither know nor endeavor to know; and partly from anxiety to finish Mass in as short a time as possible. They seem to be saying Mass as though the Church were going to fall, or the Turks were coming, and they should not have time to escape. Such priests, before saying Mass, will sometimes be engaged for hours in worldly affairs, or in useless conversation in a shop, or in the sacristy, and then hasten to begin Mass, and attend to nothing but to get through it as quickly as possible. There should be always some one at hand to say to such, as Father Avila, approaching the altar, once said to a priest who was celebrating in this manner: "Please to treat him better; for he is the son of a respectable Father."[12912] God admonished the priests of the old law to tremble with awe when they approached the Sanctuary.[12913] And shall the priests of the New Law celebrating at the altar, in the presence of Jesus Christ really there, taking him into their hands, offering him in sacrifice, and even feeding upon him, dare to behave with irreverence?

A priest at the altar, as St. Cyprian says, and most truly, represents the person of Jesus Christ himself.[12914] And in the person of Jesus Christ he says: Hoc est corpus meum. Hic est calix sanguinis mei. But, O God! seeing the irreverent manner in which so many priests now celebrate Mass, who could say whether they were the representatives of Jesus Christ, or mountebanks earning their livelihood by tricks of sleight-of-hand? as it is written in the synod of Spalatro: "Many who celebrate endeavor not to celebrate Mass, but to finish it; not that they may perform an act of devotion, but that they may have a means of making a living; so that the celebration of Mass is performed not as a mystery of religion, but as an act of making profit."[12915] And what is still more to be wondered at, or rather, to be lamented, is to see even Religious, and some even of reformed Orders, say Mass with so much haste, and with such mutilated ceremonies as would scandalize even idolaters, and scandalize them more than if such Religious had been the most lax secular priests.

Hence let priests who celebrate in this unworthy manner remember that they not only sin by the irreverence which they commit against the holy Sacrifice, but also by the great scandal which they give to those who are present at it. In proportion as a devout Mass excites great devotion and reverence towards the sacred mysteries, so does an indevout Mass destroy all devotion and reverence due to so great a sacrifice. In the life of St. Peter of Alcantara it is related that the Mass which he said devoutly produced more fruit than all the sermons of the preachers of the province in which he then was. The Council of Trent says that the ceremonies of the Mass have been ordained by the Church for no other purpose than to instil into the faithful the reverence which is due to the sacrifice of the altar, and to the sublime mysteries which it embraces. "The Church," says the Council, "has likewise employed ceremonies whereby both the majesty of so great a sacrifice might be recommended, and the minds of the faithful be excited by those visible signs of religion and piety, to the contemplation of those most sublime things which are hidden in this sacrifice."[12916] But the ceremonies, when irreverently and hastily performed, not only do not excite, but destroy the veneration of the faithful for so sacred a mystery. Peter of Blois says, that the saying of Mass with but little reverence induces the people to make little account of the most holy Sacrament.[12917] And hence the Council of Turin, in the year 1583, ordained that priests should be well instructed in the ceremonies of the Mass. For what end? "Lest they withdraw from devotion the people intrusted to their care, rather than attract them to the veneration of the sacred mysteries."[12918]

How can priests by saying Mass indevoutly expect to obtain pardon for their sins and favors from God, if while they are offering it up to him they are offending him, and insult him rather than honor him? "Since every crime," says Pope Julius, "is wiped out by sacrifices what shall be given to the Lord for the expiation of guilt, when in the very offering of the sacrifice sins are committed?"[12919] A priest, by not believing in the sacrament of the Eucharist, would offend God; but he who does believe in it, would offend him more by not treating it with becoming respect; because he would, by so doing, destroy it in others who saw him celebrate with so little reverence. The Jews respected Jesus Christ at the beginning of his mission; but when they saw him despised by the priests, they lost all reverence for him, and at last unanimously, with the priests, cried out: Tolle, tolle, crucifige eum. And thus the laity, when they see priests celebrate Mass with disrespect and negligence, lose all esteem and veneration for it.

As it is said above, when Mass is said with devotion, it excites devotion; while, on the contrary, when it is disrespectfully celebrated, it extinguishes all devotion in those who attend it, and almost their faith also. A certain religious of great credit related to me a terrible example on this point, and we find it also recorded by Seraphin Maria Loddi, a Dominican, in his "Reasons for celebrating Mass without hurry," etc. There was a certain heretic in Rome who had resolved to abjure his errors, and had promised the Pope Clement XI. to do so, but having seen Mass celebrated in a certain church in an indevout manner, was so scandalized, that he went to the Pope, and told his Holiness that he should not now abjure his errors, for that he was convinced that neither priests nor the Pope himself believed in the truth of the Catholic Church. But the Pope told him that the indevotion of one priest, or of many negligent priests, could not prejudice the truth of the faith taught by the Church. "Nevertheless," replied the heretic, "if I were Pope, and knew of a priest saying Mass so irreverently, I would have him burnt alive: and seeing as I do that there are priests who celebrate in this manner with impunity, even in Rome, and in the face of the Pope, I am satisfied that the Pope himself does not believe." And so saying, he departed, and obstinately refused to renounce his errors. I may add that a certain layman (this very morning, while I am writing this little work), as one of the brethren of our Congregation tells me, hearing a Mass of this kind, said to him: "Verily such priests and such Masses make one lose one's faith."

Hear how the pious Cardinal Bellarmine[12920] laments over the grievous scandals arising from the abuses committed by priests in the celebration of Mass, as referred to by Benedict XIV. "Another thing is also worthy of most copious tears, namely, that owing to the care lessness or impiety of some priests, the sacred mysteries are so unworthily treated that those who treat them seem not to believe that the majesty of the Lord is present. For thus some perform this duty without spirit, without affection, with incredible haste, as if they did not see Christ by faith, or did not believe that they are seen by him."[12921] Woe to such! A certain priest dying immediately after having said only his first Mass, Father Avila exclaimed, "Oh, wha t an account will he have to give before God only for this, his first Mass!" And what think you would Father Avila say of priests, who, perhaps for thirty or forty years, have offered up the holy Sacrifice in the scandalous manner that we have seen above?

The following terrible example on this subject is narrated in the annals of the Capuchin Fathers.[12922] There was a certain Rector of a church, who celebrated Mass with much hurry and irreverence. One day, Father Matthew da Basso, the first General of the Capuchins, as soon as this priest returned into the sacristy, after saying Mass, hastened to him, and represented to him how his Mass could not edify, but must bring destruction upon the Church; and on this account besought him either to celebrate Mass with more suitable gravity, or to abstain from saying it at all, in order to avoid giving more scandal to the people. The Rector was so indignant at receiving this reproof, that having soon cast off his sacred vestments, he ran after the religious in order to he revenged upon him; but not finding him, retired into his own house, where it so happened that in a few minutes the miserable man was attacked by persons who were his enemies, and was so grievously wounded by them that within the space of an hour he unhappily died; on which there arose such a terrific tempest as to tear up oaks by the roots, and carry herds of cattle into the air. An obsessed person of the neighborhood being exorcised, declared that all the demons of that country had been engaged together in preventing this priest from being converted before he died; and that having succeeded, in testimony of their triumph they raised this tempest in the air.

I know not with what conscience parish priests and sacristans can admit priests who say Mass in an irreverent manner to celebrate in their churches. Pasqualigo says that he knows not how to excuse from grievous sin those who admit such. "Prelates," he says, "even Regulars and Rectors of churches, sin mortally if they permit their subjects to celebrate with too great haste; because by reason of their office they are obliged to take care that the celebration takes place in a suitable manner."[12923] And there is no doubt but that bishops are strictly bound to prohibit, without exception, all such priests from celebrating the sacred mysteries, as ordained by the Council of Trent: "The holy Synod decrees that the ordinary bishops of places shall take diligent care and be bound to prohibit and abolish all those things which . . . irreverence, which can hardly be separated from impiety, . . . may have introduced."[12924] Mark the words, prohibere curent ac teneantur, -shall prohibit and are bound to do so; from which it is evident that prelates are obliged to watch and diligently inform themselves how Mass is celebrated throughout their dioceses, and to suspend from celebrating those priests who say it without due reverence. And this holds good even with respect to Regulars, inasmuch as bishops in their regard are declared by the Council to be apostolic Delegates: "Even as delegates of the Apostolic See, they may prohibit, ordain, reform, and establish, . . . and may compel . . . by ecclesiastical censures and other penalties inviolably to observe them.[12925]

We come now to inquire how much time is requisite for the saying of Mass in a proper manner. Father Molina[12926] says that an hour ought not to be considered too long. Nevertheless Cardinal Lambertini,[12927] agreeably to the general opinion of other authors, maintains that Mass ought not to exceed half an hour, nor to be less than twenty minutes; because, as he says, it cannot be celebrated with suitable reverence in less than twenty minutes; and if prolonged beyond half an hour it becomes tedious to those that are present.[12928] The same is found in the General Chapter of Clerics Regular: "No one should prolong Mass more than half an hour, nor say it in less than twenty minutes."[12929] We find the same again in the Constitutions of the discalced Carmelites. "The private Mass should last about half an hour, but not longer." The same again in the Rules of the Society of Jesus: "The saying of Mass should not much exceed half an hour, nor should it be so short as not fill up half an hour."[12930]

Father Gobato, speaking of the shortest time required by the Doctors for the celebration of Mass says, it is generally understood to be about half an hour.[12931] And he adds, that he should have great difficulty, ordinarily speaking, in believing that Mass could be said in a quarter of an hour,[12932] that is, without many faults. Hence Father Roncaglia maintains as certain that a priest who says Mass in less than a quarter of an hour cannot be excused from grievous sin.[12933] Pasqualigo and others in general say the same, after Cardinal Lambertini already cited, as Quarti, Bissus, Clericatus, etc. From all this it must follow, that a priest who celebrates any Mass in less than a quarter of an hour (even a Mass for the dead, or of the Votive of the Blessed Virgin), cannot, without great difficulty, not to say impossibility, be excused from mortal sin; because it is impossible to finish Mass in less time than a quarter, and not commit great irreverence against the holy Sacrifice, and give great scandal to the faithful.

But let us examine the excuses alleged by priests who commit such abuses.

1. Then some one may plead: I say in a short time Mass, but I omit nothing; for, thank God, I am naturally rapid in speech and in all my movements; and thus I soon pronounce all the words and perform all the ceremonies with exactness. But I reply, this is not sufficient for the proper celebration of Mass, merely to pronounce the words, and to hurry through the ceremonies. They ought to be performed with appropriate gravity, which is intrinsically necessary to the reverence which is required; otherwise, if hastily performed, they do not exhibit nor excite that reverence which is due to the holy Sacrifice; but, as shown above, they exhibit great irreverence and cause great scandal to the faithful. Father Quarti says: "It is certain that so much space of time is required as is needed to perform the ceremonies with the gravity that becomes so great a sacrifice."[12934] Pasqualigo also says: "It must be said that it is better to incline to prolixity than to haste, because the majesty of the sacrifice requires the mode that is suitable to the gravity of the act, rather than the inclination to the opposite."[12935] And he gives as the reason, that, in hurrying through the Mass, there may be not only sin, but scandal also; which would not follow from prolonging it, but only at most weariness in those who were present. "It is to be greatly feared," concludes Father Quarti, "that a large number of priests who hurry through Mass will go to hell."

2. It may be said that among the conditions for properly celebrating Mass, laid down by divines, brevity is one: Alte, breviter, clare, devote, et exacte.—But, I ask, why attend solely to one condition, breviter, and pay no regard to the other two, devote and exacte? Besides, the Rubric[12936] clearly explains what is meant by breviter, namely, that Mass should be said non nimis morose, ne audientes tædio afficiantur. And the Rubric after these words immediately adds: nec nimis festinanter. Hence the continuator of Tourneley very properly says: "A short Mass is here meant, that does not take away devotion; hence if it be said in less than half an hour it could not be called devout, and consequently it would be said badly."[12937] Yet he adds, that the term brevis is used in opposition to such an affected length of time in saying Mass as would weary those who heard it. Finally, the same author confirms what Pasqualigo says, to whom I have before referred: "It is better to incline to length than to brevity, because by length one cannot sin grievously, and scandal is not given as it is in a Mass said in too short a time."[12938]

A certain priest, in excuse for having said a short Mass, once pleaded that St. Philip Neri said Mass in half a quarter of an hour. But with what a want of good sense! It is true, as related by the author of his life, that St. Philip, when he said Mass publicly, was only a short time in celebrating; but the writer does not mean by a short time half a quarter of an hour, nor a quarter of an hour; he only meant that the saint avoided that wearisome tediousness which the Rubrics censure. For in the same life we read that the saint celebrated Mass, even in public, with so much devotion, that he moved all that heard him to tears of compunction. By a Mass of half a quarter of an hour he would not have moved others to tears, but to laughter and ridicule.

3. It may be said: The people complain, and are impatient when Mass is long. In reply, I would first ask, whether the want of devotion in the people is to regulate the degree of reverence to be paid to the holy Sacrifice? Secondly, I would answer, that if priests said Mass with becoming reverence and solemnity, the people would be impressed with proper respect for so holy a sacrifice, and would not complain of half an hour in being present at it. It is because Mass is but too generally said hastily and carelessly, that it does not excite the people to devotion; and hence, following the example of those who so celebrate, they hear it indevoutly, and with but little faith. If they see a priest doing wrong for a quarter or half a quarter of an hour, they are disgusted, and complain. They can spend hours at a gaming table, or loitering in the streets to kill time, but are quite wearied with a Mass of half an hour. Priests are the cause of all this evil: To you, O priests! saith the Lord, that despise My name, and have said: Wherein have we despised Thy name ? . . . In that you say: The table of the Lord is contemptible.[12939] The meaning of which is, that the little account which priests make of the reverence due to the Mass is the cause why it is not respected by others.

Wherefore, my dear priest of God, be careful to say Mass in a proper manner, and heed not others who blame you. Be satisfied if God praises you and the angels who are present around the altar. And if any one, however great a personage, requests you to say a short Mass, answer him as St. Theotone, a Canon Regular, replied to Teresa, Queen of Portugal, when, on account of some pressing affairs, she requested him to be expeditious in saying Mass. There is a Queen, said the saint, in heaven, more exalted than your majesty, in whose honor I am about to celebrate Mass; if your majesty cannot remain, go and attend to your affairs; but I cannot treat the holy Sacrifice with irreverence by shortening the time required for offering it.[12940] But what happened? The Queen, entering into herself, sent for the saint, and humbly casting herself at his feet, promised with tears to do penance for her rashness,

Let us endeavor then to reform ourselves, if hitherto we have celebrated this great Sacrifice with but little reverence and devotion. Let us consider how great is the action we are about to perform when we are going to celebrate Mass; and let us consider how great a treasure of merit we shall acquire by celebrating it devoutly. Oh, what a blessing for a priest is Mass well celebrated! The Disciple says: "Prayer is more quickly heard in the church in the presence of a priest celebrating."[1294112942]And if the prayer of a secular is more certainly heard by God when offered up in the presence of a priest celebrating Mass, how much more the prayer of the priest himself, if he celebrates devoutly? He who says Mass every day devoutly, will receive from God a constant supply of heavenly light and strength. Jesus Christ will constantly instruct him more and more, console him, animate him, and bestow upon him all the graces that he desires. Particularly after the consecration, a priest may be assured he will obtain from our Lord whatever he asks for. The Venerable Father Antony de Colellis says: "When I consecrate and hold Jesus Christ in my hands, I obtain whatever I desire."

Lastly, in speaking of the respect that is due to Jesus Christ offering himself in sacrifice in the Mass, I would not omit the precept of Innocent III.: "We also command that the oratories, the vessels, corporals, and vestments, should be kept clean; for it appears to be too absurd to neglect in sacred things what is becoming in profane things."[12943] This Pope had but too much reason for speaking in this manner, for, in truth, there were those of his day who did not blush to celebrate, or to cause others to celebrate, with corporals, purificators, and chalices, which they would not have suffered to be used at their own tables.

3. THANKSGIVING AFTER CELEBRATING MASS

Finally, a priest, after having celebrated Mass, must make a thanksgiving. St. John Chrysostom says that if men expect us to be grateful for every little favor that they do us, and to recompense them, how much more grateful ought we to be to God for the great benefits that he bestows upon us, since without any view to recompense, but only for our advantage, he would have us be grateful to him.[12944] If we, continues the saint, cannot thank God as he deserves, at least let us thank him as much as we are able. But what a misery, what an abuse, to see priests, as soon as Mass is finished, after having received from God the honor of offering up in sacrifice to him his own beloved Son, and after having partaken of his most sacred body, scarcely entered into the sacristy, with their lips still purpled with his blood, but after a short prayer muttered between their teeth, without devotion, and without attention, immediately begin to talk of useless things, or of the affairs of the world, and leave the church to pass through the streets, with Jesus Christ still present within them in the sacramental species! It would be well to do with such what Father Avila once did. Seeing a priest leaving the church immediately after celebrating Mass, he sent two clerics with lights to accompany him; on which the priest inquiring what priest they were going to attend, they answered: We are accompanying the Blessed Sacrament which you carry within you. To such might be said what St. Bernard wrote to the archdeacon Fulcone: "Alas! how can you so soon grow tired of Jesus Christ!"[12945]

Many are the devout books that inculcate and enforce thanksgiving after Mass; but how many priests are there who make it? Those who do make it may be easily distinguished. The wonder is, that while some are indeed diligent in meditation, and in other devotions, few or none remain after Mass to commune with Jesus Christ. Thanksgiving after Mass ought to terminate only with the day. Father Avila says that the time after Mass ought to be considered as of the greatest value. The time after Mass is a most precious time, in which we may treat with God and obtain from him treasures of grace. St. Teresa says, Let us not lose after Communion so fine an opportunity of treating with God: his divine Majesty is not accustomed to repay those ill with whom he takes up his abode when they afford him a suitable entertainment. In another place she says that Jesus Christ, after Communion, sits within us as upon the throne of graces, and says to each of us, as to the blind man whom he restored to sight, What wilt Thou that I should do for Thee?[12946] As though he said, I am here, O devout soul, to bestow upon thee my choicest graces: tell me, what wouldst thou that I should do for thee?

Moreover, it is the opinion of many learned writers, of Suarez,[12947] of Gonet,[12948] and of others, that the more the soul, after Communion, during the time that the sacramental species remain, disposes herself by fervent acts of devotion, the greater are the fruits which she reaps from it; because the Blessed Sacrament is in the nature of food, and as corporal food, so long as it remains in the stomach, nourishes the body: so with this spiritual and heavenly food—so long as it remains in the body, so long does it nourish the soul with divine graces, and the more plentifully in proportion as the soul disposes herself to receive them by continued acts of suitable devotion. Besides, during this time, every pious act is of greater value and merit, inasmuch as the communicant is united to Jesus Christ according to his own words: He that eateth My flesh, and drinketh My blood, abideth in Me and I in him.[12949] And as St. John Chrysostom says, Jesus Christ makes us then one with himself.[12950] And hence acts of piety and devotion are more meritorious then than at any other time, because they proceed from the soul in union with Jesus Christ.

On the contrary, our Lord will not waste his graces on the ungrateful, as St. Bernard says.[12951] Father Avila used to spend two hours in prayer and in communing with Jesus Christ after celebrating Mass. Oh, with what tenderness and affection does Jesus Christ speak to the soul after Communion! with what endearing love does he treat her! It would not be much for a priest to spend an hour with Jesus Christ after Mass. At least, I beseech every priest to spend half an hour, or at the very least, a quarter. But, O God! a quarter is too little! St. Ambrose says: "A true minister of the altar is born for God, not for himself."[12952] If, then, a priest, from the time of his ordination, belongs no more to himself, nor to the world, nor to his relatives, but only to God, for whom ought he to spend his whole life, but for God, and particularly after Communion, by uniting himself with Jesus Christ.

III. THE PRIEST WHO ABSTAINS FROM SAYING MASS

In conclusion, I would say a word, in passing, on the question whether it is more pleasing to God to say Mass, or to abstain from saying it through humility.

To abstain through humility is good, but not best. Acts of humility render to God a limited honor; but the Mass an infinite honor, as coming from a divine person. Mark what Venerable Bede says: "The priest who omits to say Mass, though he is not lawfully prevented, deprives, as far as in him lies, the Blessed Trinity of glory, the angels of joy, the sinners of pardon, the just of help, the souls in purgatory of solace, the Church of benefits, and himself of spiritual medicine."[12953]

The glorious St. Cajetan, being in Naples, and hearing that a Cardinal, a friend of his, who had been accustomed to say Mass every day, began to celebrate less frequently in consequence of the multiplicity of affairs in which he was engaged, could not, although it was during the dog-days, be persuaded from going at the risk of his life to Rome, to entreat his friend to resume his former custom in this respect, and went, and then returned again to Naples.

It is related of Father John of Avila, that on one occasion going on his way to say Mass at a distant hermitage, he became so overcome with fatigue, that despairing of being able to reach the place, which was still at a considerable distance, he began to think of returning without saying Mass; on which Jesus Christ appearing to him as a pilgrim, and opening his bosom and showing him his wounds, particularly that in his sacred side, said, "When I was thus wounded, I was much more overcome and exhausted than thou art;" and so saying, disappeared. Father Avila roused himself, went forward, and celebrated Mass.

THE DIVINE OFFICE HURRIEDLY SAID

I. IMPORTANCE OF THE DIVINE OFFICE

To those who are deputed by the Church to recite the canonical hours, two very great and important offices are entrusted—that of praising and glorifying God, and that of imploring the divine mercies upon all Christian people.

I. In the first place, then, the supreme majesty of God is to be honored by the reciting of the Office. The sacrifice of praise shall glorify Me: and there is the way by which I will show him the salvation of God.[12954] I declare myself honored, saith the Lord, by him who offers me a sacrifice of praise; and thereby he shall find the way of obtaining eternal salvation. St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi, when she heard the bell for Office, was filled with consolation and hastened immediately to the choir, delighted with the thought that she was going to be engaged in the employment of the angels, whose constant occupation it is to praise God. And it is for this end that the Church has appointed her ministers to sing the divine Office, that men on earth may join with the blessed in heaven in honoring their common Creator:

Sed illa sedes Cœlitum
Semper resultat laudibus:
Deum trinum et unicum,
Jugi canore prædicat.
Illi canentes jungimur
Almæ Sionis æmuli.

St. Gregory Nazianzen says that the chanting of the psalms is a prelude of the praises with which the saints honor God in heaven.[12955] Thus, according to Tertullian, when we recite the canonical hours, we as it were take possession of heaven, inasmuch as we discharge the same duty as the inhabitants of that blessed country. Hence, St. Catharine of Bologna took so much delight in reciting the divine Office, that she wished her death might take place while she was so engaged.

II. By the Office God is to be thanked for all the graces and favors that he is continually bestowing on mankind, and his divine mercy is to be obtained for poor sinners. It is the duty of the faithful in general to thank God for all his benefits; and as all stand in need here below of the divine assistance, in order to resist their spiritual enemies, and to obtain eternal salvation, so all are likewise bound to implore by prayer the succor of his mercies. But, as seculars are constantly distracted with the affairs of the world, the holy Church has appointed her ministers to implore for themselves and for all the people of Christ the assistance of his divine majesty through the different hours of the day. For this end is the Office divided into seven canonical hours, that there may be always some praying for all, and in the best form of prayer; inasmuch as the divine Office is nothing less than a memorial drawn up for us by God himself, through which he may more readily hear our prayers and succor us in our necessities, as he declares to us by the prophet Isaias: My spirit that is in thee, and My words that I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth.[12956] In this our good God acts as a prince, who, wishing to relieve the miseries of his vassals, draws up for them himself a form of supplication suitable to his dignity and their own wants, that he may be the better able to console them. Many private prayers do not equal in value only one prayer of the divine Office, as being offered to God in the name of the whole Church and in his own appointed words. Hence St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi says that, in comparison with the divine Office, all other prayers and devotions are but of little merit and efficacy with God. Let us be convinced, then, that after the holy Sacrifice of the Mass the Church possesses no source, no treasure, so abundant as the Office, from which we may draw such daily streams of grace.

II. NECESSITY OF RECITING THE OFFICE WELL

But St. Gregory says that true prayer consists not only in the pronunciation of the words, but also in the attention of the heart; inasmuch as our good desires prevail much more with God in obtaining his divine mercies, than simply our voices.[12957] It is therefore necessary, if we would please God, to pray not only with the voice, but with the spirit and the mind, after the example of the Apostle: I will sing with the spirit, I will sing also with the understanding.[12958]

If priests and religious did all recite the Office as it ought to be recited, the Church would not behold herself in the miserable state to which she is reduced. How many sinners would be delivered from the slavery of the devil, and how many souls would love God with much greater fervor! And how would priests themselves not find themselves ever the same, imperfect, irritable, jealous, attached to their own interests, and led away by vanities! Our Lord has promised to hear every one who prays to him: For every one that asketh, receiveth.[12959] And how comes it that a priest offering up so many prayers in a day, were it only in the Office which he recites, is yet never heard? Lie is always the same, as weak and prone as ever to fall not only into slight sins (to which he is habituated, and takes neither pains nor care to correct himself of them), but into grievous sins against charity, justice, or chastity; hence when he recites the Office he pronounces sentence of condemnation against himself, in these words: They are cursed who decline from Thy commandments.[12960] And what is still worse, he feels little remorse, excusing himself as being of the same flesh and blood as other men, and not able to restrain himself. But if he said the Office with fewer distractions and less negligence, accompanying with his heart the many prayers that he offers to God in reciting it, he certainly would not be so weak, but would acquire fortitude and strength to resist all temptations, and to lead a holy life, such as becomes a priest of God.

But how, says St. Gregory,[12961] can God regard the prayers of him who knows not what he is asking, nor at all times desires to be heard? The Apostle tells us that the prayer only of the lips is fruitless: If I pray in a tongue, . . . but my understanding is without fruit.[12962] How can you pretend, adds St. Cyprian, to be heard by God, when you do not hear yourself?[12963] As prayer offered with attention and devotion is a sweet-smelling incense, which is most pleasing to God, and brings down for us treasures of grace; so, on the contrary, prayer offered with distractions and indevotion is an abomination in his eyes, which excites his indignation, and brings upon us his wrath.

The Almighty one day complained of this to St. Bridget, saying, that priests lost much time every day, in entertaining themselves with their friends on worldly topics; but that when they came to speak with him in the divine Office, they were in such haste, that instead of honoring they dishonored him. Hence St. Augustine said that the barking of a dog was more pleasing to God than the chanting of such priests. O God, how indignant would an earthly prince be were one of his vassals, while in the act of petitioning him for some favor, to be so distracted and taken up with other things as not to know what he was saying! Hence the angelic Doctor writes, that no one can be excused from sin, who at prayer, although not of obligation, is voluntarily distracted, because he thereby slights God, as one would do, who, speaking to another, paid no attention to what he was saying.[12964]

Alas! of how many priests will the Lord complain, as he complained of old of the Jews! This people honoreth Me with their lips: but their heart is far from Me.[12965] And of how many might be said what Peter of Blois writes: While their lips pronounce the psalms and canticles, their minds are in the pleasures of the table; thinking how they may best gratify their appetites or their vanity, their thirst for riches or similar worldly desires.[12966] The Council of Treves says: What else is it to chant the psalms with the voice, and in mind to be going through the streets and squares, but to deceive men, by making them believe that you are praising God, when in reality you are mocking him, speaking to him indeed with your lips, but giving your minds and hearts to anything rather than to praising him and praying to him?[12967] Hence St. Basil justly concludes, that as, in order to obtain favors, it is necessary to pray for them with attention and fervor, so he who prays with a mind wandering upon distracting objects will not obtain the favors which he asks, but will provoke the Lord to indignation.[12968]

Our Lord has said by his prophet Malachy, that he curses the praises of those priests who bless him only with their lips, while their hearts are engaged upon everything else but his honor and glory: And now, O ye priests, this commandment is to you. If you will not hear, and if you will not lay it to heart, to give glory to My name, saith the Lord of hosts, . . . I will curse your blessings.[12969] Hence may be said of that unhappy priest, who says his Office in this careless manner, what is written in the book of psalms: May the devil stand at his right hand. When he is judged, may he go out condemned: and may his prayer be turned to sin.[12970]

While he is reciting the divine praises with his lips only, sometimes only half pronouncing the words, at other times conversing or amusing himself with others, his mind dissipated and distracted with the affairs or pleasures of the world, the devil stands by his side, and his reward for such an Office will be eternal damnation, since his very prayer itself will be imputed to him as a sin, on account of the unworthy manner in which he offers it; which is the signification of those words: and may his prayer be turned to sin.

Hence the devil is so busy in putting into the mind, while we are reciting the Office, so many of the affairs, desires and pleasures of the world, that engaging our thoughts with such things, he may rob us of all the fruit we might otherwise reap from the Office, and render us culpable in the sight of God, by causing us to treat him with so little respect. On this account we ought to take the greatest care to recite the divine praises with proper attention. A good religious once said, that when pressed for time we had better shorten our mental prayer in order to have sufficient leisure to recite the Office with proper devotion. Agreeably with this, we find in the rules of the Carthusians that God is not pleased with any act of devotion which we perform, if by performing it we neglect that to which duty obliges us.[12971]

III REQUISITE ATTENTION AND DEVOTION

But omitting other reflections, let us come to the manner in which we are practically to recite the Office with becoming attention and devotion.

Before everything else, says St. John Chrysostom, when we enter the church, or take the breviary in our hands, to discharge our obligation of reciting the divine Office, let us leave the door and expel from our minds all worldly thoughts.[12972] To this does the Holy Spirit exhort us when he says: Before prayer prepare thy soul.[12973] Consider that then the Church charges you as her minister to go and praise the Lord, and to implore his divine mercies for all mankind. Imagine to yourself that the angels stand by you, as they were once seen by Blessed Herman, with censers in their hands, ready to offer up your prayers to God as sweet-smelling incense of holy love, as the psalmist says: Let my prayer be directed, as incense in thy sight.[12974] Thus the apostle St. John describes the angels as having, . . . golden vials full of odors, which are the prayers of the saints.[12975] In a word, think that you are going to speak with God, and to treat with him of your own welfare, and of that of the whole Church; and reflect that he then regards you with greater love, and listens more propitiously to your petitions.

In the beginning, then, offer to him the praises that you are about to pour forth in his honor, and beseech him to free you from distractions, and to give you light and help to praise him and to pray to him as he deserves; and for this end recite attentively the usual prayer: Aperi Domine os meum ad benedicendum, etc.

When you begin the Office, do not hurry yourself in order to get through it as soon as possible, as some do; and would to God they were not the greater number. O my God! the Office is to be said, and at once we are weary. And shall we, in order to spare ourselves a little more time required to recite it devoutly, displease God, and deprive ourselves of the graces and merits that we might otherwise gain by reciting it with proper attention?

We should then place ourselves in a modest and becoming posture. If we do not intend to say it kneeling or standing, but sitting down, let us at least carefully avoid any negligent attitude. It is related of two religious, that while they were reciting Matins together reclined as on a couch, the devil appeared to them, bringing with him an intolerable stench, and scornfully said to them: Such prayer deserves such incense.[12976] It would greatly contribute to our devotion to recite the Office before a crucifix and a statue or picture of the Blessed Virgin, that, casting a look now and then upon them, we may be enabled to renew our intentions and devout affections.

Endeavor, therefore, while you recite the psalms, if you would derive great advantage from them, to renew from time to time your attention and devout affections; that your devotion, says St. Augustine,[12977] which gradually grows cold unless frequent efforts be made to inflame it may not be entirely extinguished.

Attention during the recital of the divine Office is of three kinds; and I speak here of internal attention; because as regards external attention it is quite necessary that we should abstain from everything incompatible with internal attention, as writing, conversation with others, or listening to others speaking, and such like things, which require considerable application of mind. And it will be well here to note, what the learned remark, that such as recite their Office in the squares, streets, and other such places, where they are much exposed to distractions, are in great danger of not satisfying their obligation.

But to return to internal attention—it regards the words, the sense, and God, as divines in general teach with St. Thomas, who says: "There is a threefold attention that may be employed in vocal prayer: one that regards the words, so that one may not make a mistake in uttering the words; the second, by which we attend to the sense of the words; and the third, by which the attention is given to the end of prayer, namely, to God and to the thing for which the prayer is offered."[12978]

The first kind of attention is to the words, by which a person is careful in pronouncing them entirely and distinctly. The second is to the sense, by attending to the signification of the words, in order that the heart may accompany them with appropriate affections. The third and the best is to God, by directing the mind to him during prayer, by adoring him, by thanking or loving him, or by imploring his graces. The first kind of attention, whenever there has been from the beginning an intention of praying, is sufficient to satisfy the obligation, the Church requiring no more, as St. Thomas teaches in another place: "The first is attention to the words by which we ask; secondly, to the petition itself, and whichever of these two is present, the prayer is not to be regarded as inattentive."[12979] But he who says the Office with this kind of attention only, without either of the other two, will never say it with devotion, nor without many defects, nor with much fruit. And what benefit can a priest expect to derive from his Office if he says it merely with his lips, endeavoring all the time to dispatch it as quickly as possible, in order to free himself of a burden pressing heavily upon his shoulders? or as though he were swallowing a nauseous medicine? What benefit can he expect, if, worse than this, while he is reciting his Office, he allows his mind to be dissipated, now looking about him at distracting objects, and now sometimes even intermixing with what he is repeating irrelevant words and phrases? St. Bonaventure[12980] relates, that in Paris a good priest being asked a question by a certain prelate on some affair while he was saying his Office, replied that he was speaking with a person of higher dignity, and that therefore he could not attend to the question, and bowing his head continued his Office. On the other hand, the same saint relates of another ecclesiastic that he was condemned to very severe punishments in purgatory on account of the many interruptions which he had allowed in the recitation of his Office.

It is not, however, meant that we should disquiet or afflict ourselves on account of the involuntary distractions that molest us in our Office. So long as they are not voluntary, they are not sinful. Our Lord has compassion on our infirmity, through which distracting thoughts come into our minds without our seeking them, and hence will not hinder the fruit of the prayers which we recite. "He prays in spirit and in truth," says St. Thomas, "who from an instinct of the spirit devotes himself to prayer, although through some weakness his mind may afterwards wander."[12981] And he adds, that it happens even to souls who are raised to the exercise of contemplation, that they cannot remain long in the exercise of this high gift without being pressed down by the weight of human misery interrupting them with involuntary distraction.[12982]

On the other hand, the holy Doctor says, that he who is voluntarily and purposely distracted in prayer cannot derive any benefit from it, nor be excused from sin.[12983] By purposely is meant, as the learned in general say, when a person perceiving his distractions wilfully entertains them. Against such St. Cyprian exclaims, that it is an insupportable irreverence in the eyes, of God, for a person while he is praying to him to think of other things as though of more importance than his speaking with God in order to implore his divine graces.[12984] Hence St. Bernard teaches that as our will renders our thoughts efficacious in obtaining the fruits of the Spirit, so our will, if neglected, renders them unwortliy of God, and thus deserving chastisements instead of favors.[12985]

St. Bernard had a celebrated vision on this subject, which is related in the chronicles of the Cistercians. As he was one night chanting the Office in choir with his monks, he saw an angel writing at the side of each of them. Some of the angels were writing with gold, others with silver, others with ink, others with water, and others stood with their pens in their hands without writing anything. Our Lord made known to the saint that the gold signified the fervor of charity with which their prayers were recited; the silver, devotion, but less fervor; the ink, diligence in pronouncing all the words, but without devotion; the water, negligence, and but little attention to what was said; and that the angels who wrote nothing signified, that those who were voluntarily distracted were guilty of great irreverence to God. On the contrary, St. Robert, Abbot, being also in the choir, had a different vision. He saw the devil going round, and finding one drowsy, laughed at him; and another distracted, was greatly delighted, and showed that he was very much pleased with him.

When then, O priest of God, you take in hand your breviary, imagine that an angel is on one side noting down your merits in the book of life, if you say the Office with devotion; and on the other side that the devil is writing down your faults in the book of death, if you say it with wilful distractions. By such thoughts endeavor to excite yourself to recite it with all the devotion in your power. For this end not only begin the Office with attention, but renew your attention at the beginning of every psalm, that you may be able to accompany in heart all the sentiments which you utter. "When you pray to God," writes St. Augustine, "let that be poured out in your heart which is uttered by your lips."[12986] He again adds: "If the psalm prays, then pray."[12987] St. Thomas observes that words pronounced devoutly with the lips excite devotion in the mind.[12988] And on this account he says our Lord has taught us to pray with the voice, that thereby in reciting our prayers we may apply the mind to ask what we pronounce with the tongue. And this is what we read in the celebrated Canon of the Fifth Council of Lateran,[12989] beginning with Dolentes, namely, that the Office be recited Studiose et devote, quantum Deus dederit: Studiose, by pronouncing all the words: Devote, by exercising the heart in the sentiments which are uttered. We should be thoroughly persuaded of what St. Augustine says, that the graces which we desire and beseech for ourselves and for others are obtained more by the effusions of the heart than by the sounds of the voice.[12990]

IV. LIGHTS AND GRACES DERIVED FROM THE OFFICE WELL RECITED

Cassian relates that the monks of Egypt held that it was better to sing ten verses deliberately and devoutly, than an entire psalm with distraction of mind.[12991] Oh, how many lights and graces are received through the psalms when recited with deliberation and reflection! St. Epiphanius says: The psalms enlighten the mind, rejoice the soul, direct it to heaven, and render it familiar with God.

It is true that many passages of the psalms are obscure and difficult to be understood without explanation; but there are many others easy and clear, which serve to reanimate our faith, our confidence in God, our love for him, and our good desires. We will here cite a few examples.

1. FAITH

They reanimate our faith by placing before our eyes the eternal truths of the existence of God, of the creation of the world, of the last things, and of the immortality of the soul. How especially do they invigorate our faith by the many prophecies that they contain of the great work of our Redemption, delivered so many ages before the event took place!

Holy David predicted in many places the coming of our Redeemer: "Redemisti me, Domine Deus veritatis;"[12992] "Redemptionem misit populo suo;"[12993] "Copiosa apud eum redemptio."[12994]

He predicted in particular many things regarding the Passion. He predicted the council of the chief priests and elders, when they would assemble to bring about the death of Jesus Christ. "Principes convenerunt in unum adversus Dominum et adversus Christum ejus."[12995] He predicted the crucifixion: "Foderunt munus meas et pedes meos: dinumeraverunt omnia ossa mea."[12996] He foretold how the executioners would divide his garments, and for his inner garment cast lots: "Diviserunt sibi vestimenta mea, et super vestem meam miserunt sortem."[12997] He predicted the thirst of Jesus Christ, and the gall mixed with vinegar which they would give him to drink upon the cross: "Et dederunt in escam meam fel: et in siti mea potaverunt me aceto."[12998]

He predicted also the conversion of the Gentiles: "Convertentur ad Dominum universi fines terræ, et adorabunt in conspectu ejus universæ familiæ gentium."[12999]

2. CONFIDENCE IN GOD

How many beautiful sentiments of confidence in God do the Psalms contain!

"Dominus, firmamentum meum, et refugium meum, et liberator meus. Laudans invocabo Dominum, et ab inimicis meis salvus ero. Protector est omnium sperantium in se."[13000]

"Dominus, illuminatio mea et salus mea; quem timebo?"[13001]

"In te Domine, speravi, non confundar in æternum. In manus tuas commendo spiritum meum."[13002]

"Sperantem autem in Domino misericordia circumdabit."[13003]

"Fiat misericordia tua, Domine, super nos, quemadmodum speravimus in te."[13004]

"Misericordias Domini in æternum cantabo."[13005]

"Quoniam in me speravit, liberabo eum."[13006]

"Vivet anima mea, et laudabit te."[13007]

"Spiritus tuus bonus deducet me in terram rectam!"[13008]

3. LOVE FOR GOD

How many acts of love!

"Satiabor, cum apparuerit gloria tua."[13009]

"Diligam te, Domine, fortitudo mea."[13010]

"Magnificate Dominum mecum, et exaltemus nomen ejus in idipsum."[13011]

"Quemadmodum desiderat cervus ad fontes aquarum, ita desiderat anima mea ad te, Deus.—Quando veniam et apparebo ante faciem Dei?"[13012]

"Paratum cor meum, Deus, paratum cor meum."[13013]

"Sitivit in te anima mea; quam multipliciter tibi caro mea!"[13014]

"Confiteantur tibi populi, Deus, confiteantur tibi populi omnes."[13015]

"Quid enim mihi est in cœlo? et a te quid volui super terram ? . . . Deus cordis mei, et pars mea. Deus, in æternum."[13016]

"Memor fui Dei, et delectatus sum.[13017]

4. ACTS OF THANKSGIVING, OF HUMILITY, OF CONTRITION, AND OF FIRM PURPOSE OF AMENDMENT

How many acts of thanksgiving!

"Venite, audite, et narrabo, omnes qui timetis Deum, quanta fecit animæ meæ."[13018]

"Quid retribuam Domino pro omnibus quæ retribuit mihi?"[13019]

How many acts of humility!

"Ego autem sum vermis, et non homo; opprobrium hominum, et abjectio plebis."[13020]

"Eruisti animam meam ex inferno inferiori."[13021]

"Nisi quia Dominus adjuvit me, paulo minus habitasset in inferno anima mea."[13022]

"Erravi sicut ovis quæ periit; quære servum tuum."[13023]

"Et non intres in judicium cum servo tuo, quia non justificabitur in conspectu tuo omnis vivens."[13024]

How many acts of contrition!

"Fuerunt mihi lacrymæ meæ panes die ac nocte, dum dicitur mihi quotidie: Ubi est Deus tuus?"[13025]

"Exitus aquarum deduxerunt oculi mei, quia non custodierunt legem tuam.—Iniquitatem odio habui et abominatus sum."[13026]

How many acts of firm purpose of amendment!

"Legem tuam in medio cordis mei!"[13027]

"Docebo iniquos vias tuas."[13028]

"Custodiam legem tuam semper. In æternum non obliviscar justificationes tuas.—Juravi et statui custodire judicia justitiæ tuæ."[13029]

5. VARIOUS PRAYERS

Nearly all the psalms abound in holy thoughts. In the fiftieth psalm alone, how many beautiful prayers!

"Miserere mei, Deus, secundum magnam misericordiam tuam.—Averte faciem tuam a peccatis meis.—Cor mundum crea in me, Deus.—Ne projicias me a facie tua. Spiritu principali confirma me."

How many other beautiful prayers in Psalm cxviii., which is every day recited in the Little Hours!

"Doce me justificationes tuas.—Revela oculos meos.—Viam iniquitatis amove a me.—Averte oculos meos, ne videant vanitatem.—Da mihi intellectum, ut discam mandata tua.—Fiat misericordia tua ut consoletur me.—Non confundas me ab expectatione mea.—Adjuva me, et salvus ero.—Suscipe servum tuum in bonum.—Aspice in me, et miserere mei.—Intellectum da mihi et vivam.—Gressus meos dirige secundum eloquium tuum.—Clamavi ad te; salvum me fac, ut custodiam mandata tua.—Vide humilitatem meam, et eripe me.—Intret postulatio mea in conspectu tuo.—Tuus sum ego, salvum me fac.—Fiat manus tua ut salvet me."

As regards other passages which are obscure, I do not say that there is an obligation of studying interpreters; but at the same time I say that such a study would be certainly one of the best and most useful to which a priest could apply himself, as the Council of Milan advises.[13030] For this purpose it would be well to read Cardinal Bellarmine on the psalms.

The petitions most pleasing to God are those which are contained in the Pater noster, which is the most excellent of all prayers, taught us from the mouth of Jesus Christ himself; and therefore does the Church require us to repeat it so often in the divine Office. How especially beautiful are the three first petitions! three most perfect acts of love! Sanctificetur nomen tuum: Adveniat regnum tuum: Fiat voluntas tua sicut in cœlo et in terra! In the first, Sanctificetur nomen tuum, we beg that God would make himself known and loved by all mankind. In the second, Adveniat regnum tuum, we beg of him to take entire possession of our hearts, that he may reign in them by his grace in this life, and by his glory in the next. In the third, Fiat voluntas tua, etc., we ask of him the gift of perfect conformity; so that we may do his will on earth as the blessed do in heaven.[13031] In repeating so frequently the Gloria Patri, how many devout acts of faith may we make, of praise, of thanksgiving, of delight in the happiness and perfections of God! St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi, whenever she repeated the Gloria Patri, bowing her head imagined to herself that she was offering it to the executioner in honor of the faith.

Moreover, the Church requires us at the beginning of all the Hours of the Office to salute and have recourse to Mary the Mother of God; by means of whom we may obtain so many graces, she being the treasurer and dispenser of all the divine graces.

Let us conclude. Many priests think and speak of the obligation of saying Office as of a great burden; and I say, that those that say it negligently without devotion, and endeavor to get through it as quickly as possible, have great reason so to speak of it; because they have to labor, for at least an hour, to recite it, and that without any relish, but with much irksomeness. But to those that say it with devotion, entering with their minds into the many devout sentiments that are expressed in it, and accompanying with their hearts the holy affections that it pours forth to God, the Office is not a load, but a relief and delight to the soul, as all good priests find it; and if it must ever be called a load, it is a winged load, which elevates us and unites us with God.

TRANSLATION

REVEREND FATHER:

As the centenary of the death of the illustrious Founder of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer drew near, you conceived the pious and appropriate plan of shedding a new lustre on his memory by translating all his works into English and publishing them. The Holy Father, therefore, who has at heart the spiritual advancement of the faithful, as well as the exaltation of the holy Doctor, has most graciously accepted the nine volumes thus far published, which you wished to present to him. While bestowing upon you well-deserved praise for your useful labor, and thanking you for the gift inspired by your filial love, he gives you from his heart the blessing which you humbly asked for in your letter, complying also with the request of the Most Rev. Archbishop of Baltimore.

As the bearer of this, I wish you all happiness in the Lord.

I am, Reverend Sir,

Your obedient servant,

M. CARD. RAMPOLLA.

ROME, June 4, 1888.

APPROBATION

By virtue of the authority granted me by the Most Rev. Nicholas Mauron, Superior-General of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, I hereby sanction the publication of the work entitled the "DIVINE OFFICE," etc., which is Volume XIV. of the new and complete edition in English of the works of St. Alphonsus de Liguori, called "The Centenary Edition."

NOTICE

ST. ALPHONSUS was seventy-eight years old when in 1774 he published his TRANSLATION OF THE PSALMS AND CANTICLES OF THE DIVINE OFFICE. This difficult work, composed at so advanced an age, amidst sufferings almost continual, and numerous occupations, excited at Naples the admiration of learned men. According to Canon Massa, professor of theology and ecclesiastical examiner, the author in his work explains so skilfully the sense and the obscure passages of the psalms, that without taking anything from the purity of the inspired word he aids both the heart and the mind of those that read it. The Holy See has frequently praised and recommended all the works of St. Alphonsus; but the decree of March 23, 1871, which conferred on St. Alphonsus the title of Doctor of the Church, makes special mention of this work, speaking of it as one of his most useful and salutary works. The decree says: "He [St. Alphonsus] has made clear dark passages of the Holy Scriptures, both in his ascetic writings, which are freighted with a celestial odor, and in a most salutary commentary, in which, for the nourishment of piety and the instruction of the soul, he has given expositions of the Psalms, as well as of the Canticles, for the benefit especially of those obliged to its recitation."

Our holy author wished above all to give, not an explanation, but, as the title expresses it, a translation of the psalms, so that even those that do not understand Latin may avail themselves of it; and he thus proceeds in his work: He takes each verse of the psalms separately, and gives of it a more or less extended paraphrase, which is accompanied or interspersed by diverse explanations. We have judged it proper, and even necessary, to modify this method in the present volume; namely, we have given in parallel columns the Latin text and the English translation.[13032] Below the psalms we have placed the explanations that are given by the holy author, and at the bottom of the page foot-notes are here and there added whenever they were found to be necessary. It must be remarked that all the foot-notes have been added by the French translator, the Rev. Father Dujardin, C.SS. R., upon whose work the present translation is based. By the kind permission of the Rev. T. Livius, C.SS.R., we have freely used his translation in the preparation of this volume.—ED.

EXPLANATION OF THE PSALMS AND CANTICLES

DEDICATION TO HIS HOLINESS CLEMENT THE FOURTEENTH

MOST HOLY FATHER:

It is to your Holiness that I present this book. To whom could I more justly dedicate it than to the supreme head of the Church—to him who holds on earth the place of Jesus Christ? In this work, composed in the last years of my life, when my infirmities warn me of approaching death, I undertake to explain the psalms of David, the recitation of which, after the administration of the sacraments and the preaching of the divine word, is the holiest occupation of persons consecrated to God; for by reciting here below the divine Office, they are associated with the angels, who celebrate in heaven the glory of the Saviour.

I will not here enlarge upon the many encomiums that your Holiness deserves in so many respects; in order not to offend your modesty, I refrain from praising so many virtues that shine forth before the whole world, and especially your mortified life, your detachment from the bonds of flesh and blood and from human considerations. But it is impossible for me not to exalt the prudence, of which your Holiness has given so glorious a proof by taking measures, so full of wisdom, whereby you have sought to calm the agitation caused by a diversity of opinion among those who are otherwise devoted to the welfare of the Church.

I venture to hope that your Holiness will receive my work, which, it seems to me, all those that recite the divine Office may advantageously use; for among them there are found some who, from their little knowledge of the Latin tongue, do not understand the words and still less the sense of the psalms; and this all the more because the greater number of them presents even to the learned insoluble difficulties. It is true that many have undertaken to explain this part of our holy books; but, written in Latin and in a lofty style, their works are not so generally useful as they might be. For this reason I have made it my study to render as clear as possible the thought of the psalmist, so that priests and religious, in reciting the breviary, may understand well what they say, and may consequently recite it with more attention.

I lay, then, this my book at the feet of your Holiness, begging you to correct it, if it merits correction, and to bless it if you think that it will produce some good among souls. Humbly prostrate at the throne of your Holiness, I kiss your feet, while at the same time I humbly ask your holy benediction, and declare myself

Ever the very humble, devoted, and obedient son and servant of your Holiness,

Alphonsus Maria,
Bishop of St. Agatha of the Goths.

INTRODUCTION

I. GENERAL IDEA OF THE PSALMS

A COMPENDIUM OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

IN the preface to his commentary on the psalms, Cardinal Bellarmine says that the psalter is a compendium of the Old Testament. In fact, all that Moses has written concerning the Hebrew people and the law, all that the prophets have announced after him, we find in the chants of David, as St. Augustine observes: "The book of psalms contains all that the other canonical books contain as useful to souls; it is like an immense treasure in which each one finds, to his own greatest advantage, the riches of heavenly doctrine."[13033] Every one that pays but slight attention will ascertain that the psalms abound in divine lights, in holy maxims, in fervent prayers, without counting the many prophecies that David alone gives us, particularly in relation to the redemption wrought by Jesus Christ.

A PROPHETIC HISTORY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

Let one read on this subject PSALMS 2, 15, 21, 45, 68, and also other psalms: in them are clearly predicted the reign of Jesus Christ, his birth, his preaching, his miracles, his Passion, his resurrection, his ascension into heaven, and the establishment of his Church, as he himself declared to his disciples: All things must needs be fulfilled, which are written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning Me.[13034]

AN ADMIRABLE BOOK OF PRAYERS

Moreover, in these inspired pages are everywhere found sentiments of divine love, acts of patience, of humility, of meekness, of forgetfulness of injuries, of strength of soul, and of confidence in God. In reciting, therefore, the divine Office every one should apply to himself the sentiments and the acts of the royal prophet—sentiments of holy fear, of confidence in God, of thanksgiving; acts of good desires, of humility, of offering of one's self; of love, of praise; and especially all the prayers that he addresses to the Lord to obtain the pardon of his sins, as well as to obtain light and the help necessary for salvation. If God requires that in the whole Church these psalms should be recited, he certainly wishes that every one, while reciting them should apply to his own soul the acts and the prayers that David made for himself. Again, when we meet with a prayer that the psalmist addressed to God for the entire Hebrew people, we should have in view the Christian people. So also when the royal prophet speaks of his enemies—this being oftenest understood, according to the literal sense, of his many persecutors—we should think of the evil spirits, who are indeed our worst enemies, since they seek to deprive us of the life of the soul rather than of the life of the body.

II. THE AIM AND PLAN OF THIS WORK

Many of the psalms are easy to understand; but many others are difficult and obscure. Hence, to render the reading of them intelligible and profitable to the faithful, the holy Fathers employed every means—dogmatical interpretations, moral explanations, eloquent preaching, and even expositions easily understood by persons of ordinary intelligence.

SIMPLE TRANSLATION OF EASY VERSES

For my part, this is what I have proposed to do in the present work: In regard to those verses that are more easy, I shall content myself with giving a simple translation, in order that those whose duty it is to recite the breviary may acquit themselves of it with so much more pious attention and spiritual profit, and while grasping better the meaning of the words, they may be more penetrated with the heavenly maxims and holy affections that are contained in the psalms. Oh, how great is the merit of a single Office recited with devotion!

EXPLANATION OF DIFFICULT VERSES ACCORDING TO THE VULGATE

But now in regard to obscure passages, I must acknowledge that when I undertook this work it seemed to me to offer no difficulty, considering that I had taken care to supply myself with a large number of excellent commentators. I had made a mistake; for when I set to work it appeared to me extremely difficult and most laborious: often, in fact, I saw myself stopped short, being embarrassed and undecided among so many different explanations given by the commentators. Sometimes, having spent whole hours in consulting different authors about a text, I remained more perplexed than ever when I found so many opinions opposed to one another. Finally, not to abandon my undertaking altogether, I resolved not to give all the explanations furnished by interpreters, nor all the questions raised by the learned, but simply to propose the interpretation that should appear to me more generally adopted and most conformable to our Vulgate. This is the rule that I have followed.

THE VULGATE

As to the Vulgate. Xavier Mattei, in his translation of the psalms, a translation into verse which is scientific, and which has caused him much labor, observes that modern critics, especially Protestants, every time that they meet with a version different from that of the Vulgate, eagerly adopt it without examining whether or not it be preferable.

ACTUAL INFERIORITY OF THE HEBREW TEXT

There is no doubt that the Hebrew text, being the original text, deserves, when considered by itself, to be preferred to all the versions; but the learned generally agree in saying that the original Hebrew is no longer perfectly exact. Indeed, Salmeron, Morinus, and others teach that the Jews have altered it out of hatred to Christianity; many, with Bellarmine, think that many errors crept in through ignorance, or by the negligence of copyists. It should especially be remarked, that after the fifth century the Jewish doctors, called Masorites,[13035] have added to the Hebrew text signs that one never had seen, that is, points that should have taken the place of vowels, and that became the occasion of numerous equivocations and discordant interpretations.

SUPERIORITY AND AUTHENTICITY OF THE VULGATE

The Council of Trent, therefore, did not wish to do for the Hebrew text what it did for the Latin text of the Vulgate; for the latter it has declared to be authentic by presenting it as exempt from all error, at least in what concerns the dogmas of faith and moral precepts. Hence, in his dissertation on the transmission and preservation of the holy Scriptures, Xavier Mattei concludes that, there being given no matter what Hebrew passage or text, and the Vulgate not agreeing with it, one should keep to the Vulgate: "Not," he adds, "that this version is more authentic than the Hebrew text, but because it may be believed, on the one hand, that the passage in question is no longer to be found in the Hebrew as it was there primitively; and on the other hand, that this primitive text is found exactly reproduced in the Vulgate—the only version that has merited to be approved by the Church."

INSUFFICIENCY OF ALL OTHER VERSIONS

Moreover, let every one be persuaded that there are in many psalms many verses so obscure, that notwithstanding all the care that one bestows upon them, one will never understand their meaning without the special assistance of God.

PRACTICAL AIM OF THIS WORK

Some, no doubt, will say to me that it is useless to explain the psalms after so many illustrious interpreters have done so. I declare, however, that it has not been useless as far as I myself am concerned; since, in consequence of this work, I recite my breviary with much more attention than formerly when there were many passages that I did not understand; I hope that the same may happen to many other persons. In order, therefore, to aid as much as possible those who must recite the Office, I have resolved to follow, not the order of the psalms, but that of the breviary.

III. THE AUTHOR OF THE PSALMS

There at first present themselves certain preliminary questions which sacred interpreters discuss among themselves; namely, the authorship of the psalms; to which of three texts—Hebrew, Greek, Latin—one should give the preference; the titles of the psalms; their composition,—that is to say, whether they were composed in verse or in prose. On all these controverted points I only wish to set forth in a few words the opinions most generally received, leaving to the reader the task of further continuing his studies in order to find out the truth so far as it may be ascertainable.

DAVID THE PRINCIPAL AUTHOR OF THE PSALMS

That the holy king David is the author at least of a great part of the psalms, one cannot deny; for the Bible shows us the Levites occupied in the Temple chanting the psalms, of which David is declared the author: And the priests stood in their offices: and the Levites with the instruments of music of the Lord, which king David made to praise the Lord; because His mercy endureth forever, singing the hymns of David by their ministry. [13036] Several Fathers of the Church, as St. Augustine,[13037] St. John Chrysostom, Theodoret,[13038] and others, recognized David as the sole author of the whole psalter; but St. Hilary,[13039] St. Athanasius,[13040] St. Isidore of Pelusium, etc., are of opinion that many of the psalms have another origin, particularly those that bear in their titles the names of different personages, such as Asaph, Idithun, Ethan, etc. "We ascribe these inspired hymns," says St. Jerome, "to the authors whose names appear in the titles."[13041] It is true, St. Augustine and Theodoret give us these different names as the names of the singers, and not as those of the authors. But St. Jerome, maintaining his opinion, replies: "We know that it is an error to look upon David as the author of the whole psalter, to the exclusion of the persons mentioned in the titles."[13042] St. Augustine himself, explaining the title of the first of the psalms, does not hesitate to say that "not all are David's."[13043] Hence we may rightly conclude with Dom Calmet[13044] and most of the interpreters, that David composed not all but the greater number of the psalms.

ALL THE PSALMS ARE INSPIRED

"Moreover," says Theodoret, with much wisdom, "what advantage can it be to me to know the different authors? for it is certain that all have written under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost."[13045] St. Gregory the Great expresses beautifully the same thought: "Since we regard the Holy Ghost as the author of the psalms, to ask then what hand has written them, is it not the same as asking when reading a letter what pen has been used in writing it?"[13046] Indeed, we read these inspired pages and we know that all are divine; what does it then matter what pen has formed the letters?

IV. THE SUPERIORITY OF THE VULGATE

It is certainly with the Hebrew text, as being the original text, that all the versions of the psalms should be made to agree.

THE HEBREW TEXT VERY MUCH ALTERED

But as we have already said, this rule is actually no longer sure, for the Hebrew text, as it exists at the present day, is full of faults, due to the negligence of copyists or to the incorrectness of printers; add to this that the Rabbinists have invented those vowel points that have caused so many ambiguities and even errors. Hence it follows: (1) That among the interpreters some understand the Hebrew text in one way, others in another way; (2) that, according to the remark of several commentators, one arrives at the true sense of the psalms much less by the aid of the original text than by the aid of the translations, and particularly of the version of the Septuagint, which is regarded as the most exact; for it was made before the alterations were effected in the Hebrew text.

TWO OLD LATIN TRANSLATIONS OF THE PSALMS

However, the Latin version of the Vulgate, called Itala by St. Augustine[13047] and Vetus by St. Gregory, is on the whole the best of all, notwithstanding its unadorned style; this we learn from the fact that it has generally been used in the primitive Church, after St. Jerome had corrected it according to the Septuagint version. It is well to remark that St. Jerome afterwards undertook another translation of the psalms, for which he used only the Hebrew text; but this second version, as Estius remarks,[13048] was not received by the faithful, and much less by the religious, who did not feel disposed to give up their ancient psalmody. Hence it has been the practice of reciting the ancient psalmody, corrected by St. Jerome.

THE VULGATE ALONE DECLARED TO BE AUTHENTIC

As regards ourselves, the question is decided; for the Council of Trent, having declared the Vulgate exempt from every substantial error, we regard it as the safest version. The Council says: "If any one receive not, as sacred and canonical, the said books entire with all their parts, as they have been used to be read in the Catholic Church, and as they are contained in the old Latin Vulgate edition, . . . and knowingly and deliberately contemn them, let him be anathema."[13049] This decree adds: "The holy Synod ordains and declares, that the said old and Vulgate edition, which, by the lengthened usage of so many ages, has been approved of in the Church, be in public lectures held as authentic; and that no one is to dare or presume to reject it under any pretext whatever."[13050]

THE VULGATE AGREES WITH THE SEPTUAGINT VERSION

Hence in this translation we shall for the most part adhere to the Vulgate; and that because in the first place this version, exempt, as we know it to be, from every substantial error, offers us the surest text; then, because it oftenest agrees with the Septuagint version, the authors of which labored on the Hebrew text long before the alterations to which it was afterwards subjected. Another consideration, no less powerful, is the end that I propose to myself, and of which I have spoken above, namely, to explain the sacred canticles as clearly as possible for the benefit of those that recite the divine Office.

AGREEMENT OF THE BREVIARY WITH THE VULGATE

Now, as Urban VIII. declares in his Bull Divinam psalmodiam, placed at the beginning of the breviary, there is but little difference between the psalms such as we recite them and the psalms such as are found in the Vulgate. I shall therefore usually follow the letter of the psalter such as is found in the breviary, without, however, renouncing the right of employing in other passages certain expressions in which it is not easy to understand the meaning either from the letter itself or from the context.

V. THE TITLES OF THE PSALMS

INSOLVABLE DIFFICULTIES ON THE SUBJECT OF TITLES

This question of titles is so confused that the interpreters, in spite of all their explanations, have not been able, it seems to me, to solve it. In fact, among these titles, many of them are very old; as for the others, they have been added it is not known by whom—some before and even long after the collection of Esdras; we also find in the Septuagint and in the Vulgate certain titles that one should seek in vain in the Hebrew text. Besides, it is unknown whether the names expressed in the titles designate the authors or only the singers of the psalms.

For these reasons I shall not undertake to explain these different titles; only I shall give at the head of each psalm a short summary of what it contains.

VI. THE COMPOSITION OF THE PSALMS

The learned discuss the question whether David and the other inspired authors wrote the psalms in verse or in prose.

Joseph Scaliger, in his "Notes on the Chronicle of Eusebius," thinks that the psalms were not written in verse, but in prose; although one finds in them, he adds, all the ornateness of poetry. Dom Calmet expresses the same opinion.

THE PSALMS COMPOSED IN VERSE

St. Jerome,[13051] and after him nearly all the learned, hold, on the contrary, that the psalms were composed in verse.

IMPOSSIBILITY OF DETERMINING THE METRE

As for determining the kind of verses and for stating precisely whether they are prosodical or syllabical, with or without rhyme,—this is what no one has ever been able nor will be able to do, since the character of the metre in use among the Hebrews is unknown, their language having become entirely strange to us. We are also ignorant of the Hebrew pronunciation; for of old Hebrew was written without vowels, the number of which, owing to the vowel points introduced by the Rabbinists, went on increasing or diminishing according as the new punctuation increased or diminished the number of syllables. According to Xavier Mattei, the Hebrews wrote their poetic works in verses of free rhythm, without restricting themselves to any determined number of syllables, and without caring for artificial connections, the verses nearly resembling the choruses of the Greek tragedies.

Having said thus much about these preliminary questions, I pass to the explanation of the psalms. Nevertheless, before entering upon this matter I wish, for the benefit of those persons who are obliged to say the breviary, to offer a few more reflections which may help them much to recite it well, that is, with attention and devotion.

VII. THE RECITATION OF THE OFFICE

THE GREAT IMPORTANCE OF THE DIVINE OFFICE AS REGARDS THE FAITHFUL

To praise God, to thank him for his benefits, to ask of him the graces necessary to eternal salvation—this is what should be here below the only occupation of all men. But because seculars are absorbed by worldly occupations, the Church wishes that not only ecclesiastics, but that religious of both sexes should consecrate at least certain hours of the day to praising God, and praying to him for all the faithful as well as for the welfare of Christian society. Hence when the clerics, personifying in some way the whole Christian people, present themselves before God in order to recite the divine Office, it is a prayer truly universal that they offer before the throne of the Divinity. "There is no doubt," says St. Thomas of Aquin, "that the prayer is universal which the ministers of the Church offer to God in the name of the people."[13052]

The same holy Doctor thus shows us that in the divine Office there is a public function, imposed upon clerics for the preservation and increase of the Church. He says: Since to the chant of the hymns and the psalms the divine Office is celebrated, there is accomplished in the Church of God a public ministry, organized for the good of all."[13053] St. Bernard had already said that upon ecclesiastics is chiefly incumbent a triple charge: to preach the word of God, to give good example, and to pray for all. "There are three obligations that remain to us: preaching, good example, prayer; and the latter surpasses the other two;"[13054] this he adds, in order to exalt prayer above eloquence and the most beautiful examples of virtue.

THE DIVINE OFFICE SPECIALLY IMPORTANT TO PRIESTS

We thence understand what terrible punishments God reserves for those who, obliged to recite the Office, abstain from saying it either through wearisomeness or in order to give themselves to worldly amusements. But let us leave these persons who are struck with blindness, and let us speak of those who recite the Office in a careless manner. What a pity to see how certain priests recite the breviary in the streets, at some window, their eyes fixed on those passing by, or in the society of friends, with whom they laugh and jest, thus intermingling the divine praises with worldly and improper conversation, without paying any attention to the sacred words. If any one of them, when admitted to the presence of a great personage of this world, dared to speak to him in this way, he would certainly be driven away and punished. Alas! some priests have the audacity to treat God as if their mission was not to honor but to dishonor him.

WHAT TREASURES OF GRACE ONE FINDS IN THE OFFICE

On the other hand, when one recites the Office with attention, what merit and what profit does one derive from it. What lights are then obtained from the divine words! With what holy maxims is the soul penetrated! How many acts of love, of confidence, of humility, of contrition, may one not make by merely paying attention to the verses that one recites! Above all, what beautiful prayers are found in each psalm! There is no doubt that, when recited with faith and fervor, they merit treasures of grace, according to the infallible promise made by our Lord that he would hear whoever prays to him: Ask, and it shall be given you.[13055] For every one that asketh, receiveth.[13056]

WHAT HAPPINESS IS ENJOYED IN RECITING THE OFFICE

I add that the Office, recited without devotion and with the only thought of finishing it as soon as possible, becomes one of the heaviest burdens and at the same time is so tedious as to seem to be of an interminable length; on the contrary, when it is recited with devotion, with a true desire of profiting by it, by applying mind and heart to the sacred words, its burden becomes light and sweet: of this all the saints have had experience. The saints found more pleasure in reciting the Office than worldlings find in the midst of pastimes and amusements. One single Office recited with devotion may gain for us many degrees of glory in heaven. What treasures of merit will not they, then, amass after they have recited the breviary for thirty or forty years with the required devotion and piety!

This is what has inspired me with the difficult undertaking of translating the psalms. May those who by the duty of their state are bound to recite the breviary, recite it with merit and profit to their souls! May they, while escaping the misfortune of reciting the breviary badly, be spared the pain of having one day to render a terrible account before the tribunal of God and then to expiate the innumerable faults that they have committed!

INVITATORY.—PSALM 94 OF THE PSALTER

Several corrections were made in this psalm by St. Jerome; but the Church, not having introduced them into the invitatory of the Office, it follows that we recite it in the breviary as it was recited according to the ancient version.

St. Paul declares (Heb. 3:7, and 4:7) that in this psalm everything directly refers to Jesus Christ; and since we understand this psalm as proclaiming God, the Creator, and at the same time the Saviour of the world, it is to him as to our supreme Pastor that the Holy Ghost exhorts us to address our praises, and to hearken to him.

1. [94:1] "Præoccupemus faciem ejus in confessione." Before the rising of the sun, let us be found in the presence of the Saviour, to praise him and to confess to him our faults. St. Augustine says: "Est confessio laudantis, confessio gementis.—There is the confession of him who praises, and the confession of him who mourns."

2. [94:3] "Omnes deos—All the false gods and all the kings of the earth." "Altitudines montium—Earthly powers," according to St. Augustine; that is to say: The Lord regards alike the powerful of the world and the poor whom the world despises; for all are in his power; therefore he does not reject any of his people.

4. [94:8] "Sicut in exacerbatione . . ." It must here be remarked that this passage is in the Office, as it was anciently read in the psalm; but it was afterwards corrected, as it is now in the psalter, where we read: "Sicut in irritatione, secundum diem tentationis in deserto, ubi tentaverunt me patres vestri; probaverunt me, et viderunt opera mea." This version, with which the English translation agrees, better explains the text, of which the sense is as follows: It is God who here speaks to the Hebrews, and he says to them: Harden not your hearts, as you did formerly when you provoked me to anger in the wilderness, where your fathers wished to tempt me, to see whether I was the true God, when in that barren and utterly destitute place they sought for water, bread, and flesh; they found by experience at the sight of my wonderful works that I can do all things according to my own pleasure.[13057]

5. [94:10] "Proximus." Instead of this word, we read in the corrected version, or the psalter, Offensus; and St. Paul says, Infensus (Heb. 3:10). But it is the same thing, as Du Hamel and Bellarmine remark, if Proximus is put for Proximus ad ulciscendum.—"Semper hi errant corde; ipsi vero non cognoverunt vias meas." They have always a perverse heart; they do not wish to know my righteous judgments.—"Requiem meam." My rest, that is to say, the land that I promised them.[13058]

PSALMS OF THE FIRST NOCTURN

PSALM 1 OF THE OFFICE AND OF THE PSALTER

The object that David proposes to himself in this psalm is to convince us that God bestows happiness only upon the just in order to be happy; we must, therefore, begin to be just.

1. [1:1] "In cathedra pestilentiæ non sedit." That is to say: Who does not teach false and pernicious doctrines.—Instead of the word Pestilentiæ, St. Jerome has Derisorum, which according to the proper Hebrew signification means scoffers, or impostors who teach falsehood. The Septuagint have understood the same expression in the sense of pests, or chair of pestilence. These renderings, however, come to much the same sense; for the impious, such as atheists and heretics, are, as is explained by St. Athanasius, St. Augustine, St. Basil, the pest of the world by the false and pernicious doctrines that they teach.[13059]

2. [1:2] The just man wills what God ordains in his law; hence he continually meditates on it.

4. [1:3] This tree will always preserve its leaves, which will help to ripen the fruit; thus will all the works of the just man prosper.[13060]

5. [1:4] "Pulvis." Pagnini translates the Hebrew word by Gluma: chaff, light straw or husks that are separated from the seed by threshing, winnowing, etc.

6. [1:5] "Non resurgent." That is, according to the Hebrew text: Non stabunt, non subsistent—they shall not stand, shall not keep their ground; and according to the Chaldee version: Non justificabuntur—they shall not be justified (Bossuet). This means that the wicked at the last judgment will not be able to oppose the just vengeance of Jesus Christ.—St. Augustine explains this verse by saying that the wicked will not rise again to be judged because they are already condemned to punishment—Non resurgent ut judicentur, quia jam pœnis destinati sunt. We should, however, here remark that the expression Non resurgent does not mean that the wicked will not rise on the day of judgment; since we read in St. Matthew (25:31–4) that all men, just and sinners, must then rise; and this St. Paul expresses still more clearly in this passage: "We shall all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ—Omnes enim stabimus ante tribunal Christi" (Rom. 14:10). Moreover, the Apostle himself explains to us how we are to understand the expression, "Non resurgent" of the psalm, when he elsewhere says: "We shall all indeed rise again; but we shall not all be changed—Omnes quidem resurgemus, sed non omnes immutabimur" (1 Cor. 15:51). He wishes thereby to say that all men will rise again, but all will not obtain the happiness of having a spiritual and heavenly body, such as the just will receive, according to what he had written just before in verses 44–49: "It is sown a natural body, it shall rise a spiritual body. . . . Therefore, as we have borne the image of the earthy, let us also bear the image of the heavenly—Seminatur corpus animale, surget corpus spirituale. . . . Igitur, sicut portavimus imaginem terreni, portemus et imaginem cœlestis." The words Non resurgent, thus understood, agree well with the Hebrew text and with the Chaldee version, so that the verses "The wicked shall not rise again in judgment, nor sinners in the council of the just," may easily be explained in this sense: that the wicked, as the dust or fine chaff or light straw which the wind carries away, will be separated from the just, who are the good grain, according to what we read in the Gospel: "Gather up first the cockle . . . to burn, but the wheat gather ye into my barn. The angels shall go out and shall separate the wicked from among the just—Colligite primum zizania . . . ad comburendum; triticum autem congregate in horreum meum. Exibunt Angeli, et separabunt malos de medio justorum (Matt. 13:30, 49).

7. [1:6] Novit. That is to say, approves and blesses. Peribit, shall end in ruin.[13061]

PSALM 2 OF THE FIRST NOCTURN

This psalm taken in its literal sense is entirely a prophecy of the reign of Jesus Christ, as the Apostles themselves teach us in the fourth chapter of the Acts: "Domine, . . . qui, Spiritu Sancto, per os patris nostri David, pueri tui, dixisti: Quare fremuerunt gentes, et populi meditati sunt inania? Astiterunt reges terræ, et principes convenerunt in unum, adversus Dominum, et adversus Christum ejus . . . Lord, who by the Holy Ghost, by the mouth of our father David, thy servant, hath said: Why did the Gentiles rage, and the people meditate vain things: The kings of the earth stood up, and the princes assembled together against the Lord, and against His Christ" (Acts, 4:24). They then continue to speak of the conspiracies that were formed against Jesus Christ by Herod and Pilate in union with the Gentiles and the Jews. In fact, certain Protestant interpreters, and even some Catholic commentators, wish that this psalm should be understood, in a literal sense, of the reign of David. But D. Xavier Mattei wisely observes that this is a novel opinion, prevailing among Protestants, and worthy of our condemnation, since we should hold to the interpretation given by holy Scripture in the Acts of the Apostles; the more so since to apply this psalm to David we must do too great violence to the text, the expression of which so clearly refers to the reign of Jesus Christ. To which Xavier Mattei, conformably to the principles laid down in the preface of his work, adds that sometimes holy Scripture has for its literal sense only the spiritual sense, without supporting any other hidden sense. Consequently, he says, when according to the interpretation of the Apostles this psalm offers so evident a prophecy of the reign of Jesus Christ, what reason is there to apply it to the reign of David? "What rashness," says St. Jerome, "to look for the sense of this psalm after St. Peter himself has given it to us! what boldness to dare to contradict what he says in the Acts of the Apostles!—Audacia est hunc psalmum interpretari velle post Petrum; imo de eo sentire aliud quam in Actibus apostolorum dixerit Petrus." Bellarmine also says: "To seek in this psalm a literal sense applicable to David appears to me to be the height of error—Omnino errare videntur qui ad litteram de Davide hunc psalmum explicare nituntur."

1. [2:1] This verse predicts that it will be in vain that so many enemies conspire against the Messias. St. Jerome translates the words Frenuerunt and Meditati sunt in the future tense; but Bellarmine rightly says that here the version of the Vulgate, which agrees with the Septuagint, should be preferred; for in the Acts of the Apostles, as we have seen, the two verbs are in the past tense. The words "Meditati sunt inania—they have devised vain things," are used, because these enemies while endeavoring to destroy the kingdom of Christ only cooperated in its establishment.

2. [2:2] "Reges . . . et principes." By these kings and princes are meant not only Herod, Pilate, and the chief priests of the Jews, but also all the emperors and all the kings of the Gentiles who have persecuted the Church of Jesus Christ. 'Adversus Dominum, et adversus Christum ejus." The prophet intimates thereby that the enemies in persecuting Christ have also made war against God; for the Messias, by his miracles had proved that he was the Son of God. As to the first word of the verse, "Astiterunt," according to the sense of the Hebrew text, it is properly to be understood of the counsel that the Jews took among themselves to compass the arrest and the death of Jesus Christ.

3. [2:3] David makes the enemies of God and of Christ speak here. They say: Let us free ourselves from their rule and their laws. "Jugum." Instead of jugum ipsorum—their yoke, St. Jerome has laqueos corum—their enares. The wicked hate the laws of God; they regard them only as a yoke, and as insupportable chains.

4. [2:4] David announces that God will dissipate and confound all the plots of his enemies, and will turn their designs to ridicule. This was accomplished by the destruction of idolatry, the dispersion of the Jews, and the conversion of the Gentiles to the faith.

5. [2:5] God spoke to the wicked, and confounded them, not by words, but by the terrible punishments that he inflicted on them. "In ira sua, et in furore suo." We here observe that God never does anything in anger, as men do when they act through passion and with trouble of mind; for the Lord disposes and does everything with moderation and in tranquillity. "Thou judgest with tranquillity—Cum tranquillitate judicas" (Wisd. 12:18). Hence, when one reads in Scripture that God becomes angry, we are to understand that he chastises sinners, not to conduct them to eternal salvation, as he often does in regard to some whom he chastises in order to bring them to repentance, but only that he is chastising them solely to punish them, and to give free course to his justice.

6. [2:6] "Ego autem constitutus sum Rex ab eo super Sion, montem sanctum ejus." Here it is Jesus Christ that speaks; he will say to them: I have been made king, not by men, but by God, my Father, over his holy mountain of Sion; that is to say, over his Church, which, as St. Augustine says, was prefigured by the city of Jerusalem, of which Mount Sion was the principal part, and most beloved by God. "Prædicans præceptum ejus." This means: I have been appointed king that I might publish his commandment. According to the Hebrew we here read: Narrabo ad decretum—I will declare for a decree. Substantially, the words Præceptum and Decretum signify the same thing; namely, the decree whereby God established the kingdom of Jesus Christ to be propagated throughout the world. The terms of the decree are as follows (see verse 7):

7. [2:7] "Filius meus es tu, ego hodic genui te." The literal sense of this word of the eternal Father, in the mind of the Holy Ghost, is threefold, as Cardinal Bellarmine and Menochius well remark. The first sense is that of the eternal generation of Jesus Christ as the Word and the eternal Son of God, according to what St. Paul writes: "Being made so much better than the angels, as he hath inherited a more excellent name than they. For to which of the angels hath he said at any time: Thou art My Son, to-day have I begotten Thee?—Tanto melior Angelis effectus, quanto differentius præ illis nomen hereditavit cum enim dixit aliquando Angelorum: Filius meus es tu, ego hodie genui te?" (Heb. 1:4.) Hence St. Augustine rightly says that this passage is to be understood literally of the eternal generation by which the Word was from all eternity begotten by the Father, in contradistinction to the angels who are the ministers of God created in time. We read the words: Hodie genui te—To-day have I begotten Thee; "Hodie"—To-day, because eternity is an actual duration, without beginning and without end, as St. Augustine well explains, speaking of this psalm: "In eternity nothing is either past or future, but only the present; because whatever is eternal, always is.—In æternitate, nec præteritum quidquam est, nec futurum, sed præsens tantum; quia, quidquid æternum est, semper est." Bossuet (Suppl. in Ps. 2:7) says that it would be difficult to find in the psalms a passage in which Jesus Christ is more expressly affirmed to be the true Son of God. The second literal sense refers to the resurrection of Jesus Christ, according to what we read in the Acts of the Apostles: "And we declare unto you that the promise which was made to our fathers, this same God hath fulfilled to our children, raising up Jesus again, as in the sacred psalm also is written: Thou art My Son, this day have I begotten Thee.—Et nos vobis annuntiamus cam quæ ad patres nostros repromissio facta est: Quoniam hanc Deus adimplevit filiis nostros, resuscitans Jesum, sicut et in Psalmo secundo scriptum est: Filius meus es tu, ego hodie genui te" (Act. 13:32, 33). The resurrection is, in fact, a certain regeneration, according to what we read in St. Matthew: "In the regeneration, when the Son of Man shall sit, etc.—In regeneratione cum sederit Filius hominis," etc. (Matt. 19:28). The third sense, also literal, has reference to the temporal generation of Jesus Christ according to the flesh. Such is the opinion of St. Cyprian (Testim. adv. Jud.1. 2. c. 8), and of St. Fulgentius (Contra Arian. resp. 3); this is well confirmed by these words of the Apostle: "So Christ also did not glorify himself that he might be made a high-priest: but he that said unto him: Thou art My Son, this day have I begotten Thee.—Sic et Christus non semetipsum clarificavit, ut Pontifex fieret; sed qui locutus est ad eum: Filius meus es tu, ego hodie genui te" (Heb. 5:5). In the Introit of the first Mass of Christmas the Church applies the quoted words of this psalm to the mystery of the day. We here add that the holy Fathers understand these words of Isaias: "Who shall declare his generation? —Generationem ejus quis enarrabit? (Is. 53:8), as referring not only to the divine generation, but also to the human generation of Jesus Christ.

8. [2:8] The eternal Father continues: Since Thou art my Son by nature, it is just that Thou shouldst have dominion over all the nations and over the whole earth, as Thy inheritance and possession.—St. Augustine understands this of the spiritual power that Jesus Christ has over the Church, which through his merits was to be spread through the entire world, according to what our Saviour has himself said: "All power is given to me in heaven and on earth—Data est mihi omnis potestas in cœlo et in terra" (Matt. 28:18).

9. [2:9] This is understood of the power that Jesus Christ has to reward the good and to punish the wicked as easily as the potter can break with a rod of iron his vessels of clay. The rod of iron signifies, moreover, the righteous and inflexible justice of Jesus Christ, which no one can resist.

10. [2:10] That is to say: You, then, who are kings, and as such exercise the office of judges on earth, understand what is your duty, and learn to perform it well.[13062]

11. [2:11] "Exsultate ei cum tremore." St. Augustine thus comments on these words: "In rejoicing, that we give thanks; in trembling, lest we fall.—In exsultatione, ut gratias agamus, in tremore, ne cadamus" (In Ps. 1n. 4). By the word Timore, according to the Hebrew, we understand the piety of the children towards their father; that is to say, that filial love with which kings and judges should serve God. The verse may therefore be thus explained: Serve the Lord with filial fear and with joy, hoping for reward if you observe justice, and fearing punishment if you do not observe it.

12. [2:13] This verse signifies: Accept lovingly the law of God, and observe it, lest he be angry with you if you do not observe it, and lest he permit you to stray from the path of justice.

13. [2:13] Unhappy those that wound justice and that are the cause why God becomes angry with them and hastens to punish them. Happy, on the contrary, are those that trust in God, because he will give them light and strength which they will need in order not to stray from the right path.

PSALM 3 OF THE FIRST NOCTURN

This psalm has for its title: Psalmus David[13063] cum fugeret a facie Absalonis filii sui—David flying before his son Absalom. It was therefore to David fleeing from the persecutions of the unfortunate Absalom that is commonly applied the literal sense of this psalm. But in the mystical sense, according to St. Jerome, St. Augustine, Bede, Theodoret, and others, David here represents Jesus Christ considered in his Passion and in his resurrection. We would here once more remark on the subject of the enemies from whom the royal prophet endured persecution, that all the psalms when they speak literally are to be understood mystically of all the internal and external enemies, especially of our most powerful and most dangerous enemies,—I mean the devils who are plotting against our eternal salvation.

2. [3:2] They tell me that there is no salvation for me, although I trust in my God.

"Ipsi . . . Ejus." According to the Greek, these pronouns are masculine. Striking features of resemblance: David is betrayed by Achitophel, who ends by hanging himself (2 Kings, 17:23); Jesus Christ is betrayed by Judas, who ends in the same way. David is persecuted by his own people; Jesus hears the Jews crying out to Pilate: "Away with him, away with him, crucify him. . . . We have no king but Cæsar.— Tolle, crucifige eum. . . . Non habemus regem, nisi Cæsarem" (John, 19:15). David hears these words: "There is no salvation for him in his God.—Non est salus ipsi in Deo ejus." Jesus hears these other words: "He trusteth in God; let him now deliver him if he will have him.—Confidit in Deo; liberet nunc, si vult eum" (Matt., 27:43).

3. [3:3] "Gloria mea, et exaltans caput meum." That is to say: "Thou art the cause of my glory; it is Thou that consolest me: I walked with my head bowed down under the weight of sorrows, and Thou hast now enabled me to lift it up again with joy.

4. [3:4] "De monte sancto suo." That is, from his high heaven.

5. [3:5] This verse means: In the midst of persecution I took a tranquil and sweet repose; then I awoke and arose without disquietude, seeing that the Lord had taken me under his protection.—These are words that mystically apply to Jesus Christ when he wished to be stretched on the cross and there give up his life, and then wished to rise again from the dead by the power of his divinity.

7. [3:7] "Percussisti omnes adversantes mihi sine causa." According to the Hebrew, we translate: Percussisti omnes hostes meos in maxilla. The Septuagint, however, have: Sine causa. Bellarmine thinks that the Septuagint have been able to translate thus, because the Hebrew text, which they used, was more correct than that which we have.

8. [3:8] "Domini est salus." According to the Hebrew, it is Domino salus. That is, salvation should be referred to God, and it is only from him that we should hope for it. Salvation is the blessing that the Lord gives to his servants; for to bless on the part of God means to do good.

PSALM 6 OF THE PSALTER

According to the most probable opinion of the learned, this psalm, taken in the literal sense, properly refers to the penitence of David. Hence it is, conclusively, the prayer of the sinner who fears the blows of the divine justice, and who strives to become reconciled with his God. It is the first of the Penitential Psalms.

1. [6:2] This verse signifies: O Lord, punish me if Thou wilt, but not in Thy anger; that is to say: Chastise me as a father and not as a judge. Not to be punished here on earth after I have offended Thee would be to me the greatest punishment. I beg Thee, then, to punish me here below, in order that I may amend, and may avoid eternal death.—(See what is said on this point in Ps. 2:5.)

2. [6:3] "Infirmus sum; sana me, Domine, quoniam conturbata sunt ossa mea." Have pity on me, O Lord! I am full of infirmities; heal me by strengthening me with Thy grace; for my very bones are troubled, that is, are trembling with weakness.

3. [6:4] That is to say: My soul also is troubled, and much more so than my body; how long wilt Thou delay to come to my assistance?

4. [6:5] "Eripe animam meam." Deliver my soul from the many miseries and perils that surround it. "Salvum me fac propter misericordiam tuam." Save me through Thy pure mercy; for I deserve nothing but punishment and hell itself.

5. [6:6] "In morte." In eternal death.

7. [6:8] I have conceived great indignation against myself when considering the deformity of my sins, and when seeing myself growing old in the midst of my enemies, which are my vices and my bad habits.[13064]

8. [6:9] "Qui operamini iniquitatem." Perverse enemies, who would also pervert me.

PSALM 7 OF THE PSALTER

Addressing himself to God, David represents to him his innocence and at the same time the anguish of his heart; this was at the time of the persecution that he had to endure from Saul or from Absalom—more probably from Saul. The holy king exhorts at the same time his enemies to be converted, and predicts to them the chastisement of heaven if they are not converted.[13065]

2. [7:3] "Animam meam." My soul, or my life.

3. [7:4] "Si feci istud." If I have done the wrong that is laid to my charge. This may mean that the enemies of David accused him of having wished to usurp the throne of Saul.

5. [7:6] "Conculcet in terra vitam meam." May he trample with his feet the earth stained with my blood in the place where he will take away my life.[13066]

6. [7:7] This verse means: But if I am innocent, O Lord! show forth Thy just anger by punishing my enemies as they deserve. We should not here reproach David with having asked to be revenged upon his enemies; for we must understand him either as speaking in a prophetic manner, announcing the chastisements with which God would punish them, or as praying to God to send them temporal punishment that they may amend themselves.

7. [7:7] "In præcepto quod mandasti." That is to say: My God, arise in order to save innocence, according to the precept that Thou hast given to men to defend the innocent. "Synagoga populorum." According to the Hebrew, Congregatio tribuum: The congregation of the tribes. That is to say: And then all the people shall gather around Thee, to praise the justice of Thy judgments.

8. [7:8] "Dominus judicat populos." It belongs to Thee, as the Lord of the universe, to judge the people.

10. [7:10] The astuteness of sinners shall not avail them; for Thou who art God, and who knowest the secrets of their hearts, well knowest how to direct the just man, so that he may escape their snares.

11. [7:11] The Lord will not fail to give me his just help; for he saves those that act with an upright heart.

12. [7:12] "Justus, fortis, et patiens; numquid irascitur per singulos dies?" It must be here observed that the Hebrew presents another sense, namely, Justus et fortis, et comminans (irascens) tota die. Hence, according to the present Hebrew text, we read that God threatens or is angry every day; in the Vulgate, on the contrary, it is said that God does not threaten and is not angry every day. The version of the Septuagint[13067] agrees with the Vulgate, and with Bellarmine I prefer to adhere to it for the reason already given, namely, that it is believed that the Hebrew text of the time of the Septuagint was more correct than that which we now have; the more so since, as Bellarmine remarks, the sense as given in the Vulgate agrees better with the following verse.

13. [7:13] This verse, united with the preceding one, signifies that God is not always angry and in the mind of punishing sinners as they deserve; but when they are obstinate and will not be converted, he will draw his sword and will punish them according to his justice; for this reason he always holds in readiness and has bent his bow to let fly the arrow of his just vengeance.

14. [7:14] "Vasa mortis." That is to say: The weapons that bring death.[13068] "Sagittas suas ardentibus effecit." By this is meant thunderbolts; such is precisely the explanation given by St. Jerome: Sagittas suas ad comburendum ignitas effecit: He hath set his arrows on fire to burn.

15. [7:15] "Concepit dolorem, et peperit iniquitatem." The sinner first conceives grief in his heart, that is, hatred against the just man, called grief, because it afflicts the soul of him who cherishes it; then he gives birth to iniquity by seeking to oppress the person whom he hates (Job, 15:35; Is. 59:4).

16. [7:16] He has opened and dug a precipice, or a covered trap; but God has permitted that he should himself fall into it.

17. [7:17] The evil that he wished to cause others shall descend upon himself.

18. [7:18] Conclusion: As for myself, I will praise the justice of the Lord.

PSALM 8 OF THE PSALTER

This psalm is a canticle composed in praise of the power, wisdom, and goodness of God, and especially of his goodness towards man. The multitude of the benefits received from God is therefore the subject of this psalm. Thus it is commonly understood by commentators. Nevertheless there are some who, on the authority of a passage of St. Paul (Heb. 2:9), apply it not without probability to the person of Jesus Christ.

2. [8:2] "Super cælos." Above the heavens, since the whole world cannot contain it.

3. [8:2] "Inimicum et ultorem." Satan Thy principal enemy, and the avenger of all Thy enemies. Some explain this verse, not according to the Vulgate, which has followed the Septuagint, but according to the Hebrew text, which instead of Perfecisti laudem—Thou hast perfected praise—signifies: Fundasti fortitudinem—Thou hast ordained strength. But be this as it may, we have translated it as is to be seen above: Even the very infants at the breast praise Thee perfectly, and confound Thy enemies. We must not depart from this interpretation, which is conformable to the Vulgate; for Jesus Christ himself rendered it authentic when after his entry into Jerusalem the children were heard to cry out: Hosanna Filio David—Hosanna to the Son of David! When the Pharisees murmured at this praise offered to our Lord, he said to them: "Nunquam legistis, quia: Ex ore infantium et lactentium perfecisti laudem?—Yea, have you never read: Out of the mouth of infants and of sucklings thou hast perfected praise?" (Matt. 21:16.) We do not read the words: Fundasti fortitudinem—Thou hast ordained strength. Xavier Mattei justly observes that in all the passages of the psalter, or of any other book of the Old Testament, which are cited in the New Testament according to the version of the Septuagint, this version should be regarded as true and incontestable; and that if the Hebrew text differs from it, it should be corrected according to the Septuagint version. He adds that it is temerity to interpret such passages in a sense different from that given to them in the New Testament, excepting only certain passages that the Church has otherwise explained according to the Hebrew text, and that are susceptible of divers literal interpretations.

4, 5. [8:4, 5] That is to say: When I consider the marvels that Thou hast wrought in favor of man, how can I refrain from praising Thee and from crying out: What is man, for whom Thou hast so great mindfulness, and whom Thou dost favor with Thy visit? This agrees with what is said in the Canticle of Zachary: "Benedictus Dominus Deus Israel, quia visitavit, et fecit redemptionem plebis suæ—Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, because he hath visited and wrought the redemption of his people." The Son of God comes himself to visit man, to take human flesh, and to redeem him from the slavery of the devil.

6–7–8. [8:6–9] Although Thou hast given to man a nature little less than that of the angels, Thou hast nevertheless subjected to him all other creatures.[13069]

9. [8:10] Repetition of the first verse for the conclusion.

PSALM 9 OF THE PSALTER

Among the interpreters there are some that see in this psalm, when taken in the literal sense, David thanking God for having given him the victory over his enemy; and when taken in the spiritual sense, Jesus Christ accomplishing the work of the Redemption, and thus subduing the devil, the great enemy of the human race. Others, whose opinion does not lack probability, regard this psalm as the portrait of the unhappy end of the wicked, who have lived in prosperity, and of the glorious end of the just, who have been living in tribulation.

3. [9:4] "Infirmabuntur." My principal enemy having been conquered, all those that follow him will be weakened and thrown into consternation.

6. [9:7] "Inimici." This word, as Menochius and Mattei observe, is in the genitive; hence the phrase is thus construed: Frameæ inimici defecerunt in finem—The arms of the enemy have entirely failed.

7. [9:7] "Cum sonitu." According to Bossuet: Cum ingente rerum gestarum fama—With the mighty fame of their deeds.

8. [9:8] "In judicio." According to the Hebrew: Ad judicium.

10. [9:11] Therefore they that know and adore Thy name have great reason to trust in Thee, O Lord! because Thou hast never forsaken those that seek Thee in truth.

11. [9:12] Praise the Lord who dwells in Sion, where he is adored as true God, differently from the idols that are found in the temples of the Gentiles; publish his works even among the most barbarous nations, that they too may praise him.

12. [9:13] In examining the unjust deeds of men, he remembered the blood of the poor and their lamentations.

13. [9:14] Here David turns to God in prayer.

14. [9:15] "De portis mortis." The perils of death. "Filiæ Sion." That is to say, Jerusalem.[13070]

15. [9:16] I will rejoice in the salvation that Thou hast given me, since my enemies have fallen into the abyss of death, which they had prepared for me. "In interitu." According to the Hebrew, In fovea, to which the word Infixa corresponds; and this signifies, according to Menochius: They are fallen into the mire, from which it is very difficult further to extricate themselves.

16. [9:16] "Quem absconderunt." Which they had secretly laid to catch me.

17. [9:17] The Lord shall make himself known as the great God that he is, by exercising his just vengeance upon his enemies, and causing the sinner to be caught in the same toils that his hands had laid for others.

18. [9:18] Malvenda thus interprets this passage: "Convertantur in infernum; quasi dicat: Male peribunt—They shall be turned into hell; as if he said: They shall perish miserably.' According to Menochius by the word Infernum we must understand hell, properly so called, the place destined for the punishment of the wicked: "Non enim sepulchrum tantum significatur hoc loco, nomine Inferni, sed etiam pœnarum locus—By the word hell, in this passage, not only is meant the grave, but also the place of punishment." This is also the opinion of Gordona. Hence this is the sense of the verse: Those that forget God during their life, will make a bad death, and will be sent to hell.

19. [9:19] "Non peribit in finem" The patience of the poor shall not utterly perish; that is, shall not always remain without recompense.

20. [9:20] O Lord! show Thy power; let not sinful man prevail; let the nations be judged before Thee according to their merit.

21. [9:21] Give them a legislator who by the severity of his punishments will curb and subdue them, that so they may know that they are men, that is, weak and mortal, obliged to obey Thee.[13071]

22. [9:22] "Despicis in opportunitatibus." Why dost Thou appear to despise me, by not consoling me when I needed Thy help? (See verse 9.)

23. [9:23] The proud man boasts in vain of his prosperity, and the poor man complains in vain of his misery.

25. [9:25] The wicked man has irritated God, and he should become reconciled to God; but blinded by an excess of anger or of pride he will not seek to appease him.

26. [9:26] "Inquinatæ sunt viæ illius in omni tempore." All the actions of his life are always stained with sin.

27. [9:26] He no longer thinks, O Lord! of Thy judgments, that is, of Thy precepts, nor of the punishments with which Thou threatenest him; therefore he seeks to lord it over, that is, to oppress his enemies.

28. [9:27] "Sine malo." St. Jerome translates: Ero sine malo—I shall be without evil.

29. [9:28] "Sub lingua ejus labor et dolor." His tongue serves only to bring sorrow and distress upon others.[13072]

31. [9:30] "Quasi leo in spelunca sua." As a lion that lies in ambush in his cave, to seize and devour those that are passing by.

32. [9:30] "Oblitus est Deus." God does not care for the things here below; after having created them, he forgets them.

35. [9:33] "Exaltetur manus tua." Let Thy power be exalted against the wicked.

36. [9:34] "Non requiret." God does not care for human things; he does not trouble himself about them.

37. [9:35] Thou seest, O Lord! and Thou dost look upon the sufferings of the poor; and when the time comes Thou wilt cause the wicked to fall into Thy hands to punish them.

38. [9:35] "Orphano." Those that are destitute of all help.

39. [9:36] "Brachium." Power. "Quæretur peccatum illius, et non invenietur." According to St. Augustine: Judicabitur de peccato suo, et ipse peribit propter peccatum suum—He shall be judged for his sin, and he shall be lost on account of his sin. This interpretation seems to agree with what is said in the following verse: Peribitis, gentes, de terra illius—Ye Gentiles shall perish from his land. Hence the sinner shall be judged according to his iniquity, and he shall no longer be found, because he will be forever lost.

41. [9:38] God will always hear the desire of the just who are afflicted; he will even hearken to the preparation of their heart; that is, the interior disposition that precedes their prayers.

42. [9:39] "Ut non apponat ultra magnificare se homo super terram." In order that men on earth may not continue to exalt themselves, that is to say, may not grow proud by exalting themselves against Thee and against their neighbor.

PSALM 10 OF THE PSALTER

In this psalm the just are exhorted to place confidence in God during the time of persecution.

1. [10:2] This is a difficult verse; it is thus explained: In the Lord I put my trust; why, then, dost thou come to me[13073] and say: Fly to the mountain as a sparrow, to escape the vexations that afflict thee in the place in which thou art? This language is that of the just man who rejects the suggestions of the devil. When the sparrows fear to be taken in the nets of the fowlers, they flee to the mountains, which are the places more safe for them; but the just man, who trusts in God, seeks no change of place; for he knows that there are everywhere temptations of the enemy, and that everywhere God helps him who trusts in him.

2. [10:3] "In obscuro." In the darkness of the night, according to the Greek version, to signify that it is difficult to guard against such attacks.

3. [10:4] O Lord! says the psalmist, the wicked have destroyed the laws that Thou hast made, by persecuting the just who have given them no cause for doing so.

5. [10:5] From the height of the heavens, where the Lord sits as a sovereign judge, his eyes look upon the poor man, and see all things; so that the Lord knows all that passes, as if he were interrogating men. Such is the explanation of Menochius: Ac si interroganti, quid actum sit, responderent—Just as if they were answering him when asking them what was done.[13074]

6. [10:6] The Lord puts questions, that is to say, he knows the just man to reward him, and he knows the wicked man to punish him; hence, says the psalmist, he that loves iniquity hates himself, because he draws down upon himself the divine vengeance.

7. [10:7] The Lord will shower down upon sinners in this life snares by which they shall be involved in greater sins;[13075] and in the next life he will rain upon them fire, sulphur, and storms; that is, most painful torments, which will be the portion of their chalice, or their inheritance, their eternal punishment; such shall be the fruit of their sins.

8. [10:8] "Æquitatem vidit vultus ejus." He considers the merit of each one, in order to punish the wicked and reward the just according to justice.

PSALM 11 OF THE PSALTER

The confidence that we should have in the mercy of God and the fear that we should always have of his justice form the twofold subject of this psalm.

1. [11:2] "Defecit sanctus." Men, even those that are reputed holy, have failed in keeping Thy precepts. "Diminutæ sunt veritates a filiis hominum." They are found to be liars.

2. [11:3] One seeks to deceive one's neighbor by telling him vain things that are nothing but knavish tricks; one speaks with a double heart when one thinks one thing and means another.[13076]

3. [11:4] Prophetic imprecation: the psalmist threatens with divine vengeance these deceivers and these proud men who boast of merits that they do not possess.

4. [11:5] "Linguam nostram magnificabimus." We will make ourselves esteemed by causing our tongues to prevail. This accords with the Hebrew, which is thus translated: Linguæ nostræ vires addemus—We will strengthen our tongue. "Labia nostra a nobis sunt"—We have our own mouth with which to defend ourselves. "Quis noster dominus est?"—Who is the master that will prevent us from speaking?

6. [11:6] I will put the just into a place of safety; this I will do freely; no one will be able to resist me.

7. [11:7] The words and the promises of the Lord are pure and sincere, free from all falsehood and all deceit; they are as silver tried by the fire in a crucible, and refined seven times, so that it is entirely purified from the earth or dross. "Probatum terræ." St. Jerome translates this: Separatum a terra.

8. [11:8] Thou wilt always preserve us from this race of proud and deceitful men.

9. [11:9] The wicked surround the just that they may oppress them; and Thou, according to the depth of Thy judgments, permittest the wicked to increase in numbers, and to delight in the good things of this world.

PSALM 12 OF THE PSALTER

Prayer that the just man addresses to God when he is tempted and afflicted by his enemies.

2. [12:2] How long shall I remain agitated and sorrowful, taking counsel with myself, to find out the means of delivering myself from my enemies?

3. [12:4] "Respice, et exaudi me." Look down upon my affliction, and hearken to my prayers.

4. [12:4] "Ne unquam obdormiam in morte." That I may never consent to temptations, which would bring death to the soul.

5. [12:6] "In misericordia tua speravi." I have placed all my trust in Thy mercy; Thou wilt not permit me to fall beneath their attack.

6. [12:6] I will rejoice, because I have been saved by Thy help, and I will not cease to thank Thee for having assisted me.

PSALM 13 OF THE PSALTER

The prophet deplores the blindness and the corruption of the wicked, and especially of infidels.[13077]

1. [13:1] "Insipiens." The fool; since the infidel who denies God is not only impious, but is also bereft of reason, for the existence of God is evident for every one that has the use of reason.—"In corde suo." He says this in his heart, because he does not dare to say it to others, lest he should be laughed at as a fool.

2. [13:1] "Corrupti sunt." The wicked say that there is no God; because they are corrupt, first in their will, and then in their understanding.—"In studiis suis." In following their passions.

3. [13:2] The Lord has looked upon these unfortunate men to see whether any one of them knows God, and seeks him to love and obey him.

5. [13:3] "Sepulchrum patens." An open sepulchre, which, filled with corruption, exhales an infectious odor.—"Venenum aspidum sub labiis eorum." They seem to keep beneath their tongue the venom of asps, to defame and outrage others.

7. [13:3] Miserable that they are! their whole life is but affliction and sadness, because they did not wish to know the way to find peace, which consists in having before one's eyes the fear of God.[13078]

9. [13:5] Their obstinacy arises from their unwillingness to call upon the Lord for help, so that he may give them his holy fear. They fear to lose the divine grace, which brings with it every good.

11. [13:7] But say the wicked: Who will come from Sion to save Israel?—But know that the Lord shall deliver his people from bondage, and its joy shall be great.

PSALM 14 OF THE PSALTER

This psalm presents the portrait of a worthy minister of the altar, and at the same time that of the predestined soul, who also will have the happiness of being admitted for all eternity into the heavenly country.

7. [14:5] "Non movebitur in æternum." He shall surely dwell in heaven forever and ever.

PSALMS OF THE SECOND NOCTURN

PSALM 15 OF THE PSALTER

The subject of this psalm, as St. Peter testifies (Acts, 2:25),[13079] is a prayer addressed to God by our Lord Jesus Christ during the three days that his holy body was lying in the sepulchre.—Resting on the authority of the prince of the apostles, Xavier Mattei and Father Rotigni rightly think that the literal sense and the spiritual sense are one and the same, and that thus the whole psalm directly refers to Jesus Christ raising his voice to his heavenly Father to address to him from the depth of the sepulchre the following prayer:

1. [15:2] "Bonorum meorum non eges." That is to say, that God is the sovereign master of all things.

2. [15:3] According to interpreters, Jesus Christ, who is here speaking, says: God, my Father, wishes that my will should tend in a marvellous manner to benefit the saints that live on earth.

3. [15:4] Jesus Christ continues to speak: Their former infirmities (that is their sins) were numerous; but afterwards healed by my merits, they became holy so that they were able to hasten to God.

4. [15:4] "Non congregabo conventicula eorum de sanguinibus." St. Jerome translates this after this manner: Non libabo libamina eorum de sanguine—Their libations of blood I will not offer. That is to say: I will never approve of the assemblies that they before held in the state of their infirmity, to celebrate sacrifices of blood.

5. [15:5] "Pars . . . calicis mei." In olden times those that presided at a banquet assigned to each guest the portion of wine that was due to him. —"Restitues hereditatem meam mihi." Jesus Christ says these words to God his Father, when speaking of his resurrection.

6. [15:6] It must here be observed that in ancient times the fields were measured with cords, and the part that fell to the lot of each in an inheritance.

7. [15:7] I will bless the Lord, who has given me the understanding to choose himself for my inheritance; and all the affections of my heart (renes mei) have excited me to suffer for him with patience all tribulations, even death itself (usque ad noctem).

8. [15:8] "Ne commovear." That I may not be shaken in my desire and in the hope that I have placed in him.

9. [15:9] "Caro mea requiescet in spe." My body, separated from my soul, shall rest in hope of the resurrection and of the glory that the Lord has prepared for me.

10. [15:10] Thou, O Lord! wilt not allow my soul to remain long in limbo, nor wilt Thou suffer my body, which is holy, to undergo corruption in the tomb.

11. [15:11] "Vias vitæ." The ways of life, that is to say, of resurrection, which I know is soon to restore life to my body.—"Delectationes in dextera tua usque in finem" Thou wilt make me enjoy Thy glory, by placing me at Thy right hand for all eternity.

PSALM 16 OF THE PSALTER

The just man prays to God to be delivered from the persecutions to which he sees himself exposed.[13080]

1. [16:1] Show favor to my innocence by hearing me; lend me a gracious ear.

2. [16:1] Hear my petitions that I lay before Thee, not in words of falsehood, but of sincerity.

3. [16:2] I beseech Thee that the judgment of my cause may proceed from Thy mouth, and from no other; regard justice, and judge me according to its laws.

4. [16:3] "Nocte." During the darkness of my desolation. "Igne." By the penetrating fire of tribulation.[13081]

5. [16:4] In order to avoid speaking against my persecutors, I have been attentive to the words of Thee, who commandest me to be silent, and thereby have walked in hard and very toilsome ways. I have had much to suffer.

6. [16:5] Continue to direct me in Thy ways in which Thou wishest that I should walk, so that I may not go astray.

7. [16:6] I have invoked Thee, and Thou hast heard me; cease not to incline Thy ear towards me by hearing all the prayers that I shall address to Thee.

9. [16:8] "Dexteræ tuæ." From those that resist Thy right hand, which defends me. "Ut pupillam oculi." With great care.

10. [16:8] Hide me from the eyes of the wicked who seek to oppress me.[13082]

11. [16:9] "Animam meam circumdederunt." They have surrounded me to take away my life. "Adipem suum concluserunt." St. Jerome translates: Adipe suo concluserunt; Viscera being understood. That is to say, as in the human body fat closes the bowels, so the abundance of riches fills the wicked with pride, and shuts in them the bowels of compassion for others.

12. [16:11] "Oculos suos statuerunt declinare in terram." Miserable men! they are determined not to lift their eyes from the ground to which they keep their hearts attached.

13. [16:12] "In abditis." In secret places to devour those passing by. Father Rotigni observes that this verse is applied to Jesus Christ more easily than to David, who was never taken by his enemies.

14. [16:13] "Animam meam." My life. "Frameam tuam ab inimicis manus tuæ." Take away Thy sword, that is to say, the power to harm, which comes from Thee, from the enemies, that is to say, from those that abuse the gifts of Thy hand.

15. [16:14] "A paucis de terra divide eos in vita eorum." This is a passage which some, such as Bellarmine, Gordona, and Lallemant, explain thus: Separate the multitude of the wicked from the small number of Thy servants who live upon earth. Others, as Bossuet, Tirinus, and Mattei, expound it as follows: Separate, that is to say, detach the wicked during life from that little portion of earthly goods which they possess and which renders them so proud. This last interpretation seems to me to be more probable; for St. Jerome translates the Hebrew: Quoniam Pars in vita—Whose portion is in their life; the meaning of this is, that they found on such things their present happiness; so that St. Jerome, or according to the Hebrew text the expression A paucis, has reference, not to the number of the just, but to the goods that the wicked enjoy in this life. In any case this passage is very obscure. "De absconditis tuis adimpletus est venter eorum." They have their belly or their heart filled with their earthly goods, which they keep hidden, or which they carefully preserve; but in reality all these goods are Thine. This is the explanation also given of these obscure words: De absconditis tuis.

17. [16:15] I hope to appear just in Thy eyes on the day when I am judged, that I may be admitted into heaven, where I shall be satiated by beholding Thy glory.

PSALM 17 OF THE PSALTER

David gives thanks to God for having delivered him from the hands of his enemies, and especially from the hands of Saul. This psalm is applicable to the Christian soul that sees itself delivered, with God's help, from every grave persecution or every temptation of the devil.[13083]

3. [17:3] "Cornu salutis meæ." That is to say, the strength that secures my salvation.[13084]

4. [17:4] Therefore, he wishes to say, I will do nothing but praise and call upon the Lord in all my wants; and while acting thus I am sure that I will always be safe from the hands of my enemies.

5. [17:5] "Torrentes iniquitatis conturbaverunt me." My enemies have filled me with terror, and have rushed upon me like a furious torrent. Instead of Conturbaverunt, St. Jerome translates, according to the Hebrew: Terruerunt—Have terrified.

6. [17:6] I have been frightened by the horrors of the tomb, that is to say, with the sadness which he feels who knows that he must soon be carried to the grave; for the snares that my enemies have laid to deprive me of life, have preoccupied me, or have filled my soul with terror.

9. [17:8] God, incensed against his enemies, manifested his anger by making the earth tremble and shaking the mountains in their very foundations.

10. [17:9] When God is angry there exhales from the gaping earth a terrific smoke, and from the breath of his wrath fire is kindled, with lightnings and thunders, which fall like burning coals.

11. [17:10] When the clouds are near the earth it seems as if the heavens were being lowered and God himself were descending upon these clouds.[13085]

13. [17:12] When the clouds are more charged with water, they become darker and they bring the rain; now, God hides himself therein as in a closed pavilion. Commentators give to this image a mystical sense, thus: The Lord, in this present life, does not make his presence sensible; he hides his majesty as in black clouds laden with dark rain; that is to say, from the depth of this obscurity he showers down graces upon his faithful souls. This may well be understood of souls that have arrived at the prayer of contemplation, and who, the more they are united with God, find themselves all the more involved in obscurity.

14. [17:13] "Carbones ignis." Coals of fire, that is to say, lightnings and thunders.

15. [17:14] The hail, the lightning, and the thunder are the voice of the Lord by which he makes us know that he is the Most High.

17, 18. [17:16] Thus also has God in his anger at times brought to light the hidden sources and the innermost bowels of the earth.

19. [17:17] He has received me into his arms, and has withdrawn me from a multitude of dangers and tribulations which as a deluge were overwhelming me.

20. [17:18] "Confortati sunt super me." St. Jerome translates: Robustiores me erant—They were stronger than I.

21. [17:19] "Prævenerunt me." They sought to take me by surprise.[13086]

23. [17:21] The Lord has rewarded me, and he will reward me according to the uprightness of my heart and the purity of my deeds.

25. [17:23] All his laws are ever before my eyes, and I have never repelled from my heart his just commands.[13087]

26. [17:24] I hope with his help to remain faithful to him.

27. [17:25] The Lord in his goodness will grant me his graces according to the uprightness of my intention, and according to my actions that are free from defect, because they are done in his presence.

28. [17:26] According to the Hebrew, the word "Sanctus"—Holy—signifies here merciful.

29. [17:27] According to the Hebrew, the word "Electus"—Elect—signifies here good. "Cum perverso perverteris." Thou wilt treat the perverse man as his perversity deserves.

30. [17:28] "Oculos superborum." The text is thus expressed, because it is especially by their eyes that the proud show their pride.

31. [17:29] "Lucernam meam." My lamp, that is to say, my mind, which without Thee would ever be deprived of light. "Illumina tenebras meas." Enlighten my darkness by the light of Thy truth.

32. [17:30] "Transgrediar murum." I shall leap over the walls, that is to say, I shall overcome the difficulties that I shall have to meet in Thy service.

33. [17:31] The path that God teaches me to keep is free from every defect or from every difficulty; his promises are tried by fire, that is to say, they are sincere and true.

34. [17:32] "Quis Deus." The translation from the Hebrew gives: Quis Deus . . . Quis petra; . . . this signifies: Where shall we find a support so firm as that which we have in our God?

35. [17:33] "Posuit immaculatam viam meam." He has given me the strength to pass my days free from all stain of sin.

36. [17:34] He has perfected my feet by rendering them swift like those of the hart; and he has placed me on the tops of the mountains, in order to withdraw me from the hands of my enemies.

40. [17:37] "Non sunt infirmata vestigia mea." St. Jerome's rendering is: Non deficient tali mei, that is, My ankles have not failed.

41, 42. [17:38, 39] This means: I have said, O Lord! relying on Thy help: I will pursue, etc.

47, 48. [17:44, 45] These verses and those that follow are properly applicable to our divine Redeemer. "Populus quem non cognovi." The Gentiles.

49. [17:46] My natural subjects, whom I called my children, are alienated from me, and have deceived me by pretending to serve me; they have become strangers to me, and are grown old, by becoming (according to the Hebrew text) like dry withered leaves; they have turned aside from the straight paths that they trod before.—This may well be understood of Jesus Christ speaking of the Jewish people, who had become unfaithful to him.

50. [17:47] "Exaltetur Dens salutis meæ." May God be ever exalted, he who is the whole hope of my salvation.

53. [17:49] Here it is evidently Jesus Christ who is speaking of his victories over the world and the devil.

54. [17:51] We must here remark that Jesus Christ is called David by Ezeckiel and by the other prophets; and therefore the psalmist concludes by thanking the heavenly Father for all the graces bestowed upon his Son, and upon all the faithful that are his followers.

PSALMS OF THE THIRD NOCTURN

PSALM 18 OF THE PSALTER

In this psalm we hear exalted the perfections of God, the sanctity of his law, and the magnificence of his works. In the spiritual sense it is to Jesus Christ and his Apostles that all these praises apply, according to St. Augustine, Bellarmine, Rotigni, Malvenda, Tirinus, and Gordona.

1. [18:2] The heavens, by the prodigious works that we admire therein, make us know God. By the heavens the above-mentioned interpreters understand the Apostles, who by the preaching of the Gospel and by miracles have propagated upon earth the faith in Jesus Christ.

2. [18:3] Each day produces or communicates for the day following and night the succeeding night, the manner of praising God; so that the heavens are unceasingly publishing the glory of the Most High.

3, 4. [18:4, 5] This accords with the command that our Lord gave to his Apostles: Euntes ergo docete omnes gentes—Going, therefore, teach ye all nations (Matt. 28:19). And St. Paul, speaking of the preaching of the New Law by the ministry of the Apostles, says: Numquid non audierunt? Et quidem in omnem terram exivit sonus eorum, et in fines orbis terræ verba eorum—Have they not heard? Yea, verily: their sound hath gone forth into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the whole world (Rom. 10:18).

5. [18:6] "In sole posuit tabernaculum suum." The Lord has placed his pavilion in the sun, as being the principal part of the heavens. This explanation which Bellarmine gives does not please Mattei; he prefers the sense of the Hebrew text, namely: Soli posuit tentorium in eis—He has set in them a pavilion for the sun. But Bellarmine observes that the version of the Septuagint, which the Vulgate has followed, says, as above, that God has set his pavilion in the sun; now we should here prefer the interpretation of the Septuagint, because we may reasonably believe that at that time the Hebrew text was more correct than it is at the present day.

8. [18:8][13088] The law of the Lord is beautiful, without a defect, so that it converts souls or withdraws them from evil and from error. It is his testimony, that is to say, it makes us know his will; it is faithful in its promises, and it renders wise the little ones, that is to say, those that are docile and those that willingly submit to his precepts.

9. [18:9] "Justitiæ Domini." The commandments of God. "Illuminans oculos." This law is full of a heavenly light, which enlightens the mind: the mind is the eye of the soul.

10. [18:10] "Timor Domini sanctus, permanens in sæculum sæculi." The divine law, which teaches holy fear, is permanent as to the eternal reward that it promises to him who observes it. "Judicia." The precepts.

11. [18:11] The divine precepts are more agreeable to virtuous souls than anything in this world.

13. [18:13] "Delicta, quis intelligit?" What man is there that knows all the sins, or, according to the translation of St. Jerome, all the errors into which we are exposed to fall, so as to be able to avoid them? "Ab alienis parce servo tuo." Do not permit Thy servant to associate with those that have strange, that is, bad manners. St. Jerome translates: A superbis quoque libera Servum tuum—From the proud deliver Thy servant.

14. [18:14] If I do not let my sins[13089] get the mastery over me, then I shall be free from every fault, and pure especially from grievous sins.

15. [18:15] My word, or my prayers will be agreeable to Thee as well as my meditations, which I shall ever make in Thy presence.

16. [18:15] It is Thou that aidest me in need and deliverest me in danger.

PSALM 19 OF THE PSALTER

This psalm is a prayer which the people address to God for the success of the arms of David. But Bellarmine and Rotigni think that this psalm and the two following psalms, that is, the 20 and the 21 of the psalter, refer to the victories of Jesus Christ over the devil and the persecutors of the Church.

3. [19:4] "Holocaustum tuum pingue fiat." May thy holocaust be agreeable to the Lord, as are the sacrifices of fat animals (Dan. 3:40).

5. [19:6] "Salutari tuo." Thy safety and thy victory. "Magnificabimur." Expression conformable to the Septuagint version. According to present Hebrew version, we would have: Vexillum attolemus: We shall lift up our banner. That is to say: We shall celebrate the victory that saves and exalts us by proclaiming the glory of the Lord, to whom it is due.

6. [19:7] "Christum suum." His Christ, or the King whom he hath anointed with his grace.

7. [19:7] "In potentatibus salus dexteræ ejus." St. Jerome's translation is: In fortitudinibus salutis dexteræ ejus.

8. [19:8] Our enemies put their trust in terrestrial goods and means; but we will invoke the name of our God, who gives victory to those that trust in him.

9. [19:9] "Obligati sunt." That is to say, according to the Septuagint version: Colligati sunt, quasi compedibus—They are tied down by earthly affections, as by so many fetters.

PSALM 20 OF THE PSALTER

Hymn of thanksgiving which the people address to God for the victories granted to the arms of David. According to Bellarmine, this psalm is understood in the spiritual sense of the victory which Jesus Christ gained through the merits of his Passion over sin and over hell.

1. [20:2] "Super salutare tuum." On account of the salvation that he has received from Thee.

2. [20:3] "Voluntate labiorum ejus non fraudasti eum." Thou hast not failed to hear his prayers.[13090]

6. [20:7] "Dabis eum in benedictionem." According to the Hebrew: Pones eum benedictiones—Thou hast set him to be blessings. These words can be verified only in Jesus Christ, the eternal source of blessings, which all receive through him.[13091]

8. [20:9] "Inveniatur manus tua omnibus inimicis tuis." According to the Hebrew: Inveniet manus tua omnes inimicos tuos—Thy hand shall find all Thy enemies.

9. [20:10] "In tempore vultus tui." When Thy angry face shall make them see Thy just wrath.

11. [20:12] Most justly wilt Thou deal with them, since they have endeavored to heap evils upon Thee by the many outrages that they have done Thee.

12. [20:13] This verse is very obscure, and has given rise to different interpretations. Theodoret and Euthymius explain it thus: "Pones eos dorsum." Thou shalt put them to flight by making them turn their back. "In reliquiis tuis." That is, in their posterity. "Præparabis vultum." Thou wilt show Thy angry face. Bellarmine explains it thus: "Pone eos dorsum"—Thou shalt make them as though they were nothing but back, a part of the body exposed to the scourger. "In reliquiis tuis præparabis vultum eorum." You will cause that their sight, for their greater punishment, be fixed in considering Thy elect, who are the remnant reserved and saved by Thee. Mattei, Menochius, Bossuet, and Tirinus take this whole verse all in one sense, and explain it thus: Thou wilt discharge Thy arrows so thick in their face that they will be forced to turn and take to flight. Let the reader choose whichever of these explanations he pleases; the last, however, agrees best with the Hebrew text, according to which, instead of the words "In reliquiis tuis," it is In nervis; signifying the string of the bow on which the arrow is placed.[13092]

PSALM 26 OF THE PSALTER

David persecuted by Saul and surrounded by every kind of peril shows no less courage by the confidence that he has in the divine protection; he sighs at the same time after the sight of the Tabernacle. He is a figure of the just man who in the midst of the enemies of his salvation longs to leave this world, and to enter into the heavenly kingdom.

3, 4. [26:2] My enemies advance against me like ferocious beasts, to devour my body; but those that ill-treat me I have seen weakened and cast down.[13093]

8. [26:4] When visiting the Temple of the Lord, I may taste the sweetness that he communicates to those that love him.

10. [26:6] He has placed me as upon a high rock, so that now I hold my head above my enemies; that is to say, I have overcome them.[13094]

11. [26:6] "Circuivi, et immolavi." In the Hebrew this is in the future, which agrees better with the rest of the verse. The sense, therefore, is: United with the priests, I will go around the altar, and will offer.

12. [26:6] "Vocem meam, qua clamavi ad te." The urgent prayer that I have addressed to Thee.

13. [26:7] In the past, my heart, or my desire, which is well known to Thee, has already told Thee that my eyes have sought Thee; for the future, I will try to be always in Thy presence, to obey Thee and to love Thee.

14. [26:9] "In ira." In wrath, as a punishment for my sins.

17. [26:11][13095]Teach me, O God! to walk according to Thy law, and guide me in the right path that leads to Thee, in order that I may not fall into the hands of my enemies.

18. [26:12] "Mentita est iniquitas sibi." Their iniquity has lied, that is, has been injurious to themselves.

19. [26:13] I hope to enjoy in the land of the living—that is, in the kingdom of the blessed, where death has no access—the good things that the Lord has prepared for those that love him.

20. [26:14] "Sustine Dominum." Expect the help of the Lord; he will never fail Thee.

PSALM 27 OF THE PSALTER

David, in the midst of persecutions, implores the help of God, and foretells his triumph.[13096] There is not one among the faithful who cannot apply this psalm to himself in view of the temptations and perils of which his life here upon earth is so full.

1. [27:1] "Ad te, Domine, clamabo." O Lord! I will not cease to cry to Thee to obtain help. "Ne sileas a me." Keep not silence, as if Thou didst not hear my prayers. "Assimilabor descendentibus in lacum." I shall become like those that find themselves shut up in the tomb, whence their voice can no longer be heard.

3. [27:3] "Ne simul trahas me." Do not permit me to fall over precipices.

5. [27:4] "Secundum nequitiam adinventionum ipsorum." According to their malice, which invents artifices to injure others.

6. [27:4] "Redde retributionem eorum ipsis." Cause the evil that they are plotting for others to fall upon themselves.[13097]

7. [27:5] "Non intellexerunt." They did not wish to understand.[13098] Non ædificabis eos." Thou wilt not restore them to their former state.

10. [27:7] Through the help that I have received, my flesh, that is, my weakness, has regained its vigor;[13099] therefore I will always sing with all my heart the praises of my Saviour.

11. [27:8] "Christi sui." Christ, or the anointed of the Lord. David thus calls himself, as having received from God the royal unction.

PSALM 28 OF THE PSALTER

The prophet here invites the people to come to adore God in his Temple.[13100] Under this figure the Gentiles are invited to receive the Gospel, which had to be preached in the midst of persecutions, here represented by the winds, the tempests, and the thunders, which are mentioned in this psalm.

1. [28:1] "Filios arietum." Young rams, to offer them to him in sacrifice.

3. [28:3] The Lord makes his voice heard upon the waters during the storms; in the noise that is then produced by the abundance of the waters, mingled with peals of thunder, he makes the voice of his majesty heard.

4. [28:4] "In virtute." According to the Hebrew: In potentia—In power. The Lord makes his voice known in his power and in his grandeur; for when he wills he makes the earth and the sea tremble.

5. [28:5] "Cedros Libani." That is to say: The loftiest and strongest trees, which it destroys by the violence of the tempests.

6. [28:6] "Comminuet." According to the Hebrew: Saltare faciet—He shall make them leap as a calf that goes bounding over the mountain of Libanon. "Dilectus." The unicorn, when little, is admired for its beauty.

7. [28:7] "Intercidentis flammam." St. Jerome's translation is: Dividens flammas; that is to say, the thunder darts a number of lightning flashes one after the other. "Desertum Cades." A vast desert of Arabia.

8. [28:8] "Præparantis cervos." This means, according to some interpreters, that the thunder so terrifies the deer that parturition is hastened. These authors rest on the Hebrew text, which is thus translated: Vox Domini parere faciens cervas—The voice of the Lord makes hinds bring forth. But I prefer the interpretation of Mattei, who says that the voice of the Lord, or the thunder, so frightens the deer as to drive them from their thickets; and he observes that the Vulgate does not use the word Cervas, but Cervos. "Et revelabit condensa; et in templo ejus omnes dicent gloriam." That is to say, the Lord lays open to daylight the thick forests by shivering and uprooting the trees with his thunderbolts; after which all men will go to render homage to the glory or to the power of the Most High in his Temple.

9. [28:9] God makes the deluge of waters that inundate the earth to dwell, to abide, or last; and he himself, as Lord and eternal King seated upon the clouds, disposes everything for his glory.

10. [28:10] The Lord will give to his people the virtue of trusting in his protection;[13101] and then blessing them he will fill them with peace.

PSALM 29 OF THE PSALTER

Thanksgiving addressed by David to God for having delivered him from a dangerous illness.[13102] This psalm is very suitable to every Christian who, having been assailed by his passions, is in danger of falling into temptations.

1. [29:2] I will praise Thee by giving thanks, because Thou hast taken me under Thy protection, and hast not allowed my enemies to sing victories over me.

3. [29:4] "Eduxisti ab inferno animam meam." Thou hast brought me back from the tomb.[13103]

4. [29:5] "Sancti ejus." You who are his faithful servants. "Memoriæ sanctitatis ejus." That is to say: For his holy memory that he has of you, to do you good.

5. [29:6] The wrath of God, or chastisement, comes from the indignation that he conceives against the sinner on account of his sin, on the other hand, life or salvation comes from the will of God, who in his goodness desires to save man.

6. [29:6] "Demorabitur." Pagnini translates: Pernoctabit. Hence the sense is: Though the Lord cause us to pass the night in sadness, in the morning he will give us joy.[13104]

7. [29:7] Finding myself in an abundance of consolations, I said: I shall never be deprived of my happiness.

8. [29:8] Thou hast wished to give to my glory and to my happiness strength; that is, solidity.

10. [29:9] Nevertheless, O Lord! I will never cease to cry to Thee, who art my God, and to pray to Thee to help me.[13105]

11. [29:10] What fruit couldst thou draw from my blood; that is to say, as St. Augustine explains this verse by applying it to Jesus Christ, from the shedding of my blood, or from my death? But, literally, it is better understood of David himself, who fears that he will not be able after death to do the good that he can do in life, as he explains in the following verse.

12. [29:10] Will, then, dust, or my body reduced to dust after death, be yet able to praise Thee, and to publish the faithfulness of Thy promises?

14. [29:12] "Saccum." Garment of mourning and humiliation.

15. [29:13] "Non compungar." Let not my sadness hinder me any longer from praising Thee. According to the Hebrew: Non taceat. That is to say: Let not my glory cease to praise Thee. "In æternum confitebor tibi." I will never cease to celebrate Thy glories, and I will ever thank Thee for Thy benefits.

PSALM 30 OF THE PSALTER

Forced by his son Absalom to leave Jerusalem, David asks help of God. This psalm is perfectly suited to a Christian who sees himsel assailed by temptations, and who, animated by confidence, asks God for aid and protection.[13106] It must be remarked that our Lord Jesus Christ makes to himself the application of the sixth verse of this psalm: a proof that the persecution of David prefigures that which our Redeemer had to endure at the hands of the Jews.

1. [30:2] "In justitia tua libera me." Deliver me from confusion by Thy justice, according to which Thou punishest the guilty and protectest the innocent.

2. [30:3] Incline Thy ear to my prayers, and hasten to deliver me from the peril in which I find myself.

4. [30:4] Thou art my strength in temptations, and my refuge in persecutions; I hope that for the glory of Thy name Thou wilt lead me safe through all dangers, and provide for me in all my wants.

6. [30:6] Into Thy hands I commit my life, because many other times Thou hast delivered me from death, Thou who art my Lord and my God, ever faithful in Thy promises. Some think that these words, and indeed the whole psalm, are to be understood of Jesus Christ, because before expiring he said on the cross: Pater, in manus tuas commendo spiritum meum. Bellarmine, however, justly observes that our Lord, in dying, might well use these words, but not the following: Redemisti me, Domine, Deus veritatis—Thou hast redeemed me, O Lord God of truth; for Jesus Christ was himself the Redeemer, and not the redeemed.

7. [30:7] "Observantes vanitates, supervacue." St. Jerome translates the passage thus: Custodientes vanitates frustra—Thou dost hate those who keep, that is, who love the vanities, or the false goods of this world; which they do uselessly, supervacue, for they will never find the peace for which they hope.

9. [30:8] Thou hast looked upon my weakness, and Thou hast saved my life from many dangers.

10. [30:9] Thou hast given me a large field, to deliver myself from the enemies that would close the way against me.

11. [30:10] Have pity on me, O Lord! for I see myself troubled by the remembrance of my sins; my eyes, my soul, and my bowels, that is to say, all my powers, exterior and interior, are troubled at the sight of Thy anger, provoked by my infidelity. Such is the explanation given by Bellarmine, who follows St. Augustine.

14. [30:12] "Timor notis meis." My friends are afraid of being known to be my friends.

20. [30:17] "Illustra faciem tuam super servum tuum." Turn Thy gracious eyes upon me. "Non confundar." I hope that I shall not be abandoned by Thee.

21. [30:18] "Erubescant impii, et deducantur in infernum." May confusion fall rather upon the wicked, and may they be buried in eternal oblivion.

22. [30:19] "In abusione." According to the Hebrew and Greek: In contemptu—with contempt.

23. [30:20] "Quam abscondisti." An expression that shows that this treasure is hidden from the wicked, who do not fear God.

25. [30:21] Thou wilt make them enjoy in secret Thy sensible presence, as happens to certain privileged souls. In this secret place they are sure not to be troubled by men of the world, or by human passions.

28. [30:23] "In excessu mentis meæ." According to the Hebrew: In stupore meo—In the excess of my tribulation, which held me stupefied.

30. [30:24] "Veritatem requiret. " According to the Hebrew: Sinceros stueturn—He protects the sincere. The sense of the verse is: All you that serve the Lord, love him; for he will test your innocence, and he will know well how to defend those that love him, as he knows how to punish the proud with terrible torments.

This psalm teaches us what a happy life one leads when, having returned from wicked ways, one does penance; and, on the other hand, what an unhappy life one leads when one persists in remaining in sin.

1. [31:1] "Quorum tecta sunt peccata." Whose sins have been covered, that is to say, blotted out. Protestants use these words, to prove, as they say, that sins, though forgiven by the mercy of God, are not removed from the soul, but are only covered, so that the stain of guilt remains in the soul, and that God always sees this stain; but he remits the penalty due, as if he did not see it. They add that God remits the sin only so far as he does not impute it to the sinner, according to what is said in the following verse: Beatus vir cui non imputavit Dominus peccatum—Blessed is the man to whom the Lord hath not imputed sin. But all this is false; for God, in forgiving sins, does not cover them, but for the merits of Jesus Christ he takes them away from the penitent soul, as holy Scripture says: Dominus quoque transtulit peccatum tuum—The Lord also hath taken away thy sins (2 Kings, 12:13). Ecce Agnus Dei, ecce qui tollit peccatum mundi—Behold the Lamb of God, behold him who taketh away the sins of the world. Moreover, as the Council of Trent has declared, man is justified not only by the remission of sin, but by grace and inherent justice. And if it is said that God does not impute sin, this is, so far as he remits and blots it out, as the same Council also teaches (Sess. 6, de Justif. cap. 7, can. 11).

2. [31:2] "Non imputavit peccatum." Has not imputed his sin, because he has forgiven it him. "Nec est in spiritu ejus dolus." He has sincerely repented of his fault.[13107]

3. [31:3] I did not confess my sin, and this silence made me lament the whole day long, so that my bones have grown old; that is to say, my continual tears have weakened me, as if my bones had become old, or had lost their strength and were broken. St. Jerome's translation is: Attrita sunt ossa mea, in rugitu meo tota die—My bones are bruised so that the whole day I cried out through pain.

4. [31:4] Thou hast afflicted me with justice; and hence when tribulation was piercing me like a sharp thorn, the only course I took was to return to Thee, my God, beseeching Thy mercy. "Configitur." According to the Hebrew: Configitur mihi.

6. [31:5] When I had resolved to confess my injustice, Thou didst at once pardon me my enormous fault.

7. [31:6] "Pro hac." That is to say, according to Bellarmine and Mattei: For this reason. "Omnis sanctus." According to the Chaldee: Omnis pius. That is to say: Every sinner truly penitent, who is holy and pious, because in stripping himself of his impiety he clothes himself with holiness by means of grace. "In tempore opportuno." In this life, when we can obtain forgiveness of our sins before death.

8. [31:6] In the flood of many waters, that is to say, at death and at judgment, when scourges shall fall as a torrent upon the wicked, they shall then no more approach God, because there will then be no longer any pardon for them.[13108]

10. [31:8] Here David makes the Lord speak to the penitent sinner. "Firmabo super te oculos meos." I will continue to look upon thee with a favorable eye, and to protect thee.

11. [31:9] The Lord addresses these words to those that are hardened sinners.

12. [31:9] Restrain, O Lord! those that keep far from Thee, and force them to obey Thee.[13109]

13. [31:10] Many are the chastisements reserved for sinners; but he that hopes in God shall be surrounded by his mercy so that he will not be able to go beyond its reach and be lost.

14. [31:11] "Gloriamini." Let your glory be to serve and to love the Lord.

PSALM 32 OF THE PSALTER

The psalmist exhorts the just to praise the Lord, to fear his judgments, and to confide in his mercy.

3. [32:3] "Bene psallite ei in vociferatione." Bossuet understands the word Psallite in the sense of playing an instrument, and not in that of singing. Hence the phrase signifies: Let your voices be in accord with the sound of instruments.

5. [32:5] He loves mercy and justice; but the earth is filled with mercy rather than justice.

6. [32:6] "Spiritu oris ejus omnis virtus eorum." For "Virtus" St. Jerome translates Ornatus—adornment, by which is meant the stars. The sense, then, is, that God by a breath of his mouth, or by another word, adorned the heavens with stars.

7. [32:7] "Ponens in thesauris abyssos." The Lord holds the abysses, or the waters of the sea, in his treasures; that is to say, in reserve, to dispose of them according to his good pleasure, either for doing good to men or for punishing them.

8. [32:8] "Ab eo autem commoveantur." St. Jerome translates: Ipsum formident—Let them fear him.

9. [32:9] Whatever God said, or wished, was done.

11. [32:11] All the thoughts of his mind, which are hidden to us, shall always have their fulfilment.

12. [32:12] Blessed is the nation that makes God, and not his creatures, its last end.

15. [32:15] It is he that created their hearts, or their souls. "Singillatim." One by one, as Bellarmine, Menochius, and Tirinus explain it. "Intelligit omnia opera eorum." He well understands and penetrates all the motives of their actions.

PSALM 33 OF THE PSALTER

In this psalm the prophet exhorts us constantly to praise the Lord for his tender and continual care of his servants, and for the assistance that he deigns to grant us in all our tribulations.

2. [33:3] "Laudabitur." According to the Hebrew: Gloriabitur. "Audiant mansueti, et lætentur." Let the meek or the devout listen to the account of the benefits which I have received from the Lord, and let them rejoice with me thereat.

4. [33:5] "Exaudivit me." He heard me, by giving me grace to find him.

5. [33:6] "Facies vestræ non confundentur." You shall not be covered with confusion by the refusal of what you ask and hope for.

6. [33:7] "Iste pauper." In proof of which, this man, poor in merit.[13110]

7. [33:8] "Immittet." Se is understood.

8. [33:9] "Gustate." Taste the Lord by applying yourselves to contemplate his goodness. "Videte quoniam suavis est." You will see by experience how sweet he is to him who seeks and tastes him.

9. [33:10] "Timete Dominum, omnes sancti ejus." All ye servants of the Lord, fear him. There is question here of a filial, not of a servile fear.

10. [33:11] The rich ones of this world, though possessing in abundance the good of this earth, suffer hunger and thirst, because they find no peace in them; but those that seek the Lord, even in poverty, are filled with every good.

12. [33:13] That is to say: What is the way to enjoy the true life, true happiness?

14. [33:15] "Inquire pacem, et persequere eam." Seek true peace, and never leave off seeking it.

20. [33:21] The Lord keepeth all the bones of his servants, and not one of them shall be broken; so that at the general resurrection they will all be found whole and sound.

21. [33:22] "Delinquent." According to the Hebrew: Devastabuntur—Shall be laid desolate.

22. [33:23] The Lord shall rescue from every danger the souls of his servants, and he will not permit any of them that trust in him to fail in their duties.

PSALM 34 OF THE PSALTER

This psalm is suitable to the just man who, seeing himself exposed here below to the temptations of the devil and to bad treatment on the part of impious men, seeks help from God.[13111]

1. [34:1] "Judica." Punish as they deserve.

2. [34:2] "Apprehende arma et scutum." Take Thy arms to strike my enemies, and Thy shield to protect me.[13112]

3. [34:3] "Effunde." St. Jerome translates: Evagina—Unsheathe.

4. [34:4] "Quærentes animam meam." Those that seek to take away my life.

6. [34:5] "Angelus Domini." The angel, the minister of the Lord's justice.

7. [34:6] "Fiat via illorum tenebræ et lubricum." That is to say: Let them fall over a precipice. He that walks by night on a slippery path, can hardly avoid meeting with a dangerous fall.

8. [34:7] Without cause on my part they have set their snares, or laid ambush, to take my life, and loaded me with injuries.

9. [34:8] "Laqueus." According to the Hebrew: Calamitas. That is to say: Let there come upon him a calamity which he did not expect. "Captio." According to the Hebrew: Retis—A net.

10. [34:9] "Super salutari suo." In the salvation received from him.[13113]

11. [34:10] "Omnia ossa mea." All parts even of my body, to my very bones.

13. [34:11] "Quæ ignorabam, interrogabant me." They asked me about things of which I was ignorant, in order to find matter for accusation against me.

14. [34:12] "Sterilitatem." According to the Hebrew: Orbitatem—Privation, despoiling. That is to say: They sought to strip me of everything.

16. [34:13] I afflicted myself by fasting, humbling myself before God, as a man who is worthy of this bad treatment, and praying for my persecutors; if my prayer does not benefit them, it will turn at least to my own profit.

17. [34:14] I loved to pray for him who persecuted me, as if he had been my friend and my brother; I suffered for him, weeping and afflicted myself with his miseries, as a mother weeps for the sorrows of her son. Such is the sense of the Hebrew, according to the translation of St. Jerome: Quasi ad amicum, quasi ad fratrem meum, sic ambulabam; quasi lugens mater, tristis incurvabar—As a mother mourning and sad, so did I go my way.

18. [34:15] They, on the contrary, rejoiced at my ills: yet more, they conspired against me; and when I least thought of it, the scourges were gathered together over me.

19. [34:16] They have been scattered by the Lord; yet they have not repented: on the contrary, they have continued to tempt me, now mocking at me in scorn, and now gnashing their teeth at me in rage.

20. [34:17] When wilt Thou look upon me with an eye of pity? Ah! deliver me from the malice of those who, like lions, lie in wait for my life.[13114]

21. [34:18] If Thou art propitious to my prayer, I will give Thee thanks on the solemn days, when the nation is assembled, and there in the presence of a great people I will praise Thy mercy.

22. [34:19] "Annuunt oculis." To deceive me, they pretend to look upon me with a good eye. On these words St. Augustine thus comments: Quid est Annuentes oculis? Pronunciantes vultu, quod in corde non gestant—What is, Winking with the eyes? To express by look what one has not in the heart.

23. [34:20] "In iracundia terræ." According to the anger of an earthly heart. Such is the explanation of Bellarmine and of Bossuet.

24. [34:21] "Viderunt oculi nostri." We have seen what we wished to see.

25. [34:22] "Ne sileas." Punish them.

27. [34:24] "Non supergaudeant mihi." Let my enemies no more rejoice over my misfortunes (see verse 22).

31. [34:27] "Pacem servi ejus." Peace or prosperity of the servant of God. Thus Bellarmine, Malvenda, and others, following St. Jerome, explain the verse.

PSALM 35 OF THE PSALTER

The psalmist here shows how great, on the one hand, is the malice of sinners, and, on the other hand, how great is the mercy of God set forth to convert them. It also at the same time makes known with what goodness our Lord treats the just.

1. [35:2] The wicked man has said in his heart, or has resolved (as is explained by Bellarmine and Mattei), to sin freely; and he acts thus because he has no longer the fear of God before his eyes.

2. [35:3] This is a very difficult verse. St. Augustine explains it thus: In odio, persequente iniquitate sua, dolose egit coram Deo—Out of hatred, pursuing his path of crime, he acts deceitfully before God; words that are applicable to sacrilegious confessions. The Rabbinists explain the Hebrew text thus: The wicked man sins, flattering himself that God does not see and does not abhor his iniquity. But Mattei believes that some words are wanting in the Hebrew text; his opinion is that the psalmist is not speaking here of deceitful hypocrites, but of obstinate sinners; and he explains the verse in this manner: The sinner acts perversely before the eyes of God, so that his iniquity may draw down the divine hatred upon himself. Such is also the explanation given by Bellarmine and Bossuet.

3. [35:4] "Noluit intelligere ut bene ageret." He does not wish to understand what is good, so as not to be obliged to practise it.

4. [35:5] On his bed he premeditates to do evil, and he gives himself to every wicked means; for, far from hating evil, he loves it.[13115]

5. [35:6] That is to say: Thy mercy and Thy fidelity to Thy promises are immense and infinite.

6. [35:7] Thy justice is as great as a mountain, and as a divine mountain that is high beyond our sight; and Thy judgments are to us abysses very obscure and impenetrable.

7. [35:8] "Homines et jumenta salvabis." Bellarmine explains this passage by saying that God wishes to save not only good men, but also those who, by following their sensual appetites, make themselves like brute beasts.

8. [35:8] "In tegmine alarum tuarum." That is to say: Relying on Thy protection and Thy Providence.

9. [35:9] Thou wilt make them participate in the infinite joy that Thou Thyself dost experience.

10. [35:10] "In lumine tuo, videbimus lumen." Illumined by Thy divine light, we shall see Thyself who art the Light by essence.

11. [35:11] "Justitiam tuam." The just reward that Thou hast prepared for each one according to his deserts.

12. [35:12] St. Augustine thus explains this verse: O Lord! suffer not that pride set its foot on me, or gain dominion over me, nor that the hand of the sinner, that is, of the devil or of any of his followers, detach me from Thy service.

13. [35:13] "Ibi." There, in pride. "Expulsi sunt, nec potuerunt stare." They have been driven out of heaven, and it is precisely on account of their pride that they were not able to remain there.

PSALM 36 OF THE PSALTER

The prophet exhorts the just to persevere in the practice of virtue and to confide in the mercy of God, without allowing themselves to be moved by the prosperity which the wicked enjoy in this world.[13116]

1. [36:1] "Neque zelaveris facientes iniquitatem." Do not allow yourself to be moved by zeal, that is to say, by envy of their happiness. Or rather: Be not inflamed against sinners on account of their happiness, as if complaining to God for favoring them as he does.

2. [36:2] They shall wither as the grass that falls under the scythe; they shall fall as the herb deprived of its root.

3. [36:3] "Inhabita terraim, et pasceris in divitiis ejus." Therefore, dwell in the land, and God will feed thee with his delights. Or, as others understand this: Cultivate the land, and thou shalt be abundantly provided with its fruits.

4. [36:4] Make thy happiness to consist in pleasing God; or make the Lord thy delight, and he will satisfy all thy requests, or all thy desires.

5. [36:5] Lay before God all the wants and desires of thy life; put thy trust in him, and he will do all that thou desirest.

6. [36:6] He will even draw forth from the darkness thy innocence as a torch of flame, and he will cause it to shine as the sun at noonday; obey the Lord, and be attentive to pray for his help.

8. [36:8] "Ut maligneris." So as to become wicked like them.

9. [36:9] The wicked shall be exterminated by the hand of God; but those that expect with patience the help of the Lord shall be heirs of the land of promise, which is heaven.

10. [36:10] Wait a little while, and thou wilt see that this sinner, now so puffed up with pride about his goods, shall be no more; thou wilt seek the place or the prosperous state in which he lived, and thou wilt no longer find it.

11. [36:11] On the contrary, the meek, like the humble, shall possess the land which was destined to them for their inheritance and shall enjoy great peace.[13117]

12. [36:12] The sinner will look with contempt on the life of the just man; and he will conceive great hatred for him so as to desire to oppress him.

13. [36:13] "Dies ejus." The day on which he will be punished as he deserves.

16. [36:15] Understood: God grant that, etc.[13118]

17. [36:16] The just man is more content with the little that he possesses than are sinners in the midst of all their wealth.

18. [36:17] For all the power of sinners shall be destroyed; whilst that of the just shall be strengthened by the Lord.

19. [36:18] "Novit Dominus dies immaculatorum." The Lord watches over the days of innocent men, and he approves of their ways.[13119]

20. [36:19] "In tempore malo." In the time of divine vengeance. "In diebus famis saturabuntur." When every one shall ardently desire his eternal salvation, they shall be satiated with joy by the benediction of God.

22. [36:21] "Justus autem miseretur, et tribuet." But the just, who has compassion on the poor, helps them, and will always have means to help them.

23. [36:22] Those that bless God, as St. Augustine understands this, shall be blessed by God, and they shall inherit the land of the living; but those that curse him with blasphemies, shall be cursed and brought to ruin.

24. [36:23] "Viam ejus." His conduct, his ways.

25. [36:24] If the just man happens to stumble, the Lord will not allow him to suffer hurt; for he himself, stretching out his hand, will support him.[13120]

27. [36:26] All day long having compassion on the poor, he helps them, at least by lending to them; and therefore his family shall always see itself blessed by God.

28. [36:27] "Inhabita in sæculum sæculi." That is to say: Thou wilt be always happy.[13121]

31. [36:29] "Terram." The land of the blessed.

32. [36:30] "Os justi meditabitur sapientiam." The words of the just man are always prudent and wise.

34. [36:32] The wicked man sees that the life of the just man is opposed to his own, and through the hatred that he bears him he seeks to do him evil.[13122]

35. [36:33] "Nec damnabit eum, cum judicabitur illi." When he has to judge him, he will not condemn him, however great the calumnies laid to his charge by the wicked.

36. [36:34] Wait, then, for the Lord, and continue to walk in the path by which he has led thee; he will exalt thee in such a manner as to make thee come to possess as thy inheritance the land that thou desirest; and when the wicked shall be lost, thou shalt see the recompense that God shall give to thee according to his promise.

38. [36:36] "Locus ejus." His greatness, of which there remained no more trace than if it had never been.

39. [36:37] "Sunt reliquiæ homini pacifico." St. Jerome translates: The remainder of the life of the meek man shall have true peace, which will accompany him even unto death. Others interpret the passage thus: His virtuous actions, besides his good name, will leave a good example, which after his death will continue to be useful to others and be a consolation which the good man will always enjoy. Both explanations are good.[13123]

40. [36:38] "Reliquiæ impiorum interibunt." The riches and the glory which the wicked thought of perpetrating on earth, all shall perish.

David bewails his sins. This psalm is suitable for every penitent that looks upon his sufferings and his tribulations as just chastisements of his sins, for which he begs pardon from God.

1. [37:2] That is to say: Chastise me as a father, not as a judge; chastise me that I may amend, instead of being lost. See what is said in Psalm 2:5 and Psalm 5:2.

2. [37:3] "Sagittæ tuæ." Thy arrows, Thy chastisements. "Confirmasti super me manum tuam." Justly hast Thou pressed heavily Thy hand upon me, loading me with trials.

3. [37:4] At the sight of Thy anger, I have lost my health of body; and at the sight of my sins, I have lost peace, so that my bones are all trembling.

4. [37:5] My iniquities are so many that they rise even higher than my head; and so grievous, that they weigh me down as a heavy burden.

5. [37:6][13124]"A facie insipientiæ meæ." Because I have neglected to apply a timely remedy.

6. [37:7] "Curvatus sum usque in finem." I have remained utterly bent down towards the earth, so that I am scarcely able to raise my eyes to heaven.

7. [37:8] "Lumbi mei." That is to say: My concupiscence. "Illusionibus." According to the Chaldee: Ardore—A malignant heart.

8. [37:9] I have been so afflicted and cast down, that the groans of my heart to heaven were like to the roarings of a lion.

10. [37:11] My heart, or my will, has continued in trouble, since all strength has left me; and my eyes, that is, my mind, have lost the light, which made me see the truth.

11. [37:12] They have drawn near, not to aid me, but to oppress me.

13. [37:13] "Vanitates." Falsehoods, calumnies, to destroy me.

17. [37:17] I said within myself: Ah! may my enemies not have to rejoice over my ruin, since as my feet began to be unsteady, and they saw me tottering and likely to fall, they said great things at my expense, predicting my final overthrow.[13125]

18. [37:18] Lord, I am prepared to suffer all the evils that Thou mayest send me; for my sorrow, that is to say, my sin which is the object of my sorrow, is ever before my eyes.

19. [37:19] For I know and will always confess my fault; and I will ever think of my sin, that I may satisfy, as far as I can, my offended God, in order to obtain his forgiveness.

20. [37:20] "Confirmati sunt." They continue to arm themselves.

PSALM 38 OF THE PSALTER

David speaks here of the pain that he felt and of the silence that he kept when Semei annoyed him with insults. The royal prophet at the same time exposes the reflections that his sins and the vain cares of men suggested to him. Finally, he represents himself as a pilgrim here on earth, and points out to sinners with what sentiments they should be animated in order to do penance.

1. [38:2] I have resolved within myself that I will watch my ways that is, do my actions well; and therefore I have determined to be attentive not to sin with my tongue.

2. [38:2] I have placed a guard upon my mouth, in order to be silent when some insolent person should provoke me with injurious words.

3. [38:3] "Silui a bonis." I refrained from reproaching my enemies with the good that I had done them.[13126] "Dolor meus renovatus est" I felt my grief renewed in thinking that I had well deserved their injuries by my sins.

4. [38:4] At the remembrance of my faults, confusion penetrated my heart; and in my meditation the heat of my pain was increased.[13127]

5. [38:5] I said: Lord, make me know when Thy anger against me shall have an end; or, as others explain the passage, how near my end is.

6. [38:5] Make known to me the number of my days, that I may know what is wanting to my penitences; or, according to others, how much longer I have to live.

7. [38:6] "Mensurabiles." St. Jerome's translation is: Breves—Short. Measurable, or so short that they are easy to count. "Substantia mea." My life, according to St. Jerome.

8. [38:6] It is indeed true that every man who lives here on earth, with all the honors and riches that he possesses, is but mere vanity.

9. [38:7] Man passes through life like a phantom; that is to say, all the joys that he thinks he finds on earth will turn out to be empty: it is, then, in vain that he should trouble himself about them and that he should seek to procure for himself such goods as will never satisfy the heart.

11. [38:8] "Substantia mea apud te est." All that I have, all my good, subsists in Thee, and depends on Thee, in whom are all my hopes. According to the Hebrew text: Spes mea apud te est—My hope is with Thee.

12. [38:9] "Opprobrium insipienti dedisti me." It is supposed that Semei is here meant, who treated David as a usurper of the throne.

13. [38:10] I did not open my mouth to complain, because it was Thou that did this, or permitted this for my just punishment; I beseech Thee now to remove from me the other scourges that I have deserved.

15. [38:12] Thou makest him waste away his life, as the spider spends itself in forming its fragile web; hence it is in vain that any man should trouble himself to lay up the goods of this world.

18. [38:14] Before, then, I leave this world, where one day I shall be no longer, I beseech Thee to appease Thy just anger against me, that so I may find refreshment and relief.

PSALM 39 OF THE PSALTER

St. Ambrose, St. Jerome, St. Augustine, and Euthymius see in this whole psalm only Jesus Christ and the holy Church, that is, the Head of his mystical body. And, in fact, in his Epistle to the Hebrews (ch. 5:5 et seq.) St. Paul applies to Jesus Christ certain verses of this psalm, which can really not be understood of David without counting several other passages which it would at least be difficult to apply to the holy king. If Jesus Christ addresses himself to his Father with so much humility and gratitude, it is because he speaks according to his humanity; he likewise speaks inasmuch as he is the Head of the predestined, and inasmuch as he has as man assumed our obligations towards God. And it is thus that, charged with our sins and as our established mediator between us and God, he prays, humbles himself, and trembles.

1. [39:2] "Expectans expectavi Dominum."[13128] I have waited a long time for Lord as liberator and redeemer of his people. "Intendit mihi." According to the Hebrew: Inclinavit se ad me—He has inclined himself to me to listen to me.

2. [39:3] "De lacu miseriæ et de luto fœcis." These expressions denote, according to the Hebrew text, as Bellarmine remarks, a deep abyss, without light, filled with filthy mud, in which have fallen and flounder confusedly a miserable multitude; such are those that are plunged into the mire of their carnal appetites.

3. [39:3] "Super petram" That is to say: Upon myself,[13129] who am the foundation-rock of the Church: Petra autem erat Christus—The rock was Christ (1 Cor. 10:4). "Et direxit gressus meos." He placed my feet on a way that is not only solid, but also straight; and he thus guided my steps.

4. [39:4] "Canticum novum, carmen." A new canticle, a canticle of love, of thanksgiving, and of praise; according to the Hebrew, which would be Laudem—Praise, instead of Carmen.

5. [39:4] Many shall see, or shall come to know, the misery of the pit in which they are, and shall have fear or horror of it; they shall then see their deliverer, and shall put their trust in the Lord.

6. [39:5] "Vanitates." Human supports, which are all vain. "Insanias falsas." Earthly goods, from which it is only folly to hope for happiness.

7. [39:6] "Cogitationibus tuis." In the inventions of Thy love which Thou hast conceived and carried into effect for our good.

8. [39:6] "Multiplicati." Bellarmine thinks, according to the Hebrew text, that perhaps an error has here crept in, and that it should be: Multiplicatæ (cogitationes tuæ), or Multiplicata (mirabilia tua)—Thy thoughts or Thy marvels are multiplied. But St. Ambrose, St. Jerome, and St. Augustine say that the verse is to be read as it stands: Multiplicati sunt super numerum; this is to be understood of unbelievers who have been converted to follow Jesus Christ.

9. [39:7] "Sacrificium et oblationem noluisti."[13130] Thou hast refused the sacrifices and the offerings of the Law, which could not avail to purify the consciences. This means that God did not accept those sacrifices as sufficient to expiate for sin and to remove it from the soul; but that he accepted them only as figures of the sacrifice of Jesus Christ. Hence the Redeemer says: Aures autem perfecisti mihi;[13131] this St. Paul thus expresses: Corpus autem aptasti mihi—A body Thou hast fitted to me (Heb. 10:5). We must not deviate from this text of the Apostle, who by it explains that of David; so that it means: Thou hast formed for me a body fitted to suffer and to die.

10. [39:7] "Tunc dixi: Ecce venio." Then—that is, on hearing Thy decree that I should assume human nature and offer myself on the cross as a sacrifice to atone for the sins of men—I said: Behold I come to obey Thee.

11. [39:8] "In capite Libri." According to the Hebrew: In volumine Libri. That is to say: In the volume of the Law. By this St. Ambrose understands the beginning of Genesis, where we read: Quamobrem relinquet homo patron suum et matrem, et adhærebit uxori suæ; et erunt duo in carne una — Wherefore, a man shall leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife, and they shall be two in one flesh (Gen. 2:24). On this passage St. Paul comments thus: Sacramentum hoc magnum est, ego autem dico in Christo et in Ecclesia—This is a great sacrament, but I speak in Christ and in the Church (Eph. 5:32). According to St. Jerome it refers to the Gospel of St. John, which begins with these words: In principio erat Verbum . . . Et Verbum caro factum est—In the beginning was the Word . . . and the Word was made flesh. But Bellarmine thinks that the expression In volumine Libri denotes rather the whole volume of the Bible, which speaks throughout of the Messias who was to come, as say St. John Chrysostom and Theodoret, because Jesus Christ is the end of the Law.[13132]

St. Paul, after having said that God did not accept the ancient sacrifices that were offered for sin, quotes this text: Tunc dixi: Ecce venio, etc.—Then said I: Behold I come, etc. He then adds: Aufert primum, ut sequens statuat. In qua voluntate sanctificati sumus per oblationem corporis Jesu Christi semel—He taketh away the first, that he may establish that which followeth: in the which will we are sanctified by the oblation of the body of Jesus Christ once (Heb. 10:7–10). He thus gives us to understand that by the one sacrifice of the cross, by which Jesus Christ delivered us from sin and sanctified us, all the ancient sacrifices were abolished.

12. [39:10] I have made known Thy just law in a great assembly, that is, to a numerous people; and Thou knowest that I have done so, and that I shall continue to do so by myself till my death, and after death by means of my disciples.

13. [39:11] I have preached publicly to a great multitude of people Thy justice and Thy truth, by which Thou renderest to every one to his works, and I have announced at the same time the salvation that Thou hast promised to him that hopes in Thee. "Non abscondi in corde meo." In contrast with those that keep the truth shut up in their heart, and do not preach it through some human respect.

16. [39:13] "Comprehenderunt me iniquitates meæ." My sins[13133] have laid hold of me to afflict me with remorse, so that I am unable to look at them for horror.

17. [39:13] My heart has abandoned, or failed me from sorrow.

21. [39:16] "Euge, euge." Well done, well done, we have made an end of him.[13134]

22. [39:17] "Salutare tuum." The salutation that they hope from Thee.

23. [39:18] Although I see myself poor and miserable, I console myself with the thought that the Lord takes care of me, that is, of my salvation.

24. [39:18] "Ne tardaveris." Do not delay to help me when Thou seest me in danger.

PSALM 40 OF THE PSALTER

This psalm, like the preceding, refers to the Passion of Jesus Christ; it is so interpreted by St. Ambrose, St. Jerome, St. Augustine, and particularly by St. John Chrysostom, who says that it would be rash to interpret it otherwise; for Jesus Christ himself, as we see in the Gospel of St. John (John, 13:18), cites a verse of this Psalm (the 10th) to signify that the treason of Judas had long before been predicted by the prophet. This psalm speaks also of the mystical Body of Jesus Christ, of the Church.

1. [40:2] Happy is he that devotes himself to the work of helping the poor,[13135] or whoever is in need of assistance; in the evil day, that is, the day of his death, the Lord will deliver him from all his trials.

2. [40:3] "Dominus conservet eum, et vivificet eum."[13136] The Lord will preserve him in the midst of dangers, and will so fortify him that he will come safe out of them. "In animam." According to some Greek copies, as St. Ambrose remarks, it is: In manus. But Bellarmine justly observes that the sense is almost the same, except that the expression In animam, that is, voluntatem, arbitrium—to the will, or good pleasure, is more expressive than In manus—to the power.

3. [40:4] At the time of his last illness the Lord will bring him help in his sufferings: Thou, O good Master, wilt prepare his couch, so that, reduced to extremity, he may find some alleviation.[13137]

4. [40:5] "Sana animam meam, quia peccavi tibi." Heal my soul, which has become sick through the offences that I have committed against Thee.[13138]

6. [40:7] "Vana loquebantur." He feigned a cordial compassion. "Congregavit iniquitatem sibi." He consoled himself by redoubling his wicked hope of seeing me die.[13139]

7. [40:7] He then went out to make others take part in his wickedness.

8. [40:7] "Adversum me cogitabant mala mihi." They united to plot against me, and to wish me all the evil that could befall me.[13140]

9. [40:9] They are confirmed in their design upon my life, saying: Shall then he that dies think to return to life again?

10. [40:10] This verse refers to the treason of Judas, according to what we read in the Gospel of St. John: "Ut adimpleatur Scriptura: Qui manducat mecum panem, levabit contra me calcaneum suum"—That the Scripture may be fulfilled: He that eateth bread with me shall lift up his heel against me (John, 13:18). "Magnificavit super me supplantationem." He has made it his boast to complete my ruin by offering to give me up into the hands of my enemies.

11. [40:11] "Resuscita me; et retribuam eis." Prediction of the resurrection of Jesus Christ: After I shall be dead on the cross, make me rise again; and then, as judge, I shall inflict upon them the punishment that they deserve. The Son of God here prays his Father to raise him up again, because he is praying as a servant; but he was well able for that matter to raise up his body again by his own power, as the Word of the Father and true God equal to his Father. This is what in fact happened, as he himself declared: Potestatem habeo ponendi eam (animam meam), et potestatem habeo iterum sumendi earn—I have power to lay down my life; and I have power to take it up again (John, 10:18).

12. [40:12] "Super me." Over me, on account of my death.

13. [40:13] On account of my innocence, Thou hast defended me from my enemies, and Thou hast placed me in heaven at Thy right hand for all eternity This happened at the Ascension of Jesus Christ.

14. [40:14] "Fiat, fiat." In the Hebrew: Amen, amen. So be it; let all be for his praise and glory.

PSALM 41 OF THE PSALTER

Forced to fly from Saul, David is full of sadness in finding himself far from the Tabernacle; he consoles himself with the hope of seeing it again; at the same time he fosters the desire of enjoying the sight of God in the Temple of Heaven after his exile upon earth. This should be the desire of every Christian living in this world at a distance from his heavenly country. He should desire without ceasing for the moment when he can go to see face to face the God of his love.[13141]

2. [41:3] "Deum fortem." The God Almighty. "Vivum." The living God, very different from the gods of the Gentiles, who are dead gods.

3. [41:4] "Dum dicitur mihi quotidie: Ubi est Deus tuus!" As I hear my enemies continually saying to me in my affliction: Where then is now thy God, in whom thou so much hopest to console thee?

4. [41:5] I remembered these reproaches, and I poured out my soul, that is to say, I emptied or stripped it of all earthly affections, with the sweet thought that I should one day pass from this exile to the admirable tabernacle in which God has established his abode.

5. [41:5] "Sonus epulantis." Then I shall take part in the banquet of the blessed, whose voice resounds with the ceaseless songs of joy and thanksgiving.

7. [41:6] Have confidence in God; for with his help I hope to go one day to heaven, there to celebrate his mercy and say to him: Thou art my God and the salvation of my face, that is to say, my Saviour always present to my eyes: Thou causest my face to see Thy face.[13142]

8. [41:7] "Memor ero tui" To console myself, I will always think of Thee in whatever place I am.

9. [41:8] One abyss of ills invites another, which pours down upon me with a crash. David speaks here of the tribulations or temptations that came upon him like billows raised by a storm with terrific roaring.

10. [41:8] All the waters of the heavens and all the floods of trials with which Thou triest Thy servants, seem to have passed over me.

11. [41:9] In the day time, or at the time of my consolations, the Lord has made me taste of the sweetness of his mercy; but now in this night of tribulations he wills that, resigned to his will, I cease not to sing his praises and to bless him.

12. [41:9] Therefore my prayer to God, the author and the preserver of my life, shall be continual in my heart; I will always say to him: Lord Thou art my protector, do not abandon me.

13. [41:10] "Quare oblitus es mei?" But why dost Thou deal with me as if Thou hadst forgotten me?

15. [41:11] Repetition of verses 3 and 6.

16. [41:12] Repetition of verse 7.

PSALM 43 OF THE PSALTER

What dominates in this psalm is the expression of the sentiments which should animate the just amid the afflictions of the present life. The psalmist, therefore, proposes to us a prayer that we should address to God in the time of tribulation.[13143]

3. [43:3] Thy powerful arm scattered the idolatrous nations that dwelt in the land of promise, and there Thou didst establish our fathers.[13144]

5. [43:4] But all was the work of Thy power, because Thou didst look upon them with a gracious eye, and Thou wast pleased to favor them.

6. [43:5] "Qui mandas salutes Jacob." Thou who providest for the salvation of Jacob, that is to say, of Thy people who descend from Jacob.

7. [43:6] "Inimicos nostros ventilabimus cornu." We shall scatter our enemies.[13145]

12. [43:11] "Avertisti nos retrorsum post inimicos nostros." Thou hast subjected us to our enemies, so that they have made us their prisoners, and we are forced to follow them.

14. [43:13] Thou hast allowed Thy people to be sold for nothing; and there was none among the multitude who offered a price for the men of Thy people because they despised them as not worth buying.

20. [43:19] "Declinasti semitas nostras." It is generally thought that the negative participle Non, which is found in the first part of the verse, is wanting here. St. Jerome translates the passage thus: Non declinaverunt semitæ nostræ. Hence the meaning of it is: Thou hast not permitted our steps to wander from Thy way.

21. [43:20] "In loco afflictionis." To the depth of misery. St. Jerome's translation is: In locum draconum—To a place of dragons, which means a place of horrors. "Umbra mortis." The shadow of death, after which darkness alone remains; this denotes a great obscurity.

25. [43:23] "Quare obdormis?" Why dost Thou make as though Thou sleepest, and takest no more care of us?

27. [43:25] We see ourselves humbled and despised as the dust that is trodden under foot; hence, prostrate with our faces to the earth, we implore Thy mercy.

28. [43:26] "Redime nos propter nomen tuum." Deliver us from so many evils for the glory of Thy name.

PSALM 44 OF THE PSALTER

A canticle in honor of Jesus Christ and of the Church, his Spouse. The prophet plainly announces the mystery of the Incarnation of the Word and the victory which the Redeemer was to gain over the world.[13146]

1. [44:2] My heart, full of divine illuminations, breaks out in holy words, and utters this hymn in honor of my King, who is the Messias.

2. [44:2] My tongue is as the pen in the hand of a rapid writer, who writes all that is dictated to him by the Holy Spirit.[13147]

3. [44:3] Thou, my King and my Saviour.

5. [44:5] "Specie tua et pulchritudine tua." St. Jerome translates: Gloria tua et decore tuo. "Intended." Go forward. "Prospere procede, et regna." Do not cease to advance from victory to victory, and establish Thy reign in the world.

6. [44:5] Reign with truth, that is, with fidelity to Thy promises, with the meekness that Thou usest towards sinners, and with the justice that Thou exercisest in judging the obstinate; thus will Thy power lead Thee on wonderfully to extend Thy kingdom.

7. [44:6] The people, conquered by Thy arrows, or by the rays of Thy light which has power to penetrate hearts, will fall and submit themselves to Thee, so that Thy enemies, who before despised Thee, shall be brought to adore Thee.

8. [44:7] Thus, O God, Saviour of the world! Thy throne, or Thy reign, unlike the temporal reigns of other kings, shall be eternal in the Church; and Thy rod, that is, Thy sceptre or Thy government, shall ever be most just—"Virga directionis" means the same as Virga rectissima.[13148]

9. [44:8] "Præ consortibus tuis." That is, Exalting Thee, so as to make Thee sit at his right hand—a glory that surpasses that of all the men and angels who shall be with Thee in heaven. It is here said that Jesus Christ is anointed or constituted King of the world. This is to be understood, not of his divinity, but of his humanity. We are to understand also that he is anointed with the unction of grace as Head of the faithful, who through his merits shall receive graces from God.

10. [44:9] "A vestimentis tuis, a domibus eburneis." Here by the garments and by the ivory houses is to be understood the most sacred humanity of the Redeemer. Hence the verse is thus explained: From Thy humanity comes the odor of most pure and sweet perfumes; an odor that leads the daughters of the kings, or great souls, to rejoice Thee by running to adore Thee.

11. [44:10] "Regina." By this Queen is understood the Church, and we may also understand the Mother of God, or every holy soul that is a spouse of Jesus Christ, and therefore a queen, as St. Bernard says: Singulæ animæ singulæ sponsæ—Every soul, a spouse.

12. [44:11] Then is said to this Queen: "Vide, et inclina aurem tuam." Behold the honor to which thou art raised, and listen to that which thou hast to do.

13. [44:12] The King shall love thy beauty, he who is thy Spouse, whom alone thou shouldst love, since he is the Lord, thy God, and whom in the end all must adore.

14. [44:13] This is addressed only to the Church: The daughters of Tyre, that is, the Gentile nations, shall honor thee with gifts and offerings; among them shall be seen all the great ones of the people prostrating themselves before thee, to implore thy protection.

15. [44:14] Her glory should consist in interior virtues of the soul, more than in exterior ornaments or in what is manifest to others.[13149]

16, 17. [44:15, 16] In the train of the Spouse many virgins shall be brought to the King in his temple; but they shall be those only that are her nearest, that is, united with the Queen and Spouse, who is the Church, according to the explanation of St. Basil and St. Augustine.

18. [44:17] According to St. Basil, St. John Chrysostom, St. Jerome, and St. Augustine, these words are addressed to the Church, and their sense is: O Spouse of the Saviour! instead of the fathers of old, the patriarchs and the prophets, who are now no more, there are born to thee sons, the apostles, the disciples and their successors, whom thou hast constituted princes over the whole earth; for by their preaching the Gospel thou hast subjected all the nations to thy obedience.

19. [44:18] O Lord! these apostles, these disciples and their successors in every age, shall continue to preach throughout all generations Thy name, that is, Thy power and Thy mercy towards men. "Memores erunt" Many, according to the present Hebrew text and the Greek version, read: Memor ero—I shall remember. But St. Jerome and St. Augustine follow the Vulgate.

20. [44:18] Therefore the nations, converted to the faith, will never cease to adore Thee.

PSALM 45 OF THE PSALTER

St. Ambrose, St. Jerome, St. Augustine, St. John Chrysostom, Theodoret, and Euthymius, unanimously teach that this psalm is to be understood of the Catholic Church with regard to the victories that she has gained over her persecutors, and her stability under the protection of God.

3. [45:4] "Eorum." Bossuet with St. Jerome, following the Hebrew, reads: Ejus.[13150]

4. [45:5] In the midst of these storms, the Lord will cause to flow down a river of peace which shall rejoice the city of God, that is, the holy Church, which the Most High has chosen for his temple by sanctifying it with his grace.

5. [45:6] God will always remain with her, assisting her from the first dawn of the morning, that is, from the moment of its birth.

6. [45:7] "Inclinata." St. Jerome translates: Concussa—Shaken. When the Church was established the nations were troubled and the kingdoms were shaken.

7. [45:8] For ourselves we have no cause to fear, privileged as we are.

10. [45:11] "Vacate." According to the Hebrew: Cessate. Therefore you who are my servants leave alone your earthly cares and employ yourselves in reflecting that I alone myself am God, for whom all things exist, and upon whom all things depend; a day will come when I shall be exalted, that is, acknowledged as the sovereign Lord of the universe, by the nations and through the whole earth.

11. [45:12] Repetition of verse 7 for the conclusion, that is to say: Let us then rejoice that we his faithful servants have on our side to protect us this great, all-powerful God.

PSALM 46 OF THE PSALTER

This psalm presents two literal senses: In the first, it refers to the triumph of the Ark when it was carried to Mount Sion (2 Kings, 6:15); in the second sense, it is applied, according to the opinion of several of the holy Fathers, to the glorious Ascension of Jesus Christ into heaven.

2. [46:3] He is the Lord, supreme above all by his majesty, terrible to all by his power; he is the great Monarch who holds dominion over the whole earth.

4. [46:5] Among all the nations, he has chosen us to be his especial inheritance, because we are the children of Jacob, whom he so much loved.[13151]

5. [46:6] "Ascendit Deus." Our Lord ascends to heaven by his own power, because he is God.

7. [46:8] "Psallite sapienter." Render to him (wisely) the praises that he deserves, and as he deserves.[13152]

8. [46:9] He shall reign as God over all nations; as God he shall sit upon his heavenly throne, at the right of the eternal Father.

9. [46:10] "Principes populorum congregati sunt cum Deo Abraham." According to the Hebrew: Congregati sunt, populus Dei Abraham—The princes of the Gentile people are united with the people of the God of Abraham. "Quoniam dii fortes terræ vehementer elevati sunt." This passage is very obscure. Some, as Mattei and Genebrard, say that by the Hebrew word Elohim (the plural for the singular) Dii fortes terræ, God himself is to be understood, and they explain the words thus: Dens victoria elevatus est—God is exalted in victory. But St. Cyril, Theodoret, and Didymus, understand by the words Dii fortes terræ—The princes of the earth. This agrees with the translation of St. Jerome: Dii scuta terræ, that is to say: The gods, the shields of the earth, that is, Protectors, those that have subjects under them. "Elevati sunt." They have become exalted by being united in worshipping the true God. This last explanation pleases me more, because it is more in conformity with the Vulgate and the version of the Septuagint. The passage, then, may be thus explained: The princes, who are the protectors or rulers of the earth, have been greatly elevated by uniting in the worship of God.

PSALM 47 OF THE PSALTER

In the literal sense this psalm is to be understood of the protection of God over the earthly Jerusalem; and in the figurative sense, of the care with which he watches over the spiritual Jerusalem, that is, over his Church.

1. [47:2] "In civitate Dei nostri, in monte sancto ejus." In the city of Jerusalem, and especially on the holy mountain of Sion, where our God makes his glory shine forth.

3. [47:4] God shall be known among the inhabitants of this city, when he shall defend it against the attacks of its enemies.

4. [47:4] "Convenerunt in unum." They have assembled for the purpose of laying it waste.

5. [47:6] "Ipsi videntes sic admirati sunt." On seeing that the hand of the Omnipotent protects it, they are seized with great astonishment.

6. [47:7] They shall suffer pains like those that a woman endureth in childbirth: Thou, O Lord! wilt raise stormy winds, which shall break in pieces the ships of Tharsis; that is, the largest ships, such as those that sailed to Tharsis.[13153]

7. [47:9] Mark now what the inhabitants of Jerusalem will say: What was promised us we have with our own eyes seen verified in the city of our God, who has made its foundations everlasting. This has indeed been verified in the Church, of which it is said: Et portæ inferi non prævalebunt adversus eam—The gates of hell shall not prevail against her (Matt. 16:8).

8. [47:10] "In medio templi tui." In Thy Church, and in the sight of the whole world.

9. [47:11] As Thou hast made known, O Lord! Thy great name throughout the earth, so everywhere has Thy glory been proclaimed; and so also has Thy power been praised, which is always full of justice in rewarding the good and in punishing the wicked.

10. [47:12] "Propter judicia tua." On account of the just judgments that Thou, O Lord! dost exercise on earth.[13154]

11. [47:13] Come, O nations! come all of you to dwell round about Sion so that she may be in the midst of you; then preach the Gospel from her towers, that is, publicly. "Narrate in turribus ejus." According to the Hebrew: Numerate turres ejus—Count the high towers that defend her.

12. [47:14] Apply yourselves to consider her strength, and distribute or assign to the different inhabitants, or workmen, the places destined for the construction of their houses, that is, of their particular churches, so that when the city is built up and filled with a faithful people, we may transmit to posterity the knowledge of the true God.

The psalmist here addresses the faithful, to teach them to despise the goods of this world and to fear only a bad death which must be followed by the sentence of condemnation. Then he raises their thoughts to the consideration of this truth, that only in God can true happiness be found. Of course, all this is said in an obscure manner; but thanks to the light of the Gospel, we are able to see the thought of the prophet.

3. [48:4] I shall speak to you only of the things that it is necessary to know; I will tell you what I have meditated in my heart, that you may know how to act prudently in all that you do.

4. [48:5] I shall attentively hear the truths that are proposed to me in parable; and this enigma I will explain to you to the sound of the harp. "Propositionem meam." According to the Hebrew: Ænigma meum.[13155]

5. [48:6] Why should I fear on the evil day, that is, on the day of my judgment? Only my iniquity makes me fear, especially the iniquity of my heel; that is, that which shall follow me unto death, which is the end of my life, as the heel is the end of my body.

7. [48:8] "Frater non redimit, redimet homo." Non is again understood before homo, according to the usage of Scripture, as Bellarmine remarks. The sense, then, is: At the moment of death their brother will be unable to deliver them from the peril; and much less will any other man be able to do so.[13156]

9. [48:11] "Non videbit interitum." These words, according to Bossuet, are to be understood in an ironical sense as if the prophet said: An putabit se non visurum interitum?—Will he suppose that he will not see death? Others give this interpretation: He shall not see death, that is, he shall not die before having finished the natural course of his life, although he sees wise men die. Or, as Bellarmine says, we may understand the passage to mean: He shall neglect to provide for death, which is waiting for him at its time; for the sinners avoid thinking of death; but alike for the fool as for the wise, there must come a day when they must die.

11. [48:12] It is there that they shall dwell for several generations; there shall be nothing left of them in their lands but their names written on tablets of marble, or on the walls of their houses.

12. [48:13] "Non intellexit." He did not understand what he should have understood as man.[13157]

13. [48:14] "Hæc via illorum scandalum ipsis." Such is their way, that is, their life, in which they find many dangerous occasions that may bring them to ruin.

14. [48:15] These miserable men, living like animals without reason, they will one day find themselves as victims of divine justice, cast into hell, where death shall feed on them; that is, where their death will be eternal. As sheep feed upon the blades of grass, and leave the roots to sprout forth again, so death torments unceasingly the reprobate, still leaving them life, that they may go on suffering eternally.

15. [48:15] At the general resurrection, which is "morning," or the beginning of the age to come, the wicked shall see the just established their masters and their judges; then the power which they had in this world will be shattered and destroyed in hell, after all the vain glory of which they boasted during their life. "Auxilium." According to the Hebrew: Robur, potestas.

16. [48:16] "Cum acceperit me." When he shall receive me among his servants, after having completed the work of Redemption.

18. [48:18] "Non sumet omnia." A Hebraism: He shall take nothing away with him.

19. [48:19] The sinner shall be blessed, that is, applauded by worldlings during his life upon earth; while he will not praise you, save when you load him with earthly goods.

20. [48:20] After his wicked life this wicked man shall go into the abode of his ancestors, whose bad example he has followed, and there he will remain forever, never more to see the light.

21. [48:21] Repetition of verse 12 for the conclusion.

PSALM 49 OF THE PSALTER

This psalm describes the second coming of Jesus Christ, which will be public and full of majesty, in contrast with his first coming, which was humble and hidden.

1. [49:1] The God of gods,[13158] the true God, the Sovereign Master of all created powers, has cited before his tribunal all men of the earth to give an account of their lives.

2. [49:2] He will make his voice heard from one extremity of the earth to the other; and he shall come down from the heavenly Sion, adorned with his glory and majesty.

3. [49:3] Our God shall come in sight of the whole world, and make himself known as the great God that he is; and then he shall no longer be silent, as he has been in the past, seeing the sins of the wicked, while seeming not to notice the injury that he received.

4. [49:3] The fire at his presence will burn with greater force, reducing the world to ashes, according to the words of St. Peter: Terra autem, et qu in ipsa sunt opera, exurentur—The earth and the works which are in it shall be burnt up (2 Peter, 3:10). And around him there shall be a great and universal tempest, which shall throw everything into confusion on earth, in the sea, and in the air.

5. [49:4] He will then call heaven and earth, that is, all the angels and all men, to be present at the judgment that he will make of his people, by separating the elect from the reprobate.

6. [49:5] Angels of heaven, gather around the Sovereign Judge his saints, that is, the elect; who besides sacrifices, that is, besides external worship, have kept his covenant by obeying his law.

7. [49:6] "Deus judex est." The judge is God; he cannot err.

8. [49:7] Here the prophet makes Jesus Christ speak and say: Listen, my people, to what I shall say to thee; listen, Israel, that is, all the true faithful, to what I shall declare to thee, through my inspirations and by my ministers; thou shouldst believe me, for I am thy God, the true God, who knows all things, and who loves thee.

9. [49:8] My people, I will not reproach thee for the sacrifices that thou hast neglected to offer to me; for those that thou hast offered me suffice me, and they are ever before my eyes.

12. [49:11] I well know that all the birds are mine, and that which gives richness and beauty to the fields is mine.

15. [49:14] If thou wouldst please me, offer to me, thy God, a sacrifice of praise, which comes not only from the lips, but from a heart that loves me, and fulfil the promises that thou hast made to me.

16. [49:15] "Honorificabis me." Thou shalt honor me by returning me thanks.[13159]

17. [49:16] We read in St. Jerome's translation: Quid tibi est cum narratione præceptorum meorum, et ut assumas pactum meum in ore tuo? The verse may, therefore, be thus explained: The Lord says to the sinner: Of what use is it to talk of my precepts, when thou dost not observe them, and of my covenant, when thou art wanting to it on thy part?

18. [49:17] "Disciplinam." That is, my teaching.

21. [49:20] "Ponebas scandalum." St. Jerome's translation is: Fabricabaris opprobrium. The sense of the verse is: Sitting in company with others, thou hast spoken ill of thy neighbor; thou hast sought to take away the good name of thy own brother; this thou hast done, and I have been silent.

22. [49:21] Didst thou think, O wicked man! that I was like to thee? and that I should take no account of thy offences against me? but the time will come when I shall bring up against thee thy wicked life, and I will take care that thy crimes may ever be before thy eyes, that their very hideousness may ever be thy torment.

23. [49:22] "Nequando rapiat." That so you may avoid being made one day the prey of the devil.

24. [49:23] Remember that the sacrifice of praise, that is, a good life, is the only sacrifice that honors me;[13160] and this is the way by which I give thee to understand that thou wilt obtain salvation, which consists in the enjoyment of the sight of God, and in loving him for all eternity.

PSALM 51 OF THE PSALTER

This psalm, taken in a literal sense, shows us David reproaching Doeg, the Edomite, for having excited against him and against the priest Achimelech the anger of Saul, and for having thus caused the ruin of many others (1 Kings, 1:22). In the mystical sense, Doeg represents all the wicked that persecute the good.

1. [51:3] "In iniquitate." In doing injury to others.

2. [51:4] All the time thou hast employed thy tongue only to offend others unjustly; thou hast used it as a well-sharpened razor to deceive."[13161]

3. [51:5] Thou hast loved to do evil to thy neighbor better than to do him good: thou hast sought to speak to his damage more readily than to his advantage.

5. [51:6] "Radicem tuam." He will make thee disappear with all thy race, as a tree is felled and pulled up with all its roots.

6. [51:8] The just shall see all this, and they will have horror thereat; at the same time they will laugh at his ruin, and will say: Behold the man who refused to put his trust in God, as if he did not need his help.

7. [51:9] "Prævaluit in vanitate sua." He reckoned on his vain supports, which gave him a promise of happiness.

9. [51:11] I will never cease to thank Thee for Thy benefits; and in all my tribulations I will wait for the help of Thy goodness, which never fails to succor Thy servants.

PSALM 52 OF THE PSALTER

The psalmist deplores the corruption of mankind, and prays God to deliver his people from the persecution of the wicked. He speaks also of God's goodness in waiting for sinners to do penance; and at the same time he sighs for the coming of the Redeemer to deliver man from the slavery of the devil, typified by the captivity of Babylon.[13162]

1. [52:1] "Insipiens." The impious man becomes a fool by his impiety. A man must have lost his reason to think that there is no God.

2. [52:2] Miserable men! living a life of moral corruption, they have become abominable by their iniquity before God and before men; there is not one among them who does a good action.

3. [52:3] "Intelligens, aut requirens Deum." Who understands his duty, and seeks to please God.

4. [52:4] "Omnes declinaverunt, simul inutiles facti sunt." All are wanting to their duty, and thus render themselves useless to God and to men.

5. [52:5] Will these unhappy men then never know their perversity, and will they continue to oppress my people with as much ease as one eats bread?

6. [52:6] The cause of their wicked life comes from their not wishing to call upon the Lord in the dangers of offending him; they fear where there is no cause for fear, that is, they fear to lose some earthly good, and they are not afraid of losing the grace of God.

7. [52:6] God will utterly destroy those that displease him in order to please men; they shall be confounded; for as they despise God, so also shall they be despised by God.

8. [52:7] The fools will say: Who will come from Sion to save Israel? But when God shall turn the slavery of his people into glorious liberty, this same people shall be filled with joy.

PSALM 54 OF THE PSALTER

David, persecuted by his son Absalom, and imploring the help of God: such, in the literal sense, is the subject of this psalm. But St. Hilary and St. Jerome apply this psalm to Jesus Christ, betrayed by Judas and persecuted by the Jews. Generally speaking, it may be applied to all the just, persecuted in this life by men or devils.

1. [54:2] "Intende mihi." Consider my tribulation.

2. [54:3] I am afflicted in applying myself to consider my sufferings, and I am troubled at hearing of the persecution that my perverse enemy is plotting against me.

3. [54:4] My enemies have accused me of crimes that I have not committed; and moved by anger, they seek all means to hurt me.

5. [54:6] "Contexerunt me tenebræ." I am encompassed all around with darkness, so that I am unable to see any escape from the dangers that threaten me.

6. [54:7] In this state I said: Who will give me wings, that like a timid dove, as I am at present, I may be able to fly and seek repose in some secure place?

7. [54:8] I would take flight if I could, and I should be content to remain in some unknown desert. This is the explanation given by Rotigni and Lallemant.

8. [54:9] There I would wait for him who has so often delivered me from my great fear of soul, and from the tempest that arose against me.

9. [54:10] Cast down those that seek to oppress me; confound their tongues, that is, put discord between them, so that their designs become fruitless; for I see their iniquity; I see the whole city in contradiction, that is, all in disorder and confusion.

14. [54:14] But he that persecutes me, who is he? It is thou, my guide and my friend, who I believed had but one and the same heart with me.[13163]

19. [54:18] At all times, I will publish the mercy of the Lord in assisting me, and I hope that he will ever graciously hearken to my prayers.[13164]

20. [54:19] He will establish me again in my former peace, and will deliver my life from those that approach me to oppress me; for they have come in great numbers against me to cast me down. This is according to the translation of St. Jerome, who has: Multi enim fuerunt adversum me.

21. [54:20] "Qui est ante sæcula." He who is the Eternal.

22. [54:20] The Lord sees that for them there is no change, that is, he sees that they are obstinate, and that they have no fear of God; and for this reason he has already raised his hand to punish them according to their malice.

23. [54:21] "Contaminaverunt testamentum ejus." They have violated his covenant. St. Jerome translates: Contaminavit pactum suum, that is, they have broken their given faith. "Divisi sunt ab ira vultus ejus." But they have been scattered at the sight of the anger which the Lord showed against them. "Appropinquavit cor illius." The heart of God has drawn near, that is, is set to take on them his just vengeance. Others refer the words cor illius, not to God, but to the rebellious. They say that such a rebel or traitor has one thing on his lips and another in his heart.[13165] But, according to Bellarmine, here is signified the heart of God aroused to anger.

24. [54:22] "Ipsi sunt jacula." In reality their words are sharp arrows hurled when least expected.

25. [54:23] But the Lord encourages me to leave to his goodness the care of my salvation, and thus he will take thought to preserve my life; he will not permit that the just man should always be tossed about on the billows of fear.

26. [54:24] On the contrary, O Lord! as for my enemies, Thou wilt cast them down into the pit of death, that is, into hell, where has to be endured a never-ending death. Hell is called a pit, because it has a mouth to receive the damned, but has no door by which they can go out.

David flying from the presence of Saul, who was seeking his death, retires among the Philistines; but when recognized by them who he was, he finds himself in great danger (1 Kings, 21:10). Under these circumstances he composes this prayer, which every Christian can use when he sees himself in danger of falling into sin and becoming the prey of the devil.

1. [55:2] The man, who is my enemy, has sought to tread me under foot; and therefore persecuting me the whole day, he has striven to afflict me.

2. [55:3] All my enemies have united to plot continually my ruin.

3. [55:4] "Ab altitudine diei." Many, as Menochius, understand hereby the great dangers that threaten; but I prefer the interpretation of Calmet and Tirinus, which is more literal. According to it the verse is explained thus: During the whole day, from the rising of the sun, I am in a continual fear; but I hope from Thee, O Lord! the help that I need.

4. [55:5] "Sermones meos." According to the Hebrew: Verbum ejus. The promises that he has made me, or the word that he has given me. "Caro." The carnal man, who in regard to God is but weakness (see verse 11).

7. [55:7] "Sustinuerunt animam meam." They have waited for the opportunity to take away my life. "Pro nihilo salvos facies illos." So Thou wilt on no account save them. This is St. Jerome's explanation. St. Augustine, on the contrary, gives this interpretation: Thou wilt save them, of pure grace, without any merit on their part. The sense of St. Jerome agrees better with the words that follow: "In ira populos confringes." In Thy just wrath, Thou wilt break to pieces this crowd of enemies who would destroy me.

8. [55:8] I lay before Thee all the afflictions of my life; I hope that Thou wilt always have my tears before Thy eyes.

9. [55:9] As Thou hast promised, I hope that my enemies, filled with confusion, at seeing their designs brought to naught, will turn backwards.

10. [55:10] I shall not fail to call upon Thee every day; for I have well known that Thou art my God, coming to my assistance, as Thou hast every time that I have called on Thee.

11. [55:11] I shall always praise in my God and my Lord his faithfulness to his promises; and therefore, trusting in him, I will not fear that man can do me any harm (see verse 4).

12. [55:12] This is the explanation that Bellarmine gives with St. Jerome: In me, that is, in my memory are always "Vota tua" the promises that I have made to Thee; hence I will never cease to offer to Thee the praises and the thanksgivings that are contained in these promises.

13. [55:13] "Ut placeam coram Deo in lumine viventium." In order that I may be well pleasing to Thee by means of the light of grace, whereby Thy servants live in the fidelity to Thee.

PSALM 56 OF THE PSALTER

The psalmist here manifests his confidence in the protection of God, whose praises he proclaims.[13166]

2. [56:2] "Donec transeat iniquitas" Until the time when I see the end of the unjust persecution that I suffer.

5. [56:4] God sent from heaven the mercy that he had promised me, and he saved my life by withdrawing me from the midst of my enemies who like young lions were seeking to destroy me;[13167] nevertheless, I cannot as yet sleep in peace without being troubled with fears.

6. [56:5] I always fear this race of perverse men, who have their teeth and their tongue as sharp swords and darts, to wound me by their lies and calumnies. This is what, according to Bellarmine, is indicated by the Hebrew phrase.

7. [56:6] Raise Thy power above the heavens, and make Thy glory shine upon the whole earth by delivering me from my enemies.

8. [56:7] "Incurvaverunt animam meam." They have made me bend under the weight of the evils with which they oppressed me.

10. [56:8] I am ready to suffer all that Thou hast appointed for me; so that in all that may happen I shall not cease to praise Thee.[13168]

11. [56:9] Arise my soul[13169] and glory in the Lord; and thou my harp and my lyre, hasten to praise the Lord; I wish to praise him without ceasing from the break of day.

13. [56:11] I shall say, from the earth till the heavens, all is full of Thy mercy and Thy faithfulness.

14. [56:12] See verse 7.

PSALM 57 OF THE PSALTER

The prophet describes in this psalm the perverse conduct of the wicked, and shows the chastisement that God usually inflicts upon them.

2. [57:3] You determine in your heart the wicked deeds, which afterwards your hands are ready unjustly to put in execution on earth.

6. [57:7] He will render them powerless to injure others.

7. [57:8] They shall be like a torrent that passes and is suddenly dried up; that is, their designs will quickly come to naught.

8. [57:9] "Supercecidit ignis, et non viderunt solem." The fire of divine vengeance will fall upon them, and they shall no more see the day.

9. [57:10] St. Jerome translates: Antequam crescant spinæ vestræ in rhamnum. That is: Before you come to execute the evil that you design to do.[13170]

10. [57:11] "Vindictam." The justice of divine vengeance. "Manus suas lavabit in sanguine peccatoris." That is, as is explained by St. Augustine, while seeing the blood, or the death of the sinner, he will preserve himself pure and innocent.

11. [57:12] And then, seeing the fruit, or the profit that the just derive from the chastisement of the sinner, every one will recognize that there is in the world a God who knows how to judge over the earth, and to punish the wicked as they deserve.

PSALM 58 OF THE PSALTER

David, seeing himself surrounded by the soldiers of Saul (1 Kings, 19:11), invokes the Lord's assistance and predicts the ruin of his enemies. This psalm applies in every point to Jesus Christ persecuted by the Jews.

2. [58:3] "De viris sanguinum." From these cruel men that thirst for my blood.

4. [58:5] "Neque iniquitas mea, neque peccatum meum." Thou knowest that there is in me no iniquity, nor any fault with which they can reproach me.

5. [58:6] Thou seest the peril in which I am; arise to help me, O mighty God, O God of Israel.[13171]

6. [58:6] "Qui operantur iniquitatem." Who do not wish to cease to be unjust.

7. [58:7] There are those that thus understand this verse: They will arrive late in the evening; but, like stray dogs, they will suffer great hunger, that is, they will have a great desire to be just in order to find peace; they will go round about the city of God, but they will not find mercy. Others explain it better, thus: They will go and return from morning till evening; they will even surround the city, seeking like dogs to satisfy their hunger, and to oppress the just; but they will be disappointed (see verse 16).

8. [58:8] Their mouth will speak of nothing else than of laying snares and killing, saying at the same time: Who knows of it?

9. [58:9] Thou wilt make them an object of ridicule, and wilt destroy all their wicked people.

11. [58:12] God will make known to me the vengeance that he will take on my enemies. I pray Thee, O Lord! to punish them, but do not destroy them, so that my subjects, having always their chastisement before their eyes, may not forget Thy justice.

12. [58:12] "Depone eos." That is: Reduce them to such a state that they may not be able to raise their heads to injure me.

13. [58:13] Let this be the punishment of their slanderous mouth and of their wicked discourse; may they be taken and confounded in their very pride.

16. [58:15] In the mean time they continue from morning till night laying snares for the just, to devour them like hungry dogs, and they surround the city, in order that the prey may not be able to escape them (see verse 7).

17. [58:16] They disperse in different places to devour the just; and if they do not succeed in satiating themselves with their blood, they do not cease at least to take away their good name.

20. [58:18] Thou art my helper and defender in all my wants; and therefore I will always sing Thy praises, calling Thee my God and my Mercy.[13172]

PSALM 59 OF THE PSALTER

David, already so often victorious over his enemies, implores God's help against the Edomites (2 Kings, 8:10); (1 Par. 18.). This psalm applies very well to the Church, coming forth victorious amid so many persecutions.

1. [59:3] O great God! it seems that Thou hast deprived us of Thy protection, since Thou hast let us see ourselves defeated; but, though Thou didst at first show Thyself angry with me, Thou hast in the end had compassion on me.

2. [59:4] "Sana contritiones ejus, quia commota est." It now remains for Thy mercy to repair the ruins made by this great shock.

3. [59:5] Thou hast given proof of chastising us severely; Thou hast made us taste of the bitter wine of compunction (or, according to the Hebrew, of fear), and that in order to see us holily contrite.

4. [59:6] "Ut fugiant a facie arcus." In order that they may preserve themselves from the arrows of Thy wrath at the sight of the already bended bow.

5. [59:7] Thou hast acted in this manner in order to save those that love Thee; hear me, then, and let Thy hand save me.[13173]

6. [59:8] God has declared from his sanctuary that one day I shall have the joy of dividing at my will the country of Sichem or Samaria, and of measuring the plains of the Valley of Tents, beyond the Jordan, to distribute them at my pleasure.

7. [59:9] I already see under my sway Galaad, Manasses, and Ephraim, which are the strength of my head. Under these names are meant the provinces occupied by the tribes of Israel, which David called the strength of his head, that is, of his crown.

8. [59:9] "Juda, rex meus." It is in the tribe of Juda that my throne is established, because God has willed that the kings should be chosen from this tribe. "Moab, olla spei meæ." The province of Moab, which is abundant as a platter filled with meat, is my hope. That is: I hope to satiate my people with the spoils of the Moabites.

9. [59:10] "Alienigenæ." Foreigners.[13174]

10. [59:11] Who will lead me into Edom, and make me master of that kingdom whose capital city is very strong?

11. [59:12] Will it not be Thou, O Lord! who seemed at first to abandon us! And wilt Thou not Thyself go forth at the head of our troops to make us victorious?

12. [59:13] "Vana salus hominis." It is in vain that we can hope for our salvation in human intercourse; Thou must aid us Thyself.

13. [59:14] In placing our hope in God we shall obtain the victory; he will destroy our enemies.

PSALM 60 OF THE PSALTER

Full of confidence in the power of God, the psalmist prays to him to come to his aid. St. Jerome and St. Hilary say that all afflicted souls find here an excellent prayer which they may recite in time of tribulation.[13175]

2. [60:3] From the lowest depths of the earth, O Lord! I have cried to Thee; and when my heart was in anguish through fear, Thou didst lift me upon a rock, that is, Thou didst place me as it were on a high rock where I see myself safe from my enemies.[13176]

3. [60:3] Thou hast led me by a sure way because Thou hast become for me as a strong tower in the face of my enemies.

5. [60:6] In this place that Thou hast given me I shall always dwell securely, since there I shall be protected by Thy wings.

6. [60:7] "Annos ejus usque in diem generationis et generationis." Thou wilt even make his reign to endure from generation to generation.

7. [60:8] He will never cease to keep himself in the presence of his God; and who shall ever be able to see his goodness and his faithfulness fail?

8. [60:9] "Ut reddam vota mea de die in diem." In order to render Thee all the days of my life the thanks that I owe Thee.

PSALM 61 OF THE PSALTER

David encourages himself and his followers to have confidence in God while persecuted and while oppressed by adversity.

3. [61:2] "In hominem." Upon himself. You are all killing me, at least by the desire that you have to take my life, and consider me as a leaning wall that is ready to fall.

4. [61:5] "Pretium meum." My honor, which is so precious to me. So this is understood by St. Ambrose and St. Augustine. "Cucurri in siti." For this honor I so much toiled and sweated. Bossuet explains it thus: I fled like a thirsty stag pursued by the hunters. "Benedicebant." They praised me.

5. [61:6] "Ab ipso patientia mea." Thou wilt receive from him patience to suffer all.

6. [61:7] "Non emigrabo" I will not quit my kingdom. I shall not be driven out. I shall not fall from the state in which I am.[13177]

9. [61:10] "In idipsum." That is, Simul, according to St. Jerome's translation. They are deceiving one another.

10. [61:11] "Divitiæ si affluant" If riches come to you abundantly in the way of justice and honesty.

11. [61:12] "Potestas Dei est, et tibi, Domine, misericordia." God has power to punish the wicked, and mercy to console the just.

PSALM 63 OF THE PSALTER

Pursued by calumny, David implores the help of God, and proclaims his hope of seeing this persecution turn to the ruin of his enemies and to the advantage of the just. In the mystical sense this psalm applies to the Passion of Jesus Christ.

6. [63:7] "Iniquitates" According to Bossuet: Vias nocendi—Their ways of injuring. The sense of the verse is: They have studied the ways of doing injury; but in this research they have found themselves foiled. This applies to the testimony brought forward against Jesus Christ.

7. [63:7] Bossuet well explains this verse: When the wicked man cannot find fault with the just on the score of his actions, he tries to give a wrong interpretation to the secret thoughts of his heart; but God, who defends the innocent, will be exalted by punishing the wicked.

8. [63:8] As the arrows discharged by children inflict only slight wounds, so the plots and calumnies of the wicked will have no effect; and therefore the arrows discharged by their tongues have become powerless to injure the objects of their calumny, and have fallen back upon themselves. This is according to the translation of St. Jerome: Et corruent in semetipsos plagis suis.

9. [63:9] Those that have seen their chastisement were seized with surprise; and every one will henceforth fear to follow them.

10. [63:10] In this all have recognized the hand of God, and have published it abroad.

PSALM 65 OF THE PSALTER

This psalm is a song of thanksgiving addressed by the people to God for having delivered them from their enemies. It may be applied to the Gentiles delivered from the tyranny of the devil.[13178]

2. [65:3] "Mentientur tibi inimici tui." The very enemies, at the sight of Thy power, will come to submit themselves to Thy rule, but feignedly: Mentientur.

5. [65:6] Reference is made to the passage of the Red Sea and the Jordan in the exodus from Egypt.

6. [65:7] He rules ever over the whole world; he watches over all nations, that the wicked who dare to offend him may not have reason to become proud.

8. [65:9] "Ad vitam." That is: Ad vivendum. The sense of this verse is: He has preserved my life, and has not suffered my feet to stumble, or that I should fall over any precipice.

9. [65:10] Thou hast tried us with tribulations, as silver is tried in the fire.

10. [65:11] "Imposuisti homines super capita nostra." Thou hast placed cruel men over us.

12, 13. [65:13, 14] I will go into Thy temple to offer to Thee the sacrifices, and to render to Thee the thanksgivings that I owe Thee, according to the vows that I made to Thee.

14. [65:15] "Holocausta medullata." Victims, fat and full of marrow; that is, not only sacrifices of external works, but also of inward affections of the heart. "Cum incenso arietum." Rams, fragrant with incense.

17. [65:18] If I had regarded with attachment any iniquity in my heart, the Lord would not have heard me.

19. [65:20] May God be forever blessed, since he has not suffered me to forget to pray to him, because by my praying to him I have obtained his mercy so that he has not removed from me. St. Augustine has written this beautiful maxim: "Cum videres non a te amotam deprecationem tuam. securus esto, quia non est a te amota misericordia ejus—When thou seest that thy prayer is not removed from thee, be sure that neither is his mercy removed from thee."

PSALM 67 OF THE PSALTER

In a figurative sense this psalm refers to Jesus Christ, who overcame death and ascended gloriously into heaven. It also foreshadows the sanctity of the Church and the protection that God, according to his promise, does not cease to give it—a protection that should firmly establish it and make it glorious by so many victories. The prophet describes various prodigies of the Old Testament, figures of the prodigies that occurred in the New Testament. This psalm is, moreover, very obscure.[13179]

3. [67:4] "Delectentur in lætitia." Let them rejoice at their victory.

4. [67:5] "Qui ascendit super occasum." Who ascends above the darkness of the grave. "Dominus nomen illi." For his name is that of the Lord: all things are under his dominion.

5. [67:5] When he shall judge the world, sinners shall tremble with fear. while you shall stand rejoicing; for he is the Father of orphans, and the Judge who defends widows. This signifies that at the Last Judgment he will console all those that have been afflicted here on earth.

6. [67:6] God sits in his sanctuary in heaven; and there in his house he makes his servants dwell; "Unius moris," of one manner, that is, as one in unity of virtue and sentiments.

7. [67:7] He sets free those that are held captive by their passions, and likewise those that have embittered him by their faults, and have dwelt in the sepulchre, the abode of death; that is, in his displeasure.

8, 9. [67:8] When Thou didst go forth in the sight of Thy people set free from Egypt, and didst go before them in the desert, in a cloud of light, the whole earth was moved, because the heavens showered down manna.

10. [67:10] In the same way Thou dost wish to store up a great outpouring of grace for Thy inheritance, that is, for Thy new Church; so that, however infirm it may be, Thou knowest how to heal her and make her perfect.

11. [67:11] There Thy flock shall abide, for which because of itself it is utterly poor, Thou hast in Thy goodness prepared abundant pastures.

12. [67:12] The Lord will inspire words to those that will announce the new law, giving them great power to convert entire nations.

13. [67:13] "Rex virtutum dilecti dilecti." According to the Hebrew: Reges exercituum confœderabuntur—The most powerful kings of the earth will become subjects of the Well-Beloved (accordding to the Hebrew Dilecti dilecti); that is, of the Redeemer, who will be greatly beloved by them. "Et speciei domus dividere spolia." And he, in order to render his house, that is, his Church, beautiful, will give her the power to divide the spoils of those kings converted by means of the Evangelists: that is, of the apostles, who divided among themselves all the kingdoms of the world, to lead them to embrace the faith.

14. [67:14] This verse is very obscure, says Bellarmine; hence it will be necessary to explain it in detail. "Si dormiatis." If you who preach the word of God sleep, that is, if you repose. "Inter medios cleros." The word Clerus in Greek signifies lot, or inheritance; meaning: In the midst of the Church. But St. Jerome, St. Augustine, Theodoret, and others, understand by the word Cleros, the Old and New Testaments, and explain the first part of the words thus: If you repose in the midst of the two Testaments. "Pennæ columbæ deargentatæ." The Church, or the union of the faithful, will be like a dove with its wings silvered with the purity of wisdom. "Et posteriora dorsi ejus in pallore auri." And with its back gilt by the fervor of charity, which makes it all beautiful.

15, 16. [67:15, 16] "Dum discernit cœlestis reges." While the heavenly King, that is, Christ, will divide and send forth his preachers, raised to the dignity of kings by the spiritual power given them over souls. "Super eam." Over the Church scattered throughout the kingdoms of the earth. "Nive dealbabuntur" Then the nations, purified from the blackness of their sins, will become whiter than snow. "Mons Dei, mons pinguis, mom coagulatus." The mountain of God, the Church, is a fat, or rich mountain, a coagulated, that is, a very rich mountain; for the milk of divine grace, with which it abounds, does not run off, but remains there coagulated and firm. "Ut quid suspicamini montes coagulatos?" O men, why do you think that there is another Church as fat and as rich as this one?

18. [67:18] The chariot of the Lord is borne by many thousands of angels in great jubilee; it was thus the Lord was borne upon these celestial spirits, when he descended upon the holy mountain of Sinai.

19. [67:19] This passage is referred to by St. Paul (Eph. 4:8): Ascendens in altum, captivam duxit captivitatem; dedit dona hominibus—Ascending on high, He led captivity captive; He gave gifts to men. He adds: Quod autem ascendit, quid est, nisi quia et descendit primum in inferiores partes terræ?—Now, that he ascended, what is it, but because he also descended first into the lower parts of the earth? The verse is, therefore, thus explained: Thou, O Saviour of the world! coming forth from the sepulchre, didst ascend to the highest heavens, and didst take with Thee those that were captives here below; and in heaven Thou didst receive the gifts from Thy Father, to dispense them to men.

20. [67:19] For Thou hast bestowed Thy gifts on those who before did not believe that the Lord dwells in his holy mountain, that is, in his Church.

22. [67:21] He is our God, whose property it is to save us; and it is his own gift to set us free from death. "Exitus mortis." According to Bellarmine and Menochius: Evasio mortis, ereptio et liberatio a morte—Rescue and deliverance from death.

23. [67:22] "Verticem capilli." Denoting the top of the hair of the head; which means, that God will bring down the summit of their proud locks, or the crest of those that walk with pride in their sins, and do not walk in the law of God.

24. [67:23] "Ex Basan convertam." Mattei translates the Hebrew thus: Ex Basan reducam. That is: My people, I will deliver thee from the Basanites, or the people of Basan: and I will cast that people into the depths of the sea, as I did with Pharao.

26. [67:25] Then did they see Thy glorious march, and Thy triumphs, O my King and my God! who art now in the holy place; that is, according to Bellarmine and Menochius, in heaven, or in the Church.

27. [67:26] "Principes." The heads of the people.

28. [67:27] "De fontibus Israel." According to the Chaldee version: De semine Israel—From the race of Israel. This is the reading adopted by St. Hilary, Theodoret, Euthemius, Vatable, and Tirinus, who cites these authors; and it is applicable to Jesus Christ: Christo Domino, ortum habenti ex Israel—To the Lord God, who has sprung from Israel.

29, 30. [67:28] "Ibi." There in that triumph, described in verses 26, 27, and 28. "Benjamin adolescentulus." The tribe of Benjamin, who was the last of the children of Jacob. "In mentis excessu." In a transport of joy, as if in ecstacy. St. Hilary, St. Jerome, Theodoret, Bellarmine, and others, apply this passage to the apostles, who were almost all from one of the four tribes here named: St. Paul was of the tribe of Benjamin; St. James and St. John, and other relatives of our Lord, were of the tribe of Juda; and Galilee comprised especially the whole tribe of Zabulon and Nephthali.

32. [67:30] "A templo tuo." Mattei translates: Post templum tuum; and Bossuet: Propter templum tuum. The verse, then, is thus explained: After Thy temple has been built at Jerusalem, or, because of Thy temple that shall be built in Jerusalem, kings will offer Thee their gifts.

33. [67:31] "Feras arundinis." Bellarmine says that by this we are to understand the wild animals that hide among rushes. "In vaccis." According to the Hebrew: In vitulis—Calves. The verse therefore means: Frighten our enemies, who, as wild beasts, and like an assemblage or a troop of savage bulls, together with the calves of the people, that is, the dissolute young men, will seek to exclude from the temple those that have been proved as silver. Such is the explanation given by Bellarmine, Menochius, and Tirinus.

34. [67:31] "Præveniet manus ejus Deo." St. Jerome thus translates the Hebrew: Festinet manus Deo; and Father Mariana's interpretation is: Junget manus pacem petens. The sense of the verse, then, is: Thou wilt scatter, O Lord! the nations that wish for war; then ambassadors from Egypt and Ethiopia will come running with joined hands to ask for peace.

36. [67:33] "Cælum cæli." A Hebraism, which signifies: The highest heaven. "Ad Orientem." Towards the east; that is, towards the Mount of Olives situated at the east of Jerusalem. It is thus explained by Menochius and Tirinus, following St. Hilary and St. Jerome. The sense is, therefore: Give praise to God, who ascends from the Mount of Olives to the highest heaven.

37. [67:34] "Vocem virtutis." A voice of power and efficacy. "Deo super Israel." To the God of Israel. "In nubibus." According to the Hebrew: In cælis. According to St. Augustine, this may be understood of the day of judgment when Jesus Christ will come in nubibus cæli—in the clouds of heaven; then, dabit voci suæ vocem virtutis—he will give unto his voice the voice of power; he will speak with so great power, that he will cause a great terror by the sentence that he will pronounce against the reprobate.

38. [67:36] God will give to his people a virtue and a strength that will make them victorious over their enemies; let this great God be, therefore, ever blessed.

PSALM 68 OF THE PSALTER

The holy Fathers and interpreters agree that this psalm refers to our Lord who was ill-treated by the Jews; it is also frequently quoted in the New Testament.[13180]

1. [68:2] "Aquæ." The waters of affliction.

2. [68:3] "Non est substantia." St. Jerome's translation is: Non possum consistere. That is, according to the explanation of Menochius: There is no consistence or solidity.

3. [68:3] That is: I am as if engulfed in an abyss of bitterness that has overwhelmed me.

6. [68:5] Behold Jesus Christ, who in dying satisfies for sins that are not his own.

7. [68:6] Thou knowest the folly of which I am wrongly accused by men; and my sins, that is, those of men, which I have taken upon myself in order to atone for them. This agrees with what Isaias has said: Iniquitates eorum ipse portabit—He shall bear their iniquities (Is. 53:2).

8. [68:7] "Non erubescant." Let them not blush, or let them not be ashamed. "In me." According to Bellarmine: Propter me. "Qui expectant me." Those that wait for Thee, or those that trust in Thee. "Virtutum." According to the Hebrew: Exercituum.

9. [68:7] "Super me." According to Bellarmine: Mei causa.

11. [68:9] "Matris meæ." Of my mother, the Synagogue.[13181]

12. [68:10] "Comedit me." Has devoured me; or, according to the Chaldee, has consumed me: Consumpsit me.

13. [68:11] This verse is very obscure. "Operui in jejunio animam meam." According to the Hebrew: I overwhelmed myself with my tears in my fast.

15. [68:13] "Qui sedebant in porta." Those that were sitting at the gate; that is, the magistrates, who had their station in the public place of judgment. "Qui bibebant vinum." The drunkards.

16. [68:14] "Tempus beneplaciti." St. Jerome's translation is: Tempus reconciliationis est. For behold now the time of Thy good pleasure; that is, the time destined for the peace and reconciliation of men.

17. [68:14] "In veritate salutis tuæ." That is, according to the faithfulness of the promise which Thou hast made to save us.

19. [68:16] "Neque urgeat." According to Bellarmine and others: Non claudat. This is to be understood of the sepulchre from which Jesus Christ willed to rise, and to pass to life eternal.

23. [68:20] "Reverentiam." St. Jerome's translation is: Ignominiam.

27. [68:23] Their table, in retribution for their cruelty, shall become unto them a snare and an occasion of their ruin. Jesus Christ here predicts, under the form of imprecation, the evils that were to fall on the Jews. For this reason the text is given in the future tense; it is thus Menochius and the others understand it.

28. [68:24] Their eyes will remain darkened, so that they will not see the precipice over which they shall fall; Thou wilt cause them to bend the back forever: that is, Thou wilt always keep them under the yoke of strange masters.

31. [68:27] God has stricken his Son for the sins of the human race, as is written in Isaias (53:8): Propter scelus populi mei percussi eum—For the wickedness of my people have I struck Him. Moreover, the Jews have persecuted and added pain upon pain to his wounds.

32. [68:28] On this text Bellarmine makes a wise remark: Dicitur Deus facere, quando permittit fieri id quod sine ejus permissione fieret—God is said to do, when he permits to be done, that which, without his permission, would not be done. The sense therefore is: Thou permittest these wicked men to add iniquity to iniquity, and that they should not enter into Thy justice, that is, that they should not be admitted to receive from Thee justification.

33. [68:29] "De libro viventium." That is, from the number of the elect.

34. [68:30][13182] "Salus tua . . . suscepit me." Thy salvation has taken me, or withdrawn me from these pains, by causing me to rise again. Or, as others explain the text, in a prophetic sense Thy power will save me by withdrawing me from these pains.

36. [68:32] "Cornua producentem et ungulas." That begins to have horns and hoofs.[13183]

37. [68:33] The poor and afflicted will see it and will rejoice: O men, seek God, and thus your souls will live forever.

38. [68:34] "Vinctos suos non despexit." He does not despise his captives; that is, those that are loaded with the chains of their sins.

40. [68:36] By Sion is understood the Church in general, and by the cities of Juda, the particular Churches. This is the explanation given by Bossuet and others.

41. [68:36] In this happy land men redeemed shall dwell, and shall possess it as their own inheritance.

42. [68:37] "Qui diligunt nomen ejus, habitabunt in ea." It shall always be inhabited by those that love the glory of the Lord.

PSALM 69 OF THE PSALTER

This psalm is almost the repetition of the last seven verses of Psalm 39. According to most of the Latin interpreters it is the prayer that Jesus Christ was to make on the cross. It may serve as a model to the faithful in their prayers, especially when they find themselves in grave danger.

2. [69:3] "Qui quærunt animam meam." Those that seek to take my life.

4. [69:4] Euge, euge." Well done, well done, we have struck him down. Instead of this word, St. Jerome translates: Vah! vah! a word, as Bossuet remarks, not of praise, but of mockery, just as people sometimes cry out in derision: Hurrah! hurrah!

5. [69:5] "Qui diligunt salutare tuum." Those that love the salvation that Thou hast promised. Or, as Bossuet explains: Those that wish to be saved by Thee.

PSALM 70 OF THE PSALTER

David prays to God to come to his aid in the persecution raised against him by his son Absalom. This psalm will serve for all the faithful when they are afflicted by temptations in order to trust in God and ask his help.

1. [70:1] I have placed in Thee my hopes; I hope that I shall not be confounded forever; deliver me from the confusion in honor of Thy justice.

2. [70:2] Give ear to my prayers, and save me from the dangers that threaten me.

6. [70:5] "Patientia." St. Jerome translates: Exspectatio. Hence the verse may be explained with Bellarmine: Thou art my patience, that is, Thou art that divine Lord from whom I expect with patience my deliverance, since from my youth Thou hast been my only hope.

7. [70:6] "In te confirmatus sum." According to the Hebrew: Super te innixus sum; or, as St. Jerome's translation is: A te sustentatus sum. This means: In Thee I have been confirmed, that is, I have found my support and my prop.

8. [70:6] My chant shall always be occupied with Thee, that is, I will always celebrate Thy goodness with praises; I am admired by many as a prodigy, through the benefits that Thou hast conferred upon me; and Thou art looked upon as a strong defence of those whom Thou protectest.

11. [70:10] "Qui custodiebant animam meam, consilium fecerunt in unum." St. Jerome translates: Qui observabant animam meam, inicrunt consilium pariter. Those that spied out my life, my way of living, have conspired against me. Others understand this of the guards whom David kept about his person, and explain it thus: Those that before guarded my life are now united to plot my ruin.

13. [70:12] "In auxilium meum respice." St. Jerome's translation is better: Ad auxilium meum festina.

15. [70:14] But I will always hope in Thee, my Lord, and I will add new praises to all those that I have given Thee. According to Bellarmine, Menochius, and Bossuet, something is here to be supplied.

16. [70:15] "Salutare tuum." The salvation that I have received from Thee.

17. [70:15] "Non cognovi litteraturam." I am little versed in human wisdom. Interpreters generally understand the word Litteraturam as if David meant to say: I have never made profession of that infamous cunning in which my enemy Achitophel abounds. "Introibo in potentias Domini." I shall enter into the power of the Lord, that is, I shall set myself to praise the divine power. "Memorabor justitiæ tuæ solius." I shall have nothing else before my eyes but the memory of Thy justice.

18. [70:17] "Et usque nunc pronuntiabo mirabilia tua." Wherefore I will never cease to celebrate the wonderful graces that Thou hast done unto me.

20. [70:18] Till I succeed in proclaiming Thy arm, that is, Thy great power, to all the generations that shall come to inhabit this earth.

22. [70:20] "Et conversus, vivificasti me, et de abyss is terræ iterum reduxisti me." Then, appeased, Thou hast so to say restored to me life, and hast brought me back from the abyss of the earth, that is, from the depth of miseries.

23. [70:21] "Multiplicasti magnificentiam tuam." That is, Thou hast in many ways shown the greatness of Thy goodness towards me. "Conversus." A Hebraism which signifies that the action is repeated.

24. [70:22] "In vasis psalmi." According to Menochius and Bossuet: In musicis instrumentis. "Veritatem tuam." The faithfulness of Thy promises.[13184]

25. [70:23] "Anima mea, quam redemisti." My soul, which Thou hast redeemed, that is, hast set free from so many dangers.

26. [70:24] "Meditabitur." That is: Shall praise while meditating.

PSALM 71 OF THE PSALTER

David speaks here of his son Salomon, the presumptive heir of the kingdom of Israel, a figure of the spiritual kingdom of Jesus Christ. Thus speak commonly the holy Fathers and the commentators. Indeed, it seems to me that the whole or nearly the whole psalm should be applied to Jesus Christ; for certain expressions that are found in it, and especially verses 5, 11, 12, and 17, can only refer to Jesus Christ, to his coming among us, and to the vocation of the Gentiles; all of which mysteries David clearly saw by the prophetic light.[13185]

1. [71:2] Give to the king the grace to judge justly, and grant to the son of David a righteous justice like Thine own.

3. [71:3] "Montes." This word is variously understood. Maldonatus understands it as if it were Undique; and meaning: May peace be enjoyed everywhere, even on the mountains. Emmanuel Sa writes: Montes, id est, primores, seu præfecti—the chief men or rulers. Malvenda: Montes, id est, totum regnum montibus abundans—the whole kingdom abounding with mountains. It is in this way Bossuet, with Bellarmine and Menochius, explains the verse: Descendat de cœlo pax et justitia, et super regnum Israeliticum requiescat—May peace and justice descend from heaven and rest upon the kingdom of Israel. Lastly, Mariana, and with him Tirinus, says: Montes, ubi scilicet solent esse latrones et ferœ—Mountains, that is, where robbers and wild beasts are wont to be. This last interpretation, as Lallemant thinks, seems to be the most probable. Hence the sense would be: May the mountains and the hills receive peace for the good of the people, that is: may even the people of the mountains, who are usually fierce and turbulent, taste the sweetness of peace and enjoy the fruits of the justice of the prince.

5. [71:5] "Ante lunam." Translation of St. Jerome: Ultra lunam—Beyond the moon. That is: His kingdom shall endure as long as the sun and the moon, and even beyond that.

6. [71:6] "Vellus." About this word there is a great diversity of opinion. Malvenda, Bellarmine, Menochius, Tirinus, etc., understand by it the fleece, or skin covered with wool, upon which Gedeon asked that all the dew that fell from heaven might be collected (Judges, 6:37). Others, as Maldonatus, Mariana, Bossuet, Mattei, with Mark Marino, and Father Lallemant, are of opinion that the word Vellus here means something cut or shorn; hence Lallemant translates the passage thus: His coming to the throne will be like a rain that waters a meadow newly mown. But the first interpretation agrees better with that of St. Ambrose, Rupertus, and Procopius, who understand by the fleece the Mother of God, and by the dew the divine Word, who came down gently as the dew into the womb of the Virgin Mary, by the operation of the Holy Ghost. Moreover, the verse taken in this sense, has a better connection with the following: Orietur in diebus ejus justitia et abundantia pacis—In his days shall justice spring up, and abundance of peace. This is certainly to be understood of the coming of the Messias.[13186]

7. [71:7] "In diebus ejus." Under his reign. "Donec auferatur luna." This happy state will last till the end of the world.

8. [71:8] "A flumine." St. Augustine, Theodoret, etc., understand by the river, the Jordan, because it was there, at the baptism of Jesus Christ, the eternal Father's voice was heard saying: Hic est Filius meus dilectus, in quo mihi complacui—This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased (Matt. 3:17).

9. [71:9] "Terram lingent." Shall lick the earth, that is, shall bow down to kiss the earth that is under his feet.

10. [71:10] "Reges Tharsis, et insulæ." The kings of India and the inhabitants of the isles.

11. [71:11] These verses, from verse 5th, can apply only to Jesus Christ.

12. [71:12] "Pauperem." The weak, or the feeble.[13187]

13. [71:13] "Parcet." According to the Chaldee: Miserebitur—He will have compassion.

14. [71:14] "Ex usuris." According to the Chaldee: Ab oppressione—From oppression. "Et iniquitate." And from iniquity, that is, from injustice.

15. [71:15] "Vivet." He shall live, that is, his reign shall be everlasting. "Vivet et dabitur ei." According to the Hebrew: Vivet, et dabit ei. Hence Maldonatus thus interprets this passage: The poor delivered by him shall live, and out of gratitude will give him gold of Arabia. "Adorabunt de ipso." St. Jerome translates: Orabunt de eo. These words are thus commented upon by Emmanuel Sa: De eo, id est, pro eo. The people will continually pray for him and for the prosperity of his kingdom.[13188]

16. [71:16] "Firmamentum." The Hebrew text, St. Jerome, Bellarmine, Mattei, Lallemant, and all the interpreters of the Compilation of Venice, attest that Firmamentum is put here for Frumentum; and this is the explanation that is given: There will be such an abundance of wheat upon earth, and even on the summits of the mountains, that its fruits will rise above Lebanon, that is, the ears will rise higher than the cedars of Lebanon; and the inhabitants of the city of God, which is the Church, shall flourish or spring up like the herb of the field.

17. [71:17] "Nomen ejus." The name of this new king. "Ante solem." According to the Hebrew: Coram sole; and as St. Jerome translates: Ultra solem. "Permanet." According to St. Jerome, Menochius, Bossuet, etc., this verb is to be understood in the future.

This psalm describes the wretched happiness of the wicked and the blessed afflictions of the just, since the end of the one class will be very different from that of the other. We learn, hence, not to be astonished when we see the wicked prosper and the good afflicted.[13189]

1. [72:1] "Israel" To Israel, or towards the people of Israel. Father Lallemant has understood this name as if it were in the genitive; but in the Greek it is preceded by the article in the dative, and so in the Hebrew text, of which the sense is: Certe bonus est Deus Israeli—Truly, God is good to Israel. It is thus that Bossuet, with several others, explains it.

2. [72:2] That is to say: My belief was almost shaken through the emotion that I felt.

3. [72:3] "Super iniquos." St. Jerome's translation is: Contra iniquos. "Pacem peccatorum videns."[13190] At seeing the peace in which sinners live on account of the prosperity which they enjoy, or to speak more correctly, which they flatter themselves that they enjoy.

4. [72:4] "Quia non est respectus morti corum." St. Jerome translates: Quod non recogitaverint de morte sua—Because they have not reflected on their death. "Et firmamentum in plaga eorum." This passage is obscure, and is differently explained by interpreters. The word Firmamentum presents the greatest difficulty; But Gordona observes that if the particle Non be repeated, by understanding Et as Nec, the sense becomes easy. Thus: "Nec est firmamentum in plaga eorum;" hoc est: Si quod illis accidit malum, cito transit, leve est, et sine firmamento—Nor is there firmness in their wounds; that is, if any evil happens to them, it quickly passes, it is light and has no firmness. Hence the most natural explanation seems to be this: And in their wound, that is, when they feel themselves tormented by the fear of death, their affliction has no strength or firmness, and does not last long.

5. [72:5] They are not in the travail of men, that is, they are exempt from poverty, from fatigues, and from other evils that afflict the generality of men; so that they are not scourged, that is, they do not suffer with other men.

7. [72:7] "Prodiit quasi ex adipe iniquitas eorum." Their iniquity has been produced by fatness, that is, by the abundance of their good things of the earth. Such is the explanation of Menochius. "Transierunt in affectum cordis." According to the Hebrew: Transierunt cogitationes cordis; that is: Omnia contingunt illis supra spem—They all have come to surpass their desires by obtaining more than they wished and hoped for.

8. [72:8] They have meditated and uttered their wickedness, that is, they have employed their thoughts and their words to put in execution their wicked designs; and they have not been ashamed to publish their iniquity "in excelso" as from a high place, to make it known to the whole world.

9. [72:9] They have opened their mouth ever against heaven; that is, according to Bellarmine, against God and his saints, and they have not abstained either from employing their tongue on earth against men. Malvenda's comment is: Quasi dicat: Nec Deo nec hominibus parcunt—As though he would say: They spare neither God nor man.

10. [72:10] Wherefore my people shall turn and see that for these impious men, notwithstanding their iniquity, these are days full of worldly satisfaction. Such is the explanation of Bellarmine and Lallemant.

11. [72:11] And the men of my people say: How can it be that God, in whom is the science or knowledge of all that comes to pass on earth, should know this; and it may be added, should permit it?

12. [72:12] "Abundantes in sæculo." According to the Hebrew: Pacifici sæculi. Behold these sinners abound in riches in this world, so that they are esteemed as those who enjoy peace on earth.

13. [72:13] "Sine causa justificavi." According to the Hebrew: Frustra mundavi. "Inter innocentes." That is, with the innocent.

14. [72:14] "Flagellatus." Scourged, chastised; that is, afflicted by the wicked.

15. [72:15] St. Jerome's translation: Et dixi: Si narravero sic, ecce generationem filiorum tuorum reliqui. The sense of the verse is: But afterwards I said: If I spoke thus, I should do wrong, and I should come to abandon the society of Thy children, that is, to disapprove of the religion of Thy faithful.

16. [72:16] I thought to be able to understand this conduct of Thy Providence; but I perceived that my labor was vain. "Labor est ante me." That is, above my comprehension.

17. [72:17] "In sanctuarium." According to Bossuet: In arcanum; or according to Malvenda: In sacratiora adyta. The sense of the verse is: Until, by means of prayer, I enter into the sanctuary, that is, into the secret judgments of God; and then I came to understand the end of sinners, and what will be the miserable end of their happiness here on earth.

18. [72:18] "Posuisti eis." Menochius says: Subintellige "Mala," ut habent aliqui textus græci—Here we must supply Mala, as being understood, which some of the Greek texts have. The sense, then, is: Nevertheless, because of the deceits which they employ to exalt themselves, Thou hast prepared punishment for them; Thou hast caused their feet to fail them, and hast cast them down whilst they sought to raise themselves to power here on earth.

20. [72:20] "Velut somnium surgentium." St. Jerome translates: Quasi somnium evigilantis. "In civitate tua." According to Menochius: In superna civitate. That is: O Lord! at the end of all things, these miserable men shall be afflicted, as those are afflicted who, after dreaming that they have come to a great fortune, find themselves on awaking in the same poverty as before; and whereas Thy faithful servants shall be honored, in Thy city of heaven, they on the contrary shall be excluded from it, and the great figure that they have made in the world will be brought to nothing.

21. [72:21] "Inflammatum est cor meum, et renes mei commutati sunt." According to the Septuagint: Lætatum est cor meum, et renes mei dilatati sunt; and as Mattei says, the same version is found in St. Ambrose, as also in the ancient psalters. The passage is thus explained: Wherefore my heart was inflamed with joy and my reins were stirred with gladness, when I saw my fears vanish. "Et ego ad nihilum redactus sum, et nescivi." And at the same time I was brought to naught, that is, I became aware of my own nothingness, of which I was before ignorant.

22. [72:23] I confess that hitherto I have been like a beast of burden, not knowing the truth of my nothingness; and, therefore, henceforth, I desire to be always united to Thee, who art my only good.

23. [72:24] Thou hast held my right hand; that is, Thou hast kept me up, so that I might not be lost; Thou hast led me to live according to Thy will, and Thou hast covered me with glory.

25. [72:26] My flesh and my heart have failed, that is, can no longer resist the attraction of Thy love, which draws me to Thee; Thou art the God of my heart; it is for Thee alone to possess it eternally; Thou alone must be my portion and all my good.

26. [72:27] Those that withdraw from Thee will in the end perish; for Thou justly sendest to perdition those that love other objects than Thee. It is thus that Menochius, Sa, Mariana, and Tirinus understand the expression: "Qui fornicantur abs te."[13191]

27. [72:28] My only good is to adhere and entirely unite myself to God, and to place in him all my hopes.

28. [72:28] And thus I hope, one day, to publish Thy glories in Jerusalem, which is called the daughter of Jerusalem.[13192]

PSALM 73 OF THE PSALTER

The Jewish people, submissive and humbled, weep over their captivity and the destruction of the temple; then, imploring Heaven to favor their religion and their kingdom, the children of Israel called to mind the many prodigies worked by God and the numerous benefits received from his bounty. Bellarmine and other interpreters think that there is question here of the persecution of Antiochus at the time of the Machabees. This psalm may be used for asking God's help in the persecutions that the Church suffers at the hands of her enemies.

2. [73:2] "Ab initio." Menochius understands by this the time when the people of Israel had no other king than God: Quæ nullum habuit regem ante te.

3. [73:2] "Virgam." According to St. Augustine, Theodoret, Symmachus, Euthymius, Bellarmine, and Mattei: Sceptrum or Regnum. Explanation: Thou didst redeem the sceptre of Thy inheritance, that is, the kingdom of the Promised Land, by driving out the enemies that occupied it; there is Mount Sion, where Thou hast vouchsafed to dwell for our good.

4. [73:3] Raise the hands of Thy dread power, to strike down entirely their arrogance; Thou knowest how many evils this hostile people has wrought in the holy place; that is, in the holy city, or in the holy Temple.

5. [73:4] Those that hated Thee have gloried in their insults committed in the Temple when solemnities were offered to Thy name. "In medio solemnitatis tuæ." According to Menochius: Dum sacra solemnia peragerentur—Whilst the sacred solemnities were going on.

6. [73:4] "Posuerunt signa sua, signa" They have placed their signs, that is, their banners, on the summit of the Temple. "Et non cognoverunt." According to St. Jerome, Theodoret, Tirinus, etc.: Neque curarunt quantus honor deberetur Templo tuo—And had no thought of how great honor was done to Thy Temple. "Sicut in exitu" According to Mattei: As a common thoroughfare; or, according to Lallemant: As the vilest place to be found in the whole city.

12. [73:11] Why holdest Thou Thy hand afar off, and almost wholly idle, in Thy bounteous bosom, without pouring upon us Thy accustomed graces?

13. [73:12] "In medio terræ." Mazzocchi says that this is a Hebraism, and that it means the same as In terra.

14. [73:13] Here the psalmist begins to relate the wonders wrought in behalf of his people: By Thy virtue, or by Thy power, Thou didst make the sea firm and stable, after having divided it for the passage of the Hebrews; and Thou didst lay low, submerged in those waters, the heads of the dragons, that is, the chiefs of the Egyptians; as is explained by Euthymius and other interpreters.

15. [73:14] Thou didst break the pride of the dragon; that is, of this hostile people who, being sunk, was made by Thee the prey of the Ethiopians, who reaped the spoils. According to Malvenda and Menochius, by the Ethiopians are meant properly the Arabians who inhabit, the shores of the Red Sea, and are called Ethiopians in Scripture.

16. [73:15] "Dirupisti fontes et torrentes." According to Bellarmine: Dirupta petra, fecisti scaturire fontes et torrentes—When Thy people passed through the desert, Thou, from a dry rock broken by Moses, didst cause to spring forth fountains and torrents of water. "Siccasti fluvios Ethan." Thou didst dry up the river Ethan. Bellarmine, Menochius, Lallemant, and Panigarola understand here the river Jordan; but Mattei says that it is in vain to seek what is this river Ethan, and that this word is rather an adjective, which means Rapid. In fact, St. Jerome translates: Flumina fortia—Strong rivers. Bellarmine, Menochius, and Tirinus also give this meaning. Rotigni and Mattei say, however, with Bellarmine: Interpretes cæteri relinquere maluerunt ipsam vocem hebraicam non interpretatam—that is, they prefer to leave the word untranslated.

17. [73:16] "Tuus est dies, et tua est nox." That is: Thou hast made both the day and the night.

18. [73:17] "Æstatem et ver." By the summer and the spring is meant the whole year; because anciently, say the learned, the year was divided only in two parts; and in fact, according to the Hebrew, instead of "Ver," it is Hyemem—Winter.

19. [73:18] "Hujus." Some refer this pronoun to what has gone before as if the psalmist said: O Lord! remember this, namely, these works of Thine. But others more commonly, with Bellarmine, refer it to that which follows, in this sense: Have before Thy eyes what I am about to say to Thee. "incitavit." Has provoked or blasphemed.

20. [73:19] "Ne tradas bestiis animas confitentes tibi." Abandon not to the power of these wild beasts, as are these our enemies, the lives of those that are faithful to Thee.

21. [73:20] "Testamentum tuum." That is, the covenant that Thou hast made with our fathers. "Qui obscurati sunt terræ." According to Bellarmine: Qui obscurati sunt in terra, viles et barbari homines. "Iniquitatem," that is, Inique. Hence this interpretation: Consider how these vile men have unjustly possessed themselves of our houses and of all our property. This second part of the verse is very obscure, as Mattei and others remark.

22. [73:21] Permit not, O Lord! that Thy people, after having been so humiliated, should be brought to confusion: they are poor, are needy; but raised up by Thee, they will know how to praise Thy name and to give Thee thanks.

23. [73:22] "Causam tuam" This cause which is not only ours, but in truth Thy own.

24. [73:23] "Voces." The blasphemies.

PSALM 74 OF THE PSALTER

In this psalm a prayer is offered to God to hasten to the help of the good and the punishment of the wicked. Yet it is in some way a dialogue between God and his people who are in slavery. May the just here learn to reanimate their courage, and the wicked to tremble.[13193]

2. [74:2] "Cum accepero tempus." That is: When the fitting time has come. (Here it is God that speaks). "Justitias judicabo." Quod justum est, decernam—What is just I will determine. This is the explanation of Tirinus with St. Jerome and Theodoret.

3. [74:4] "Liquefacta est." St. Jerome translates: Dissolvetur. Then in the time of my vengeance the earth shall be dissolved, and all its inhabitants with it through the terror that they shall feel; but I will again set up its columns, that is, its foundations, its solidity. This verse is obscure, and different interpretations are given of it.

4. [74:5] (Some think that God continues to speak; but Lallemant with more probability says that it is the psalmist who speaks here). "Cornu." According to Bellarmine: Superbiam—Pride.

5. [74:6] "Cornu vestrum." According to the Chaldee: Gloriam vestram—Do not take pride in your glory.

6. [74:7] "Neque ab Oriente." . . . According to Bossuet and Mattei here should be supplied: Veniet vobis auxilium. The sense is: At the time of punishment there shall come to you no help, neither from the East nor from the West. . . . Others explain thus: In vain will you hope to fly for refuge in the East. . . . But the former explanation is more common, and pleases me better. "Quoniam Deus judex est." God himself being judge, no one can hinder the execution of his judgments.

7. [74:9] "Vini meri plenus misto." Full of pure wine, that is, of justice, and also, at the same time, of mixture, that is, of pity, so as to temper justice with mercy, as says St. Jerome (In Malach. 3.)

8. [74:9] "Inclinavit." According to the Hebrew: Effudit, propinavit. From this cup thus tempered the Lord pours in turn one and the other on men, giving them at one time graces, at another punishments. "Verumtamen fæx ejus non est exinanita; bibent omnes peccatores terræ." But let sinners know that the dregs, that is, the bitterest part of this cup, is not entirely emptied; the wicked shall all drink of it. Bellarmine remarks that for sinners the greater part of their pains, besides those of this life, is reserved for them on the Day of Judgment.

10. [74:11] I will ever strive to repress and break down the pride of sinners; and will, on the other hand, publish the glory of the just, who shall be exalted.

PSALM 75 OF THE PSALTER

This psalm is a canticle of praise and thanksgiving which the Jews address to God for having aided them to be victorious over their enemies. Some Fathers believe that it was composed after the victory gained over the Assyrians and the defeat of the army of Sennacherib (4 Kings, 19:35), the title of it being according to the Vulgate: Canticum ad Assyrios. But Grotius and Xavier Mattei think that David composed it after his victory over the Ammonites (2 Kings, 10), and that afterward Ezechias recited it after the defeat of the Assyrians. It may be used by Christians to thank God for having delivered them from their enemies.

2. [75:3] "In pace." According to the Hebrew: In Salem. The word Salem signifies Peace; but here it denotes the city of Jerusalem. Lallemant with others has, therefore, well translated the verse: He has chosen his dwelling-place in Jerusalem, and his habitation on the mountain of Sion.

3. [75:4] He has broken: "the powers of the bows," that is, the bows of the hostile powers, and the shields, and the swords, and all the forces of their enemies who were making war.

4. [75:5] "A montibus æternis." Nearly all the modern interpreters read according to the Hebrew: A montibus prædæ or rapinæ; and this agrees with the translation of St. Jerome: A montibus captivitatis. Whence it is thus explained: Thou, O Lord! hast caused a marvellous light to shine forth from the mountains of plunder, that is, where our army seized on the spoils of the enemy. "Turbati sunt omnes insipientes corde." St. Jerome's translation is: Spoliati sunt superbi corde. The proud remained conquered and despoiled of everything.

5. [75:6] These men, so proud of their power and of their riches, stricken by the sleep of death, have no longer found anything in their hands. This is the translation of Lallemant; but according to this sense I should prefer to render the verse thus: To the rich of the earth, at the hour of death, all the riches that they have possessed will seem like a dream, since then they will find nothing any more in their hands. Others, however, following the Hebrew text, which instead of "Divitiarum" has Fortitudinis, explain the passage in a sense quite different, thus: They slept and on awaking they found no strength in their hands, that is, they saw that their strength was gone. Bossuet, quoting the translation of St. Jerome, in which we read the word Exercitus for Fortitudinis or Divitiarum, gives still another interpretation: Parte exercitus casa, et somnum mortis dormiente, reliqui, conterriti, nec pugnare potuerunt. A part of the army being killed, the rest, seized with terror, were unable to fight anymore. I see no reason for departing from the first sense. The word Fortitudinis, given in the Hebrew, makes nothing against it; for men of the world regard riches as their strength. This fully accords with the Hebrew text.

6. [75:7] By reason of Thy wrath, or of Thy chastisement, even those were smitten with death that thought themselves the strongest, because they were mounted on horseback.

7. [75:8] "Ex tunc ira tua." According to Estius and others: Cum ira tua fuerit commota—When Thy anger is aroused.

8. [75:9] "Judicium." The sentence of punishment launched against the enemy: "Terra tremuit, et quievit." The earth quaked with terror, and then at once there was calm. But according to the Hebrew, instead of "quievit" it is "siluit." That is: The inhabitants of the earth trembled and kept silence through terror.

9. 75:10 "Mansuetos." All those that are meek, that is, his humble servants.

10. [75:11] This verse is obscure. Lallemant explains it thus: Hence Thy servants who have received mercies from Thee will never think of them without thanking and praising Thee for them; and the memory thereof will cause them to celebrate feasts in Thy honor. But others more commonly, as Maldonatus, Malvenda, Grotius, Mariana, Rotigni, Mattei, etc., supported by the Hebrew text, which instead of the word "Cogitatio" gives Ira, explain it thus: For the fury of hostile man will cause us to praise Thy goodness and power on seeing his defeat; and the remains of the enemy's fury will serve Thee for a feast, since it will move us to celebrate a festival in Thy honor, in order to praise Thee and return Thee thanks.

12. [75:13] "Qui aufert spiritum principum." Who takes away life from princes; or, following this translation from the Hebrew: Qui coercet spiritum principum—Who subdues the pride of princes.

PSALM 76 OF THE PSALTER

According to a large number of interpreters, we have here the prayer that the captive people at Babylon offered up to God. However this may be, this psalm finds a natural place on the lips of those that are in affliction, who aspire, as St. Augustine says, to leaving the exile of this earth in order to enter the heavenly country.

1. [76:2] "Intendit mihi." The literal translation of the Hebrew is: Aures mihi præbuit; or according to St. Jerome: Exaudivit me.

3. [76:3] The following is the explanation of Lallemant: My soul plunged in sorrow, refused all consolation: I remembered God, and this memory filled me with joy; but the thought of my evils made me fall again into despondency. Other interpreters, as Malvenda, Maldonatus, Rotigni, and Mattei, follow the Hebrew text, which instead of the word "Delectatus" gives Conturbatus. St. Jerome understands it in the same sense; we read in his commentary: Memor fui Dei, et conturbabar. Qui olim, quamvis afflictus, audito Dei nomine, respirabam, nunc, minis ejus territus, divini nominis rec ordatione conturbor. I remembered God, and was troubled. I who formerly, however much afflicted when I heard the name of God, would again breathe freely (or revive), now, terrified by his threats, am troubled at the recollection of the divine name. And so, following this interpretation of St. Jerome, which seems to be the one most received, the passage is explained thus: I remembered God, and instead of being consoled by his remembrance, I was thereby still more troubled. "Exercitatus sum." St. Jerome translates thus: Loquebar in memetipso. The sense then of this latter part of the verse is: And speaking, complaining, in myself, I remained anxious and restless through sadness, so that my spirit fainted within me.

4. [76:5] My eyes looked forward to the dawn, that is, I passed the whole night without being able to sleep because of the trouble that I suffered, and without saying a word.

5. [76:6] "Annos æternos." St. Jerome translates: Annos sæculorum—I thought of the ancient days, and I had in my mind the ages of the past. David recalled to his memory, in order to comfort himself, the graces and the favors that he had formerly received from God, and the benefits conferred upon his people.

6. [76:7] "Et meditatus sum." According to the Hebrew: Recordabar cantici mei; or, following the translation of St. Jerome: Psalmorum meorum. At night I meditated in my heart the time when I sang canticles; and thus I exercised myself, and searched out my spirit, that is, I examined my conscience. "Scopebam." St. Augustine in his day read: Perscrutabar—I searched through.

7. [76:8] "Non apponet ut complacitior sit adhuc?" Will he not show himself more appeased and propitious? Such is the sense that St. Jerome gives according to the Hebrew: Non repropitiabitur ultra? And thus also Bellarmine, Bossuet, etc., understand it.

10. [76:11] "Hæc mutatio." Some understand this change in respect to God, following the translation of St. Jerome, who renders the verse thus: Et dixi: Imbecillitas mea est hæc: commutatio dexteræ Excelsi. That is: I said that my weakness, or my wickedness, is the cause of the change of the right hand of the Most High, who from being clement has changed so as to become severe. But others, as Lallemant, with St. Augustine, understand the change to be wrought in the psalmist who speaks: "Et dixi: Nunc cœpi . . ."; which is explained thus: I said that now I begin to breathe again by means of hope; or, according to others, I have now determined to change my life, and this change is the work of the right hand of the Most High, that is, of divine grace, dispellentis, writes St. Augustine, priorem nebulam et caliginem: of grace, which delivering me from the cloud of darkness in which I was before, draws me to himself with a new light. St. Antony, the abbot, enjoined, upon his disciples to repeat every morning, when renewing the good intention of giving themselves entirely to God, these words: Et dixi: Nunc cœpi.

11. [76:12] "Quia." According to the Hebrew: Certe, quin etiam. And assuredly, I shall continue to remember the wonderful things which Thou, O my God, hast wrought since the beginning of the world.

12. [76:13] "In adinventionibus tuis exercebor." St. Jerome translates: Adinventiones tuas loquar. And Bossuet explains the passage thus: Sapientiæ tuæ arcana, et ad salutem nostram excogitata consilia—I shall exercise myself in praising the loving inventions of Thy wisdom with a view to our salvation.

13. [76:14] "In sancto via tua." Bossuet: Viæ tuæ sunctæ. That is, following the explanation of Bossuet: Thy designs and Thy works are always in holiness.

14. [76:16] "Redemisti." Thou hast redeemed or delivered Thy people from the hands of their enemies.[13194]

15. [76:17] The waters saw Thee, O God Almighty! they were stricken with terror, and out of reverence and awe they drew back to their abysses, that is, to their lowest depths. Bellarmine explains this of the waters of the Red Sea, which at the command of God divided to give a passage for the Hebrews.

16. [76:18] Then there was heard a great sound, that is, the great roaring of the waves of the sea, when they rushed on the Egyptians to overwhelm them; the clouds also gave forth their voice, raining with fury on the enemies.

17. [76:19] Lallemant translates: Thy lightnings flashed on all sides, and Thy thunderbolts broke up the wheels of the enemy's chariots. But other interpreters render the sense better thus: The hailstones struck like arrows, and the voice of Thy thunder, that is, the thunder made a noise like that of a wheel creaking by reason of its rapid motion. "In rota." Bossuet says: Instar rotæ rapide discurrentis. Thus also is it explained by Maldonatus and Mariana.

19. [76:20] "Vestigia tua non cognoscentur." St. Jerome translates: Vestigia tua non sunt agnita. Thy traces, that is, those of Thy people who passed over dry shod, were not known by the enemy, who remained submerged.

PSALM 77 OF THE PSALTER

This psalm recalls briefly all that the Lord has done for his people from the time of Moses till the days of David. The psalmist, while exalting the munificence of God, expresses his detestation of the ingratitude of the Hebrews.

1. [77:1] "Legem meam." My precepts, or my teaching.

2. [77:2] "In parabolis." The learned Mazzochi (Spicil. Bibl. in Num. 23:7) says, that in Scripture the word Parabola is used for every kind of poetical composition; whence it is explained: I will open my mouth to sing in verse. "Loquar propositiones ab initio." St. Jerome translates: Loquar ænigmata antiqua—I will speak ancient enigmas. This agrees with the Gospel of St. Matthew (13:35), in which we read: Eructabo abscondita a constitutione mundi—I will utter things hidden from the foundation of the world: I will declare unto you the mysteries of ancient deeds, come to pass since the beginning of the world.

3. [77:3] "Quanta audivimus." St. Jerome translates: Quæ audivinus.

6. [77:5] "Suscitavit." St. Jerome translates: Statuit—He established. "In Jacob, . . . In Israel." Among the posterity of Jacob.

7. [77:5] "Quanta." According to the Hebrew: Quæ—Which.

10. [77:8] "Prava et exasperans." According to the Hebrew: Amara et rebellis; or, following the translation of St. Jerome: Declinans et provocans—Inconstant and irritating.

11. [77:8] "Non est creditus cum Deo." St. Jerome has: Non credit Deo—Believe not God.

12. [77:9] "Filii Ephrem." The tribe of Ephraim.[13195]

15. [77:12] "Taneos." Tanis, the capital city of Lower Egypt (Menochius).

16. [77:13] "Quasi in utre." According to the Hebrew: Quasi cumulum; or, according to St. Jerome: Quasi acervum—Piled up high in a heap.

17. [77:14] "Diei, . . . In illuminatione." St. Jerome translates: Pre diem . . . In lumine. The Lord went before them to show the way by day in a pillar of cloud, and by night in a pillar of fire (Exod. 13:21).

18. [77:15] "Adaquavit." According to the Hebrew: Potum dedit. "Velut in abysso multa." Menochius explains: Ac si essent ad ripam profundissimi fluminis—As though they were on the bank of a deep river.

20. [77:17] "Apaosuerunt adhuc peccare." According to the Hebrew: Iterum peccaverunt; or, according to the translation of St. Jerome: Addiderunt ultra peccare. "In inaquosa." According to the Chaldee: In arido deserto.

21. [77:18] In the psalm of the invitatorium, verse 4, is explained what we read here. The Hebrews in asking of God for bread and flesh, in the midst of the desert (Exod. 16:3; Num. 11:4), wished to tempt him in order to see by this experiment whether he were really able to provide them with such food in a place deprived of everything.

22. [77:20] "Parare mensam." Prepare for us a table such as we desire.

25. [77:21] "Distulit." Mattei interprets: Distulit implere—He delayed to fulfil his promises; but it appears to me better to say: He suspended the course of his benefits to those ungrateful men. "Jacob . . . Israel." The posterity of Jacob.

27. [77:23] "Januas cœli aperuit." This is said to show the abundance of manna that came down from heaven.

28. [77:24] "Manna." Bellarmine says that this name comes from the wonder excited in the people when they saw the earth covered with this extraordinary food, spread over the ground like hoar-frost, and said to one another: Man Hu? which signifies: Quid est hoc—What is this? (Exod. 16:15). The same author adds that manna was the seed of the coriander. "Panem cœli." The manna was thus called, because it came from heaven or from the atmosphere.

29. [77:25] "Panem angelorum." It was thus called, because it was formed by the operation of the angels.

30. [77:26] According to the interpretation of Lallemant, the Lord caused the Auster or east wind to cease, and made the Africus or south wind blow in its place. But Bellarmine remarks that the east wind, Auster (or Eurus), denoted in the Hebrew text is not opposed to the Africus, but is rather next to it and united with it. Hence Theodoret, Euthymius, and others, do not give to the word Transtulit the sense of Cessare fecit—Made to cease; but that of Flare jussit—Commanded to blow; as if it were said, following the explanation of St. Augustine: Transtulit de cœlesti thesauro, et emisit in terram—So that God ordained that these two winds together should bring the quails in the desert.

34. [77:30] "Ascendit." The same expression as in verse 25. When the fire of anger is great, its flame rises on high.

35. [77:31] "Pingues eorum." Bellarmine understands by this: The most voluptuous; Lallemant: The strongest. "Electos Israel impedivit." This means, according to Lallemant, that he struck with death the choice or the pick of their youth; and, according to Bellarmine, that the strongest among them were by God prevented from escaping death.

36. [77:32] "Non crediderunt in mirabilibus ejus." Such wonders could not induce them to fear the Lord and trust in him.

37. [77:33] They consumed uselessly their days in the desert; and their years were shortened.

40. [77:36] They promised to love him; but this promise was only in their mouth, on their tongue, and they thus lied to God.

42. [77:38] "Non disperdet eos." God, who is always compassionate towards others, notwithstanding their sins, would not utterly destroy all his people as they deserved.

44. [77:39] God remembers, that is, he considers that these sinners are men of flesh, weak, and filled with misery, whose life is as a passing wind that lasts but a short time, which comes and goes but does not return. Thus the young man passes on to old age, but does not return to youth.

47. [77:42] "De manu tribulantis." From the hand of their enemy, Pharao, who oppressed them.

47. [77:42] "Taneos." (See verse 15.)

49. [77:44] "In sanguinem." Into the color of blood. "Flumina." Bellarmine says that by these rivers are to be understood the different branches of the Nile which run through Egypt. "Imbres." This properly is not rain, of which there is hardly any in that country, but every kind of water, especially the overflowing of the Nile (Exod. 7:20).

50. [77:45] "Cœnomyiam" (Exod. 8:24). It is a question whether this should be written Cœnomyia, the common fly, or Cynomyia, the dog-fly. The Vulgate has the first, but the Greek more commonly prefers the second; St. Jerome varies.

51. [77:46] "Ærugini." To the rust. Caterpillars and locusts, according to St. Jerome's explanation, devour the herbs like rust or mildew (Exod. 10:13).

52. [77:47] "Moros." St. Jerome translates: Sycomoros; and St. Gregory makes this remark: Sycomorus, quippe ficus fatua dicitur. The word Sycamore, etymologically, meaning a foolish fig (*Mor.*1. 27, c. 27). "In pruina." Mattei says that the Hebrew word signifies here great hail-stones.

53. [77:48] "Igni." By this fire, Mattei understands with probability, frost; which also burns the fields. He does this to avoid introducing another plague of Egypt, that of fire, of which Moses makes no mention.[13196]

56. [77:51] "Primitias omnis laboris eorum." Men labor hard to bring up their first-born, and for this reason they are called the first-fruits of their labors. "In tabernaculum Cham." It was the descendants of Cham, son of Noe, who peopled Egypt after the deluge.

57. [77:52] It is thus, says the psalmist, that God delivered his people from the slavery of Egypt.

58. [77:53] He led the Israelites full of confidence and without fear, because their enemies were now sunk in the Red Sea; and thus their slavery was at an end.

59. [77:54] "In montem sanctificationis suæ." This, as Bellarmine explains, signifies the Promised Land; a mountain, that is, a mountainous land, which God had chosen for himself to be there honored by his people; a mountain, or land, which he had acquired by his own right hand; having wrought so many miracles to help the Israelites in conquering and driving out the idolaters who inhabited it.

60. [77:54] "Gentes." The hostile nations, or the Chanaanites, who inhabited the land. "In funicula distributionis." The lands were measured with cords, according to the custom of those times, to be then distributed by lots to the families of the Israelites.

66. [77:60] "Silo." A town of the tribe of Ephraim, where abode for some time the Ark of the Covenant, which God caused to be made in the desert, and where the Lord in some sense dwelt amongst men; since it was thence he gave to them his answers.

67. [77:61] "Virtutem eorum et pulchritudinem eorum." The strength and the glory of the people of Israel was the holy Ark, as Menochius, Lallemant, and Bossuet, with St. Augustine, explain: God permitted that it should become the spoil of the enemy, namely, of the Philistines (1 Kings, 4:11).

68. [77:62] He suffered, moreover, that his people should be encompassed on all sides by the swords of their enemies; and thus he had to despise that people whom he had chosen as his heritage; that is, to be to him a peculiar and special people.

69. [77:63] "Ignis." The fire of war, or rather of the divine wrath 'Lamentatæ." Some explain this word in an active sense; but Bellarmine, Lallemant, and Mattei think with more reason that it should be taken in the passive sense; thus the meaning is: After the death of the young men, the young maidens whom they were to marry had no one to lament their sad lot; because in the general massacre every one had to bewail the losses in his own family, rather than those of others; and this explanation agrees well with the Hebrew text, which St. Jerome renders thus: Virgines ejus (populi) nemo luxit—No one mourned the virgins of the people.

70. [77:64] "Sacerdotes eorum." Ophni et Phinees, the sons of Heli (1 Kings, 4:11). "Non plorabantur." St. Jerome translates: Non sunt fletæ. None consoled nor even pitied them, because all were occupied with weeping the death of their own relatives.

71. [77:65] But at last the Lord awoke, as wakes up a strong warrior who, heavy with wine, has fallen into a deep sleep. This is the interpretation given by Bellarmine, Menochius, Gordona, and Lallemant; they say that God when he does not punish the wicked seems to sleep a deep sleep. But Mattei justly remarks that the parallel of a drunken man waking up from sleep is ill becoming to God; and he adds that the verse contains not one but two similes; the first is that of the awaking: "Excitatus est tamquam dormiens;" the second is that of the return that God makes against his enemies, like a mighty warrior, strengthened and whetted for fight by the wine that he has taken: Tamquam potens miles exhilaratus a vino; this agrees with the Hebrew text, which is rendered by Ovans or Exhilaratus—Cheered or Refreshed, instead of "Crapulatus."

72. [77:66] "Inimicos suos." The Philistines. "In posteriora." That is: In secretiori parte natium (1 Kings, 5:6). God punished their pride by sores so disgraceful, that they were a perpetual cause of shame to them.

73. [77:67] "Tabernaculum Joseph." That is, the Tabernacle containing the Ark of the Covenant, which was at Silo, a city of the tribe of Ephraim, son of Joseph.[13197]

74. [77:68] "Elegit tribum Juda, montem Sion, quem dilexit." He chose the tribe of Juda, to establish his Tabernacle, Mount Sion, preferring it to all other places in Juda.

75. [77:69] And on this Mount Sion, that is, at Jerusalem, a land that he established to last forever, he built his sanctuary, firm and strong as the horn of the unicorn. Bellarmine says that Jerusalem, which was afterwards destroyed, is here a figure of the Church, which is to endure till the end of the world. Mattei adds that Mount Sion was compared to the unicorn because upon it was the Temple, which was the only temple of Judea.

77. [77:71] God took David from the humble condition of a shepherd, to place in his hand the royal sceptre and the government of his people, composed of the children of his servant Jacob.

78. [77:72] David governed this people with a right heart, and directed them with counsel and prudence in all the works that he did for their good.[13198]

PSALM 78 OF THE PSALTER

This psalm shows us the miserable state of the Jewish people during the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, in the time of the Machabees. This at least is to be inferred from the first book of the Machabees, chapter 7 verse 17, in which the author cites the second verse of our psalm as a prophecy realized in his presence. But, according to St. Augustine, reference is here made to the persecutions that the Church suffered under the pagan emperors.

1. [78:1] "In hereditatem tuam." Against Thy people, that is, Thy inheritance. "In pomorum custodiam." St. Jerome translates: In acervos lapidum—They have made of it heaps of stone. In the first book of the Machabees, we read as follows: Accepit spolia civitatis, et succendit eam igni, et destruxit domos ejus, et. muros ejus in circuitu . . . Et Jerusalem non habitabatur, sed erat sicut desertum—He took the spoils of the city and burnt it with fire, and threw down the houses thereof round about . . . And Jerusalem was not inhabited, but was like a desert (1 Mach. 1:33; 3:45).

4. [78:4] "Qui in circuitu nostro sunt." Namely, the Moabites, the Edomites, the Ammonites, and other Gentiles,

5. [78:5] "In finem." According to the Hebrew and Chaldee: In Perpetuum. "Zelus" Tirinus explains this to be: Indignatio—Indignation. "Velut ignis." Like fire which is not extinguished till it has reduced everything to ashes, says Bellarmine: Qui crescere solet in immensum, et in cinerem omnia redigere.

7. [78:7] "Jacob." The children of Jacob, that is, Thy people. "Locum ejus." Their country; or, according to the Hebrew, their Temple.

8. [78:8] "Anticipent nos misericordiæ tuæ." That is: Prevent by Thy mercy the ruin with which our enemies threaten us.

9. [78:9] "Propter gloriam nominis tui . . . propter nomen tuum." Not for our merits, but for the glory of Thy name. "Libera nos." Deliver us from the miseries in which we are. "Propitius esto peccatis nostris." Pardon us our sins which have drawn this persecution upon us.

10, 11. [78:10, 11] "Innotescat . . . Ultio sanguinis servorum tuorum." Let Thy justice be manifest to all, by avenging the blood of Thy servants.

12. [78:11] "Posside filios." Possess, that is, preserve the children who have escaped from slaughter.

13. [78:12] "Vicinis nostris." To those enemies who are our neighbors. Some think that these are Edomites and Philistines; some others, as Bellarmine, those that brought ruin upon Jerusalem under Antiochus, king of Syria. "Septuplum." Sevenfold, or many times as much, or simply the double, expressing a complete retribution. "In sinu eorum." In the centre of their hearts.

PSALM 79 OF THE PSALTER

We find in this psalm, according as we take it in the literal or the mystical sense, the prayer which the Jews who were prisoners addressed to God for their deliverance, or which the patriarchs offered up, that the Messias might put an end to the tyranny of the devil.

1. [79:2] "Qui regis Israel." According to the Hebrew: O Pastor Israel! or, according to St. Jerome: Qui pascis Israel: O God, who as a shepherd rulest and feedest the people of Israel. "Intende." St. Jerome translates: Ausculta: Hear, Thou who guidest as Thy flock the posterity of Joseph. "Ovem." The Hebrew word, though singular, denotes a multitude, as Menochius remarks. "Joseph." Menochius and Tirinus give the reasons why under the name of Joseph are comprised all the Israelites, descendants of Joseph and of his brethren. (See Psalm, 76:14.)

2. [79:2] "Qui sedes super Cherubim." That is: Thou to whom the first angels in heaven serve as a throne. "Manifestare." According to the Hebrew: Splende, Inclarescere—Make Thy power brilliantly shine forth. "Coram Ephrem, Benjamin, et Manasse." By these three tribes are meant the whole people of Israel, according to the explanation of Bellarmine and others.[13199]

3. [79:3] "Excita potentiam tuam." Awake Thy power; for, as Bellarmine explains, it seems to be asleep, when Thou permittest our enemies to afflict us in this way. "Ut salvos facias nos." By delivering us from this captivity.

4. [79:4] "Converte nos." According to the Hebrew: Reduc nos—Make us recover our liberty. "Ostende faciem tuam." Look upon us with a benign countenance. This verse is thus well rendered by Mattei:

"Signor, da questi carceri,	Ah! from these prisons forth, O Lord,
Deh per pietà richiamaci;	In pity lead us, home restored;
Un sol tuo sguardo bastaci,	Enough, one gracious look from Thee,
E sarem sarem salvi e liberi."	To save and set us captives free.

5. [79:5] "Servi tui." That is: Of Thy people; as Bossuet and others explain with St. Jerome.

6. [79:6] "In mensura." Bellarmine says that some misunderstand this phrase, as though it meant: With moderation; for the Hebrew word here means something great and multiplied, that is, in very full measure.[13200]

8. [79:8] Repetition of verse 4.

9. [79:9] Thou hast brought Thy vine, that is, Thy people, out of Egypt into the land of promise, after having driven there from the Gentiles; and there Thou hast planted it, that is to say, the Synagogue, which was the figure of the Christian Church.

10. [79:10] "Dux itineris fuisti in conspectu ejus." Lallemant translates thus: Thou didst convey (wert conductor of) this vine in the journey, without ever losing sight of it. But others more commonly continue the allegory, following the sense of the Hebrew text, namely: Præparasti locum coram ea; or, according to St. Jerome: Præparasti ante faciem ejus. Hence they translate: Thou hast prepared this land for this vine. Plantasti radices, etc.—And Thou hast caused it to take such good root, that it has filled all this land.

11. [79:11] "Arbusta." St. Jerome translates: Rami. "Cedros Dei." That is, according to Bellarmine and Lallemant: Cedros altissimas—The most lofty cedars, as were those of Lebanon.[13201]

12. [79:12] "Mare." The Mediterranean. "Flumen." The Euphrates. Such is the interpretation of Bellarmine, Lallemant, and others.[13202]

14. [79:14] "Aper de silva." Euthymius, Bellarmine, Malvenda, Mattei, and others understand by the wild boar Nabuchodonosor; and, allegorically, according to St. Jerome, it is the devil. "Singularis ferus." Bellarmine, Mattei, and others say that according to the Hebrew phrase these words designate the same wild boar; it is the ordinary repetition.[13203]

15. [79:15] "Vide, et visita vineam." Consider our miseries, and visit with Thy compassion this vine thus brought to ruin.

16. [79:16] "Super Filium hominis." According to the Chaldee version: Propter Regem Christum. We beg Thee for the love of the Son of man; that is, the Messias, whom Thou hast confirmed; that is, hast established, as Thy Son. It is thus that St. Jerome, St. Augustine, Theodoret, Euthymius, Bellarmine, etc., explain this verse.

17. [79:17] "Ab increpatione vultus tui peribunt." Some, as Estius, Sa, and Bossuet, explain this passage thus: But those that have thus laid it waste shall perish through the wrath of Thy angry countenance. Others, more commonly, as Malvenda, Menochius, Rotigni, Tirinus, and Mattei, with Vatablus, Genebrard, Maldonatus, and Mariana, apply it to the Jewish people in this sense: If Thy countenance continues to appear threatening, and to show forth Thy wrath, all those that belong to the Synagogue will perish.

18. [79:18] Cause Thy power to be known upon the Man of Thy right hand;[13204] and upon the Son of man whom Thou hast willed for Thy glory to send into the world to restore Thy vineyard.

19. [79:19] "Discedimus." St. Jerome translates: Recedemus. "Vivificabis nos." Thou wilt give us the strength to serve Thee.

20. [79:20] Repetition of verses 4 and 8.

PSALM 80 OF THE PSALTER

The psalmist reproves the people for the negligence with which they celebrate the praises of the Lord, and urges them to celebrate them with devotion and in thanksgiving for the benefits received from the Lord; for this end the feasts are instituted. Every Christian can apply this psalm to himself.

3. [80:4] "Neomenia." We should here remark, that the Hebrews celebrated every month the Feast of the New Moon; but the most solemn Feast of the New Moon was in September, when the trumpets were sounded, and hence it was called the Feast of Trumpets: Dies clangoris est et tubarum (Num. 29:1). "Vestræ." According to the Hebrew: Nostræ—Our.

4. [80:5] In the Book of Numbers, 10:10.

7. [80:8] "In Joseph." That is: On the posterity of Joseph and his brethren; that is, on the people of Israel. "Linguam quam non noverat." A language which he did not know, because this was the first time that God spoke to his people.

6. [80:7] According to the Hebrew: Liberavi ab onere dorsum ejus, et manus ejus a cophinis cessaverunt. The prophet recalls to mind the burdens, the baskets full of mud and bricks, that the Israelites were condemned to carry.

7. [80:8] Here it is God that speaks. "Exaudivi te in abscondito tempestatis." This passage is variously interpreted. Mattei understands it as referring to the chastisements that God poured upon the enemies of his people; but I prefer the view of Genebrardus, who explains it thus: I heard thee in the tempest of afflictions which thou didst suffer at the hands of the Egyptians, when it seemed to thee that I hid myself away, and did not hear thy prayer. (This applies well to souls in a state of desolation, to whom it appears as if God does not hear them any more, whilst the Lord in the midst of this storm secretly, that is, without letting them know it, listens to them and helps them.) "Probavi te apud aquam contradictionis." And yet I tried them and found them to be unfaithful near the water of Meriba. The Hebrew word Meriba, meaning contradiction or strife, and so translated in the Vulgate, is the name of the place where the people, suffering from the want of water, contradicted Moses and first refused to obey him. Thus Mattei and others.

8. [80:9] "Contestabor te" Bellarmine explains: Testatum faciam tibi quid a te requiram. "Si audieris me." If thou wilt obey me. "Neque adorabis deum alienum." St. Jerome's translates: Et non adores deum peregrinum.

9. [80:11] "Dominus Deus tuus." Thy only Lord and God. "Dilata os tuum." That is: Enlarge thy desires, and ask of me what thou wilt. "Implebo illud." I will satisfy thee fully.

10. [80:12] "Non intendit." According to the Hebrew: Non acquievit, or according to St. Jerome: Non credidit, that is, would not rest satisfied with believing my word.

11. [80:13] "Secundum desideria cordis eorum." That is, according to their disordered appetites. "Ibunt in adinventionibus suis." St. Jerome translates: Ambulabunt in consiliis suis—They will walk to their ruin through following their evil designs.

14. [80:16] "Mentiti sunt ei." They have failed in keeping their word to him.[13205]

15. [80:17] "Ex adipe frumenti." With the flower of the flow of wheat. "De petra melle." With honey gathered from the rocks; that is, in abundance, since the bees had even made their honey in the midst of rocks.

PSALM 81 OF THE PSALTER

It is God whom the prophet makes speak in this psalm; he reproaches the princes and the judges of the earth for their evil administration of justice, and places before them the moment of death, when they themselves will have to be judged. The last verse shows us Jesus Christ coming to judge all men at the end of the world.

1. [81:1] "Deorum." According to the Chaldee: Judicum. "Deos dijudicat." He weighs the judgments that they render.

2. [81:2] Here God is speaking to the judges. "Facies peccatorum sumitis?" Bellarmine says that Sumere faciem alicujus in judicio, is to judge, not according to the rule that justice demands, but according to the pleasure of him whom the judge wishes to favor. But Mattei says that Sumere faciem peccatorum, according to the proper sense of the Hebrew expression, signifies: Erigere faciem peccatorum, and says he, when judges favor the wicked, they cause the wicked to hold up their head; that is, their pride.

4. [81:4] "De manu peccatoris." From the hands of the sinner who is more powerful and would oppress them.

5. [81:5] The wicked judges do not understand these maxims; they walk in the dark, and they put all the world in confusion by their unjust practices.

6. [81:6] O judges! I have set you up as gods of the earth, by giving you a share of my own power; by virtue of this authority that you have received from the Most High, you are his sons.

7. [81:7] But take note that you are men, and as men you have all to die, and one day each one of you will fall from his post, as the princes who went before you have fallen.

8. [81:8] "Hereditabis in omnibus gentibus." Thy reign shall extend over all the nations as Thy heritage, and at the last day all these must submit to Thy justice and power.

PSALM 82 OF THE PSALTER

We have in this psalm the prayer that the Jewish people addressed to God, asking him for help against the Ammonites, the Moabites, and other Gentiles, who threatened to ruin the Temple and the holy city. This psalm may be used to pray to the intention of the Church whenever she suffers any special persecution.

1. [82:2] "Quis similis erit tibi?" Who shall have power to do what Thou canst? "Neque compescaris." St. Jerome translates: Et non quiescas. Hide not Thy just indignation by keeping silence and peace.

2. [82:3] "Sonucrunt." St. Jerome translates: Tumultuati sunt.

3. [82:4] "Malignaverunt consilium." St. Jerome translates: Nequiter tractaverunt. "Sanctos tuos." Those that adore Thee.

4. [82:5] "Disperdamus eos de gente." According to Mattei, this is a Hebraism, which means: Let us remove this people from the world:

5. [82:6] "Testamentum disposuerunt" St. Jerome translates: Fœdus pepigerunt. "Tabernacula." That is, the tents or the camp, the troops.

6. [82:7] "Alienigenæ" The strangers, or foreigners.[13206]

7. [82:9] "Etenim Assur." St. Jerome translates: Sed et Assur. And even the host of the Assyrians. "Filiis Lot." Mattei says that hereby we can only understand the Ammonites, the descendants of Ammon, son of Lot.[13207]

8. [82:10] "Madian." The Madianites, defeated by Gedeon (Jud. 7:20).

10. [82:12] Oreb and Zeb, two of the chiefs of the Madianites, were slain by the Hebrews (Jud. 7:25). Zebee and Salmana, their kings, were killed by Gedeon himself (Jud. 8:21).

11. [82:12] "Hæreditate possideamus sanctuarium Dei." Let us go to take possession of the Sanctuary of God, that is, Jerusalem, as an inheritance that belongs to us.

12. [82:14] "Pone illos ut rotam" Lallemant thus interprets these words: Send upon them a spirit of giddiness, to disconcert them. "Sicut stipulam ante faciem venti." Scatter them as a heap of straw is scattered before the wind. Such is the explanation also given by Mattei.[13208]

13. [82:15] "Flamma comburens montes." Genebrard and Rotigni understand this of volcanoes, as Vesuvius and Etna, which cause general devastation by the flames they send forth. Bellarmine understands it of the dry grass burning on the mountains; but Lallemant and Mattei interpret it of the lightning that strikes the mountains and sets then on fire.[13209]

14. [82:16] St. Jerome translates: Sic persequere eos in tempestate tua, et in turbine tuo conturba eos—So pursue them with the tempest of Thy vengeance, and confuse them with the whirlwind of Thy wrath.

15. [82:17] "Quærent nomen tuum." That is, they will enter into themselves and be converted to Thee. But others more commonly explain it thus: They will ask to know Thy name, that is, Thy power; they will be instructed therein, and they will venerate it.

16. [82:18] If this is not enough to bring about their conversion, let them remain troubled with continual fear of Thy power all their lives, and let them die in confusion.

17. [82:19] Let them know that the name of the Lord belongs properly to Thee alone, since Thou alone art King of kings throughout the earth.

PSALM 83 OF THE PSALTER

This psalm shows us with what ardor the psalmist, desolate in finding himself far from the Temple of Jerusalem, sighed after the moment of seeing it again. And as the Temple was the figure of heaven, one must believe that he sighed at the same time after the happiness of going to contemplate God in the heavenly kingdom. Nothing is more fitted than this psalm to excite in us the desire of leaving the earth, and of entering the abode of the blessed.

1. [83:2] "Atria Domini." See verse 10.

2. [83:3] That is: My soul and my body leap for joy in thinking of Thee, O living God! Our God is called the living God, in contrast with the gods of the Gentiles, who are dead gods.

3, 4. [83:3, 4] For the sparrow finds its dwelling in some house, and the turtle a nest in which it places its young in safety; and cannot I retire near Thy altars, that is, in Thy Temple, which would be my happy asylum and my happy nest.—This is thus understood by Bellarmine, Maldonatus, and Lallemant. Mattei translates: Altaria tua—Thy altar was my nest, my haven.

6. [83:6] This is the sense that St. Augustine gives to this verse: Happy the man that hopes to receive from Thee the help that he needs, having resolved in his heart to rise more and more to higher degrees of perfection, as long as he is in this valley of tears,—a place where God has placed him to gain merit. But Mattei with Bossuet interprets this in a very different manner. He says that the psalmist, sighing to return from Babylon to Jerusalem, imagines that he is already free, and exclaims: Happy he that hopes for and obtains Thy help; he already returns, he passes by the valley of Bocha, and is there refreshed by the water that Thou causest to rain down. The same author gives afterwards some explanations: 1. "Ascensiones." This word, according to the Hebrew, expresses the return to Jerusalem, and it is this that the prophet represents to himself in spirit: "In corde suo." 2. "Disposuit." A verb that is found joined to the following words: "In valle lacrymarum" which are expressed in Hebrew by the name of Bocha, which was an arid valley, called the Place of Tears: Locus flentium, sive Lacrymarum (Jud. 2:5. In the Hebrew we read: Bochim). 3. "In loco quem posuit." Here the Hebrew word instead of Locus—Place, signifies Fons, a Fountain; so that we translate: Fons ibi ponetur—There shall be set a fountain of water.

7. [83:8] Mattei, following the sense which he gives to the preceding verse, renders this verse as follows: Etenim propitia dabitur pluvia; hinc ibit de cœtu in cœtum, donec videbit Deum deorum in Sion—For a kindly rain shall be granted; and thence he shall go from company to company, till he comes to see the great God in Sion. Thus the psalmist imagining himself refreshed in the valley of Bocha with the water of a most salutary rain, and that he is marching in the midst of the companies of Israelites who are going to Jerusalem, rejoices as if he were already in the Temple and saw the God of gods. But others, following the sense that they at first adopted, give this explanation: For God, who has given the law, which is the road to arrive at life eternal, will give them his blessing; and so they will walk from virtue to virtue till they see the God of gods in the heavenly Sion. What is certain is that these two verses, 6 and 7, are obscure; and interpreters have made them still more so.

9. [83:10] O God, who art our protector! regard us with a gracious eye, and especially look upon our king, who is the figure of the Saviour whom Thou art to send us. "Christi." According to Bossuet: Regis, qui est Christi figura—The king who is a figure of Christ. But it may well be understood as applying principally to the Messias.

10. [83:11] "In atriis tuis." These words designate the Temple, says Mariana: Sic Templum vocat, in quo varia atria erant—He thus speaks of the Temple, in which there were various courts. Tirinus observes that the Temple allegorically signifies the Church, and anagogically, that is, in a higher spiritual sense, heaven.

11. [83:11] "In domo Dei mei." By this house of God Bellarmine with St. Augustine understands heaven; but Bossuet, Mattei, etc., understand the Temple, according to the Hebrew, and is thus translated: Mallem esse custos liminis domus tuæ—I would rather be a doorkeeper of the Temple; that is, amongst its most lowly servants, according to what we read of the most humble offices of the Levites (1 Parall. 9:19, and seq.). "In tabernaculis." This expression here denotes the great houses, palaces.

12. [83:12] That is: God is merciful and faithful to his promises; hence he wishes to grant us grace in this life, and glory in the next.

13. [83:13] "Bonis." Grace and glory are real good things. "Qui ambulant in innocentia." Those that live, keeping away from sin.

PSALM 84 OF THE PSALTER

The psalmist goes to show us, on the one hand, the Jewish people delivered from slavery; on the other hand, mankind redeemed from the slavery of Satan. He enumerates, moreover, the fruits of the Redemption. The Church recites this psalm in the office of Christmas, and we ourselves may recite it to obtain that the fruits of the Redemption may be applied to us.

1. [84:2] "Benedixisti, Domine, terram tuam." St. Jerome translates: Placatus es, Domine, terræ tuæ—At last, O Lord, Thou hast been appeased in respect to Thy land,[13210] and Thou hast blessed it. "Jacob." Of Jacob, or his children.

2. [84:3] "Operuisti omnia peccata eorum." Thou hast covered all their sins; or, as is very well explained by Bellarmine, Thou hast hidden them from Thy face, in order not to see them, nor to punish them. When God covers sins, he effaces them and remits them as if they had never existed. See what has been said in Psalm 31, verse 1.

3. [84:4] "Avertisti ab ira indignationis tuæ." St. Jerome translates: Conversus es ab ira furoris tui—Thou hast put off Thy wrath, as Bellarmine explains it; Thou hast turned away from Thy anger and Thy indignation: Avertisti te ab ira et indignatione tua.

4. [84:5] "Deus salutaris noster." St. Jerome translates: Deus, Jesus noster.

6. [84:7] "Deus, tu conversus." St. Jerome translates: Nonne tu convertens . . . ? That is: If Thou, O Lord, art appeased, and turnest Thy eyes towards us, Thou wilt give us life, by causing us to rise again from sin to grace; and Thy people will rejoice in Thee, singing Thy praises.

7. [84:8] "Misericordiam tuam." The effects of Thy mercy. "Salutare tuum da nobis." That is, according to Bellarmine and Menochius: Give us salvation by sending us the Saviour, or the expected Messias.

8. [84:9] "Loquetur pacem in plebem suam." He will speak of peace for his people, that is, of the reconciliation that Jesus Christ their Redeemer will obtain for them, who is called by Isaias: Princeps pacis (Is. 9:6).

9. [84:9] He will make me understand that he wishes to save the just, and even the sinners, who entering into themselves will be converted, seriously and with all their heart; according to Bellarmine and Bossuet: Qui serio resipiscunt.

10. [84:10] "Verumtamen." According to the Hebrew: Certe, Utique—Surely, of a truth; as Malvenda, Menochius, Sa, Tirinus, and Lallemant observe. "Salutare ipsius." The salvation that God will give them with the coming of the Messias. "Gloria." That is: Jesus Christ; Splendor gloriæ (Heb. 1:3). Thus Maldonatus et Malvenda.

11. [84:11] Mercy and truth, or justice, will meet at the coming of the Messias, so that then justice satisfied and peace bestowed shall embrace each other. St. Jerome and St. Augustine understand by Mercy, the coming of the Saviour for the Gentiles, to whom he was not promised; and by Truth, the faithfulness of the Messias with respect to the Jews, to whom he was promised. We have used the future will meet and will embrace, because in this psalm the coming of the Messias is predicted, as Bellarmine remarks, and the poetical language of the Orientals often expresses the future in the past tense, to denote the certainty of the prophecy.

12. [84:12] "Veritas de terra orta est." That is, according to Lallemant: Innocence will again spring up on earth. Others explain it thus: The inhabitants of the earth will embrace the truth, or the true faith. But the interpretation that seems to me better is that of Bellarmine and of Menochius, namely: Truth shall spring from the earth, that is, from the virginal womb of Mary; so also St. Augustine understands it of the Eternal Word, who is the Truth itself, clothing himself with human flesh in the womb of the Blessed Virgin.[13211]

13. [84:13] God in his goodness will send his Son to become man; and our earth, the Blessed Virgin will give us her fruit, Jesus Christ, who was called the fruit of Mary's womb (Luke, 1:42); thus was accomplished the prophecy of Isaias: Aperiatur terra, et germinet Salvatorem—Let the earth be opened, and bud forth a Saviour (Is. 45:8).

14. [84:14] That is: All his actions and all his steps during his life shall be conformed to rectitude and justice, in order that men by following him may arrive at the country of the Blessed.

PSALM 85 OF THE PSALTER

We have in this psalm one of those fervent prayers that the royal prophet addressed to God in the midst of his tribulations. For, according to the common opinion, David is the author of this psalm. Moreover, he initiates us into the sentiments that filled the soul of Jesus Christ during his Passion, and he prophesies the conversion of the Gentiles. Afflicted souls may use it during their trials to implore the help of God.

2. [85:2] "Custodit animam meam." Preserve my life. "Sanctus sum." St. Jerome translates: Sanctus ego. According to the Syriac version and the Psalter of Milan: Sanctus es; but commonly the interpreters read: Sanctus sum; and Mattei says that we should not depart from the Hebrew. Hence this explanation: I am Thy faithful servant, devoted to Thy service.

3. [85:3] "At te clamavi." I have cried to Thee by asking Thee for mercy. "Ad te . . . animam meam levavi." Dom Calmet explains: I have desired Thy help with ardor. But Mattei's translation is better: I have raised my heart to Thee.

4. [85:5] "Mitis." St. Jerome translates: Propitiabilis—Ready to be propitiated, to pardon.

5. [85:6] "Intende voci deprecationis meæ." Deign to listen to what I ask of Thee.

6. [85:7] "Exaudisti me." That is, according to Bellarmine, Menochius, Sa, and Mariana: Thou hast always been willing to hear me.

7. [85:8] "In diis." Among all the gods whom men adore.

8. [85:9] "Venient." They will come not by leaving the country that they inhabit, but by embracing the faith.

10. [85:11] "In via tua." In the way of Thy commandments. "Ingrediar in veritate tua." Make me to enter it and walk in it with a firm step. Mattei says that according to the Hebrew the word Veritas marks the perfection of anything that is done. "Lætetur cor meum." According to the Chaldee: Uni cor meum; that is, according to Mattei: Collige cor meum; this agrees with St. Jerome's translation: Unicum fac cor meum. Unite, gather together to Thyself all the affections of my heart; make my heart to be only for Thee, so that it may fear nothing else than to give Thee displeasure.

12. [85:13] "Ex inferno inferiori." That is, according to some: From great dangers which were for me a deep grave. But it is better to understand it, with Gordona, of the depth of hell where are the damned; or the abyss of sin, which according to St. Jerome is a kind of hell.

13. [85:14] "Synagoga potentium quæsierunt animam meam." My powerful enemies have assembled in numbers to seek for me and to take away my life. "Non proposuerunt te in conspectu suo." They have not set before their eyes that Thou protectest the just and punishest the guilty. This is thus understood by Bellarmine and Lallemant, with St. Augustine.[13212]

14. [85:15] "Verax." That is: Faithful to Thy promises.

15. [85:16] "Imperium." According to the Hebrew Mattei notes: Robur, strength; or following St. Jerome's translation: Fortitudinem. This passage, as Mariana, Sa, and Rotigni say, may easily apply to Jesus Christ the Son of the Blessed Virgin, who is called herself the servant of the Lord: Ecce ancilla Domini.

PSALM 86 OF THE PSALTER

This psalm is consecrated to the praise of Jerusalem, this glorious city that God had chosen for his dwelling-place. And since Jerusalem is a figure of the Church, the Fathers and the interpreters refer unanimously this psalm to the Catholic Church; built upon the holy mountains, that is, upon the apostles, as St. Jerome, St. Augustine, Theodoret, Euthymius, explain, and as one may infer from these words of St. Paul: Superædificati super fundamentum Apostolorum. Built upon the foundation of the apostles (Eph. 2:20). This psalm is as obscure as it is short.

1. [86:1] "Fundamenta ejus." That is, according to Bellarmine, Mattei, and others: The foundations of the holy city which I contemplate in spirit. "In montibus sanctis." On the mountains of Sion and Moria, where the Temple is built; hence St. Jerome translates: In montibus sanctcarii. "Portas Sion." That is to say: The city of Jerusalem. "Tabernacula Jacob." The habitation of Jacob, that is, according to Menochius, Bossuet, Mattei, Rotigni, etc.: The other cities of Judea.

2. [86:3] "Gloriosa dicta sunt." Many glorious things have been said by the prophets; thus, Menochius, Mariana, and Tirinus.

3. [86:4] God here speaks. "Rahab." According to the Hebrew: Superbi; but the interpreters, following the Chaldee, commonly understand Egypt.[13213] "Scientium me." The inhabitants of which shall one day know me through the faith, and shall adore me. It is thus explained by Menochius, Lallemant, and several others.

4. [86:4] "Alienigenæ." The Philistines. So it is understood by Lallemant, Mariana, and all the interpreters.[13214] "Fuerunt." This past tense expresses here the future: All the people will be there. This is a prophecy that has been well verified in the Church of Jesus Christ by the conversion of the Gentiles, as Mattei observes.

5. [86:5] This verse is more obscure than the others. "Numquid Sion dicet." In this phrase Sion is not in the nominative case. St. Jerome translates: Ad Sion autem dicetur; Estius with Symmachus has: De Sion autem dicetur; et Pagnini: Et ipsi Sion dicetur. "Homo et homo." A Hebraism, which, as Mattei says, can have two senses: it can signify the multiplicity of men, and so it is understood by Lallemant, or the excellence of man, a wise man, a powerful man, etc., as St. Augustine, St. Jerome, Theodoret, Tertullian, and Bellarmine, and others understand it. Hence the verse is explained thus: What! Is there then no one there to say to Sion, that is to Jerusalem, that in the midst of her will be born a Man the most excelling, who will be the Most High, at once God and man, becoming man in the city founded by himself? In ea factus est homo, et ipse eam fundavit. Thus St. Augustine expresses it.

6. [86:6] The Lord will announce it, that is, will make it known in Holy Scriptures written for the instruction of the people, and especially in the writings of the apostles, who are the princes or the heads of the new Church. Thus following the explanation of Menochius, in these Scriptures shall be preserved the names of those distinguished men who have illustrated her.

7. [86:7] In a word, O city of God! O holy Church! those that shall dwell in thee will all be filled with joy on account of the peace that they shall enjoy.

PSALM 87 OF THE PSALTER

The coming Passion of Jesus Christ is the subject of this psalm, according to St. Augustine, who says: Domini hic Passio prophetatur. Here, then, under the figure of a soul overwhelmed with sufferings, insults, tribulations, which prays to God to come to its aid, we see Jesus Christ in the midst of his most bitter sufferings and in his total dereliction addressing himself as man to his heavenly Father to ask his help. This is the explanation given by Bellarmine and many others, with St. Jerome and St. Augustine, who makes this remark: Oravit enim et Dominus non secundum formam Dei, sed secundum formam servi: secundum hanc enim passus est—For the Lord, too, prayed: not according to the form of God, but according to the form of a servant; for according to this, too, he suffered. Every soul in desolation can profitably use this psalm to obtain relief from God.

1. [87:2] "Deus salutis meæ." God, from whom I look for my salvation

3. [87:4] This verse agrees with what Jesus Christ said in the garden of Olives: Tristis est anima mea usque ad mortem—My soul is sorrowful even unto death (Matt. 26:38). It is thus applied by St. Augustine.

4. [87:5] "Inter mortuos liber." Here the word Liber gives rise to different interpretations. St. Augustine applies it to Jesus Christ in two ways: first, in the sense of, Free from sin, in contrast with other men who are subject to death by reason of sin: Inter peccatores solus sine peccato—Though among sinners he himself alone without sin; and then in this sense that he died not through necessity, but only by an act of his free will. This second explanation is adopted by Bellarmine and Bossuet; it appears to me to be more adequate according to the letter in relation to Jesus Christ, typified under the person of David. But, speaking literally of the person of David, Mattei says that the words Inter mortuos liber signify: Separate from the other dead. He cites the example of king Azarias, who, on account of his leprosy, dwelt in a free house: in domo libera (4 Kings, 15:5); that is, in a free house—in domo separata (2 Parall. 26:21); and Josephus, the historian, attests that the same king when dead was also buried by himself in a place apart: Seorsum solus sepultus est. Hence Mattei, explaining this passage with regard to the person of David, renders it thus: I am reputed as separate even from the other dead, as though unworthy to remain amongst them.

5. [87:6] "Vulnerati." St. Jerome translates: Interfecti—Killed. "De manu tua repulsi." That is, according to Bellarmine and Tirinus: Deprived of all help from Thee.

6. [87:7] "Posuerunt." St. Jerome translates: Posuisti. That is: Thou hast permitted that I should be deposed. "In umbra mortis." St. Jerome translates: In profundis. According to Bellarmine, the sense is the same: he adds that the words Umbra mortis signify: A shadow so dense as it deprives of all light, like the shadow of death. He says, moreover, with St. Jerome, that this verse, applied to Jesus Christ, may be understood of his descent in Limbo.

7. [87:8] "Furor." St. Augustine justly remarks that this word is better rendered by Indignation, because fury (wrath) is ordinarily found in those that have a troubled mind. "Omnes fluctus tuos induxisti super me." Thou hast heaped upon me all the floods of ills.

8. [87:9] This was truly accomplished in Jesus Christ when he was abandoned by his disciples: Tunc discipuli omnes, relicto eo, fugerunt—Then the disciples, all leaving him, fled (Matt. 26:56). Stabant autem omnes noti ejus a longe—And all his acquaintance . . . stood afar off (Luke, 23:49).

9. [87:9] "Traditus sum." I have been given up to the power of my enemies. "Non egrediebar." That is, as Bellarmine explains: Non volebam egredi. I did not wish to withdraw myself, my Father having decreed that I should suffer for the salvation of men. "Oculi mei languerunt præ inopia." That is, according to the same interpreter: My eyes have become faint, as if drained by reason of shedding tears.

10. [87:10] To ask help according to what the Apostle says: Preces supplicationesque, ad eum qui possit illum salvum facere a morte, cum clamore valido et lacrymis offerens—Who in the days of his flesh with a strong cry and tears offering up prayers and supplications to him that was able to save him from death (Heb. 5:7).[13215]

12. [87:12] "Veritatem tuam." Thy fidelity to Thy promises. "In perditione." After having lost his life.

13. [87:13] Can the admirable prodigies of Thy goodness and justice be known in the darkness of the tomb and in this place of forgetfulness, to render Thee the homage that is due to Thee?[13216]

14. [87:14] "Mane oratio mea præveniet te." I will not cease to present to Thee my prayers from the break of day.

15. [87:15] This may be understood of the prayer that Jesus Christ made in the garden of Olives: Transeat a me calix iste—May this chalice pass from me; a prayer that his Father did not hear because our Redeemer wished effectively to die, to save man; for, says Bellarmine, had the Son prayed absolutely, the Father would certainly have heard him.[13217]

16. [87:16] "Exaltatus autem, humiliatus sum et conturbatus." That is: No sooner have I received some relief than immediately I saw myself humbled and weighed down with afflictions.[13218]

17. [87:17] "Conturbaverunt me." St. Jerome translates: Oppresserunt me. That is: I am crushed under the blows of Thy justice, on account of the rigor with which all the sins of men have deserved to be punished.

19. [87:19] "A miseria." According to the Hebrew: Ab obscuritate, a tenebris. Hence this explanation that Mattei gives with Marco Marino: Tenebris se abdunt, ne videantur a me—They hide themselves, not to be seen by me and obliged to help me in my misery.

PSALM 88 OF THE PSALTER

St. Jerome divides this psalm into three parts. The first recalls the promise, several times repeated, which God made to David to maintain always royalty in the family. The second teaches us that this promise was not entirely fulfilled in the sons according to the flesh, nor in the temporal kingdom of David. The third shows us the prophet sighing for the coming of the Messias, in whom all was to be fully realized, since he alone was to put an end to the tribulations of his people. This is the reason why the Church recites this psalm in the Office of Christmas.

2. [88:2] "Veritatem tuam." According to the Hebrew: Fidem tuam—Thy fidelity to Thy promises.

3. [88:3] "In æternum misericordia ædificabitur." That is: Mercy shall be for us an eternal edifice of graces. "Præparabitur." According to the Chaldee: Stabilietur—Shall be established. "Veritas tua." That is: Thy fidelity, or the accomplishment of Thy promises.

4. [88:4] "Disposui testamentum." St. Jerome translates: Percussi fœdus. "Electis meis." With my elect; namely, Abraham, Isaac, and the other Patriarchs, as is commonly understood by interpreters. "Præparabo." St. Jerome translates: Stabiliam. God has promised (2 Kings, 7:12) to intrust forever his kingdom to the posterity of David, and this promise was verified in the person of Jesus Christ, as is taught by St. Jerome, St. Augustine, Theodoret, etc. Mattei observes very well that the kingdom of David was perpetuated in Jesus Christ, his descendant, who has continued and will continue eternally to maintain and to govern the spiritual empire of the Church.

5. [88:5] That is: I will establish for thee a royal throne through all ages. Bellarmine justly remarks that this was properly verified only in our Saviour, of whom David was the figure.

6. [88:6] "Etenim." According to the Hebrew: Et, Etiam. "Veritatem tuam." Thy fidelity to the promises that Thou hast made.

7. [88:7] "In nubibus." That is: In the heavens. "In filiis Dei." According to the Chaldee: Among the angels.

8. [88:8] "Sanctorum." That is: Of the angels.

9. [88:9] "Veritas tua in circuitu tuo." That is: Thy faithfulness always accompanies Thee. Mattei understands this part of the verse thus: Thou art powerful; and therefore Thou dost promise much, and Thou art faithful to fulfil Thy promises.

10. [88:10] "Potestati maris." St. Jerome translates: Superbiæ maris—The pride of the sea.

11. [88:11] "Vulneratum." The Hebrew word signifies, according to Menochius: Mortally wounded. "Superbum." In Hebrew: Rahab. That is: King Pharao, or else Egypt.[13219] "Dispersisti." Thou hast scattered Thine enemies by drowning them in the Red Sea, according to the interpretation of Bellarmine.

12. [88:12] "Aquilonem et mare." Bellarmine, Menochius, Lallemant, and Mattei, with Symmachus, hereby understand the North and the South.[13220]

13. [88:13] "Thabor et Hermon." That is, as Lallemant explains: The East and the West.

14. [88:14] "Firmetur." St. Jerome translates: Roboretur. "Præparatio." According to the Hebrew: Basis; or, according to St. Jerome's translation: Firmamentum.

15. [88:15] "Veritas." Fidelity to Thy promises. "Præcedent faciem tuam." That is: Are always before Thy eyes. "Beatus populus qui scit jubilationem." Happy the people that know the joy that is felt in praising Thee! Thus Bellarmine, Menochius, Tirinus, and Bossuet.

16. [88:16] That is, according to Bellarmine and Menochius: Those that praise Thee shall walk in the light of Thy grace, in following the way of Thy precepts; they shall exult with joy all the day long in celebrating Thy name; and Thy justice, which will never fail to recompense Thy servants, will elevate them to a higher degree of perfection.

17. [88:18] Thou art the glory of their virtue, since all their vigor comes from Thy grace, and not from their own works; and it is only by Thy good pleasure that our strength will be raised against the enemy. "Inbeneplacito tuo exaltabitur." St. Jerome translates: In voluntate tua elevabis—In Thy will shalt Thou raise up. "Cornu." According to the Chaldee: Robur—Our strength.

18. [88:19] "Assumptio." St. Jerome translates: Protectio.

19. [88:20] "Sanctis tuis." To ye holy prophets. According to the Hebrew: Sancto tuo; which may be understood of the prophet Samuel; but Malvenda, Lallemant, and Mattei say that the other prophets may also be very well understood in accordance with the Vulgate.[13221] "In potente." In a mighty man, who is David. "Exaltavi." I have raised him to the throne.

20. [88:21] "Unxi eum." I have anointed him, or I will cause him to be anointed as king of Israel; as was done by the ministry of Samuel (1 Kings, 16:13).

24. [88:25] "Veritas mea." My fidelity to my promises. "In nomine meo." That is: By my help. The interpreters say that the expressions of this verse and of the following verses apply better to the person of Jesus Christ.

25. [88:26] That is: I will give him the dominion of the sea and of the rivers. If one wishes to apply to David this verse, one may understand by the Sea the Persian Gulf, the Arabian Gulf, or the Red Sea, and the whole Erythræan Sea, where the Edomites, the Amalekites, and the Arabs, all tributaries of David, lived; and by the rivers, the Euphrates, the Orontes, and others subject to David, when he took Syria, Mesopotamia, and Damascus. But Maldonatus, Bellarmine, Menochius, and many others apply the verse better to Jesus Christ, of whom David was the figure, and to whom God made subject the seas, the rivers, and the whole earth.

26. [88:27] Jesus Christ, speaking of God, calls him his Father, as to his divinity, and his God, his Saviour, as to his humanity. Such is the explanation given by Bellarmine and Menochius.

27. [88:28] Bellarmine and Menochius say that Jesus Christ as God is the only Begotten, and that as man he is the First-born, because he was the Head of the predestined (Eph. 1.). Others apply this verse to the person of David. Mattei justly remarks that in the spiritual sense the expressions in the verse are fully verified only in Jesus Christ.

28. [88:29] St. Augustine also applies this verse to the person of Jesus Christ, saying: Propter ipsum fidele testamentum; which means that God on account of the merits of Jesus Christ kept his promise to save mankind. But others commonly apply it to David in this sense: I will be faithful to him in the promise that I have made him; namely, to give him a Son who shall be Jesus Christ, through whom his reign shall become eternal. This promise was made to David by the prophet Nathan (2 Kings, 7:12). Such is the explanation given by Bellarmine and Menochius.

29. [88:30] This verse corresponds to what we read in the Gospel: Dabit illi Dominus Deus sedem David, patris ejus; et regnabit in domo Jacob in æternum, et regni ejus non erit finis—The Lord shall give unto him the throne of David, his father; and he shall reign in the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end (Luke, 1:32, 33). It also corresponds to the prophecy of Isaias: Super solium David et super regnum ejus sedebit, ut confirmet illud, et corroboret in judicio et justitia, a modo et usque in sempiternum—He shall sit upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom; to establish it and strengthen it with judgment and with justice, from henceforth and forever (Is. 9:7). Jesus Christ was, in fact, to reign over all Israel and over the whole earth; not, indeed, with a temporal rule, which it was not his will to exercise, but with a spiritual rule, of which the earthly kingdom of David was a figure. Hence the verse may be thus explained: I will preserve his race by giving him the Messias for his son, through Whom I will make his throne to endure as long as the heavens; that is, forever. Gordona here remarks that the temporal reign of David ended under Jechonias; whence, he says, this promise of an eternal kingdom can be understood only of Jesus Christ typified by David.

32. [88:33] The Lord threatens the rod and stripes, and not the sword and death, to show that he will come as a father to correct, and not as an executioner to take their life.

33. [88:34] "Misericordiam autem meam non dispergam ab eo." That is, the offence that the descendants of David will inflict upon me will not prevent me from keeping my promise of causing the Messias to be born in his family. "Neque nocebo in veritate mea." According to the Hebrew: Non mentiar in veritate mea—I will not fail in the promise that I have made to him.

35. [88:36] "Juravi in sancto meo." Mattei observes that this is a recognized expression in Scripture; thus we read: Juravit Dominus Deus in sancto suo—The Lord God hath sworn by his holiness (Amos, 4:2). "Si David mentiar." The same interpreter says that in the imprecatory oaths the Hebrews left the second part of the imprecation to be understood; so that Si mentiar means the same as Non mentiar; it is as if God said: If I lie, I am no longer God. "Semen ejus in æternum manebit." His posterity shall never come to an end, since Jesus Christ shall reign for all eternity.

36. [88:38] "Testis in cælo fidelis." That is, according to Bellarmine and Menochius: Like the rainbow which appears in heaven as a faithful witness of the peace which God wishes to keep with men (Gen. 9:16). But Lallemant explains it thus: This throne placed in heaven for the Son of David shall be there forever, a faithful witness of the truth of my promises.

37. [88:39][13222] "Distulisti Christum tuum." Thou hast deferred sending the Messias whom Thou hast promised. St. Augustine says in regard to this passage: Ergo, Domine, non imples quod promisisti—Art Thou not, Lord, going to fulfil what Thou hast promised? He then adds: Manet omnino, Deus, quod promisisti; nam Christum tuum non abstulisti, sed distulisti—Thou still keepest Thy promise, for Thou hast not cast off Thy Christ, but Thou hast delayed him.

38. [88:40] "Sanctuarium." According to the Hebrew: Diadema. The verse is thus explained: It seems as if Thou hast revoked the covenant and the promise Thou hast made to Thy servant David; for Thou hast permitted Thy sanctuary to be profaned on earth, by allowing the crown to pass into the hands of a Gentile king, who has seized upon the throne. This happened when Jechonias and Sedecias, descendants of David, were taken captive. But St. Augustine, Bede, Cassiodorus, and others, apply this text to the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus.

39. [88:41] "Destruxisti omnes sepes ejus" Thou hast willed all the walls of the kingdom of David to be ruined, so that it remained as a vineyard without hedges. "Posuisti firmamentum ejus formidinem" According to the Hebrew: Posuisti in munitionibus ejus formidinem; or, according to the translation of St. Jerome: Posuisti munitiones ejus pavorem. That is: Thou hast set fear in the place of the fortresses of the kingdom. Thus Lallemant explains it: Fecisti ut in locum munitionis succederet formido—Thou hast caused terror to take the place of defence.

41. [88:43] "Exaltasti dexteram." Thou hast increased the strength, the power.

42. [88:44] St. Augustine, applying this passage to the destruction of the Jewish people, and to the ruin of their kingdom for having put to death Jesus Christ, exclaims: Terram perdidit, pro qua Dominum occidit!—It has lost that land for which it killed the Lord!

43. [88:45] We translate this verse as Father Lallemant[13223] does. But St. Augustine explains differently the words "Destruxisti eum ab emundatione;" he says that the Jews not believing in Jesus Christ remained deprived of the grace which would have purified them: Soluti sunt ab emundatione; for faith alone was able to purify their hearts from their sins.

44. [88:46] "Minorasti dies temporis ejus." St. Augustine says that the Jews believed that their kingdom would last forever: Putabant se in æternum regnaturos.

45. [88:47][13224] "Avertis." According to the Hebrew: Absconderis—Wilt Thou hide Thyself? "In finem?" Is it to be until our ruin is complete? The sense of the verse is: How long, O Lord, wilt Thou refuse to look graciously upon us? Is Thy anger, then, like fire, which is not quenched until it has utterly consumed whatsoever it lays hold of? Thus Lallernant explains the words with Bellarmine.

46. [88:48] "Memorare quæ mea substantia." Bellarmine thus translates the Hebrew: Memorare ego quanti temporis sim—Consider how short the time is that remains for me to live. St. Augustine, explaining these words with reference to Jesus Christ, makes David say: Remember, O Lord, what is my substance, that is, that Thy Son is to take flesh from my blood.

48. [88:50] "In veritate tua." That is, according to Thy fidelity.

49. [88:51] "Quod continui in sinu meo." Mattei explains: Quibus opprobriis plenus est sinus meus—Of which reproach my own heart is full.

50. [88:52] "Commutationem." According to the Hebrew: Claudicationem—Limping. That is: Thy enemies, O Lord, upbraid us, and for what? Because Thy Christ, or the Messias, comes limping with too slow a pace. When the Gentiles insulted the Jews, the latter answered them that the Messias would soon come to deliver them from their miseries; but the Gentiles, continuing their reproaches, rejoined: How is this? Is your Messias lame, that he never arrives?

51. [88:53] That is: But may the Lord be blessed forever, for he cannot fail in his promises; let us, then, humbly pray to him to accomplish with all speed the promise that he has made to send us the Saviour.[13225]

The subject of this psalm is the Providence of God, attentive to the punishing of the wicked and to the rewarding of the just; although, by a judgment full of wisdom, it often happens that the wicked prosper in this world and the just are afflicted. The first fourteen verses of this psalm show us the just who are afflicted and who lament in seeing the prosperity of the wicked. The psalmist rebukes the just for their little faith, and exhorts them to be patient and to put their trust in God.

1. [93:1] The Lord is the God of vengeance, that is, he that punishes crimes; he punishes them, and there is no one that can prevent him from doing so. In the Hebrew this verse is in the imperative mood, and St. Jerome thus translates it: Dens ultionum, Domine, Deus ultionum ostendere—O Lord, God of vengeance, show the power That thou hast of punishing the wicked.[13226]

2. [93:2] "Exaltare." That is: Let Thy all-powerful justice be known.[13227] St. Augustine here remarks that the prophet, under the imperative form, is simply predicting. He says: Prophetia est prædicentis, non audacia jubentis—The prophecy of one that predicts, not the presumptuousness of one that commands.

5. [93:5] "Humiliaverunt." According to the Hebrew: Attriverunt. That is: They have oppressed and tormented this people who are Thy inheritance.

6. [93:6] That is: They did not hesitate to put to death all those that they found before them: the widows, the orphans, and even strangers whom they did not know.

7. [93:7] "Nec intelliget Deus Jacob." According to St. Augustine: Deus nee advertit ut sciat—God does not pay attention to know these things.

9. [93:9] "Plantavit." That is: Has formed.[13228] "Considerat." St, Jerome translates: Videbit—Shall he not see?

10. [93:10] "Corripit." St. Jerome and St. Augustine translate: Erudit—Instructs. "Qui docet hominem scientiam." St. Augustine says: Ipse non scit, qui te fecit scire?—Does he not know who made thee know?

11. [93:11] "Vanæ." Vain: or, as Mattei prefers, Evil; he says that in the language of the Bible vanity means sin.

12, 13. [93:12, 13] "Ut mitiges ei." According to the Hebrew: Ut quietem des illi—That Thou mayest give him rest; or, according to St. Jerome's translation: Ut quiescat—That he may rest. Hence it is thus explained: Happy he whom thou dost instruct, so as to mitigate his pain in the time of tribulation. "Fovea." The pit of the grave, that is, death; this signifies that the sinner, though he is not afflicted in this life, yet has to die.

14. [93:14] "Plebem suam, et hereditatem suam." His people who are faithful to him, and his inheritance which is the same faithful people. (See verse 7.)

15. [93:15] Different interpretations are given to this verse; but the following appears to me clear: God does not abandon his faithful servants until justice is resolved into judgment, and according to the same justice, all those that are upright in heart shall be judged. This sense seems to me to be that of St. Jerome's translation, although it is expressed in different terms, namely: Quoniam ad justitiam revertetur judicium, et sequentur illud omnes recti corde—Because judgment shall return to justice, and all the upright in heart shall follow it (that is, judgment).

16. [93:16] "Consurget mihi . . . Stabit mecum." St. Jerome repeats: Stabit pro me—Will stand up for me.

17. [93:17] "In inferno." St. Augustine understands thereby the real hell of the damned; he thus explains: Prope rueram in illam fossam quæ paratur peccatoribus—I was on the point of falling into the pit which is prepared for sinners.

18. [93:18] "Motus est pes meus." That is: I am in danger of falling.

20. [93:20] That is: Wouldst Thou have a throne like that of unjust judges, Thou who feignest or imaginest that Thy precepts are accomplished only with labor and irksomeness? Estius says that here in the Hebrew the word "Laborem" signifies Affliction. So also Bellarmine, whose explanation seems to be the best.

PSALM 95 OF THE PSALTER

We see, according to 1 Paral. 16:7–36, that David composed this psalm when the Ark was transferred from the house of Obededom to the Tabernacle erected on Mount Sion, which is the figure of our holy Church. In this psalm the Jews are exhorted to praise the Lord, and especially are Christians called on to serve Jesus Christ. With St. Jerome, St. Augustine, St. Ambrose, and with the generality of interp reters, Bellarmine says that David in this psalm aimed chiefly at foretelling the coming of the Messias and the establishment of his kingdom.[13229]

2. [95:2] "Salutare ejus" According to the Hebrew: Salutem ejus; and the Chaldee: Redemptionem ejus. That is: The salvation that he has procured us by Redemption.

5. [95:5] "Dæmonia." According to the Hebrew: Dii vani, falsi, nihil—Vain, false gods, nothing.

6. [95:6] "Confessio et pulchritudo in conspectu ejus." According to the Hebrew: Gloria et decor coram eo; and Mattei says that in the Bible the word Confessio is taken for the praise that is given to God.[13230] "In sanctificatione ejus." Mattei understands: In ipso Sancto—In him the Holy One by essence. We may also transate these words according to the Hebrew: In sanctuario ejus,—In his Temple, or Tabernacle.

7. [95:7] "Patriæ gentium." Estius, according to the Hebrew, says that we should read: Familiæ gentium. So also Menochius. Tirinus, and others, with St. Jerome, who translates: Familiæ populorum.

8. [95:8] "Hostias." Bellarmine and Menochius say that the Hebrew word denotes an unbloody offering, and especially one made of flour; this points to the Holy Eucharist. Jansenius of Ghent, Tirinus, Rotigni, Sa, and others, make the same remark.

9. [95:9] "Commoveatur." St. Jerome translates: Paveat. "Regnavit." St. Justin (Dial. cum Tryph.), St. Augustine, and St. Leo read: Regnavit a ligno—Hath reigned from the wood. But the Church no longer uses this version, except in the hymn Vexilla Regis, in which she sings: Regnavit a ligno Deus.

10. [95:10] "Correxit." According to the Hebrew and the Chaldee: Firmavit—Has made firm, or established.[13231]

11. [95:11] "Plenitudo ejus." All that is in the sea, as the islands, the fishes, etc. "Omnia quæ in eis sunt." All that is found in the fields, as the flocks and herds, the plants, etc.

13. [95:13] "In æquitate . . . In veritate sua." That is: With an exact judgment as regards the good and the wicked.

PSALM 96 OF THE PSALTER

According to Xavier Mattei, the holy Fathers saw in this psalm the announcement of the first and the second coming of the Redeemer. Hence the psalm is chiefly to be understood in the spiritual sense.

1. [96:1] That is: Behold, the Lord has come to govern and to judge the world; let them all, the inhabitants of the earth, rejoice.

2. [96:2] "Correctio." According to the Hebrew: Firmamentum; which signifies that the firmness of his tribunal will consist in the justice of his judgments.[13232]

3. [96:3] Fire will consume everything on the last day according to what St. Peter says: Terra autem, et quæ in ipsa sunt opera, exurentur—The earth and the works that are in it shall be burnt (2 Peter, 3:10).

7. [96:7] "In simulacris suis." In the protection of the idols that they invoke.

8. [96:7] "Audivit, et lætata est Sion." Sion, the faithful people, the Church, hearing of these things was full of joy, according to the invitation given in verse 1.

9. [96:8] "Filiæ Judæ" The same faithful people. "Propter judicia tua." Knowing that Thou art to judge the world.

10. [96:9] "Omnes deos." That is, according to Mattei: All the judges of the earth.

11. [96:10] "Sanctorum suorum." Of his servants. "De manu peccatoris." According to the Hebrew: De manu impiorum—From the hands of the ungodly.

12. [96:11] The gift of light is granted to the just man, and that of joy to all those that are right of heart.

13. [96:12] "Confitemini memoriæ sanctificationis ejus." Praise him, ever mindful of the gift of sanctification which you have received from him.

PSALM 97 OF THE PSALTER

The prophet thanks God for having delivered his people from captivity; he at the same time foretells in a figurative sense the coming of Jesus Christ and the Redemption of mankind.

1. [97:1] "Quia mirabilia fecit." For the marvels that he has wrought in behalf of his servants.

2. [97:1] This verse may well be applied to Jesus Christ. "Sibi." Bellarmine says that this word, according to the Hebrew, is to be understood as if it were Ipsa; which gives this meaning: It is his own right hand that has saved the world. But St. Augustine refers the pronoun Sibi to Jesus Christ, as to the end proposed, thus: Christ has saved men for himself, that is, for his own glory. "Et brachium sanctum ejus." And all has been the work of his own holy arm.[13233]

3. [97:2] "Salutare suum." The salvation that he has provided for the world. "Revelavit justitiam suam" He has by means of his apostles manifested his justice, that is, his fidelity in the accomplishment of the promised Redemption.

4. [97:3] God is said to remember when he fulfils a promise that he has made; now he had promised the people of Israel to come to save mankind; and he remembered his mercy and his fidelity by accomplishing this promise.

7. [97:5] "Voce psalmi." That is, as explained by Bellarmine, Menochius, and Lallemant: Sonitu psalterii—With the sound of the psaltery. "Ductilibus." Menochius thus explains them: Mettalicis, ex laminibus malleo ductis—Long, straight, metal trumpets shaped and attuned by the hammer.

9. [97:8] "Plaudent manu." As one does to praise any one, "Judicare." To govern by excellent laws.

10. [97:9] "In æquitate." According to the Hebrew, as Bellarmine remarks: In rectitudine—Rectitude, or righteousness.

PSALM 98 OF THE PSALTER

David invites his people to come to praise and invoke God on the Mount Sion. Now the Mount Sion is a figure of the Catholic Church, in the bosom of which we should invoke and praise Jesus Christ.

1. [98:1] The Lord has established his reign in spite of the idolatrous nations who are enraged thereat. He has his throne above the Cherubim, however much the earth be thereby troubled; this signifies that no one can resist his power.

3. [98:3] Let all praise and fear Thy great name; for it is terrible on account of its power and its sanctity, and the honor of a king, that is, his dignity, his authority, requires him to love justice, that is, to exercise righteous judgment by rendering to every one according to his deserts.

4. [98:4] Thou hast established righteous laws for the direction of the conduct of men, as Thou hast shown in the midst of the people of Israel, exercising justice and judgment, that is, judging always according to judgment.

5. [98:5] "Scabellum pedum ejus." They invoked the Lord before the holy Ark. "In columna nubis." According to St. Augustine, by the column of fire we must understand the obscure language that the Lord used.[13234]

8. [98:7] "Testimonia ejus." That is, according to Bellarmine: All the precepts given in common to all. "Preceptum quod dedit illis." The special precept that he had given them, namely, to govern and to instruct the people.

9. [98:8] "Propitius fuisti eis, et ulciscens in omnes adinventiones eorum." St. Augustine and Menochius give this explanation: Thou wast propitious to them in pardoning the people for their sake, but without letting go unpunished the injuries and the calumnies that they had to suffer from this people. Bellarmine says that these two interpretations are probable.

10. [98:9] "Sanctus Dominus Deus." God is holy by essence, and consequently worthy of every homage.

PSALM 99 OF THE PSALTER[13235]

The royal prophet exhorts the faithful to praise God and to thank him first for having created us; then for having given us for our mother this holy Church which nourishes her children as young and tender sheep.

1. [99:2] All ye people of the earth, let all your joy be to praise your God, and to serve him as is meet.

3. [99:3] Have always before the eyes of your mind that the Lord is the true God; we did not of ourselves come into the world, nor did we make ourselves; it is he that gave us being.

4. [99:3] "Introite portas ejus in confessione." Enter, therefore, the gates of his tabernacle, by confessing yourselves unworthy to stand in his presence. "Confitemini illi." Acknowledge that all that you have has come from his beneficent hand.

5. [99:4] "Veritas ejus." The truth of his teachings and of his promises.

PSALM 100 OF THE PSALTER

David here gives excellent instructions to those that govern, and particularly to princes how they should live well. Also, every father of a family will find in this psalm rules for his conduct.

2. [100:1] "Psallam." I will sing Thy praises upon the psaltery. "Intelligam in via immaculata." According to the Hebrew: In via perfecta. I will apply myself to know and to follow the pure and perfect way. "Quando venies ad me?" But when wilt Thou come to my help?[13236]

3. [100:2] "Perambulabam." Some explain this and the following verse in the past tense, as they are in the Vulgate and in the Greek; but the Hebrew has them in the future, and thus St. Jerome translates: Ambulabo—I will walk. "Domus meæ." That is, of those belonging to my house.

4. [100:3] That is, with the verbs in the future tense: I will never propose to do anything unjust; I will hate, or I hold in abomination, all the transgressors of Thy law.

5. [100:4] "Non adhæsit mihi cor pravum." St. Jerome translates: Cor pravun recedet a me. Explanation of this verse: I will never associate with those who have their heart perverse; and if any one of those wicked persons keeps away from me, that is, does not wish to have me for a friend by changing his conduct, I will not know him, that is, I will show that I do not wish to know him.

6. [100:5] That is: For him who secretly rends the character of his neighbor, I will keep him at a distance, or I will ever persecute him by reproaching him with his vice.

7. [100:5] I will never sit at table with those who have a proud eye, that is, who look upon others with contempt; nor with the insatiable of heart, that is, with the ambitious and avaricious.

8. [100:6] My eyes shall be attentive to choose for my companions faithful men who live with me on this earth, and I will not have myself served or aided in my needs except by those that live apart from vice.

9. [100:7] The proud man shall not live in my house, and he that speaks unjustly, by lies or detraction, shall not remain long before my eyes, that is, I will drive him from my presence. "Non dixerit." According to the Hebrew: Non firmabitur—shall not be established.

10. [100:8] I will hasten to exterminate all the wicked from the country, taking care that they are punished; thus I shall banish from the city of the Lord all those that lead bad lives, and who seek to have companions in evil.

PSALM 101 OF THE PSALTER

In this psalm, which is one of the seven penitential psalms, we see one humbling himself before God, praying for himself and for all the people.[13237] According to St. Augustine, it is Jesus Christ who prays for us; in fact, it cannot be denied that in certain verses the Messias and his coming are spoken of.

4. [101:4] "Cremium." Du Hamel says: Cremium est id omne quod facile crematur—Whatever easily burns.

5. [101:5] Interpretation: My heart has been stricken as grass by Thy hand, and my spirit has remained in aridity so that I have forgotten to take my food.[13238]

7. [101:7] "Pelicano." The pelican loves solitude. According to Mattei, this bird is said to exist, but in reality no one has any knowledge of it. "Nycticorax." St. Jerome translates: Bubo—the owl which makes its dwelling in ruins and deserted places. "Domicilio." Mariana says: Vox hebræa ruinas vel parrietinas significat—The Hebrew word signifies ruins or crumbling walls.

8. [101:8] I have passed whole nights without sleep under the pressure of my woes, and I am become like a solitary sparrow which complains upon the roof, that is, sadness keeps me to within the most retired parts of my house.

9. [101:9] "Jurabant." According to Du Hamel: Conjurabant—Conspired together.

10. [101:10] "Cinerem tamquam panem manducabam." The bread that I ate seemed to me insipid as ashes.

11. [101:11] "Elevans allsisti me." St. Jerome translates: Levasti me, et allisisti me.

13. [101:13] "In æternum permanes." That is: Thou art, and Thou wilt always be the same. "Memoriale tuum." According to the Chaldee: Memoria tua. Mattei says that the Hebrew may be so translated; and Menochius explains it thus: Tui memoria, et mentio, et laus—The memory, the mention, and the praise of Thee.

14. [101:14] "Exsurgens." That is: As if rising from a profound sleep. "Tempus." The time fixed in Thy decrees.

15. [101:15] Mariana says that here is meant the city of Jerusalem, when it was destroyed by its enemies. "Lapides ejus." The heaps of stones, which is all that is left of the city. "Terræ ejus." The Hebrew, according to Menochius, Bossuet, and Mattei, here signifies Pulveris ejus—The dust of its ruins.

16. [101:16] "Gloriam tuam" That is: They shall know and fear Thy power.

17. [101:17] Thus it shall happen when God shall build up Sion; and he shall be seen in his glory, that is, in his temple, according to Maldonatus, Mariana, and Mattei.

19. [101:19] "Populus qui creabitur." Mattei says that this is to be understood of Christians, who, regenerated by baptism, are called by St. Paul: Nova creatura—New creature (Gal. 6:15).

21. [101:21] "Filios interemptorum." According to the Hebrew: Filios mortis. Mattei observes that these two versions according to the Hebrew expression signify the same thing, namely: Those doomed to death; that is, men deprived of the grace before the Redemption.

23. [101:23] "In unum." In one church, in one same faith. Du Hamel thus comments: Hæc ad Ecclesiam sub Christo referuntur. Bellarmine, Malvenda, Mariana, and Menochius say the same.

24. [101:24] Bellarmine and Mattei say that this verse is very obscure, as indeed it is. "Respondit ei." Bellarmine thinks that it is the psalmist who answers God in regard to what the Lord ordained in verse 19. "In via virtutis suæ." That is: In the time of the vigor of his age. "Paucitatem dierum meorum nuntia mihi." O Lord, make me know the shortness of my days, that is, according to the interpreters, if my life shall be too short for me to see the end of these evils on the day of man's redemption.

25. [101:25] "Ne revoces me." St. Jerome translates: Ne rapias me: For mercy's sake, do not withdraw me from the world. "In generationem et generationem anni tui." Thou whose years are eternal, canst add to the number of my years.

26. [101:26] St. Paul applies to Jesus Christ this verse and the two following verses (Heb. 1:10).

27. [101:27] "Permanes." St. Jerome translates: Stabis: Thou shalt ever remain the same. "Veterascent." St. Jerome translates: Atterentur—They shall come to an end, as a garment worn out by long use.

28. [101:27] "Opertorium." St. Jerome translates: Pallium, a cloak, Mattei here admires the images of the Oriental poetry.

29. [101:29] "Habitabunt." shall dwell there, that is, in the holy city. "Semen eorum in sæculum dirigetur." That is: Thou wilt ever have a care of their posterity.[13239]

PSALM 102 OF THE PSALTER

The psalmist extols the divine mercy; but finding himself incapable of praising and thanking God as his benefits deserve, he invites the angels and all creatures to do so in his name.

1. [102:1] "Omnia quæ intra me sunt." All my powers.

3. [102:3] "Propitiatur omnibus iniquitatibus tuis." He is propitious that is, he pardons all thy sins. Thus nearly all interpret. "Omnes infirmitates tuas." That is, as Mattei observes: All thy infirmities, corporal and spiritual.

4. [102:4] "De interitu." St. Jerome translates: De corruptione: and according to the Chaldee: De gehenna: That is: He delivers thy corporal life from the death of the body, and thy spiritual life from the death of the soul, whether it be from sin, or as we may also understand, from hell. "Coronat te." According to Estius and others: He surrounds them on all sides.

5. [102:5] "Renovabitur ut aquilæ juventus tua." He will make thy youth renewed, as the wings and the strength of the eagle are renewed. This may be understood, as Mattei says, of the renewal of the soul by baptism, and conversion to penance, according to the words of St. Paul: Exspoliantes vos veterem hominem, cum actibus suis, et induentes novum, eum qui renovatur. . . . Stripping yourselves of the old man with his deeds, and putting on the new, him who is renewed . . . (Col. 3:9, 10).

7. [102:7] "Vias suas." That is: The dispositions of his Providence.

8. [102:8] God is compassionate and merciful, and he will manifest to us the effects of his mercy. "Longanimis." He is slow to punish, he is patient, but only up to a certain point.

9. [102:9] If he is angry with any one, and if he threatens to abandon him, his menaces will not last always if the sinner amends his life.

10. [102:10] Ah! let us never cease to thank him, knowing that he has not treated us as our sins deserve, and that he has not punished us according to our wickedness.

13. [102:13] "Figmentum nostrum."[13240] That is: Our weakness.

14. [102:14] He knows that we are only dust, and that man, living on this earth, is like the grass, which to-day flowers in the field and to-morrow withers and dies.

15. [102:16] "Spiritus pertransibit in illo, et non subsistet." In this life the spirit is not in man; but is passing on its way to eternity. "Non cognoscet amplius locum suum." That is: He does not return to know his place any more, that is, to begin over again his past years.

17. [102:17] "Justitia illius." His beneficent justice. "Testamentum ejus." His covenant, or his law,

19. [102:19] "Regnum ipsius omnibus dominabitur," That is: All will have to obey his rule.

According to the interpreters, this psalm presents a brilliant description of the glory of the Saviour as manifested in the works of nature. In it we find a eulogy of the wisdom and of the power that God has shown forth in creating heaven and earth. The author of the arguments, placed at the head of the psalms in the Compilation of Venice, adds that we learn here how to see nature and the manifold variety of created things.

1. [103:1] "Vehementer." St. Jerome translates: Nimis: Beyond all measure, exceedingly. That is: Thou hast made Thy greatness known by Thy works in a wonderful manner.

2. [103:2] "Confessionem." According to the Hebrew: Gloriam—Glory.[13241]

3. [103:2] "Pellem." According to the Hebrew: Tentorium. "Aquis." Estius understands by this the clouds. According to Mattei, this part of the heavens is really covered with waters.[13242]

4. [103:3] Thou ridest upon a cloud, as upon a chariot which goes whither Thou willest; Thou walkest flying on the winds as if they were birds that had their wings extended.

5. [103:4] Thou makest the celestial spirits who are always before Thy throne Thy angels; and of these same spirits who burn with the fire of Thy love Thou makest messengers, to execute Thy orders with promptitude and efficacy. Thus St. Augustine interprets this verse; so also St. Gregory (In Evang. hom. 54); and this agrees with the absolute application that St. Paul makes of it to the angels.

6. [103:5] "Stabilitatem suam." St. Jerome translates: Bases suas. That is, as Lallemant well explains: Thou hast made it firm by its own weight; so that, as Mattei adds, it supports itself.

7. [103:6] "Abyssus." Mattei says that this word in the language of the Bible signifies an accumulation of waters. "Stabunt." According to the Hebrew: Stabant. The sense of the verse is: There was a time when Thou didst cover the earth with waters in such a manner that these waters were higher than the mountains (Gen. 7:20).

8. [103:7] Then at the sound of Thy voice, that is, of Thy command, as at the roar of threatening thunder, these waters withdrew, as if seized with terror in the place assigned to them, which was the sea.

9. [103:8] At this command it seems that the mountains rose up and the plains descended to the place which Thou didst destine for them.[13243]

12. [103:11] "Onagri." Wild asses, by which may be understood all wild animals.

13. [103:12] "Super ea." According to the Chaldee: Juxta eos. Above or beside these fountains or these springs of water. "De medio petrarum." According to the Hebrew: Inter ramos; or according to St. Jerome's translation: De medio nemorum—In the midst of the neighboring groves.

14. [103:13] Thou waterest the mountains with the upper waters, which descend from the clouds; thus the earth by Thy Providence shall be satisfied, and shall abound in fruit.

16. [103:14] "Vinum lætificet cor hominis." Here St. John Chrysostom makes this reflection: "Some say: Let there be no wine; but we should rather say: Let there be no drunkenness; for wine is the work of God, but drunkenness the work of the devil" (Ad pop. Ant. Hom. I).

17. [103:15] We should here remark, that according to Theodoret, Maldonatus, Menochius, Tirinus, and others, the Orientals used to anoint the face with oil to show a cheerful countenance. The sense then is: Thou producest the olives, the oil of which serves to anoint the countenance to make it look joyous, and grain to make bread wherewith to sustain the life of man.

18. [103:16] "Saturabuntur." Shall be sated with these waters of fountains and of rains. "Ligna campi." Mattei hereby understands wild plants. "Passeres." The sparrows and the other birds.

19. [103:17] "Herodii." It is uncertain what kind of bird this name denotes: according to St. Jerome, it is the kite; but Estius, Lallemant, and others, following the Chaldee, say that it is the stork. "Herodii domus dux est eorum." According to the Hebrew: Herodii abies est domus ejus. That is: The top of the fir-tree is her house. "Herinaciis." According to the Greek, Leporibus—For the rabbits. See Mattei.

20. [103:19] "Fecit lunam in tempore." The Hebrews used to regulate their calendar by the moon: A luna signum diei festi—From the moon is the sign of the festival day (Ecclus. 63:7). "Sol cognovit occasum suum." The sun runs its course to its setting; or as Malvenda explains the verse, the sun knows how to go through its course without the variations incident to the moon.

22. [103:21] The lions come forth roaring with their cubs to seek for prey in the forests; and by their roaring they seem to ask of God their food.

25. [103:24] "Possessione tua." According to the Greek: Creatura tua—With Thy creatures. Menochius and Mattei explain thus: The earth is filled with the goods that Thou hast created.

26. [103:25] "Reptilia." Properly: Reptiles, animals without legs, that crawl on their bellies. Here the word signifies every kind of fish.

28. [103:26] "Draco." St. Jerome writes: Leviathan. Others, as Lallemant, and perhaps all, commonly say that it is the whale; but according to Mattei this is not certain; it is only certain that some sea-monster is signified. "Ad illudendum ei." According to the Hebrew: Ut luderet in eo. Thus it is understood by Maldonatus, Estius, Sa, Malvenda, Mattei, etc.

30. [103:29] That is: If Thou withdraw Thy gracious looks, they wlli languish; Thou wilt take away their life and they will cease to be; they return to the dust whence Thou didst draw them.

31. [103:30] That is: Thou wilt send forth the breath of life into other animals, to which Thou wilt give being, and thus Thou wilt renew the face of the earth. Du Hamel applies this in a mystical sense to the Holy Ghost, who by his grace renews the face of the earth, that is, of the souls living in this world; and thus the Church uses this verse in her Liturgy at Pentecost.

32. [103:31] That is: Let then the Lord be glorified forever! and let us act in such a manner that he may rejoice in us, who are his works, and that he may not be saddened by our faults.

33. [103:32] That is: Let us beware of provoking this powerful Lord, who with a single glance makes the earth tremble, and who by touching the mountains causes them to smoke with his thunder and lightning, as he did on Mount Sinai: Totus autem mons Sinai fumabat—And all Mount Sinai was in a smoke (Exod, 19:18).

PSALM 104 OF THE PSALTER

The prophet urges the Jews to praise God, and to thank him for all the benefits bestowed on their fathers.[13244]

3. [104:3] "Laudamini in nomine sancto ejus." That is: Render yourselves worthy of praise by your zeal in procuring glory to his holy name.[13245]

4. [104:4] Be constant in seeking God; try to be in spirit always in his presence.[13246]

5. [104:5] "Judicia oris ejus." His commandments, or his law.

6. [104:6] I say this to you who are the posterity of Abraham, and the servants of the Lord; to you, children of Jacob, who are the chosen people of God.[13247]

7. [104:7] "In universa terra judicia ejus." That is: He governs the whole earth.

8. [104:8] He has always been mindful of his covenant with his servants, and of the promise that he made them in words that expressed his will, to make all subsequent generations have part therein.

10. [104:10] "Præceptum." According to the Hebrew: Statutum, Decretum. "Testamentum aternum." A covenant or compact that was always to be observed.

11. [104:11] "Terram Chanaan." The Land of Promise, where the Chanaanites dwelt. "Funiculum hereditatis vestæ." This land will be possessed by your children as an inheritance distributed with a line of cord.[13248]

12. [104:12] "Incolæ." According to the Hebrew: Peregrini, Advenæ.

13. [104:13] The patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob had to pass from one country to another, as from Palestine to Egypt (Gen. 7, 20, 26, 28, 31, 50).

15. [104:15] "Christos meos . . . Prophetis meis." My anointed . . . my prophets; that is, the patriarchs.[13249]

16. [104:16] "Firmamentum panis." That is: The support of human life, which consists in bread.[13250]

17. [104:17] He ordained that Joseph, who had been sold by his brethren, should be taken before them into Egypt, and thus deliver them from famine (Gen. 37:28).

18. [104:18] "Ferrum pertransiit animam ejus." According to the Greek: Anima, instead of "Animam." The Hebrew may be understood either way; but Bellarmine says that in the Vulgate the sense is clearer, and that thus St. Jerome, St. Augustine, and others explain the passage; namely: The pain caused by the iron fetters afflicted the soul of Joseph. "Donec veniret verbum ejus." That is: Until the accomplishment of his prophecy concerning the release from prison of Pharao's chief butler, which release was followed by his own (Gen. 40:12, 41:9).

19. [104:19] The spirit of prophecy with which Joseph felt himself inspired was as a torch which inflamed him; that is, which encouraged him to make this prediction. Then king Pharao, this prince of many peoples, set him at liberty.

20. [104:21] "Principem omnis possessionis suæ." Chief of his whole kingdom.

21. [104:22] "Principes ejus." The great men of his court, of his possessions. "Senex ejus." The ancients of his council.

22. [104:23] "Israel . . . Jacob." Jacob with his family. "Terra Cham" Egypt. We have already said (see Psalm 77:56) that this country was peopled by the descendants of Cham, son of Noe; it was Mesraim, son of Cham, who first established himself in Egypt.

24. [104:25] That is: By multiplying the Israelites, God gave occasion to the Egyptians to be exasperated against his faithful people, to seek every means of oppressing his servants (Exod. 1.).

25. [104:26] Then the Lord sent his servant Moses, and Aaron his brother whom he chose to be his fellow-helper. "Ipsum." Bellarmine observes that the Hebrew may be rendered by Ei; but he says, with St. Augustine, that among the Hebrews the word Ipsum is used simply for elegance, and therefore adds nothing to the sense.[13251]

26. [104:27] "Verba signorum." A Hebraism, which means: The power to work miracles.

27. [104:28] In this verse, and in the eight following verses, David describes the miraculous prodigies wrought to punish the Egyptians. "Misit tenebras." This darkness lasted three days (Exod. 10:22). "Non exacerbavit sermones suos." Some would omit the particle Non; but according to Bellarmine this correction is admissible; for the Vulgate here agrees with the Hebrew text, of which the rendering is: Non exacerbaverunt sermones ejus. That is: Moses and Aaron did not resist the orders of God, who had commanded them to work those wonders.[13252]

38. [104:39] "Expandit nubem in protectionem eorum." The Lord spread a cloud above the waters to protect them from the heat of the day. But here we must remark with Bellarmine that this cloud is not the pillar spoken of in Exodus: Dominus autem præcedebat eos, ad ostendendam viam, per diem in columnam nubis—And the Lord went before them to show the way by day in a pillar of cloud (Exod. 13:21). The pillar was to go before them to show them the way, and not to be spread out over their heads; moreover, the cloud spread out above them could not take the shape of a pillar. Hence, adds Bellarmine, we are justified in saying that besides the pillar of cloud which went before the Israelites, and which once we read went behind them to protect them against the Egyptians (Exod. 14:19), there was another cloud spread out over them to shelter them from the heat during their journey. This explanation is supported by the Hebrew text, which St. Jerome thus renders: Expandit nubem in tentorium—He spread out a cloud for a tent or covering; as well as by the following words in the Book of Wisdom: Fuit illis in velamento diei, et in luce stellarum per noctem—She was to them for a covert by day, and for the light of stars by night (Wisd. 10:17).[13253]

39. [104:40] The Israelites asked for means to feed on flesh and bread; the Lord sent among them an abundance of quails, and he satiated them with manna, which he caused to fall from heaven.

40. [104:41] They were thirsty, and the Lord by the hand of Moses broke a rock, whence ran waters seen flowing as torrents in that arid place (Num. 20:11).[13254]

43. [104:44] "Labores populorum possederunt." They came into possession of the labors of those nations, that is, of the cities which they had built, and of the fields which they had cultivated.

PSALM 105 OF THE PSALTER

The psalmist exhorts the Israelites to thank the Lord for all the wonders wrought in their behalf from the time that they left Egypt till the time of the Judges, and reproaches them for their ingratitude to the Lord. A matter of confusion for us Christians, who have received from God far greater benefits.

1. [105:1] "In sæculum." St. Jerome translates: In æternum.

2. [105:2] "Loquetur." According to the Chaldee: Eloqui poterit. That is: Who shall show forth . . . ?[13255]

3. [105:3] "Judicium." Judgment, equity, or the law of God.[13256]

4, 5. [105:4, 5] In the Hebrew, according to St. Jerome and the other interpreters, instead of the plural, "Nostri," etc., is found the singular, namely: Mei, Me, Videam, Læter.[13257] "In beneplacito populi tui." St. Jerome translates: In repropitiatione populi tui. That is: According to the goodness which Thou hast so often shown towards Thy people. "In salutari tuo." According to the Hebrew: In salute tua; and according to the Chaldee: In redemptione tua. That is: By sending us salvation, or redemption through Jesus Christ, as St. Augustine explains: Ipse est enim Salvator . . . ; de illo quippe dixit Simeon senex: Quia viderunt oculi mei salutare tuum—Because my eyes have seen Thy salvation. "Ad videndum in bonitate." According to the Hebrew: Ut videam bonum; or, according to St. Jerome, oona—In order that I may see the good things prepared for Thy elect. "Ad lætandum in lætitia gentis tuæ." That is, according to the Hebrew: That I may rejoice in the joy, or that I may have part in the joy, of Thy faithful people. "Ut lauderis cum hereditate tua." That is: That Thou mayest be forever praised in the midst of this people who are Thy inheritance, or Thy domain, chosen for all eternity.

7. [105:7] That is: They did not appreciate the wonders wrought by Thee for their deliverance, and too soon they forgot Thy many mercies towards them.

8. [105:7] "Ascendentes in mare." According to the Hebrew: Juxta mare. That is: They provoked Thy anger near the Red Sea, where they received so many benefits (Exod. 14.).

10. [105:9] Here the prophet returns to speak of the benefits done them in their progress through the Red Sea. "Increpuit Mare Rubrum." St. Jerome translates: Comminatus est Mari Rubro. God threatened the Red Sea to make it obey; that is, he bade the Red Sea to dry up, its waters withdrawing on both sides to make a way for the Israelites.

13. [105:12] They then chanted the Canticle of Moses (Exod. 15.).

14. [105:13] "Fecerunt." They made a change. "Obliti sunt operum ejus." They forgot all the wonders that God had wrought in their favor. "Non sustinuerunt consilium ejus." St. Jerome translates: Non expectaverunt voluntatem ejus—They would not wait for the execution of his will.

15. [105:14] "In inaquosa." St. Jerome translates: In solitudine.[13258]

16. [105:15] "Misit saturitatem in animas eorum." That is: God sent them to satiety the food that they craved.

17. [105:16] "Irritaverunt." According to the Hebrew: Inviderunt; and the Chaldee: Invidia commoti sunt. Reference is here made to the envy that Dathan and Abiron, named in the following verse, had conceived against Moses and Aaron on seeing them constituted leaders of the people, envy that led them to address to Moses and Aaron these words: Cur elevamini super populum Domini?—Why lift you up yourselves above the people of the Lord? (Num. 16:3.) "Sanctum Domini. Aaron, consecrated to God as his priest.

18. [105:17] The earth swallowed them both up, with all those that had joined their party of revolt (Num. 16:32).

19. [105:18] "Synagoga eorum." The multitude of those that murmured the following day (Num. 16:41).

20. [105:19] The psalmist refers here to another rising of the Israelites, when they worshipped the golden calf (Exod. 32.). "In Horeb," near Mount Horeb, or Sinai.

21. [105:20] "Gloriam suam." Some understand these words to mean the glory of the Israelites; but according to the Chaldee we read: Gloriam Domini sui; and Estius says the sense of the verse is: They gave to the image of a calf the glory that is due to God.[13259]

23. [105:23] That is: God then declared that he would destroy his people (Exod. 22:10), and so he would have done if Moses, whom he had chosen to be their leader, had not interposed in his presence as their mediator.[13260] "In confractione." According to the Hebrew: In ruptura, or divisione; and St. Jerome translates: Medius (stetisset medius contra faciem illius).

24. [105:23] "Terram desiderabilem." The land that God had promised them, and that was so worthy of their desires.

26, 27. [105:26, 27] "Manum suam." His hand armed with the sword of justice. Bellarmine here remarks that the first of these chastisements was inflicted in the desert itself, where all the murmurers twenty years old and upwards were condemned to die (Num. 14:29); the second, namely, the dispersion, had its accomplishment later on, at first by means of the king of Babylon, and more fully afterwards by Titus and Vespasian.

28. [105:28] Here David mentions another sin of the Israelites which they committed when, led away by the daughters of Moab, they began to worship their idol Beelphegor (Num. 25.). Don Calmet, in a dissertation at the beginning of the Book of Numbers, shows that Beelphegor is the same as Adonis. "Sacrificia mortuorum." St. Jerome translates: Victimas mortuorum. That is: Sacrifices offered to dead gods, such as are the gods of the Gentiles; while our true God is a living God.

29. [105:29] "In adinventionibus suis." With their perverse inventions, that is, with their superstitions. "Multiplicata est in eis ruina." According to the Hebrew: Erupit in eos plaga. That is: A great slaughter was made of them on account of this sacrilege; the number of those that perished on this occasion amounted to twenty-four thousand (Num. 25:9).

30. [105:30] Phinees, grandson of Aaron, burning with zeal for God, slew one of the transgressors of the law, with his accomplice. "Stetit." He stood firm for the honor of the law. "Placavit." St. Jerome translates: Dijudicavit—He judged and punished the guilty one. Others, according to the Chaldee: Oravit; or Oratione placavit—He interposed by praying for his people, and appeased the anger of God.[13261] "Cessavit quassatio." That is, according to some interpreters: The disorder ceased. But the sense of the Chaldee is: Cessavit mors; and St. Jerome translates in the same sense: Est retenta percussio—The slaughter ceased. This last interpretation is the best; for we read in Numbers: Cessavitque plaga a filiis Israel—And the scourge ceased from the children of Israel (Num. 25:8).

31. [105:31] This act of Phinees was ascribed to him for merit, as a work of justice and of true zeal. He received in recompense the dignity of high-priest (Num. 25:13), which continued in his family for more than thirteen centuries, according to Mattei, with Mariana, Menochius, etc. "In sempiternum." That is: He received this reward for as long as the Mosaic law should last; Quamdiu lex duraret, says Emmanuel Sa.

32. [105:32] The Israelites committed another sin (Num. 20.) when, suffering from want of water in the desert, they broke out in unjust murmurings. Moses then, though he had received from God the command to speak to the rock, hesitated somewhat, having conceived a certain feeling of diffidence; however, he struck the rock and water flowed from it in great abundance. God, displeased with Moses on account of his hesitation, punished him by making him die before entering the Promised Land. "Ad aquas contradictionis." That is: In the place where on account of the want of water there arose a contradiction and a contest against Moses. "Exacerbaverunt spiritum ejus." They so embittered his soul that he hesitated to execute the order that God had given him to speak to the rock.[13262]

33. [105:33] God with his own mouth rebuked the Hebrews, reproving them for not having exterminated the Gentiles, as he had commanded them.[13263]

37. [105:38] "Fornicati sunt." In the Bible apostasy from the faith is called Fornication, or treason like to that of unfaithful spouses, who are false to their plighted troth.[13264] "In adinventionibus suis." That is: With their superstitions.

38. [105:40] "Hereditatem suam." Those whom he had chosen for his own people.

41. [105:43] "In consilio suo." According to the Hebrew: In consilio ipsorum—By the purpose, as Menochius explains, which they formed of serving idols. "Humiliati sunt in iniquitatibus suis." According to Mattei we are by thus not to understand that they were humbled in their wickedness, but that they grew more wicked in their humiliations.[13265]

42. [105:44] However, the Lord, seeing them thus afflicted, had pity on them and lent his ear to their prayers.

43. [105:45] "Testamenti sui." That is, of the promises made to their fathers. "Pœnituit eum." According to the Chaldee: Conversus est ab ira sua. He turned aside from his anger, as though he felt sorrow for having punished them.

44. [105:46] That is, according to Maldonatus, Mariana, Tirinus, and Mattei: He caused them to meet with compassion from their enemies, who held them captives.[13266]

45. [105:47] "Congrega nos de nationibus." Gather us together by delivering us from the midst of the Gentiles, where we are scattered.

46. [105:47] That is: In order that we may come to render Thee thanks in celebrating . . .

47. [105:48] Then we shall sing: Blessed be, etc.

PSALM 106 OF THE PSALTER

In the literal sense this psalm sets forth the sufferings that the Jews endured in their captivity and in the desert, and it exhorts them to return thanks to God for having delivered them therefrom. In the figurative sense it represents the miseries from which Jesus Christ has delivered Christians. In it, moreover, the prophet clearly announces the ruin of the Synagogue, the vocation of the Gentiles, and the establishment of the Church.[13267]

3. [106:3] From the East and from the West, from the North and from the South.[13268]

4. [106:4] "Erraverunt." The Israelites wandered, etc.[13269]

9. [106:9] He provided in the desert a marvellous food, and he satisfied those that were famishing.

10. [106:10] He assisted them when they were in dark prisons, which were as the shadow of death;[13270] in want of everything and bound with iron chains.

12. [106:12] Then was their heart humbled by labors, that is, the pride of their heart was brought low by the hardships that they suffered in the midst of all their afflictions. They grew too weak to resist their enemies, and there was no one to help them to deliver themselves from their hands.

14. [106:14] "De tenebris et umbra mortis." See verse 10.

16. [106:16] That is, he has delivered them from prison or from captivity.

18. [106:18] By reason of their infirmity or sickness.

19. [106:19] In repeating this verse several times, the prophet wishes to make us understand the compassion that God has for our miseries, and at the same time the efficacy of prayer which makes the Lord not know how to refuse help to him who asks it of him.

20. [106:20] "Verbum suum." His word, or his orders.[13271]

25. [106:25] "Dixit." God commanded. "Stetit spiritus procellæ." The wind that makes the storm went forth immediately.

26. [106:26] The waves of the sea mount and then sink again; the mariners are troubled by fear and their strength begins to fail.

27. [106:27] "Omnis sapientia eorum devorata est." In the midst of their confusion they have lost all their seaman's craft.

30. [106:30] "Deduxit eos." The Lord has conducted them.

32. [106:32] "Seniorum." The ancients, or the chiefs of the people.

33. [106:33] "Posuit." The Lord has wrought these other wonders; he has, etc.[13272]

39. [106:39] Afterwards, in punishment for their sins, they were reduced, etc.

40. [106:40] Contempt was also cast upon their princes, that is, the Lord made the chiefs who ruled them to be despised by allowing them to fall into many mistakes, when they strayed from the path of justice and prudence.[13273]

42. [106:42] The just shall see these mercies and rejoice thereat; while the wicked for shame of their iniquity shall not dare to open their mouth.

43. [106:43] He that is wise will remember these things; and while meditating on them will understand how far reach the mercies of the Lord.

PSALM 107 OF THE PSALTER

David consecrates this chant to giving thanks to God for his benefits, and to praying to him for victory over the Edomites. It must be remarked that this psalm has already been explained, partly in verses 1–5; in Psalm 56 verses 10–14; and for the rest, in Psalm 59 verses 5–13. We shall content ourselves with giving here a succinct explanation.

1. [107:2] My heart is disposed to write whatever Thou ordainest; in all I will bless Thee, and I will sing Thy praises.[13274]

2. [107:3] "Gloria mea." My spirit, which loves to praise God. "Exurgam diluculo." I wish to praise Thee at early morn.

4. [107:5] I shall say that for all, from earth even to the heavens, is full of Thy mercy and fidelity.

5. [107:6] "Ut liberentur . . ." Psalm 59:5.

6, 7. [107:7, 8] Hear me, O Lord, and let Thy right hand save me. God has declared from his sanctuary that I shall one day have the joy of dividing the country of Sichem, or Samaria, and of measuring the lands of the valley of Tents beyond the Jordan, to distribute them at my will.

8. [107:9] The names of Galaad, Manasses, and Ephraim designate the provinces occupied by the tribes of Israel, whom David called the strength of his head or crown.

9. [107:9] It is in the tribe of Juda that my throne is established; and the land of Moab which is abundant, makes me hope fully to satisfy my people.

10. [107:10] "Alienigenæ." Strangers.[13275]

11. [107:11] Who will lead me into Edom, to take possession of this country, the capital of which is very strong?

12. [107:12] Shall it not be Thou, my God, who at first didst repel us? Wilt not Thou Thyself go forth with our troops to give us victory?

13. [107:13] "Vana salus hominis." In vain can we hope for help from others.

14. [107:14] Placing our hopes in God, we shall obtain the victory; he will exterminate our enemies.

PSALM 108 OF THE PSALTER

Interpreters have given various explanations of this psalm. Some apply it to Saul giving vent to his anger against Doeg and those that resemble him. Others to David predicting in form of imprecation the chastisements reserved for Doeg and Achitophel, his enemies. Others, as Xavier Mattei, Mark Marius, and Louis Mingarella suppose that the imprecations are uttered against David and Jesus Christ by their enemies. But commonly the Fathers and the other interpreters regard these imprecations as pronounced against Judas and the other enemies of our Lord. This interpretation, which we follow, agrees especially with that of St. Augustine.

1. [108:2] Hide not my praise, that is, make known my innocence; for the mouth of an impious man and traitor is opened against me.[13276] "Super me." St. Jerome translates: Contra me. St. Augustine explains: Odium, quod dolo tegebatur, erupit in vocem—The hatred, treacherously concealed, broke forth in words.

3. [108:4] "Detrahebant." St. Jerome translates: Adversabantur—They contradicted me. "Orabam." St. Augustine adds: Pro eis ipsis—At the same time I prayed for these very men.

5. [108:6] St. Augustine applies this verse to Judas, and by the sinner he understands Satan himself, which he thus explains: Diabolo subditus sit, qui Christo subditus esse noluit—Let him be subject to the devil, who refused to be subject to Christ. And in fact Judas was possessed by Satan: Post buccellam, introivit in eum Satanas—After the morsel (that is, after Holy Communion) Satan entered in him (John, 13:27).

6. [108:7] "Cum judicatur." When he shall be judged at the tribunal of God. "Oratio ejus fiat in peccatum." That is, as Lallemant very well explains: If he dares speak in self-defence, may it be ascribed to him as a new crime on account of his temerity.

7. [108:8] "Episcopatum ejus." Some understand by this his place of honor or administration; but it may be justly remarked that by the word Episcopate we must understand the apostolate, as St. Peter interprets it in applying this passage to Judas in the assembly of the apostles, who afterwards addressed this prayer to the Lord: Ostende quem elegeris ex his duobus unum, accipere locum ministerii hujus, et apostolatus, de quo prævaricatus est Judas—Show which of these two Thou hast chosen, to take the place of his ministry and apostleship, from which Judas hath by transgression fallen (Acts, 1:20–24).

8. [108:9] Here we must remark, that St. John Chrysostom, Theodoret, and Euthymius are of opinion that Judas was never married. Moreover, Genebrardus and Tirinus think that these imprecations against Judas did not all have their effect in his person, but those only that could reach him. On the other hand, St. Augustine teaches that they were verified with regard to the Jewish people, of whom Judas is here the figure: for by the destruction of Jerusalem the Synagogue became a widow, and the Jews, her children, were made orphans.[13277]

9. [108:10] This happened after the destruction of Jerusalem. "Nutantes transferantur." St. Jerome translates: Justabiles vagentur.

10. [108:11] Here Menochius remarks: In excidio Hierosolymitano, adeo Judæorum divitias scrutabantur milites Romani, ut etiam, corporibus sectis aliquorum, viscera scrutati sint, sperantes se aurum, quod deglutivissent, inventuros. Testis Josephus—In the destruction of Jerusalem the Roman soldiers made such a close search after the riches and property of the Jews, that they even ripped up the bodies of some and searched their bowels to find gold which they might have swallowed, as Josephus testifies (*De Bello Judaic0,*1. 6, c. 15).

12. [108:13] That is, as Lallemant explains: May death carry off his children before they are able to have their father's name pass to a second generation.[13278]

13. [108:14] "Iniquitas patrum ejus." The iniquity of the fathers of this same people, to be punished in him, as St. Augustine explains, applying the text of the Gospel: Ut veniat super vos omnis sanguis Justus, qui effusus est super terram, a sanguine Abel . . . That upon you may come all the just blood that hath been shed upon the earth from the blood of Abel . . . (Matt, 23:33). "Matris ejus." By this the holy Doctor understands Jerusalem.

14. [108:15] "Fiant contra Dominum semper." May the iniquity of their fathers and the sin of their mother, with their own crimes, be always before the eyes of God in punishment.

15. [108:17] "Hominem inopem . . ." Jesus Christ himself, who was thus treated without pity.

16. [108:18] "Dilexit maledictionem." St. Augustine applies this to the time when the Jewish people cried out: Sanguis ejus super nos et super filios nostros—His blood be upon us and upon our children (Matt, 27:25).

17. [108:18] That is, as St. Augustine explains: May cursing wrap round his body and penetrate within his soul.

19. [108:20] "Hoc opus." St. Jerome translates: Hæc est retributio—This is the punishment.[13279]

20. [108:21] "Propter nomen tuum." For the glory of Thy name. "Suavis." St. Jerome translates: Bona. Bent on helping the afflicted.

21. [108:22] "Cor meum conturbatum est intra me." St. Augustine refers this passage to what Jesus Christ said in the garden: Tristis est anima mea usque ad mortem—My soul is sorrowful even unto death (Matt. 26:38).

22. [108:23] "Excusans sum sicut locustæ." The locust goes lopping from place to place; and thus, says Du Hamel, did it happen to Jesus Christ: Ex uno tribunali in aliud jactatus—Who was cast about from one tribunal to another.

23. [108:24] "Propter oleum." St. Jerome translates: Absque oleo—Without oil. We should then understand that ill and infirm condition of body was brought on not by the use of oil, but through being debarred from its use; for Estius, Sa, Mariana, Malvenda, Tirinus, and Mattei say that unctions with the use of oil were customary among the Hebrews, and that their health suffered if they failed to use them. Hence Mattei asserts that to understand here that flesh was lost by the use of oil is a most evident error. Besides, Bellarmine thus translates and explains the Hebrew literally: Caro mea immutata est a pinguedine; id est, ex pingui macilenta reddita est. And according to the Chaldee we read: Macilenta est absque pinguedine. The sense, therefore, is: My flesh has been changed from being fat, and is become lean for want of food that produces fatness. Otherwise, I do not see how this verse can with propriety be applied to Jesus Christ.

24. [108:25] "Moverunt capita sua." They shook their heads to insult me. This was verified, as Bellarmine remarks, when the enemies of Jesus Christ blasphemed him as he was on the cross: Prætereuntes autem blasphemabant eum, moventes capita sua—And they that passed by blasphemed him, wagging their heads (Matt, 27:39).

26. [108:27] That is, as Menochius explains it: Let them know that all that I have suffered, I have suffered by Thy will, according to the words of Isaias: Propter scelus populi mei percussi eum—For the wickedness of my people have I struck him (Is. 53:8).

27. [108:28] "Maledicent illi." They will curse me. And thus St. Paul wrote: Christus nos redemit de maledicto legis, factus pro nobis maledictus—Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us (Gal. 3:13). Du Hamel comments on the last words thus: Nostram ipse suscipiens maledictionem—Taking upon himself our curse. "Confundantur." May they remain confounded, and be converted, as St. Augustine understands it.

28. [108:29] "Diploide." With a double cloak, that is, according to St. Augustine, both within and without.

29. [108:30] "Nimis . . . In medio multorum." St. Jerome translates: Vehementer . . . In medio populorum—In the midst of the people.

30. [108:31] He has stood at my side in my misery, to defend me and to save my life from the hands of my persecutors. Bellarmine understands this of the resurrection of Jesus Christ, whereby ne resumed the life which the Jews had taken from him.

PSALM 92 OF THE PSALTER

The psalmist exalts the power that God manifested in creating heaven and earth; and transporting himself in thought to the first moment of creation, he represents to himself God, who in some way proceeds from the mystery of his eternal existence, in order to reveal himself in the production of creatures.[13280]

1. [92:1] The Lord has established his kingdom over the whole universe; he has clothed himself with majesty; he has girt himself ready to govern the world and to fill it with his benefits.

3. [92:2] Lord, thy throne or thy reign was established from all eternity, since Thou hast existed eternally before all creatures.

4, 5. [92:3] The rivers seem to have raised their voice to praise Thee; the sound of many waters has served them for voice to give Thee glory.

6. [92:4] Marvellous are the heavings of the waves of the sea when agitated by the winds; yet more marvellous[13281] is the Lord, who from the height of heaven bridles the rage of the billows, and governs all things.

7. [92:5] The tokens of Thy goodness and grandeur, which are proclaimed from Thy house, that is, from the Church, are but too clear and evident; it is fitting then that this Thy house should by Thy divine Providence ever be kept holy and pure of all stain.

(For Psalm 2, see Psalm 99, Jubilate Deo, page 286.)

PSALM 62 OF THE PSALTER

A prayer of David when he was in the desert, pursued by his enemies. He thanks God for his protection; and it is in his mercy that he always wishes to hope.

1. [62:2] At break of day I wake from sleep and come to Thee.

2. [62:2] My soul has so great thirst for Thee, that my body also feels the ardor.[13282]

4. [62:4] "Labia mea laudabunt te." My lips shall always be employed in praising Thee.

5. [62:5] Thus throughout my life I will do nought but bless Thee, and I will lift up my hands continually to invoke Thy name.

6. [62:6] "Sicut adipe et pinguedine." As with an agreeable and nourishing fatness, that is, with the abundance of Thy grace and consolations.

7. [62:7] If in the time of my repose, when in my bed, I was mindful of Thee, much more when day comes will I meditate upon Thy goodness in having thus protected me.

8. [62:8] "In velamento alarum tuarum." At seeing that Thou coverest me with Thy wings.

9. [62:9] It is in vain that my enemies have sought to take my life; they shall lose their own instead, and shall be buried in the abyss of hell; there they shall be given into the hand of the avenging sword of God; they shall become the prey of foxes, that is, of devils who as foxes deceive men by their cunning.

10. [62:10] "Rex . . . in eo." Some refer these words to David, and believe that there is question here of the oath of fidelity which had to be made to him when he came to the throne. But Rotigni and Lallemant say, with greater probability, that they refer to the Messias, the King of the world and true God; for it is one thing to swear allegiance to a king, and another to swear by the name of a king. This is the meaning of the words: Jurant in eo.

The psalmist addressed to God a fervent prayer, beseeching him to send the Messias, that he may thus make himself known and adored by all nations.

1. [66:2] "Illuminet vultum suum super nos." May God illuminate us by the splendors of his presence.

2. [66:3] O Lord, let us know here on earth the way to please Thee, and cause that among all nations the Saviour, Thy Son, be known.

3. [66:4] May all the nations thus enlightened confess that Thou art their God. May they praise and give Thee thanks.

5. [66:6] May all the people praise Thee, O my God! and thank Thee for all Thy benefits; and especially because the earth, that is, the most pure womb of a Virgin, such as Mary, by the operation of the Holy Ghost, has brought forth the Fruit so greatly desired, the Saviour of the world. Wherefore, Jesus Christ was called by the angel the Blessed Fruit of Mary.[13283]

6. [66:7] "Deus, Deus noster, . . . Deus." In this triple repetition of the name of God interpreters recognize a sufficiently clear indication of the Mystery of the Most Blessed Trinity.[13284] "Metuant eum omnes fines terræ." May all men on earth, even to its farthest limits, fear and adore him.

CANTICLE OF THE THREE CHILDREN (DAN. 3:57)

A hymn sung at Babylon by the three young Israelites, Ananias, Misael, and Azarias, while they were in the midst of the fiery furnace wherein King Nabuchodonozor had condemned them to die for having refused to adore his statue (Dan. 3:57). This canticle, in which all creatures are invited to bless God, is very easy to understand. We therefore omit to explain it, because such an explanation instead of pleasing and instructing the reader would rather be wearisome to him.[13285]

PSALM 148 OF THE PSALTER

In this psalm, as well as in the two following, all creatures are called upon to praise and thank the Lord for the victory gained over the enemies of his holy name. In an allegorical sense all Christians are invited to bless God for the victory that he helped them to gain over the devil, the world, and the flesh; a victory so great that for it they will be honored by being appointed judges at the day of judgment.

4. [148:4] "Aquæ omnes quæ super cælos sunt." With regard to these waters there are various opinions. Some, as St. Bonaventure, Ambrose and Catharinus, etc., say that they are the crystalline heaven. Others, as St. Athanasius (Cont. Arian. or. 2, n. 28, E. B.), St. Basil (In Hexam. hom. 3), St. Ambrose (*Hexam.*l. 2, c. 2, 3), St. John Chrysostom (In Genes. hom. 4), Bede (In Hexam.), etc., believe that these waters are above the firmament or starry heavens, and they cite for this opinion Genesis: Et fecit Deus firmamentum, divisitque aquas quæ erant sub firmamento, ab his quæ erant super firmamentum—And God made a firmament, and divided the waters that were under the firmament from those that were above the firmament (Gen. 1:7). And St. Augustine, who holds the same view, says: Major est Scripturæ hujus auctoritas, quam omnis humani ingenii capacitas—The authority of this Scripture is greater than all the capacity of the human mind (*De Gen. ad litt.*l. 2, c. 5, n. 9). This opinion is also followed by many modern interpreters cited by Tirinus. Others, in fine, such as Rupert, Lorinus, Mariana, etc., with the greatest number of modern commentators, understand by these waters the clouds that are suspended over the earth.[13286]

6. [148:6] "Ea." That is, the angels and the heavenly bodies.

7. [148:7] "Dracones." This is the name given by Scripture to seamonsters. "Abyssi." Abysses, that is, deep waters.

8. [148:8] "Spiritus procellarum." These are violent winds.

10. [148:10] "Serpentes." Animals that crawl upon the earth. "Volucres pennatæ." Birds that fly in the air.

12. [148:12] "Exaltatum est nomen ejus solius." God is raised above everything; it is to him alone all glory belongs.

13. [148:14] Let then the praises of the Lord resound through heaven and earth, since he has willed to exalt by his power his faithful people, in giving them Jesus Christ, who has made his servants victorious over the devils.

14. [148:14] Let praise be given at the same time to all his saints, and to all the true children of Israel who form the people that by their faith and virtue approach near to God.

PSALM 149 OF THE PSALTER

1. [149:1] Sing to the Lord a new canticle for all the new benefits that he has bestowed upon us, and especially for having given us Jesus Christ for our Redeemer: it is just that in the assembly of the saints, that is, of Christians, the praises of the Lord should ever resound.

2. [149:2] Let the children of the holy Church exult in their God who has created them, and who reigns in them by his grace.

4. [149:4] "Exultabit mansuetos in salutem." He will exalt the meek by giving them eternal salvation.

5. [149:5] "In gloria." In the glory of heaven, where they shall enjoy eternal gladness.

7. [149:7] Wherewith to execute a just vengeance upon the nations who had persecuted them by reproaching them with their iniquities.[13287]

9. [149:9] "Ut faciant in eos judicium conscriptum." So they shall execute upon the persecutors the judgment spoken of in Holy Scripture. Judicabunt nationes, et dominabuntur populis—They shall judge nations, and rule over people (Wis. 3:8).

PSALM 150[13288] OF THE PSALTER

1. [150:1] "In sanctis ejus." According to the Hebrew: In sanctuario ejus—In his sanctuary, which is principally heaven. "In firmamento virtutis ejus." St. Jerome translates: In fortitudine potentiæ ejus—In the strength of his power. The almighty power of God shines forth in a special manner in the firmament, or in the heavens, as is the meaning of the word Firmamentum given in the first chapter of Genesis.

2. [150:2] "In virtutibus ejus." In the effects of his power, or in the marvels that he works.

4. [150:4] "Choro." Some think that this expression means here some musical instrument, now unknown to us; others that it signifies a concert of voices. We are ignorant as to what instruments correspond to those mentioned by the psalmist. Dom Calmet has treated this subject in a special dissertation.

THE CANTICLE OF ZACHARY (LUKE, 1:68)

In this canticle we hear the prophet Zachary praising and thanking the Messias who comes to save mankind: he then shows his own son, St. John the Baptist, chosen to be the precursor of our Lord Jesus Christ.

2. [1:69] "Cornu salutis." The strength that saves, that is, the Saviour.

8. [1:75] "In sanctitate et justitia coram ipso." That is to say: Not merely with external worship, but also with piety and interior justice, which renders us likewise interiorly just in the sight of God.

9. [1:76] Thou shalt be the prophet of the Lord; for before he manifests himself on earth, thou shalt go forth to prepare souls to follow his teaching.

11. [1:78] "Per viscera misericordiæ." That is: Through the immense and tender pity. "Oriens." The word Oriens is not the participle of the verb Orior, but according to the Hebrew and the Greek text, is a noun substantive, which, as explained by St. Jerome, St. Cyril, and others cited by Tirinus in his comments on Zachary, iii. 8, denotes the eternal Word begotten by God. Hence the following is the antiphon which the Church sings on the 21st of December in addressing our divine Saviour: O Oriens, Splendor lucis æternæ, et Sol justitiæ! veni, et illumina sedentes in tenebris et umbra mortis—O Orient, Splendor of eternal light, and Sun of justice, come and enlighten those who sit in darkness and the shadow of death.

12. [1:79] "Qui in tenebris et in umbra mortis sedent" That is: Those that are deprived of the grace of God, a privation which is the shadow of the eternal death. "In viam pacis." In the path that conducts to eternal beatitude.

PSALM 50 OF THE PSALTER

David, contrite and humbled, bewails his sins.[13289]—In this psalm is perfectly expressed the sorrow that a sinner feels when repenting of his faults he humbly asks God's pardon. It is the fourth penitential psalm.

1. [50:3] Show to me great mercy because I am a great sinner.

2. [50:3] "Dele iniquitatem meam." Blot out from my soul all my sins.

4. [50:5] I well know the enormity of my sin, which is continually before my eyes, reproaching me with the evil that I have done.

5. [50:6] O Lord, against Thee alone I have sinned, and I have dared to do evil before Thy eyes; but I hope to receive from Thee the pardon which Thou hast promised to repentant sinners so that Thou mayest be justified in Thy words. In sermonibus tuis, that is, in regard to Thy promises to pardon him who repents, and that Thou wilt overcome, that is, Thou wilt shut the mouth of my enemies, who think and dare to say that it is not just that I should receive pardon for so great a sin, when Thou shalt judge me.

It must be remarked that this verse is variously explained by others. "Tibi soli peccavi." Bellarmine, Tirinus, and Mattei, following the commentary of St. Cyril and of St. Gregory, explain thus: Tibi soli peccavi ut judici—Against Thee only have I sinned as Judge. I have sinned against Thee alone, in this sense, that Thou alone art to judge me; for though it is true that I have also sinned against my neighbor by causing the death of Urias and by scandalizing the people, nevertheless I am afraid of Thee alone; because as king I have no one on earth to judge me, and yet I have to be judged, and by Thee alone be punished, and not by men. This commentary is beautiful, but the interpretation given above appears to me more simple and more appropriate: "Lord against Thee alone I have sinned," for it was God's law only that David transgressed. It is no objection that he had also offended against Urias and the people; for these offences were sins only so far as they were transgressions of the law of God, since all the malice of sin consists in the transgression of the divine law, according to what the Apostle says: "Peccatum non cognovi, nisi per legem"—But I did not know sin, but by the law (Rom. 7:7). Hence David said with good reason: Against Thee only I have sinned; for Thy law alone I have transgressed. "Ut justificeris."[13290] Theodoret says that the particle Ut does not here signify cause but consequence. "Judicaris." According to the Hebrew: Judicaveris—Thou shalt judge.

6. [50:7] I have had the misfortune of being conceived in sin; when my mother conceived me I appeared in the world already a sinner.—As if he would say: what, O Lord! couldst Thou expect from a man conceived in sin?—Grotius explains this passage thus: I was guilty from my birth. But this interpretation seems to favor the opinion of Socinus, who denied original sin. and denied that it was contracted from the moment of conception; whereas this text proves perhaps more clearly than any other that all men are conceived in original sin.

7. [50:8] Thou lovest the truth, and him also who confesses his fault: I confess my ingratitude, inasmuch as Thou hast favored me by making known to me the secrets of Thy wisdom, secrets uncertain and hidden to others.

8. [50:9] Reference is here made to the sprinkling of the blood of the victims, which was made over the lepers with hyssop to purify them (Levit. 14:6). That is to say: Cleanse me, O Lord! ever more and more.[13291]

9. [50:10] In making me hear that Thou hast pardoned me, Thou wilt give to my soul a joy and gladness so great that my very bones, that is, all my interior powers, which have been so greatly afflicted, shall leap for joy.

10. [50:11] My God, turn, then, Thy face from my sins, that is, look no longer upon them; and blot out from my soul all my faults, which gave Thee horror.

11. [50:12] Change my heart, and give me a pure heart, that loves none but Thee: and renew within my bowels, that is, my interior, that right spirit which I had lost by sin.

13. [50:14] Restore to me the joy of the salvation which Thou hast given me, and confirm me in good by means of a principal spirit, that is, one that is strong, inspired by Thee.

14. [50:14] I promise Thee, on account of the scandal that I have given, to instruct sinners in Thy law, and I hope that they will be converted to Thee.

15. [50:16] "Sanguinibus." Rotigni and Lallemant give to this word a sense that is very probable, by explaining it to refer to the remorse of conscience with which David was afflicted on account of the blood of Urias.[13292]—"Justitiam tuam." Bellarmine says that the pardon of sin is mercy with respect to us; but that it is justice with regard to Jesus Christ who, by his death, has merited for us pardon; and this is the divine justice of which David meant to speak.

17. [50:18] If to satisfy for my sins Thou hadst required of me sacrifices, I would willingly have offered them to Thee; but I well know that with holocausts Thou art not satisfied.

18. [50:19] The sacrifice that is pleasing to Thee, O my God! is a soul afflicted on account of its sin; when a heart is contrite and humbled Thou knowest not how to despise it.

19. [50:20] That is: If I do not deserve to be heard, look, O Lord! with a gracious eye upon Thy city Sion, and according to Thy good-will, that is, in accordance with the purpose of Thy good pleasure, which Thou hadst in choosing it as Thy dwelling place, show to it Thy favor, so that the walls of Jerusalem, now fallen in ruins, may be rebuilt.

20. [50:21] Then wilt Thou accept with joy my sacrifices of justice, that is, as Bellarmine understands it, my homage justly due to Thee, and all my offerings and holocausts; and many, after my example, will offer to Thee upon Thy altar, calves, that is, choice victims, amongst which the calf was the noblest.[13293]

PSALM 5 OF THE PSALTER

The just man may here understand perfectly how he should conduct himself in adversities and then be consoled by confiding in God. At the end, the psalm shows us the happiness of heaven as a reward promised to souls that suffer patiently here below.

1. [5:2] 2. God hears and understands everything; but sometimes he seems not to hear, or not to understand, because the prayer that we make to him is either not just or because it is ill-made. Hence David said: O Lord, hear me, understand me.

3. [5:4] I will always have recourse to Thee; and I know of a certainty, according to Thy promises, that Thou wilt always hearken to my prayer.

4. [5:5] I will place myself in Thy presence to pray to Thee, and I will always have before my eyes that Thou hatest all iniquity.[13294]

9. [5:9] "Propter inimicos meos, dirige in conspectu tuo viam meam." To confound my enemies so direct me that I may always walk in Thy presence.

11. [5:11] An open sepulchre that exhales a malignant infection; for they use their tongues to weave deceits; judge them, and punish them as they deserve.

15. [5:13] Thou hast surrounded us on all sides with the shield of goodwill which renders us secure from all the assaults of our enemies.

CANTICLE OF THE PROPHET ISAIAS (CH. 12)

Isaias, after having prophesied the coming of the Messias, the call of the Gentiles, the end of the captivity, and the return of the Jews to the Land of Promise, composed this canticle that it might be chanted by the people in thanksgiving to the Lord. (Is. 12.)—The Church appoints it to be sung as a thanksgiving to Jesus Christ for having given us the law of grace and for having by this signal benefit delivered us from the slavery of the devil.

1. [12:1] I will ever thank Thee, because after being justly angry with me for my sins, Thy wrath is turned to clemency, and has consoled me.

2, 3. [12:2] My God has come himself to save me; I shall then live henceforward in confidence and without fear; for the Lord will be my strength and the object of my praise, since he has willed to become my Saviour.

4, 5. [12:3, 4] The prophet here addresses his words to the faithful, and says to them: You will draw with joy from the very fountains of the Saviour the waters[13295] of salvation; that is, according to St. Cyril and St. Jerome, his holy doctrine; or, according to St. Ambrose and Origen, the sacraments; or, according to St. Bernard, the gifts of the Holy Ghost. And in that day you will say one to another: Give praise to the Lord, and invoke his name; make known to the people the inventions[13296] of his love, and remember always to praise him, for his name is exceedingly great, even high above all praise.

6. [12:5] "Quoniam magnifice fecit." For the magnificence that he has wrought in making us pass from death to life.

7. [12:6] "Habitatio Sion." The assembly of the faithful, the holy Church.—"Magnus in medio tui, Sanctus Israel." That is: Emmanuel, the expected of Israel, is in the midst of thee, to enrich thee with his graces.

PSALM MISERERE MEI DEUS OF MONDAY AT LAUDS

PSALM 42 OF THE PSALTER

David begs of God to be delivered from his enemies, and consoles himself with the hope of again seeing the Tabernacle of the Lord. In the spiritual sense this psalm applies to the just man who in the trials of the present life longs to leave this world, and to go to his heavenly country.[13297]

1. [42:1] "De gente non sancta." Against the wicked who persecute me.

2. [42:2] "Quare me repulisti?" Why dost Thou seem to have cast me off?

3. [42:3] Send forth Thy light, and make me enjoy Thy promises; they will bring me out of sadness, and will lead me to Thy holy mountain of Sion, and to Thy tabernacle.—"Deduxerunt et adduxerunt." According to the Hebrew: Deducent et adducent.

4. [42:4] Having entered therein, I will approach the divine altar, and even to my God, who will restore to me the gladness that rejoiced my youth.

5. [42:5] "Confitebor tibi." There I will sing Thy praises.[13298]—"Quare tristis es, anima mea? Why, my soul, having such a hope, art thou sad?

6. [42:6] Have confidence in thy God, for I hope to go one day to bless him and to thank him forever in heaven, while saying to him: Thou art my God and the salvation of my face, that is, Thou my Saviour wilt be ever present to my eyes, and to see Thy beautiful face will be my salvation and beatitude.

(Here follow the Psalms Deus, Deus meus, and Deus misereatur, as on Sunday at Lauds.)

CANTICLE OF EZECHIAS (IS. 38:9)

The title of this canticle sufficiently explains its contents, thus: Scriptura Ezechiæ, regis Juda, cum ægrotasset, et convaluisset de infirmitate sua—The writing of Ezechias, king of Juda, when he had been sick, and was recovered of his sickness. In the first part Ezechias complains of his sad state, and in the second he thanks God for having restored him to health. This canticle perfectly applies to the Christian who bewails his spiritual infirmities and who then thanks the Lord for the help that he has given to him.

1. [38:10] I said: In the middle of my life's course[13299] I shall enter the tomb.

2. [38:10] I set myself to consider the rest of the years which I might have lived, and I said: So here on earth I shall not any more have the joy of going to the temple, there to visit and to adore my Lord and my God.

3. [38:11] I shall see no more the inhabitants of my kingdom, who now live in peace.

4. [38:12] Behold I remain deprived of all posterity, and my family will be destroyed, as is the wont to destroy a shed of shepherds. Such is the explanation of St. Jerome, St. Thomas, and others.[13300]

5. [38:12] My life is being cut off like a web that is cut off by the weaver; I was still weaving it when the Lord cut it off; thus, my God, from morning till evening, Thou wilt make an end of me, that is, within the space of one day Thou wilt bring my life to a close.

6. [38:13] I hoped to live until the morning of the second day; but the violence of the disease, like a lion, has broken all my bones, that is, has taken away all my strength.

7. [38:13] My state is such that I cannot now last to see the evening. Like a little callow swallow that is in the nest, without feathers, suffering from cold and hunger, I cry out and beg for pity; and like a plaintive dove, so do I meditate upon my miseries, and implore for help by my moanings.

9. [38:14] O Lord! I am oppressed by evil; do Thou answer for me.[13301] But what is it that I ask for, or what will the Lord reply to me since it is he himself who has done it, that is, it is he that has reduced me to the state in which I am?

10. [38:15] This being so, I will go over in thought all my past years, in bitterness of soul for the sins that I have committed.

11. [38:16] If this be man's life, that is, a life of sin, and if thus my life has been passed, punish me, and thus preserve my life. Behold, in the time even of my great bitterness I have regained peace.

12. [38:17] But Thou, O my God! hast delivered me from death; and in order to deliver me therefrom, Thou hast cast all my sins behind Thy back, no more to behold them.

13. [38:18] He that is dead in the tomb can no longer praise Thee, nor can he hope to see the fulfilment of Thy promises.

14. [38:19] Only the living sing Thy praises, as I am doing this day; and so fathers shall recount to their children Thy fidelity to the promises which Thou hast made to them.

15. [38:20] Save me, and so I shall celebrate Thy glories in Thy temple all the days of my life.

Bellarmine (Ps. 6:5) thinks, with St. Jerome and other Fathers, that Ezechias speaks here of eternal death and hell, as the preceding verse Eruisti animam, etc., would seem to indicate.—The just soul, he adds, after the death of its body, is always alive and continues to praise God; and even without its body, in the tomb, it awaits the truth of God, who has promised to resuscitate it. We may see similar passages in the psalm 5:5; 87:11–13; 113:26, 27. —As we recite this canticle in the Office of the dead, it is then proper to apply it to the souls of the dead in the sense given by the holy Fathers; hence the House of the Lord, v. 15, can only be heaven.

(The psalm Laudate Dominum as on Sunday at Lauds.)

PSALM MISERERE MEI DEUS AS ON MONDAY AT LAUDS

PSALM 64 OF THE PSALTER

The people ask with the greatest confidence that God may put an end to their captivity in Babylon. The Jews, slaves of the Chaldeans, represent here the Gentiles, the slaves of the devil.—This psalm well applies to the just, who sigh for the end of their exile here on earth.

1. [64:2] Thou art worthy of being praised in Sion, and in Jerusalem shall worthy homage be paid to Thee.[13302]

2. [64:3] If Thou wilt hear me, we shall come to Thee with all the people.

3. [64:4] "Verba." A Hebraism for Opera. Accordingly the verse is thus explained: The unjust deeds or plots of the enemy have prevailed against us; but Thou, O Lord! wilt have compassion on our sins, which have reduced us to slavery, and Thou wilt take us out of these great miseries.

4. [64:5] Happy he whom Thou choosest for Thine own, and whom Thou hast taken under Thy protection: he shall dwell securely in Thy temple.

5. [64:5] There in Thy house we shall be filled with good things; this Thy temple is all holy, and admirable for the love of justice which it inspires. It is said: "Of justice," because the saints are admitted into this house while the wicked are excluded from it.

6. [64:6] Hearken to us, O God, our Saviour, Thou who art the hope of all nations, even of those that dwell at the uttermost limits of the earth and in the most distant isles!

8. [64:8] "A signis tuis." When they behold the signs of Thy wrath. "Exitus matutini et vespere delectabis."[13303] On the other hand, Thou shalt delight with Thy benefits the goings forth of the morning and of the evening; that is, of Thy servants who are in the East and in the West, where the sun rises and where it sets.

9. [64:10] "Inebriasti eam." That is: Thou hast poured upon it abundance of rain.

10. [64:10] The river which Thou causest to run through the country[13304] is full of water, so as not to fail for Thy providing food for Thy people; since in this way art Thou wont to prepare the earth to bring forth its fruit.

11. [64:11] Thou wilt satiate its furrows[13305] with water, and Thou wilt multiply its plants; the showers of rain shall be such that the earth will rejoice therein, and abound with fruit.

12. [64:12] Throughout the circle of the year Thou wilt bless it with the signs of Thy goodness; and the fields will be filled by Thee with a rich harvest.

13. [64:13] Even the deserts will become fertile and pleasant; and the hills will be girded with joy; that is, they shall be clothed with smiling verdure.

14. [64:14] These fields and these hills will be covered with flocks; the valleys will abound with corn, and then all will resound with the voice of jubilee and hymns of praise to God.

(The psalms Deus, Deus meus, and Deus misereatur, see Sunday at Lauds.)

THE CANTICLE OF ANNA, MOTHER OF SAMUEL

Inspired by the Holy Ghost, Anna thanks God for having freed her from the reproach of sterility, and she predicts clearly the mystery of the Incarnation and the glories of the Church.—There is no Christian that cannot use this canticle to thank God for all his benefits, and especially for the benefits of Redemption.

1. [2:1] My heart has exulted with joy in the Lord; and my glory, as a mother, has been exalted by the power of my God.

2. [2:1] My enemies insulted me; I was able to answer them that Thou hast consoled me by granting me the favor of delivering me from sterility.

5. [2:3] "Vetera." The Hebrew word, as Du Hamel remarks, also signifies: Dura—Hard. The explanation of this verse is: Let your hard and cutting words of the past cease; for God is the Lord of wisdom, and it is before him that all our thoughts should be prepared or directed.

8. [2:5][13306]"Infirmata est." Has become weak, that is, sterile.

16. [2:10] The Lord will judge the whole earth, and will give it over to be governed by the King of his choice, and he will exalt the glory of his Christ, that is, of the Messias.

THE PSALM MISERERE MEI DEUS AS ON MONDAY AT LAUDS

PSALM 89 OF THE PSALTER

According to St. Jerome, it is Moses who in this psalm[13307] represents to God the brevity and the miseries of human life, and prays to him to have pity on his people. Other interpreters, however, apply it to the Jews who are captives at Babylon and implore help from God.

1. [89:1] Thou hast been at all times our refuge, and Thou wilt be so to the end.

2. [89:2] Thou hast ever been and wilt ever be the God that Thou art.[13308]

3. [89:3] Some explain this verse thus: Do not Thou suffer that men should turn their back upon Thee to give themselves up to worthless creatures; for Thou hast said to them: O men! turn ye unto me, and I will make you feel the effects of my mercy. But others, as Maldonatus, Bossuet, Mattei, etc., follow the Hebrew text, which says: Convertis hominem in pulverem, or, according to St. Jerome: Convertes hominem usque ad contritionem, et dices: Convertimini, or Revertimini, filii Adam; and they explain the verse thus: Thou, O Lord, art eternal; but Thou hast ordained that all men should one day return to the dust out of which they are formed. This explanation is founded on the Hebrew text; but the former, which follows the Vulgate, appears more simple and natural.

4. [89:4] Even if we were to live a thousand years, what more would these be in Thy sight, that is, compared with Thy eternity, than as yesterday which is already past? Such is the explanation that the learned commonly give, as Malvenda thus attests: Omnes fere.

5. [89:5] All these thousand years are no more than one of the four watches into which the night is divided, and which are counted as nothing; what then do all the years of men count when compared with eternity?

6. [89:6] St. Jerome translates: Mane floruit et abiit; ad vesperam conteretur atque siccabitur—The life of man is like a blade of grass that soon passes; in the morning it flourishes and in the evening it falls, withers, and dries up.

7. [89:7] Such is our lot, because by our sins we have provoked Thy wrath; we have become mortal, and we are afflicted by the horror and the fear of death on account of Thy just anger. So it is explained by Bellarmine and many others.

8. [89:8] When God wills to punish the sinner, he keeps his eyes fixed on his faults; when, on the contrary, he wills to show him mercy, he turns away his eyes in order not to see them: Avertit faciem. It is for this reason that David says in Psalm 1.: Avertit faciem tuam a peccatis meis—Turn away Thy face from my sins. "In illuminatione vultus tui." Thou exposest to the light and examinest our most secret faults. These explanations are given by Bellarmine, Lallemant, etc.

9. [89:9] That is: Our life is shortened, and we succumb under the weight of Thy wrath which we have excited by our sins. This is the sense given by Bellarmine and Menochius.

10. [89:10] Our life is like the web which the spider wastes its own self to make, and which is destroyed by the least touch. As to the number of our years, they do not generally exceed seventy. "Anni nostri sicut aranea meditabuntur." The Hebrew according to Bellarmine is: Anni nostri sicut meditatio; and according to St. Jerome: Consumpsimus annos nostros quasi sermonem loquens. But these different renderings signify the same thing, namely, that our life passes away like a thought, a meditation, or like a word that is over the moment that it is uttered.[13309]

12. [89:10] When we shall reach that age, seeing ourselves near death we shall correct the sentiments of pride which we had during our life. This interpretation will agree with the Hebrew text, which is thus rendered: Quoniam tonsio celeriter, et avolabimus.—For quickly is the cutting off, and we have fled away. And with St. Jerome: Transibimus cito, et avolabimus—We have passed away quickly and have fled.[13310]

13. [89:11] Who has ever understood how great, O Lord! is the power of Thy wrath, and who can measure the greatness of Thy indignation, which surpasses all that we can conceive, and all that is commonly believed?

14. [89:12] Make us know the strength of Thy arm, and cause us to be fully informed of Thy avenging justice; and thus made wise we shall come to Thee. St. Jerome translates it thus: Sic ostende, et veniemus corde sapienti—Thus show to us, and we shall come to Thee with a wise heart.

15. [89:13] Turn to us with a gracious countenance; how long wilt Thou show Thyself in anger? Suffer Thyself to be moved by the prayers of Thy servants.

16. [89:14][13311] And thus we shall at once see ourselves filled with Thy mercy; we shall exult with joy and we shall be glad all the days of our life.

18. [89:16] "In servos tuos et in opera tua." That is, according to Menochius and Tirinus: Upon Thy servants, who are the work of Thy hands—"Et dirige filios eorum." Look graciously upon their children, and direct them in the way of salvation.

19. [89:17] May the grace of our Lord shine upon us: direct in us our actions and all that we do.

(The psalms Deus, Deus meus, and Deus misereatur, as on Sunday at Lauds.)

Moses composed this canticle that the people might chant it in thanksgiving for the miraculous passage of the Red Sea. He predicts in it the conquest by the Israelites of the promised land through the defeat of their enemies.[13312]

1. [15:1] "Æquum et ascensorem." The horses and riders who pursued us.[13313]

2. [15:2] The Lord is our strength and the object of our praise; he has made himself our Saviour.[13314]

3. [15:2] He is my God, the God of our father Abraham; I will always proclaim his glory.

4. [15:3] "Quasi vir pugnator." He has come forth as a warrior to defend us.[13315]

7. [15:7] "Congregatæ sunt aquæ." The waters have gathered together, that is, have risen up on both sides to give passage to Thy servants.

9. [15:9] "Implebitur anima mea." I shall be fully satisfied.

11. [15:10] "Flavit spiritus tuus." The wind sent by Thee blew waves.

12. [15:11] Who among the mighty[13316] can be found like unto Thee who art so great in holiness, so terrible in power, and so worthy of all praise for Thy goodness? And who can work the admirable marvels that Thou hast made.

13. [15:12] "Devoravit eos terra." Lallemant translates: Our enemies have disappeared from the face of the earth. But the explanation that Rotigni gives seems to be better, namely: The sea having cast them on the shore, they were covered by the sand. "Quem redemisti." Whom Thou hast delivered from the hands of their enemies.

14. [15:13] From the beginning of this verse to the end of the canticle, Moses speaks of the entrance and establishment of the people in the Land of Promise.

15. [15:14][13317] The people of that land rose up enraged against Thy people; the Philistines had the grief of seeing themselves driven out from the country where they dwelt.

18. [15:16] Lallemant applies this verse to the passage of the Red Sea; but Rotigni applies it to the entrance of the people into the Land of Promise, spoken of in the following verse. Notwithstanding this reason, the first explanation seems to me more proper.[13318] "Quem possedisti." This people whom Thou hast won for Thyself, and hast made Thy own possession.

19. [15:17] Thou wilt bring in this Thy people, and wilt establish[13319] them on Mount Sion, which Thou hast chosen for Thy inheritance and for Thy fixed abode, having prepared it in order to found there Thy temple.

20. [15:17] This sanctuary, which Thou, O Lord! hast established to make there Thy perpetual abode, will serve for Thee to reign in throughout the ages and world without end. Here the canticle finishes: what follows is a summary of the history of the passage of the Red Sea, as recorded in Exodus.[13320]

THE PSALM MISERERE MEI DEUS AS ON MONDAY AT LAUDS

PSALM 142 OF THE PSALTER

Driven and pursued by Absalom,[13321] David regards his removal from Jerusalem as a just punishment for his sins, and gives utterance to sentiments of repentance, and prays to the Lord.

(The Psalms Deus, Deus meus, and Deus misereatur, as on Sunday at Lauds.)

1. [142:1] "In veritate tua." According to Thy faithful promise. "In tua justitia." According to the goodness which Thou showest to the truly penitent. Thus St. John Chrysostom understands the word.[13322]

2. [142:2] "Non justificabitur in conspectu tuo omnis vivens." There is no one who, living on earth, can be called just before Thee.

3. [142:3] The enemy, that is, the devil, has persecuted my soul in tempting me to those offences that I have committed; and thus he has humbled my life here on earth, making me become vile in Thy eyes.

4. [142:4] He has placed me in darkness, making me like a man of the world who no more sees the light by which to walk as he should; and my spirit is restless with anxiety at the sight of my misery, and my heart within me is afflicted and troubled.

5. [142:5] I was mindful and I reflected on all the wonderful works wrought in our behalf by the Almighty hand.

6. [142:6] I have stretched forth my hands towards Thee, to obtain mercy, for my soul is become as dried up earth; it is unable to serve Thee, seeing itself deprived of the water of Thy grace.

7. [142:7] Make haste to hear me, O Lord! and strengthen me by Thy grace, for I feel my spirit fainting in me.

9. [142:8] Make me soon hear the voice of Thy mercy; telling me that Thou hast pardoned me; for in Thee alone have I placed all my hope of salvation.

10. [142:8] "Ad te levavi animam meam." That is: I have resolved to detach myself from all earthly affections, to please only Thee.

11. [142:9] "Deus meus es tu." Thou art my God; and therefore Thou deservest that I should not do anything except what Thou willest.

12. [142:10] Thy good spirit, that is, the Holy Ghost, will conduct me, while here upon earth, by the right way; I hope, for the glory of Thy name, that Thou wilt grant me vigor and strength to live according to Thy justice, that is, to lead the life of the just. "In æquitate tua." According to the Hebrew: In justitia tua.

13. [142:12] I hope that Thou wilt deliver my soul from eternal tribulation.

THE CANTICLE OF HABACUC

Having learnt by revelation, of the captivity in Babylon in store for the Jews on account of their sins, the prophet prays for his unfortunate countrymen; then he announces their deliverance by Cyrus, king of Persia. According to St. Jerome, Theodoret, Theophylact, Rupert, Euthymius, Jansenius of Ghent, Cornelius à Lapide, and most of the other commentators, we have here a manifest figure of the divine work wrought by Jesus Christ to deliver mankind from the slavery of the devil.[13323]

1. [3:2] "Auditionem tuam." That is: All that Thou hast revealed to me.

2. [3:2] "Vivifica." According to Du Hamel: Perfice—Perfect. Lallemant gives this explanation: Complete Thy work, the deliverance of the Jews from the captivity of Babylon, and in mercy shorten the time of our chastisement. But this passage is better understood in the figurative sense, thus: Bring to perfection the work of man's redemption by means of the Messias: Grant that it may have its full force and effect within the space of years which Thou hast determined.

3. [3:2] In the midst of those years appointed; that is, anticipating the time fixed, Thou wilt make manifest the work of the deliverance of the Jews from the captivity of Babylon. (This is in the literal sense; but in the mystical sense is signified the redemption of mankind.) And though angry at the sons of men, yet Thou wilt be mindful of Thy mercy, and wilt not withhold it from us: Licet peccatis hominum iratus, says Du Hamel, misericordiam tuam non subtrahes.

4. [3:3] God will come from the South to deliver his people, as the Holy One of Israel came of old on Sinai, appearing from Mount Pharan (Deut. 33:2). So too, from Persia and Media, lying to the South, came Cyrus and Darius to deliver the Jews from Babylon. In the figurative sense this verse, as understood by St. Jerome, Theodoret, Theophylact, and others cited by Tirinus, this verse applies to the Messias who was to be born at Bethlehem situated to the south of Jerusalem. "Sanctus de monte Pharan." Tirinus says that hereby is meant the Holy Ghost, who descended on Mount Pharan and communicated the spirit of prophecy to the seventy judges of the people (Num. 11:25).

5. [3:3] His glory overspread the heavens, causing their brightness to pale, and the whole earth was filled with their praises. In a figurative sense this signifies: The Messias who is to come will fill heaven with glory, and the angels will praise him on earth. It is thus that they chanted at his birth: Gloria in altissimis Deo—Glory to God in the highest (Luke, 2:14).

6. [3:4] He shall appear resplendent with light as the sun, and his hands shall be armed with power. "Splendor ejus ut lux erit." This may mean, in the literal sense, that at the coming of Cyrus the light of liberty will shine forth for the Jews; and in the figurative sense that at the coming of the Messias, of whom Cyrus was a figure, the true light shall shine forth on the world, according to what is said in the Gospel: Erat Lux vera, quæ illuminat omnem hominem—That was the true light which enlighteneth every man (John, 1:9). "Cornua in manibus ejus." Cornu and Cornua in Scripture mean strength. Tirinus and Du Hamel, with St. Cyprian and St. Augustine, thus apply this passage to Jesus Christ: All his strength to conquer the devil and the world shall be in his hands pierced upon the cross. St. Augustine says: Quid fortius manu hac, quæ mundum vicit, non ferro armata, sed transfixa?—What is there stronger than that hand which conquered the world, not armed, but transfixed with iron? (In Ps. xxxiv. s. I, n. I.)

7. [3:4] In the figurative sense: There (that is, in his pierced hands) is hidden his power; so that before his power, death will fly, conquered by his death: Absorpta est mors in victoria—Death is swallowed up in victory (1 Cor. 15:54).

8. [3:5] At the entrance of the people into the Land of Promise the Lord was preceded by the devil, the executor of his vengeance; whereupon the enemies being vanquished, he distributed their lands to his people. "Egredietur diabolus ante pedes ejus." This is explained figuratively: The devil shall be utterly vanquished, and shall go forth with shame, to be led in triumph before the feet of Jesus Christ, his conqueror, who will despoil him of his power, according to the words of St. Paul: Exspolians principatus et potestates, traduxit confidenter, palam triumphans illos in semetipso—Despoiling the principalities and powers, he hath exposed them confidently in open show, triumphing over them in himself (Col. 2:15). "Stetit, et mensus est terram." Then Jesus as conqueror seated at the right hand of his Father, as Du Hamel says, and looking over the earth, divided it among his Apostles, that they might fill it with the light of the Gospel: Qui, sedens ad dexteram Patris, terram Apostolis suis divisit, ut Evangelii luce eam complerent.

9. [3:6] With his looks he broke asunder the nations; and the great ones of the world, who seemed like mountains, were brought to naught. In the figurative sense: He looked upon the earth and the nations, and, giving them the light of faith, he set them free from the yoke of Satan; and as for the princes of the world, who as mountains were lifted up, they were brought low and shattered at the coming of Jesus Christ.

10. [3:6] These proud hills of the world have been laid low beneath the feet of the Eternal. In the figurative sense: These princes of the world shall bow down before the Redeemer, bending the knee to adore him. as they consider that on him depends the course of eternal ages. "Ab itineribus æternitatis ejus." According to the Hebrew: Itinera sæculi ætcrni ejus sunt—His are the journeys of the eternal age.

11. [3:7] I saw the tents of the Ethiopians cast down for their wickedness, and the tabernacles of the Madianites thrown to the earth. In the mystical sense: As the hosts of the Ethiopians and of the Madianites were seen destroyed on account of their wicked doings against God's people, so shall those that oppose the Gospel be likewise punished.

13. [3:8] Thou didst save Thy people, and didst deliver them from the Egyptians, mounting upon the clouds as on horses which draw the chariot.

14. [3:9] Thou wilt resume Thy bow, that is, the bow of Thy power, and wilt fulfil the promises that Thou hast sworn to the tribes of Israel. Thus Tirinus, Du Hamel, and Rotigni explain it.

15. [3:9] Thou didst cut in twain the course of the Jordan, that Thy people might pass over. Its waters saw Thee, that is, understood Thy command, and raising themselves like mountains, remained suspended in the air, as if grieving to see themselves stopped in their course;[13324] and thus Thy people crossed over the river.

16. [3:10] The waters flowed back with noise, and in lifting themselves on high they seemed to raise up their hands to implore Thy permission to return again to their course.

17. [3:11] At Josue's voice, in the battle with the Amorrhites, Thou didst cause the sun and the moon to stand still in their course (Jos. 10:13); and didst make his army march by the glare of Thy lightnings, and by the glitterings of Thy spear from which thunderbolts flashed.

18. [3:12] Thou didst tread underfoot, that is, Thou didst go through the earth with the roar of thunderings and of lightnings; and the hostile nations were astonished and in dismay at Thy wrath.

19 [3:13] "Cum Christo tuo." Such was Cyrus who came to set free the people from captivity, as Isaias had foretold: Hæc dicit Dominus Christo meo Cyro, cujus apprehendi dexteram, ut subjiciam ante faciem ejus gentes—Thus said the Lord to my anointed Cyrus, whose right hand I have taken hold of to subdue nations before his face (Is. 45:1). Now, Cyrus was a type of Jesus Christ, who has saved us by his merits, as remark St. Jerome, St. Augustine (*De Civ. D.*1. 18, c. 32), and others. The verse is translated thus according to the sixth Greek version: Egressus es ut salvares populum per Jesum Christum tuum.

20. [3:13] "Percussisti caput de domo impii." Thou hast struck the head of the house of the impious one, that is, king Balthassar, the head of the Chaldeans, and Thou hast utterly ruined him (Dan. 5.). In the mystical sense: Thou hast laid prostrate the devil, the head of impiety. "Denudasti fundamentum ejus usque ad collum." Tirinus thus interprets this: Denudatum evertisti ab imo sursum. Thou hast despoiled him of his empire, and hast upset him from top to bottom, that is, Thou hast taken from him all his tyrannical power. It is thus, O Lord! that Thou hast willed to save Thy people by means of Jesus Christ.

21. [3:14] Thou hast cursed his empire,[13325] that, namely, of king Balthassar, along with the head of his soldiers, who are come as a whirlwind to destroy Thy people. This is understood mystically of the curse pronounced on the devil, who held sway over the human race, and on his associates, who all contrived our ruin.

22. [3:14] "Qui devorat pauperem in abscondito." Who robs and kills a poor man in a secret place where no one can come to his help.

23. [3:15] Thou didst open a passage in the Red Sea, making the horses of Thy people pass upon its muddy bed in the midst of the piled-up masses of waters. Tirinus observes that here the canticle ends, and that the prophet adds what follows.[13326]

24. [3:16] The prophet, knowing by revelation what God's people would have to suffer before their deliverance, says: I heard this prediction and my heart was troubled; at what was told me my lips quivered, so that I was unable to utter a word.

26. [3:16] So that I may find myself at rest in the tomb on the day of so great a tribulation, and thus be united with our people who have already fought the fight against the enemy. But we read in the old Vulgate: Ad populum peregrinationis meæ. That is: To the people who regard this life as a pilgrimage, as I myself regard it.

27. [3:17] In the mystical sense, this is what it may mean: In the desolation to which the Jews shall be brought in punishment for having put their Saviour to death, they will cease to produce any fruit of good works, having lost the kingdom of God, which shall be given to the Christian people who will bring forth fruits of holiness, according to the words of Jesus Christ: Ideo dico vobis, quia auferetur a vobis regnum Dei, et dabitur genti facienti fructus ejus—Therefore I say to you, that the kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and shall be given to a nation yielding the fruits thereof (Matt. 21:43).

28. [3:17] "Mentietur opus olivæ." The olive crop shall lie; that is, shall disappoint expectation.

29. [3:17] St. Augustine (De Civ. D. 1. 18, c. 32) applies this passage to the Jews, who after having put Jesus Christ to death, were to remain without pastors, without Temple, and without spiritual food.

30. [3:18] "In Deo, Jesu meo" In the Hebrew, according to Pagnini, Vatablus, and others, we have: In Deo, salute mea. But some, says Tirinus, interpret the Hebrew in the sense of the Septuagint, which agrees with the Chaldee and Syriac, namely: In Deo, Jesu, or Salvatore, or Redemptore meo. Thus St. Augustine and others understand it.

31. [3:19] That is understood of the return of the Jews from the captivity of Babylon. In the mystical sense it is applied to the Gentiles hastening to come to God when set free by Jesus Christ from the bondage of Satan.

32. [3:19] The vanquisher of enemies will lead me up to Mount Sion, there to sing his glories. In the spiritual sense, according to St. Jerome: He will bring me to heaven, there to glorify him with hymns of praise and thanksgiving.

THE PSALM MISERERE MEI DEUS AS ON MONDAY AT LAUDS

PSALM 91 OF THE PSALTER

David here exhorts the people to praise God for the protection that he has given to the just, and for the chastisements inflicted on sinners in order to correct them.[13327]

1. [91:2] It is just to give glory to God by rendering him thanks for his benefits, and by singing his praises.[13328]

2. [91:3] "Veritatem tuam" Thy faithfulness to Thy promises.[13329]

3. [91:4] "In decachordo psalterio." Mariana and Sa understand thereby two different instruments, following in this the Hebrew, which St. Jerome thus translates: "In decachordo et in psalterio." But Bellarmine thinks that the copulative particle in the Hebrew is redundant; he depends, moreover, on the version of the Septuagint, and on other like expressions that we find in Psalms 32:2, and 143:10.

4. [91:5] "In factura tua, et in operibus manuum tuarum." Mattei says with reason that these two expressions are synonymous.

5. [91:6] "Magnificata." According to the Chaldee: Magnifica, magnificent. "Cogitationes tuæ." Thy thoughts, or, according to Sa and Mariana, Thy counsels; or with Menochius, the designs of Thy Providence. "Nimis profundæ." Impenetrable to our weak intelligence.

7, 8.[13330] [91:8, 9] "Apparuerint." According to the Hebrew: Floruerint. Explanation of these two verses: When sinners are born into this world, they are multiplied as the grass which grows up thick apace; and when all the wicked have made a show upon earth, with their dignities and riches, they still perish forever, while Thou, O Lord! shalt ever be the same that Thou art.

10. [91:11] My strength, or glory, by Thy grace, shall rise on high, as on the head of the unicorn rises its single horn, which is its strength and glory; and my old age shall be consoled by Thy mercy, abounding in gifts and helps.

11. [91:12] "Despexit." St. Jerome translates: Respiciet—My eyes shall see my enemies cast down so that, far from fearing them, I shall despise them, and my ears shall hear the chastisement inflicted on those that are risen against me in their malice to plot my ruin.

12. [91:13] The just shall flourish and shall endure as the palm-tree, which always remains green; they shall grow to a great height, like a cedar of Libanon.

13. [91:14] Planted in the house of the Lord, and cultivated by him, they shall flourish; that is, they will always preserve their vigor and their beauty.[13331]

14. [91:15] "Uberi." Abundant in fruits of virtue. "Bene patientes." According to the Hebrew: Virentes et florentes—Green and flowering; and St. Jerome translates: Frondentes—Leafy. That is: Of a temperament full of strength, they will be well able to bear up against fatigues. "Ut annuntient." Bellarmine says that this verb should be joined to the following verse.

15. [91:16] To make known to all the world, by word and example, that the Lord is right and just in all things, and that there is no iniquity or injustice in him because he allows the wicked to prosper; for in his own time, he will reward the just and punish sinners as they deserve.

(The psalms Deus, Deus meus, and Deus misereatur as on Sunday at Lauds.)

CANTICLE OF MOSES

It is by God's order[13332] that Moses, just before his death, intones this canticle in the presence of the people. In it he recounts the benefits done to the Israelites, the faults, and the chastisements sent by God to convert them (Deut. 32.).

2. [32:2] "Concrescat." According to the Hebrew: Stillet. "Fluat ut ros eloquium meum." Let my speech drop down as dew into the minds of those that hear me.

3. [32:2] "Nomen Domini invocabo." I will invoke the name of the Lord, that my words may be of profit.

5. [32:4] God is faithful to his promises, and in him there is no iniquity, for he is just and righteous; but for all that, the Israelites have turned their back upon him, and by their shameful action have made themselves unworthy to be called his children.

7. [32:6] "Possedit te." That is: Has chosen thee out of all nations for his own property.

9. [32:7] Ask of your fathers, and they will recount to you what they have seen; question your elders, and hear what they will tell you.

11. [32:8] He fixed the boundaries of the people who were to be the first to dwell in the Land of Promise, according to the number of the children of Israel who should possess that land.

12. [32:9] For the portion which the Lord reserved to himself, as specially his own, was the people of his choice; he thus destined Jacob to be his inheritance. In Scripture the portion of inheritance is called Funiculus, a line, because the portions were marked out by a line of cord.

14. [32:10] "Docuit." He instructed him in his law.

19. [32:13] That is: That he might draw honey even from the rocks, where the bees made their combs, and gather oil from the olives planted amongst the rocks.

20. [32:14] "Cum adipe agnorum et arietum." That is: With the flesh of the fat lambs and sheep; for it was forbidden to the Israelites to eat the fat of these animals (Levit. 7:23). "Filiorum Basan." That is: The country of Basan, east of the Jordan, were there were excellent pasturages, and therefore the best flocks.

22, 23. [32:15] This people, so beloved by God, after being thus fattened on his gifts, became stubborn: they struck out their heels against him by disobeying his precepts; in fine, having grown fat, and big, and bloated, they forsook their God who created them, and separated themselves from that God who alone could save them.

24. [32:16] "Provocaverunt eum." These ungrateful ones provoked him to anger.

26. [32:17] They brought into the world certain new gods, unknown to their fathers.

27. [32:18] Apostrophe to these foolish people.

28. [32:19] The Lord saw, and was inflamed with indignation, because those that thus offended him were his own sons and daughters.

29. [32:20] "Considerabo novissima eorum." I will have before my eyes their last excesses; these were the outrages and torments that the Jews inflicted on Jesus Christ, for which they were left abandoned in their obstinate unbelief.

30. [32:20] They have rendered themselves undeserving of my mercy.

31, 32. [32:21] They have provoked me by adoring as god what was not God, by setting themselves to honor vain and false deities; and I will afflict them by substituting for them a people which is not my people, a foolish nation, which knows me not.

33. [32:22] The wrath is kindled within me against them, and it shall burn them even to the lowest hell, where they shall be forever condemned.

35. [32:23] "Sagittas meas complebo in eis." That is: I will discharge against them all the arrows of my wrath, all the plagues.

39. [32:26] "Dixi." After that, I will say.

40. [32:27] "Propter iram inimicorum distuli." I have delayed the chastisement on account of the hatred borne me by their enemies.

42. [32:28] These enemies have neither discernment nor prudence; would to God that they had wisdom enough to understand, and prudence enough to provide for the last things, that is, for death and judgment!

43, 44. [32:30] They should say: How can it be that a single one of us goes against a thousand Hebrews, or two of us against ten thousand, and put them to flight? This could not happen were it not that their God had sold them, and because the Lord had so hemmed them in as to be unable to go forth and deliver themselves from their straits.

46. [32:32] Tirinus here observes that Moses or the Lord who speaks, returns to the Israelites, and assigns the cause of their chastisement, namely, because their vine[13333] has become like the vine of the Sodomites, which bears only fruits of iniquity.

49. [32:34] "In thesauris meis." Among the treasures of my judgments?

50. [32:35] To me it belongs to punish sins,[13334] and when the time arrives I will send the chastisement whereby they shall fall into the pit that is prepared for them, their feet stumbling against the stone, that is, as Rotigni explains, Jesus Christ, the corner-stone, set by God for their salvation. The Jews, by rejecting their Saviour, fell into perdition.

53. [32:37] But this shall not come to pass until the Jews shall be reduced to such weakness that those even who guarded the citadels shall themselves have yielded, and the others shall have perished.

55. [32:38] They partook of the fat of victims offered to such deities, arid drank the wine consecrated to them. The Gentiles consecrated wine to their gods, and such consecrations were called Libations.

56. [32:38] "Surgant." Let these gods arise. "In necessitate." In the extremities to which you are reduced.

59. [32:40] "Vivo ego in æternum." A form of oath which God pronounces to confirm the threat that follows.

62, 63. [32:42] That is, as Tirinus explains: My vengeance shall strike them all, but in different ways: some shall be put to death, others shall be made slaves, and others shall have their heads shaved. In ancient times the victors shaved the heads of the vanquished to disgrace them, as it is related that the Scipios did in Africa.

64. [32:43] "Populum ejus." The people of the Lord.

65. [32:43] "Propitius erit terræ populi sui." He will bless the land where his people shall dwell.

(The Psalms Laudate Dominum de cœlis and the Benedictus as on Sundays at Lauds.)

PSALM 53 OF THE PSALTER

Prayer that David addresses to God to deliver him from the soldiers of Saul by whom he was surrounded.[13335] This psalm may serve for all Christians that find themselves assailed by the temptations of the devil. We may remark with Cardinal Bellarmine that the holy Church wishes to teach us how to arm ourselves with prayer against the tribulations and temptations that may assail us every day.

1. [53:3] Save me, by the virtue and for the glory of Thy holy name, from the danger in which I am; judge me according to my innocence, and according to Thy power, which protects the innocent.

3. [53:5] My own fellow-countrymen have separated themselves from me and, as foreign enemies, have armed themselves against me, in order to take away my life, having lost sight of God's justice.[13336]

4. [53:6] "Ecce enim." But I already know that, etc.

5. [53:7] "Averte mala." According to the Hebrew: Revertatur malum—May evil return. Make, O God! to retort upon my enemies the evil that they have planned for me; scatter them according to Thy promises, which are always faithful and true.[13337]

6. [53:8] Then with ready heart will I offer Thee sacrifices; and I will praise Thy holy name, so full of goodness to him that invokes Thee.

7. [53:9] Through Thy mercy I find myself delivered by Thy hand from all anxiety, and my eyes shall be able to see with scorn my enemies cast down.

(FOR OTHER PSALMS THAT ARE TO BE SAID, SEE BREVIARY.)

PSALM 117 OF THE PSALTER

David offers here his solemn thanksgiving for the victory that he gained over his enemies, and for all the other benefits that had been conferred upon him; he thanks him specially for having given to the world Jesus Christ, the Redeemer of mankind.

1, 2, 3, 4. [117:1, 2, 3, 4] The prophet begins by inviting all men to praise God for the mercy that he continually exercises towards them. He then calls specially on the Israelites, among whom were all the apostles; he next invites all the priests, who were to propagate the holy faith; and lastly all the faithful.

5. [117:5] "In latitudine." By sending me abundant help.[13338]

6, 7. [117:6, 7] God is my protector; this is the reason why I shall fear nothing of all the evils that men think to do me; I will despise all the efforts and snares of my enemies.

10, 11, 12. [117:10, 11, 12] "Ultus sum." I have been revenged. It must be observed that this expression is not to be understood here of vengeance properly speaking, but of a victory gained over the enemy. It applies specially to Jesus Christ triumphing over his enemies, and to all the faithful who by his help overcome their temptations. We may, then, take these three verses together, and explain them thus: My enemies have closed in around me from every side, as an angry swarm of bees, or as a burning flame in a bundle of thorns; but thanks to the protection of the Lord, I have been avenged on them, that is, I have overcome them all.

15. [117:15] In the tabernacles or tents of the just, no voices were heard but of gladness and victory in thanksgiving to God for having saved me, and caused me to triumph over my enemies.

16. [117:16] The hand of God in aiding me has shown forth its strength.[13339]

17. [117:17] "Non moriar." As I shall not die as my enemies had hoped.

18. [117:18] "Castigans castigavit me." He has chastised me, but with the tender compassion of a father.

19. [117:19] The gates of justice are the gates of heaven; for justice is the gate of the kingdom of God; hence we should seek it before all things: Quærite ergo primum regnum Dei, et justitiam ejus—Seek first the kingdom of God and his justice (Matt. 6:33). Since justice is the only gate by which we can come to God, it is only the just that enter through it. Such is the sense given to this passage by St Jerome, St. John Chrysostom, and St. Augustine.

20. [117:21] Once having entered this gate, as I have desired, I will, O my God! sing Thy praises always, and render Thee thanks for having heard my prayer, and for having become my Saviour.

21. [117:22] This verse is to be understood only of Jesus Christ and his Church as St. Peter explains it to the Jews: Hic est lapis qui reprobatus est a vobis ædificantibus, qui factus est in caput anguli—This is the stone which was rejected by you the builders: which is become the head of the corner (Acts, 4:11).[13340] God sent upon earth this most precious Stone, that is, his own beloved Son; but the Jews, who at that time formed the Church, rejected him. This Stone, however, became the head of the corner, joining together the two walls, namely, the Hebrew nation and the Gentile people, into one Church.

23. [117:24] This is specially a happy day; it is a particular work of God: let it ever be a day of joy and thanksgiving for the immense benefits received.

24. [117:25] Save me, O Lord! and be ever gracious to me, so that I may never cease to repeat: Blessed be he that is come in the name of the Lord to save us! This precisely was the cry of the multitude when Jesus Christ made his triumphant entry into Jerusalem: Hosanna Filio David! benedictus, qui venit in nomine Domini!—Hosanna to the son of David: Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord (Matt. 21:9).[13341]

25, 26. [117:26, 27] We wish and bespeak you a thousand blessings, you who are of the Church of the Lord; for he is the true God, and he has manifested himself to us by taking to him our human flesh. Celebrate, then, this day with solemn pomp by adorning the temple even to the altar with green and leafy boughs.[13342]

David here announces, according to the exclusively literal sense of the psalm, the principal mysteries of the natural law. He predicts the vocation of the Gentiles; he describes the character of the predestined; he speaks of the interior justice with which the souls of the faithful will be adorned by the grace of Jesus Christ; in fine, after having referred to the divinity of our Lord, he prophesies his victories and his glorious ascension into heaven.

2. [23:2] God has thus prepared the earth to be the habitation of man.

3. [23:3] Heaven is called a mountain by reason of its elevation; and it is the sanctuary of God, where he has his throne.[13343]

4. [23:4] He shall ascend thither who has not sinned in his works, and has kept his heart pure, that is, detached from creatures; he who has not received his life in vain, that is, who has not only avoided evil, but has also fulfilled what God has enjoined on him; he who loves truth, and has not sworn falsely to deceive his neighbors.[13344]

6. [23:6] Such is the happy generation of those that seek God by being attentive to serve him, and that long to go to see in heaven the God of Jacob. According to the Hebrew text, we read: Quærentium faciem tuam, O Jacob! Bellarmine says that this phrase is obscure; hence the Septuagint-interpreters supplied here the word God, and have rendered the verse as we have it in the Vulgate, for it is only God who makes the joy of the saints.

7. [23:7] O angels, princes of the heavenly city! lift up, open the gates which have been given to you to guard; and yourselves, O eternal gates! (that is, you who have been shut from all eternity, as is explained by Rotigni) be ye lifted up, be ye opened, and the King of Glory shall enter.

8. [23:8] "In prælio." In the battle with his enemies whom he has conquered and discomfited.

PSALM 24 OF THE PSALTER

Exposed to persecution, David begs God's help; and regarding his afflictions as a just punishment for his sins, he renews his acts of repentance. We may therefore recite this psalm for ourselves when we are assailed and tormented by temptations which men and demons raise against us.

1. [24:1] "Non erubescam." I hope by Thy help that I shall not have the confusion of seeing myself conquered by my enemies.

2. [24:3] Suffer not that they have me in derision by gaining a victory over me; for all those that wait on Thee shall never be confounded.

3. [24:4] Let all the wicked rather be speedily put to confusion at seeing how they have worked their iniquity in vain, without the fruit they hoped for.

4. [24:4] Show me the ways by which Thou wouldst have me walk; teach me to keep the paths that lead to Thee.

5. [24:5] "In veritate tua." In the straight way of Thy law.[13345] "Te sustinui tota die." From Thee I continually look for the help that I need.

6. [24:6] "Quæ a sæculo sunt." Which Thou showest to the world for so many ages.

9. [24:8] "Legem dabit delinquentibus in via." To those that have sinned in this life he will give the rule to follow so as to be able to return to the right way.

10. [24:9] He will guide the gentle by the straight paths of his law, which in the Scriptures is called Judicium—Judgment; he will teach the docile of heart to walk in his ways.[13346]

11. [24:10] The whole conduct of the Lord is full of mercy and of fidelity to his promises towards his servants, who keep before their eyes the covenant made between God and those that are faithful to his precepts.

12. [24:11] Thou wilt show mercy with regard to my sins, and their pardon will cause Thy glory to shine forth all the more brightly because they have been grievous and many.

13. [24:12] Who is the man that truly fears God? It is he to whom the Lord has taught the way he has chosen to walk.[13347]

14. [24:13] His soul shall dwell in good things, that is, it shall be continually enriched with goods spiritual and temporal; and his children, following his good example, shall be heirs of the Promised Land, that is, of heaven.

15. [24:14] "Testamentum ipsius, ut manifestetur illis." To those to whom he manifests the covenant that he has made to protect his faithful servants.

16. [24:15] I will then keep my eyes ever fixed upon the Lord, for he it is that shall deliver me from the snares that Thy enemies lay for me.

17. [24:16] My God, turn Thy eyes towards me, and have pity upon me, for I am alone and poor, and my enemies are many and powerful.

18. [24:17] "De necessitatibus." According to the Hebrew: De pressuris—Distresses.

19. [24:18] "Delicta mea." My sins, which I know to be the cause of my affliction.

21. [24:20] "Non erubescam, quoniam speravi in te." Verily I shall not be confounded, after having placed all my confidence in Thee.

22. [24:21] The just and the upright of heart have united to defend me, seeing that I have put my trust in Thee.

23. [24:22] Have pity on those that belong to the people of Israel, and deliver them from all their affliction.

PSALM 25 OF THE PSALTER

This psalm teaches all those that are unjustly persecuted what virtues they should practise during their trial. Moreover, it makes and explains in detail what are the dispositions with which we should approach the altar, whether to communicate or to offer the holy Sacrifice.

1. [25:1] Be my judge against my persecutors, since I present myself with an unblemished conscience, having nothing to reproach myself with; I hope that Thou wilt not permit that I be declared guilty.

2. [25:2] Try my fidelity; put to the test in the fire of tribulation my heart and all its secret folds.

3. [25:3] I abide in peace, because I have not lost sight of Thy mercy, and have tried to live according to the truth, that is, Thy law.[13348]

4. [25:4] I have avoided the company of vain and lying men,[13349] and I will ever guard against entering the society of the wicked.

5. [25:5] "Malignantium." Malicious persons, who turn even good actions to evil.

6, 7.[13350] [25:6, 7] I will seek to wash my hands, that is, to purify myself together with the just; and so united with them, I will also join in surrounding Thy altar; that there I may hear the voices of those that praise Thee; and that I may publish all the marvels that Thou hast wrought.

10. [25:10] They commit acts of injustice in order to receive gifts.

PSALM 22 OF THE PSALTER

The principal end of this psalm is to represent God as a good shepherd who omits nothing, so that in the order of eternal salvation his servants may be abundantly provided with help and spiritual means. The verses 1, 2, 6, and 7 plainly refer to this pre-eminent benefit, which consists in the partaking of the body and blood of Jesus Christ.

2. [22:2] He has nourished me near waters that flow in the very place of my pasturage; and when my soul like a silly, wayward sheep, went away from him, he brought it back again to his fold.

4. [22:4] "In medio umbræ mortis." In the midst of a thousand dangers that seem to me to be the figure of death.

5. [22:4] The shepherd's crook and the staff which Thou hast in hand console me; for with the crook Thou correctest me when I go out of the path, and with the staff Thou dost drive away the wolves that seek to devour me. "Virga." Some commentators understand by this the Blessed Virgin Mary, who was called Virga de radice Jesse—a rod out of the root of Jesse (Is. 11:1), of whom was born Jesus.[13351]

6. [22:5] Thou hast prepared before me a table where I shall take a food that will make me strong against my enemies. By this table we may well understand the altar, where we receive as food the body of Jesus Christ, which renders us strong against all the assaults of hell.

7. [22:5] "In oleo." With the unction of Thy grace.[13352] "Calix meus inebrians." The chalice that Thou offerest me contains a wine that holily inebriates him that drinks it, making him forget the world to remember only Thee and Thy love. "Quam præclarus est!" How noble and precious is it!

9. [22:6] "In longitudinem dierum." During all eternity.

PSALM 21 OF THE PSALTER

This psalm is to be understood in the literal sense of Jesus Christ, and especially of the prayer which he said before his death from the height of the cross, as also of his glorious resurrection. According to Cardinal Bellarmine, it would be an act of temerity to seek to turn it to any other sense. We have then in this psalm an express prophecy of all that which our Lord suffered when dying on the cross.

1. [21:2] My God, look upon the affliction in which I am; why hast Thou abandoned me? I see well that my sins,[13353] that is, the sins of my people, which I have taken upon myself to expiate, as if they were my own. Keep me far from my salvation, that is, make it impossible for me not to die. We make here the following observation on the abandonment of Jesus Christ: It is certain that the divine Word did not abandon the humanity of Jesus Christ when he was dying upon the cross. But why did our Saviour say: Deus meus, Deus meus, ut quid dereliquisti me?—My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me? (Matt. 27:46.) St. Leo answers: Vox ista doctrina est. non querela—That voice utters teaching, not complaint (De Pass. s. 16). Jesus Christ did not thus speak to the eternal Father to be delivered from death, nor was he speaking of his own abandonment, but of the abandonment of grace, of which all men would have remained deprived if he had not died for our salvation. He was praying then in our name, that we might be delivered from eternal death; in our name also he prayed for his resurrection, to make us also have a share therein. So that he then put himself in our place, and thus prayed not to be abandoned, whilst at the same time he offered up his own death in order to save us from the abandonment that we had deserved, and he did not die himself until he had at first made our salvation secure. This is the reason why, towards the end of the psalm, he gives thanks to his Father, and sings the fruits of his victory.

2. [21:3] I invoke Thee by day, and Thou dost not hear me; I invoke Thee also by night; ah! attribute not my prayers to imprudence and indiscretion.[13354]

3. [21:4] "Laus Israel." Thou art the praise of Israel on account of the many graces that Thou hast vouchsafed to him; but now it seems to me that Thou wilt not listen to me.

4. [21:5] Our Lord is here speaking of the deliverance which the holy Fathers under the Old Law were to obtain by his death.

6. [21:7] "Sum vermis, et non homo" Behold! I am no longer looked upon as a man, but as a worm of the earth.

7. [21:8] All seeing me reduced to this miserable state have set themselves to mock me: they have spoken against me, and insult me by wagging their heads. A reference to the words that we read in the Gospel: Prætereuntes autem blasphemabant eum, moventes capita sua—And they that passed by blasphemed him, wagging their heads (Matt. 27:39).

8. [21:9] They have said: He put his hope in the Lord; let then the Lord deliver him, since he has a will for him and protects him.[13355] Moreover, we read in the Gospel: Confidit in Deo; liberet nunc, si vult eum—He trusted in God; let him now deliver him, if he will have him (Matt. 27:43).

9, 10. [21:10, 11] It was Thou, O Lord, who hast drawn me out of the womb of my mother, and from her breasts; since then I have placed in Thee all my hopes; I have always acknowledged Thee for my God; in mercy, then, do not abandon me.[13356]

11. [21:12] Bellarmine says that Jesus Christ is here speaking of his death which is approaching, as what precedes and what follows clearly prove.

12. [21:13][13357] By bulls are meant the chief priests and Pharisees, who by their sharp words and mocking jeers, as if with thrusts of horns, insulted Jesus Christ, saying: Alios salvos fecit, seipsum non potest salvum facere; si rex Israel est, descendat nunc de cruce, et credemus ei—He saved others; himself he cannot save; if he be the king of Israel, let him now come down from the cross, and we will believe him (Matt. 27:42).

13. [21:14] "Sicut leo rapiens et rugiens." Like so many famished lions greedy to devour me, roaring with rage Such were, the Jews when they cried out to Pilate: Tolle, tolle; crucifige eum—Away with him, away with him, crucify him (John, 19:15).

14. [21:15] "Sicut aqua effusus sum." I am spent of all my strength through the shedding of my blood, which has poured forth from my body like water from a vase. "Dispersa." According to the Hebrew: Divulsa—Torn from their sockets, out of joint.

15. [21:15] Notwithstanding all that, my heart, far from being hardened against my enemies, has become soft like melted wax, through the compassion that I have for their evils.[13358]

16. [21:16] "Et in pulverem mortis deduxisti me." In short, Thou hast, O my God, brought me to lie beneath the dust of the tomb that covers the dead.

18. [21:17] They have pierced my hands and my feet with nails; they have so stretched my body upon the cross that all my bones can be counted. In these words David clearly describes the crucifixion of Jesus Christ; thus St. Jerome, St. Augustine, Theodoret, and Euthymius explain the passage.

19. [21:18] My executioners after crucifying me have set themselves to watch me with contempt, and to gaze upon my sufferings with complacency. They have parted my garments among them, and for my under-tunic, which was woven entire, and without seam, they cast lots. This text is quoted in the Gospel where we read: Ut impleretur quod dictum est per Prophetam, dicentem: Diviserunt sibi, etc.—That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, saying: They divided my garments, etc. (Matt. 27:35). This is a certain proof that our Saviour died naked upon the cross.

21. [21:21] Save my life promptly from the sword of death by raising up my body after I shall be dead. Cause my soul, which appears now left alone and abandoned, to triumph over the infernal dog.

22. [21:22] Save me from the lion, which keeps its mouth open to devour me; and protect my weakness from the assaults of these ferocious unicorns.

23. [21:23] The prophet here speaks more expressly of the resurrection of our Lord, and of the fruit that it would produce, namely, the conversion of the Gentiles. He says: I will publish the glory of Thy name by means of my brethren the apostles, etc.

24. [21:24] "Semen Jacob." By this is meant Christians who have the faith of Jacob.

25. [21:25] "Pauperis." This poor man is Jesus Christ himself, who died upon the cross naked and abandoned by all.

27. [21:26] I will praise Thee, O Lord, in the great assembly, the Church of the faithful gathered together from all the nations. In their presence I will pay my vows, renewing my sacrifice, by the ministry of my priests.

28. [21:27] The poor in spirit, who are conscious of their spiritual misery, shall feed upon and be satiated with grace; and they that seek the Lord shall praise him, and hence their souls shall live eternally.

29, 30. [21:28, 29] All the nations even to the farthest bounds of the earth shall call to mind the benefits of God, and the mysteries of the Redemption, which shall be preached to them, and they shall be converted to the Lord; so that all the nations of the Gentiles shall enter the Church to adore the true God.

32. [21:30] Not only the poor, but also "Pingues terræ," the great and powerful of the earth, who abound in riches, shall eat at the table of the Lord, and shall adore him; and in bowing down to adore, they shall humble themselves even to the earth. "In terram." According to the Hebrew: In pulverem—To the dust. Hence this other interpretation, which is also probable: All men, who since they are mortal must return to dust, shall prostrate themselves before him.

34. [21:32][13359] The generation to come of believers shall receive the good tidings of the Lord, that is to say, the knowledge of the faith; and the heavens, or heavenly men, shall publish the justice of God, or the justice of faith, which makes men just,—to the new people that shall be born to the life of grace; a people which the Lord has made, that is, a special people of God, created in Jesus Christ.

PSALM 118 OF THE PSALTER

In the Hebrew text the first eight verses of this psalm begin each by the first letter of the alphabet, the eight following by the second, and so on with the twenty-two letters of the alphabet. This seems to have been done to help the memory. The learned say that this psalm is so long because it was composed with a view of giving pious and profitable occupation to the people who used to recite or chant it on their way three times a year when they visited the Temple. It is filled with praises of the divine law,[13360] with prayers for grace to observe it perfectly, with petitions for help in the dangers that beset us, whether on the part of men, or especially of the evil spirits who seek to destroy the life of our soul. In the divine Office the psalm is divided into eleven parts of sixteen verses each, distributed among the Little Hours, namely: Prime, Terce, Sext, and None. As the Little Hours are always the same, and have to be recited daily, it will be of much help when reciting them to give the attention of the mind to the petitions which the verses contain.

1. [118:1] "Immaculati in via." Those that keep themselves without stain in the course of their life. "In lege." Without deviating from the law.

2. [118:2] "Testimonia ejus." The divine commandments, which testify what is the will of God.

3. [118:3] "In viis ejus." According to his laws, which are the way to go in order to find him.

5. [118:5] Grant, O Lord, that my conduct may always be so directed that I keep Thy precepts.[13361]

6. [118:6] I shall not be confounded at Thy judgment, I have always the intention to observe what Thou dost command me.

7. [118:7] I will give thanks to Thee with an upright, sincere heart, for having taught me to observe Thy just commandments.

8. [118:8] I hope with Thy help to observe them faithfully; O Lord! cease not to assist me.

9. [118:9] "Viam suam." The errors of his life, of his conduct.

10. [118:10] "Ne repellas me." Permit me not to go astray.

11. [118:11] I have endeavored to impress Thy laws on my heart, in order to avoid in any way to offend Thee.

12. [118:12] Thou art blessed by Thy creatures for the graces that Thou vouchsafest them. Grant me the grace to know Thy commandments.

13. [118:13] My voice has published all the laws that have come from Thy mouth.[13362]

17. [118:17] Restore to me the life that I have lost through sin, and thus re-established in Thy grace, I shall be faithful to Thee.

18. [118:18] Enlighten me with Thy light, and thus I shall see how admirable is Thy law.

19. [118:19] I am a pilgrim here below, always exposed to go astray; wherefore conceal not from me Thy precepts, by the observance of which I hope to arrive at the heavenly country.

20. [118:20] I desire with all my heart to keep Thy law now and forever.[13363]

21. [118:21] "Superbos." Those who through pride refuse to obey Thee.

22. [118:22] Deliver me from the reproach of seeing myself despised and cursed by Thee. so that the devil should be able to say of me: I have conquered him, I have made him fall. Thus we read in Psalm 12:4: Nequando dicat inimicus meus: Prævalui adversus eum—Lest my enemy say at any time, I have prevailed against him. Preserve me from this misery, because I wish to accomplish in all things Thy holy will.

23, 24. [118:23, 24] The powerful ones of the earth have designedly set themselves to speak evil of me; but Thy servant, nevertheless, has not ceased to exercise himself in all Thy just ordinances; for I meditate ever upon these testimonies of Thy will, and they counsel me how I should conduct myself.

25. [118:25] "Pavimento." According to the Hebrew: Pulveri—To the dust. My soul has become attached to the earth, and thus has lost the life of Thy grace. Restore to me, O Lord, this life according to the promise that Thou hast made to hear him that prays.[13364]

26. [118:26] I have exposed to Thee the disorders of my life, and my needs, and when imploring Thy mercy Thou didst hear me. Deign then to teach me what I must do in future to observe all Thy precepts.

27. [118:27] Instruct me how to walk always in the way of Thy commandments, and so shall I exercise myself in keeping Thy precepts, which are wonderful, that is, difficult, nay, impossible to observe without Thy help, but easy with Thy grace.

28. [118:28] My soul has slumbered, that is, has become lukewarm in Thy service, through the weariness that I found therein. Give me strength to fulfil whatever Thou commandest me.

29. [118:29] "De lege tua, miserere mei." According to the Hebrew: Et legem tuam dona mihi—And give me Thy law. In Thy mercy grant me the grace to keep Thy law.

30. [118:30] I have chosen to walk in the way of truth, that is, of faith and of Thy holy precepts, which I have not forgotten.

31. [118:31] Thou hast given me the grace of being enamoured of Thy law; suffer me not to merit the shame of trangressing it.

32. [118:32] I have made rapid progress in the way of Thy commandments when Thou hast enlarged my heart by Thy grace, inflaming it with Thy holy love.

33. [118:33] "Legem pone mihi." According to the Hebrew: Doce me—Teach me. The passage is thus explained: Give me as a law Thy way, that is, the rule of Thy commandments, or, grant that I take not pleasure in the laws of the world and of the flesh, but only in Thy law, and thus I shall always seek to put it in practice.

35. [118:35] "Ipsam volui." Therein only I wish to walk.

36. [118:36] Incline my heart towards the observance of Thy law by means of Thy holy love, which by the weight of its influence inclines hearts to Thee, and deliver it from the concupiscence of earthly things.

37. [118:37] Turn away my eyes from looking at the vanities of the world, that I may avoid looking at them; grant that I may live only for Thee, and that my life may consist in walking by the way that leads to Thee.

38. [118:38][13365] Establish Thy law in the heart of Thy servant, so that he may pay attention to observe it through fear of displeasing Thee.

39. [118:39] Take from me the reproach that I dread, namely, of transgressing Thy precepts, which are so pleasant to those that observe them.

40. [118:40] I have set my heart upon Thy law; it is just, then, that Thou shouldst give me strength to observe it.

41. [118:41] Let Thy mercy come upon me, and Thy saving help according to the promise that Thou hast made to him who prays to Thee in the name of the Saviour.

42. [118:42] To those that reproach me for living in this state of humiliation, I will answer that I hope in Thy promises, which can never fail.[13366]

43. [118:43] Permit not that I ever fail of telling the truth, for I have placed all my hopes in Thy judgments, which are full of mercy.

45. [118:45] By the effect of Thy love which enlarges hearts, I have found myself at large walking in the way of Thy precepts, for I have sought to observe them with exactness.

49. [118:49] "Verbi tui." The promise that Thou hast made.

50. [118:50] This hope has consoled me in my tribulations, for Thy promise has given me strength to suffer them with patience.

51. [118:51] My enemies, proud of their power, have hitherto unjustly persecuted me, but I have never failed in the observance of Thy law.

52. [118:52] We here remark that we should fear the judgments of God if we are unfaithful to him; but when we are faithful to him, with his help, which we shall certainly obtain if we are careful to ask it of him by prayer, the judgments of God should not terrify, but should rather console us; for these judgments are full of joy and comfort, because full of mercy, as David says in verse 39: Judicia tua jucunda—Thy judgments are pleasant. This is the reason why he adds in verse 43, that in his confidence in these same judgments he places all his hope of salvation: Quia in judiciis tuis supersperavi—For in Thy judgments I have hoped exceedingly.[13367]

53. [118:53] I have felt myself as if fainting away for sorrow at the sight of so many sinners, who despise Thy law. See verses 139 and 158.

54. [118:54] For myself, whilst here on earth, I have ever praised Thy ordinances.

55. [118:55] During the night I have been mindful of Thy name; I have invoked it, and so have had strength to keep Thy law.

56. [118:56] All this has happened to me because I have striven to obey Thy just commands.

57. [118:57] "Portio mea." My portion, my riches.

58. [118:58] "Secundum eloquium tuum." According to Thy promise.

59. [118:59] I have considered the ways that I should keep, and have directed my steps in the path of Thy commandments.

60. [118:60] "Paratus sum, et non sum turbatus." I have prepared myself to suffer all tribulations, and am not troubled at the sight of difficulties.

62. [118:62] "Judicia justificationis tuæ." Thy just judgments, decrees, ordinances.

64. [118:64] "Justificationes tuas doce me." Teach me Thy just ordinances, and give me strength to observe them.

65. [118:65] "Verbum tuum." Thy promise.

66. [118:66] Deign to teach me after Thy example the goodness that I should show forth to others; instruct me in the rule of how to live well, and give me the science of the saints, which consists in knowing how to love Thee; for I have placed all my hopes in the fulfilment of Thy precepts.

67. [118:67] I sinned, and then Thou didst humble me with tribulations; these have taught me to keep Thy law. See verse 71.

69. [118:69] The iniquity of the proud, who are properly the infernal spirits, is multiplied against me, to make me transgress Thy law; but I will ever study with all my heart to enter into the purposes of Thy holy will concerning me, that I may accomplish them.

70. [118:70] "Coagulatum est sicut lac." Is hardened like curdled milk.

71. [118:71] "Ut discam justificationes tuas." That I may learn how to keep Thy precepts. We may here remark how necessary it is to keep ourselves humble before God and before men; for the Lord, as he did with David, is wont to chastise the proud, by permitting them to fall into shameful sins such as they had previously held in abhorrence.

73. [118:73] Thy hands have formed me so that I am the work of Thy hands; but by sin I have lost the knowledge and the love of Thy law; give me, then, understanding to know it, and love to keep it.

74. [118:74] Those that fear Thee will rejoice to see that I keep Thy law, and that I have put all my hopes in Thy promises.

75. [118:75] "In veritate tua." In Thy justice.

76. [118:76] "Secundum cloquium tuum." According to the promises that Thou hast made.

77. [118:77] Make me feel the effects of Thy mercy, and then I shall always live in Thy grace, because I meditate only upon Thy law in order not to transgress it.

80. [118:80] May my heart become pure through the observance of Thy precepts, that I may not one day incur the confusion of having transgressed them.

81. [118:81] My soul has fainted away for desire to see myself saved from so many anguishes and fears that torment me; all my hope is in Thy promise.

82. [118:82] My eyes too have grown faint through keeping them fixed on Thee, expecting the effect of Thy word.

83. [118:83] "Pruina." This word has given rise to different interpretations. Mattei thinks that it is put in place of Fumo: In the smoke; because the Hebrew word is thus rendered by St. Jerome in Genesis (19:28),[13368] and Emmanuel Sa explains it in the same sense according to the Chaldee: Ad fumum. So that the meaning of the passage would be: By reason of my sufferings I am become like a skin that has become shrivelled and blackened by the smoke. But others keeping to the Vulgate explain it thus: The sufferings that I have endured have made me become like a skin grown slack by the damp, and then is contracted and hardened by the frost; that is to say, have made me become tepid. Of these two interpretations the reader can choose the one that most approves itself to him. For my part, I prefer the second, because it is in conformity with the letter of the Vulgate and is the one most commonly received.

84. [118:84] How many days must Thy servant remain thus tried? When wilt Thou pass judgment on my persecutors, and punish them as they deserve?

85. [118:85] These wicked men have set before my eyes the goods of this world, which in truth are all deceitful fables when confronted with Thy law, which alone satisfies him who keeps it.

86. [118:86] "Veritas." They are the very truth, which gives true peace to him who observes them.[13369]

87. [118:87] They had all but ruined me here on earth with their temptations; but with Thy help I have not ceased to obey Thy precepts.

89–92. [118:89–92] These four verses are variously interpreted. The best and most suitable explanation appears to me to be that given by Mattei, with Bossuet and several others, according to which David means here to say: O Lord, the heavens obey Thee, by always remaining in the state wherein Thou hast placed them; in like manner the earth remains the same as when Thou didst first establish it; so, too, the day and all irrational creatures obey Thee. After this the psalmist concludes: If I had not obeyed Thee myself, by meditating and observing Thy law in the numerous persecutions that I have suffered, I should have perished through my weakness.[13370]

93. [118:93] "Vivificasti me." Thou hast preserved my life.

94. [118:94] I belong to Thee, and I have given myself to Thee; Thou hast to save me, for I have tried to obey Thy ordinances.

95. [118:95] Sinners watched their opportunity to strike me down; but I have taken care not to withdraw from Thy precepts.

96. [118:96] I have seen that all things come to an end; but the law that Thou hast given us will endure forever. Thus Mattei and Bossuet explain this verse after Theodoret.

97. [118:97] In what way have I loved Thy law? I have loved it by meditating upon it every day.[13371]

98. [118:98] "Mandato tuo." Not by craft, but by means of Thy law, which is full of wisdom.

99. [118:99] I have understood Thy law better than my masters, because I have constantly meditated upon Thy precepts.

103. [118:103] How sweet it is to speak of Thy precepts! Thy words are sweeter than honey to my mouth.

104. [118:104] "Intellexi." I have received the true understanding of my duties.

105. [118:105] Thy law is to me as a torch, which makes me see where I have to place my steps; and as a light, which shows me the way that I have to keep.

107. [118:107] I have been everywhere afflicted and persecuted; do not fail to give me strength as Thou hast promised.

108. [118:108] Graciously accept the free offerings of my mouth, and teach me to observe Thy law.[13372]

109. [118:109] "Anima mea in manibus meis." That is: My life is in danger. In the same way it is said of David: Posuit animam suam in manu sua—He put his life in his hand (1 Kings, 19:5). The proper version, therefore, of this verse is: My life is always in danger, because I wish to keep Thy law; but I will never forget it.

111. [118:111] I have chosen for my heritage to accomplish always Thy will, for it is the joy of my heart.

112. [118:112] "Propter retributionem." Mindful of the recompense that Thou hast promised to Thy faithful servants.[13373]

114. [118:114] "In verbum tuum supersperavi." In Thy promise I have put all my confidence.

115. [118:115] Come not to disturb me; I wish to give myself to search into the precepts of my God, that I may observe them with exactness.

116. [118:116] O Lord, take me under Thy protection, as Thou hast promised, that I may live to Thee; do not, I beseech Thee, permit me to fall into the confusion of being deprived of the help that I expect from Thee.[13374]

118. [118:118] "Injusta cogitatio eorum." They give themselves to thoughts contrary to justice.[13375]

119. [118:119] Sinners are such so far as they transgress the divine law; for where there is no law there is no sin.

120. [118:120] Pierce through and restrain my flesh, that is, my carnal appetites, with Thy holy fear, for Thy judgments make me tremble.

121. [118:121] I have always taken care to observe justice; suffer not that I remain abandoned in the hands of my calumniators.

122. [118:122] Take care of me and confirm me unto good, so that the proud, my enemies, whether men or demons, may not overwhelm me by their calumnies.

123. [118:123] See verses 81, 83.

124. [118:124] "Justificationes tuas doce me." Teach me how I should obey Thy precepts.

125. [118:125] I am Thy servant, obliged to obey Thee; make me understand well Thy commands, that I may know them and put them in execution.

126. [118:126] It is time to manifest Thy justice against those that destroy Thy law.

127. [118:127] For my part, this shameful conduct of theirs moves me to love Thy precepts more than gold and precious stones.

128. [118:128] Therefore have I set myself not to transgress any one of Thy precepts; and I have abhorred not iniquity only, but also every occasion that might lead me to sin.

129. [118:129] Thy law and all the truths that Thou hast revealed to us are indeed worthy of our admiration; therefore has my soul studied to penetrate them.

130. [118:130] When the hidden sense of the divine Scriptures is explained by the holy Doctors, there arises a light that dispels the darkness and that gives to the humble the true intelligence in which the proud can have no part.

131. [118:131] I opened my mouth in prayer to Thee, and have received from Thee the good spirit,[13376] that is, the help to keep Thy commandments; for my desire is to fulfil them exactly.

132. [118:132] "Secundum judicium." According as Thou art wont to deal with.[13377]

133. [118:133] Make me conduct myself according to Thy law, and permit not that any unjust passion should have dominion over me.

135. [118:135] Enlighten me by looking upon Thy servant with a gracious eye and render him faithful to Thy service.

137. [118:137] "Justus es." Thou art just by essence; Thou art justice itself.

138. [118:138] Whatsoever Thou hast commanded and attested, all is justice and evident truth.

139. [118:139] "Zelus meus." My zeal for Thy glory. "Verba tua." Thy commandments. See verses 53 and 158.

140. [118:140] "Ignitum." According to the Hebrew: Probatum et examinatum igne—Proved and tried in the fire. That is: Thy law is most pure, as gold refined by fire; and it inflames hearts with an ardent love; therefore I have always loved Thee.[13378]

141. [118:141] I am a young man of but few years and without consideration; but I do not forget Thy precepts.[13379]

142. [118:142] "Veritas." See verses 86 and 151.

143. [118:143] In the pains that afflict me, I am sustained by meditating upon Thy law.

144. [118:144] Thy precepts are and will ever be just; grant that I may understand them well, and thus I shall always live faithful to Thee.

145. [118:145] "Justificationes tuas requiram." Thus shall I strive to discover Thy holy will, in order to accomplish it.

146. [118:146] "Salvum me fac." Save me by giving me needful help.

147. [118:147] "In maturitate." According to the Hebrew and the Greek: In diluculo—At the dawn. I have begun at break of day to call upon Thee, because I have hoped much in Thy promises.

149. [118:149] "Secundum judicium tuum, vivifica me." According to Thy promise, give me strength to be faithful.

150. [118:150] My persecutors have made themselves friends of iniquity by seeking to pervert others. But woe to them! the nearer they approach to iniquity, the farther do they depart from Thy law.

151. [118:151] Thou art ever at hand to succor him that loves Thy law, which is all just and faithful. "Veritas." See verses 86 and 142.

152. [118:152] From the beginning when I knew Thy commandments, I knew at the same time that they are eternal, that is, unchangeable.

154. [118:154] According to Thy justice, rescue me from the hands of my enemies; according to Thy promise, give me strength to resist them.

155. [118:155] Sinners are far from salvation, because they do not take care ever to know Thy law.

156. [118:156] See verse 149.

158. [118:158] In the presence of the prevaricators of Thy law I pined away with fretting, observing the little account that they made of Thy commandments. See verses 53 and 139.

159. [118:159] "Vivifica me." Give me strength to continue to love them.

160. [118:160] Thy words proceed from truth, as from their source: Thy decrees, therefore, can never be wanting in justice.

161. [118:161] The great ones of the earth have persecuted me without cause, but I have had no other fear than to violate Thy ordinances.

162. [118:162] I shall rejoice over Thy promises as the soldier after a victory gained over the enemy, rejoices when he finds rich and abundant spoils. See verse 14.

164. [118:164] I have frequently celebrated Thy praises, at seeing how just are Thy judgments.

165. [118:165] "Non est illis scandalum." To such Thou givest strength to avoid the snares of the enemy, and to escape all danger.[13380]

168. [118:168] I have fulfilled Thy precepts and Thy will, for I have ever walked in Thy presence.

169. [118:169] Permit the prayer that I address to Thee to be before Thy eyes; according to Thy promise, make me well understand what Thou wiliest of me.[13381]

170. [118:170] "Eripe me." Deliver me from my afflictions and from what hinders me to do Thy holy will.

171. [118:171] I will celebrate Thy praises when Thou shalt have instructed me in Thy ordinances.

172. [118:172] "Eloquium tuum." Thy law.

173. [118:173] "Elegi." I have resolved always to keep.

174. [118:174] I much desired Thy grace, which is to save me; and therefore do I meditate solely upon Thy law.

175. [118:175] I hope that my soul will always live united to Thee, and will ever praise Thee; and Thy judgments, which are full of mercy, will help me to be faithful to Thee.

176. [118:176] In time past I have gone astray like a sheep that through leaving its shepherd, was lost; mayest Thou prevent this misfortune from coming over me; and if I should fall into it, deign to bring me back; for notwithstanding my wanderings I have never entirely forgotten Thy law; I have always desired to be Thy servant.

PSALM 109 OF THE PSALTER

The reign of Jesus Christ, his eternal and temporal generation, his priesthood and his Passion, form the subject of this psalm. It is in the literal sense that we must understand it as referring to our Lord Jesus Christ; for he himself applies it to himself to convince the Jews that he is the true Son of God, as we read in the Gospel of St. Matthew, 22:44. In fact, after asking them how David can proclaim Christ his Lord, since Christ was to descend from him, David, he stated this irrefutable argument: If David calls him his Lord, how being his Lord could he be also his Son?—Si ergo David vocat eum Dominum, quomodo filius ejus est? (lb. 45.) The Jews did not answer that the Messias could not be the Lord of David, as true God; but they would not allow that Jesus was the Messias or Christ of whom David had spoken. We Christians all believe that Jesus Christ was the true Messias. Thus are refuted the Arians who refuse to acknowledge Jesus Christ as the true Son of God, and true God as his Father. And in fact how can they speak thus since David proclaims as his Lord this same Jesus Christ as his Son?

1. [109:1] "Dixit Dominus Domino meo." That is: The eternal Father said to Jesus Christ. For "Dominus Domino meo," the Hebrew reads: Jehova Ladoni. Jehova is a name that belongs to God only; it signifies HE WHO IS. The Hebrews through reverence did not pronounce the name of God. Ladoni, the dative of the word Adoni, means: To my Lord; the name that is applied to the Messias, not only as God, but also as man; and it is for this reason that David uses it here; for if he had designated Jesus Christ by the name of Jehova, he would have been understood as speaking of him as God only, and not as man. "Sede a dextris meis." Be seated. "Sede" signifies supreme authority given to Jesus Christ as sitting at the right hand of God. "A dextris meis." Equality of elevation. In reality Jesus Christ has the same dominion as his Father, not only as God, but as man, since his most sacred humanity has been raised to this exaltation by virtue of his hypostatic union with the Word, according to the words of St. Paul: Qui, cum in forma Dei esset, non rapinam arbitratus est esse se æqualem Deo. . . . Jesus Christus in gloria est Dei Patris—Who being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God. . . . Jesus Christ is in the glory of God the Father (Phil. 2:6, 11). There is no doubt that In gloria Dei—In the glory of God—is the same as A dextris Dei—At the right hand of God; that is: In majestate Dei—In the majesty of God. So St. Mark (16:19), speaking of our Saviour ascended into heaven, says: Assumptus est in cælum, et sedet a dextris Dei—He was taken into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of God. St. Ambrose thus comments: Audit quasi Homo, sedet quasi Dei filius—He hears as man, he sits as the Son of God (De David. apol. 2).

2. [109:1] That is: Thou shalt reign at my right hand, even during the time that Thou shalt subdue Thy enemies; according to what St. Paul writes: Oportet autem illum regnare, donec ponat omnes inimicos sub pedibus ejus—For he must reign until he hath put all his enemies under his feet (1 Cor. 15:25). The word Donec here signifies according to interpreters As long as, since, as Mattei says, Donec does not always imply the termination of what is spoken of.[13382]

3. [109:2] Here David speaks to Jesus Christ, and says to him: The Lord, that is, Thy eternal Father, will cause to come forth from Sion, or from Jerusalem, the sceptre of Thy power, and Thy reign shall extend over the whole earth. This accords with the command given by the divine Master to his disciples to go to preach salvation to all nations beginning with Jerusalem: Prædicari, in nomine ejus, pœnitentiam et remissionem peccatorum in omnes gentes, inicipientibus ab Jerusalem—That penance and remission of sins should be preached in his name, . . . beginning at Jerusalem (Luke, 24:4). Mattei observes that by "Virgam" many of the holy Fathers understand the cross, which is the sceptre of Jesus Christ.

4. [109:3] There are in this verse several words difficult to understand: of these the interpreters give various explanations. "Tecum principium." Some understand by "Principium" the divine Word himself, who is also the principle, according to the words of Jesus Christ: Sicut tu, Pater, in me, et ego in te—As Thou, Father, in Me, and I in Thee (John, 17:21). But Principium is commonly explained as Principatus: Principality, or Dominion, and this agrees with the rendering of the Septuagint. Thus Tertullian understands it, who writes; Principium pro principatu sumetur (Adv. Hermog. c. 9). "In die virtutis tuæ." Mattei, according to the authority, as he says, of several holy Fathers, explains this of eternity: Ab æterno. But others, with great probability, apply it to the day of the last judgment, when Jesus Christ will display his power over all creatures; and this is the explanation of St. Augustine, Theodoret, Lallemant, and many others. "In splendoribus sanctorum." That is: When the eternal Judge shall be surrounded by the saints, who will shine forth as so many suns. Tunc justi fulgebunt sicut sol—Then shall the just shine as the sun (Matt. 13:43). "Ex utero ante luciferam genui te." This is to be understood, according to St. Thomas, of the eternal generation of the Word: I have begotten Thee before the star called Lucifer, that is, to put a part for the whole, before all creatures; and I have begotten Thee from my womb—"Ex utero," that is to say, from my substance, as St. Jerome explains: De sua natura, substantia. The sense, then, of the verse is this: My Son, Thy princedom over all created things shall appear when Thou shalt sit on Thy throne in the midst of the saints, who shall shine as stars or suns, to judge the world; for I have begotten Thee of my substance before the existence of the stars and ot all other creatures, even from eternity.[13383]

5. [109:4] The Lord has sworn, and will never repent of it; it is an oath and an immutable decree. He has said: Thou art priest eternal, according to the order of Melchisedech, in contradistinction to the priests according to the order of Aaron, who were subject to change and death. Jesus Christ is a Priest forever, because even in heaven he offers the merits of his Passion for the salvation of men who live on this earth; and even after the end of the world he will ever continue to offer them on behalf of men in thanksgiving for the graces bestowed upon them by God. There is also this difference between the sacrifices of the Old Law that in it animals were offered; while that of Melchisedech, in which bread and wine were offered, was a figure of the sacrifice of Mass, wherein Jesus Christ is the principal Sacrificer.[13384]

6. [109:5] The Lord shall always be at Thy side, and in the day of his just vengeance he will overthrow the power of those kings who are Thy enemies. Here Mattei justly remarks that according to the Hebrew, instead of "A dextris tuis," it is Super dextera tua. Hence these words mean here, not that Jesus Christ is to sit at the right hand of God, as some understand them, but that the eternal Father, "Dominus," will give to Jesus Christ the strength to vanquish all his enemies.[13385]

7. [109:6] Jesus Christ shall judge the rebellious nations, and will carry into effect the chastisements with which they have been threatened; he shall shiver in pieces on the earth the proud heads that rose up against him.[13386]

8. [109:7] Mattei with Marcus Marinus gives this interpretation: He shall cause the blood of his enemies to flow like a torrent in which he will quench his thirst. But others give this explanation: Nevertheless this God made man shall first during his mortal life drink the water of the torrent, that is, the chalice of his Passion, which like a torrent of pains shall overwhelm him to death; but in consequence of this death, he shall lift up his head; for thereby he shall be exalted to a throne of glory, according to the words of the Apostle: Videmus Jesum, propter passionem mortis, gloria et honore coronatum, ut, gratia Dei, pro omnibus gustaret mortem—We see Jesus . . . for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor, . . . that through the grace of God he might taste death for all (Heb. 2:9). Blessed death, which has restored life to all men![13387]

PSALM 110 OF THE PSALTER

In this psalm the perfections of God are exalted, and he is praised for the wonders that he has wrought in behalf of his people.

1. [110:1] "In consilio . . . et congregatione." According to the Hebrew: In secreto . . . et synagoga. That is: In private gatherings and in public assemblies.

2. [110:2] All the works of the Lord are great; for in all, his infinite wisdom and power shine forth; and all are perfect, since they all correspond to the intentions of his holy will.

3. [110:3] All his works are so many motives for us to praise and magnify him; he it is that does all things; and everything that he does is always just.

4. [110:4] The Lord, who is merciful and (according to the Hebrew text) full of paternal tenderness, has left the memorial of his admirable prodigies which he has wrought in favor of his people, especially in the miraculous food, the manna, which he gave to our fathers, who had the gift of his holy fear. Every one knows that this manna was a figure of the Holy Eucharist, that most admirable work which Jesus Christ left on earth as a memorial of the death which he suffered for us.

5. [110:5] "Virtutem." That is: The grandeur, the strength, the wisdom.

6. [110:7] "Hæreditatem gentium." The Land of Promise in possession of the Gentiles. "Opera manuum ejus, veritas et judicium." In a word, his works show forth to us his fidelity and his justice.[13388]

7. [110:8] His laws ever righteous are unchangeable.

8. [110:9] He has sent redemption to his people, that is, the Redeemer, as St. Augustine and Euthymius explain, and he has made a covenant with them which shall never be broken.[13389]

9. [110:9] His name is holy and terrible; we must, therefore, greatly fear to violate his covenant, and be careful to preserve the fear of the Lord, without which we cannot possess wisdom.

10. [110:10] They have a good intelligence, that is, they rightly understand this salutary fear who act up to it; hence he who keeps this fear shall be forever praised. "Facientibus eum." According to the Hebrew: Facientibus ea, that is, mandata, the commandments. Mattei says that it is the same in substance, though the Hebrew makes us better understand that speculative fear is not enough if we would have the wisdom of the saints, but that we must live practically according to this fear in order to be truly wise. Among those that have the fear of God there are many who, because they lead a bad life, are the greatest fools in the world.

PSALM 111 OF THE PSALTER

The prophet describes in this psalm the character of the just man and his temporal happiness which he enjoys here below, according to the promises that God made in the Old Law. But we, who love in the New Law, should raise ourselves to the thought of the spiritual happiness that God makes the just taste in this life and in the next.[13390]

1. [111:1] He that fears God as he ought, that is, with a fear not servile but filial, takes all his delight in observing his precepts. St. Jerome says: Anxie mandata ejus non facit, sed vult: The just man obeys not by force, but with a good will, and loves to obey.

3. [111:3] His house shall enjoy honors and riches; and with all his honors and riches he will firmly persevere in his holy life, and will not regret at leaving them, because the reward due to his justice shall be everlasting in the life to come.

4. [111:4] The light that comes from the Lord shall not fail the righteous in the darkness of their afflictions; for God will come to their aid, since he is full of mercy and goodness, and a just rewarder of his servants.

5. [111:5] "Jucundus." Mattei says that according to the Hebrew this word signifies Beatus. Happy is the man that exercises mercy towards the poor, at least in lending them what they need; he will regulate his words and his temporal affairs, or will manage his possessions "in judicio," with prudence, so that he will never be disturbed in his happiness.

6. [111:7] The just man shall live forever in the memory of men, and he will not fear to lose his character by the calumnies of his enemies.

8. [111:9] He has given generously of his goods to the poor; his justice, that is, his good deeds, his merits, shall ever be before the eyes of God, to be recompensed eternally in heaven, and he shall be exalted in power and in glory.

9. [111:10] At seeing this the sinner will be angry; he will gnash with his teeth for rage, and pine away with spite and envy; he would wish to deprive the just man of his happiness, but the desires of the wicked shall vanish as smoke.

PSALM 112 OF THE PSALTER

The psalmist invites just souls to praise God for the care that he takes of all his creatures, even of the most humble.

1. [112:1] "Pueri." According to the Hebrew: Servi—Servants.

5. [112:5] Who can be compared with our God, whose goodness is such that from the highest heaven where he dwells he does not disdain to look upon the creatures that are the most lowly.[13391]

8. [112:9] This verse applies well to Jesus Christ, who, when the Church was bereaved of children by the perversion of the Jews, made her by his redemption the mother of all the faithful.

PSALM 113 OF THE PSALTER

The psalmist shows the wonders wrought by the Lord to deliver the people from the slavery of Egypt. He then exhibits what is the folly of the Gentiles to put their trust in vain idols, and he urges the faithful people to put their confidence in our true God, and to perseverance in his service.

1, 2. [113:1, 2] When the people of Israel were delivered from the yoke of the Egyptians, God consecrated them to his service, wishing henceforth to rule over them alone.[13392]

3. [113:3] The Red Sea beheld the Hebrews pursued by the Egyptians, and fled, that is, drew back to afford an open passage to the people of God. The river Jordan turned back, that is, its waters stopped in their course, and lifted themselves up on high (Jos. 3:13) that the faithful people might pass over.

4. [113:4] Then the mountains exult with joy. Others apply this verse to the trembling of the mountains when the law was given to Moses. I prefer the first sense as agreeing better with the following verse.[13393]

10. [113:10] Protect us for Thy mercy's sake, and according to the faithfulness of Thy promises, lest the impious should say in case Thou shouldst abandon us: Where now is their God to help them?

16. [113:16] Let those who with their own hands make to themselves such gods, and all those that put their trust in them, become like unto them.[13394]

20. [113:20] "Benedixit nobis." He has blessed us, loading us with graces.[13395]

25. [113:24] "Cœlum cœli." The Empyrean, as Lallemant and others explain it. The Lord has created the empyrean heaven for himself, that is, to reign there; and he has given the earth to men for their habitation, that they may there gain merit to be raised to the empyrean.

26. [113:25] That is: After death no one can do good works any more.[13396]

27. [113:26] That is: We who enjoy the life of grace, let us bless the Lord at the present time, and let us hope to bless him for all eternity.

CANTICLE OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY, OR MANGNIFICAT

The Most Blessed Virgin extols in this canticle the goodness of God for having chosen her to be his Mother, and for having redeemed the world by means of Jesus Christ. This canticle may be divided into three parts. In the first, the Blessed Virgin thanks the Lord for the favors that have been conferred upon her. In the second, she praises him for the benefits granted to the Hebrew people. In the third, she glorifies him for the grace that he has bestowed upon all men in giving them Jesus Christ for their Saviour.[13397]

1. [1:46] "Magnificat." That is, according to the Greek text: It extols the greatness of.

2. [1:47] "Salutari." According to the Hebrew and the Greek: Jesu, or Salvatore. The Blessed Virgin found all her delight in rejoicing in her God; and such also should be ours.

3. [1:48] "Humilitatem." According to the Greek: Vilitatem, Abjectionem—Meanness, Littleness, Lowliness.[13398] The most humble Mary could not mean by this word the virtue of humility, for if so she would be praising herself; whereas humility, says Euthymius, alone amongst the virtues does not know itself: Sola inter virtutes humilitas seipsam ignorat. "Ecce enim . . ." For behold from this time forth all nations and all ages shall call me BLESSED. This prophecy has been perfectly verified; for there is not one among Catholics that does not in a special manner venerate this great Mother of God.

4. [1:49] Because the Almighty, whose name is holy, has wrought great and marvellous things in me, making me Virgin and Mother of my Creator.

5. [1:50] "Timentibus eum." Extends itself to all those that fear him with a filial fear.[13399]

6. [1:51] God has shown forth his power by putting to rout the proud, that is, the haughty princes of the earth (we may also here understand the rebel angels), and he has defeated all their wicked designs whereby they sought to oppress the innocent.

7. [1:52] "Potentes." These proud princes.

9, 10. [1:54, 55] He has taken under his protection Israel, his servant, that is, his chosen people, being mindful of the promise which, in his mercy, he had made to him, to send the Messias to redeem him, as he promised to our fathers, especially to Abraham, and to all his descendants.

PSALM 114 OF THE PSALTER

In this psalm David thanks God for having delivered him from the persecution of Absalom. The royal prophet is here the figure of the Christian soul, which, after suffering many dangerous temptations, finds itself at the approach of death victorious over its enemies and on the point of going to heaven to enjoy its God.

1. [114:1] I have loved and love my Lord; for he has heard, and I hope will always hear my prayer.

2. [114:2] He has inclined his ear to my voice; therefore I will never cease to call upon him all the days of my life, confiding in his mercy.

3. [114:3] Lallemant and Mattei explains this verse as referring to the fears and dangers of losing the life of the body; but Bellarmine interprets it thus: Deadly temptations have surrounded me which would draw me to eternal death, and these temptations have brought me near to the danger of being condemned to hell.

4, 5. [114:4, 5] In this state I found nothing on all sides but afflictions and sorrows; then I had recourse to the Lord, and called upon his name, saying: My God, deliver my soul from these perils. The Lord is as merciful as he is just; he is our God, and he shows mercy to those that have recourse to him.

6. [114:6] "Parvulos." The little ones who are humble.

7. [114:7] "In requiem tuam." To the place of thy repose, that is, to the heavenly country, as Bellarmine with St. Basil understand it. "Benefecit tibi." According to the Hebrew: Retribuit super te—The Lord will recompense thee according to thy good works, by giving thee eternal life, which is a crown of justice. Thus again Bellarmine with St. Basil interprets the words.

9. [114:9] I hope, then, to find myself in the land of the living, far from hell, where all are dead, and far from this world, where so many are also dead through sin, and there I shall be happy, occupied forever in pleasing the Lord.

This psalm does not differ from the preceding; but in it David shows yet more his gratitude for the graces which he acknowledges that he has received from his goodness.[13400]

1. [115:10] This verse is clearly explained by St. Paul: Habentes autem eumden spiritum fidei, sicut scriptum est: Credidi propter quod locutus sum; et nos credimus, propter quod et loquimur—But having the same spirit of faith, as it is written: I believe, for which cause I have spoken: we also believe, for which cause we speak also (2 Cor. 4:13.) Hence this explanation: Resting on faith I have hoped in God; and I therefore said: Thou art my hope; and this I said on beholding myself so deeply humiliated and afflicted.

2. [115:11] The following is the explanation given by Bellarmine, with Euthymius: In my ecstasy when my spirit was raised to the knowledge of the land of the living, I said that every man is a liar, that is, that when men talk of this world's happiness they only speak lies.

4. [115:13] By the chalice of salvation St. Basil, St. Jerome, St. Augustine, Theodoret, and Euthymius, according to Bellarmine, understand the chalice of the Passion of Jesus Christ, of which he himself spoke thus: Calicem quern dedit mihi Pater, non bibam illum?—The chalice which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it? (John, 18:11.) Hence this explanation: Having nothing to present to God for the graces that he has bestowed upon us, I will offer him in thanksgiving the sufferings of Jesus Christ, to which I will unite those that I endure; and I will always invoke the name of the Lord, that he may enable me to bear my pains with patience.

6. [115:16] "Quia ego servus tuus." That is: I will pay my vows to Thee, for I am Thy servant.

PSALM 116 OF THE PSALTER

This psalm invites all the people to praise the mercy and the faithfulness of the Lord for having united them all in one and the same Church. It is thus that the Apostle interprets this psalm in his Epistle to the Romans (15:8–11).

2. [116:2] That is: He has multiplied upon us the effects of his mercy; and his faithfulness in the promises that he has made to us shall never fail.[13401]

PSALM 119 OF THE PSALTER

David asks God to defend him against the calumnies of his enemies and he complains that his exile is prolonged during the persecution of Saul. This psalm is suitable to every Christian who struggling with adversity looks forward to the end of his exile here on earth.[13402]

3. [119:3] What greater evil canst thou have to fear, O my soul, than that of a deceitful tongue?

4. [119:4] The shafts that go forth from the mouth of a man of power are so sharp and hurtful that they are as burning coals dealing destruction all around.

5. [119:5] "Cum habitantibus Cedar." That is: With barbarians. Cedar, says Bellarmine, is a Hebrew word which means Swarthiness.[13403]

PSALM 120 OF THE PSALTER

Here the psalmist makes a just man speak, who lifts his eyes to the blessed mountains, where is seated the holy city, and whence he hopes for divine help.

3. [120:3] The Lord will not suffer thee to fall, when thou hast recourse to him.

6. [120:6] Thou wilt not have to fear the burning of the sun, nor the noxious influences of the moon.[13404]

8. [120:8] May he protect thee in all thy doings, from the beginning to the end, now and forever.

PSALM 121 OF THE PSALTER

In this psalm is expressed the joy that the Jews felt when they heard that they were to leave Babylon and be released from captivity. Every Christian may use this psalm to stimulate his desires for heaven.

2. [121:2] We rejoice at seeing our feet as if already arrived at the threshold of thy gates.

3. [121:3] "Ejus." Redundance common in the Hebrew. "In idipsum." That is: Simul: Altogether. "Participatio in idipsum." Bellarmine explains: Charity which unites friends, makes all goods common among them, and all become the joy of each.

4. [121:4] "Testimonium Israel." This is understood of the law by which the Israelites were obliged at fixed periods to worship God in the Temple; but on applying it to heaven, it has reference to the souls of the just, who will ascend thither to be solely occupied in praising the Lord.

6. [121:6] Pray for the prosperity of Jerusalem. May those that love thee, O holy city, possess in thee the abundance of every good.

9. [121:9] Because thou art the house of the Lord, I desire for thee an abundance of every good.

PSALM 122 OF THE PSALTER

Prayer that the Hebrews address to the Lord that he may put an end to the captivity at Babylon. Thus does the Church in her persecutions implore deliverance from God.[13405]

PSALM 123 OF THE PSALTER

A hymn of thanksgiving which the Jews addressed to God after the captivity at Babylon. Thus may the just man also address God after his victory over a temptation.

3. [123:3] "Aqua." That is, this their rage like a torrent of water.

4. [123:5] We have happily passed through that torrent; but without the assistance of God we could never have passed through so great a flood.

PSALM 124 OF THE PSALTER

Released from the captivity at Babylon, the Jews receive the assurance that God will never fail as long as they confide in him, to assist them against their enemies.

2. [124:2] Jerusalem shall be defended by the mountains that surround it, and his people shall ever be protected by the Lord who will stand round about them.

5. [124:5] The Lord will treat those that fail in their duties, departing from the right way, as he treats the wicked; but Israel shall always enjoy peace. "obligationes." According to the Hebrew and the Greek, as Bellarmine explains it with St. Jerome and Euthymius: Pravitates, Obliquitates—Crooked ways. The prophet said, v. 4, that God will reward the just; he adds here that as to those that turn from an upright heart by engaging in crooked ways, by compounding with their consciences, shall end by finding themselves among the declared enemies, in the midst of the evils that await them, while peace with all its happiness shall be shared by the true servants of God.

PSALM 125 OF THE PSALTER

This psalm contains the sighs of the Jews to be released from captivity at Babylon. It is of service to sinners who wish to be delivered from this slavery of sin, and to the just who sigh for the end of their exile here on earth.

1. [125:1] St. Jerome translates: Cum converteret Dominus captivitatem Sion, facti sumus quasi somniantes. The verse is explained thus: When the Lord shall bring forth Sion, or his people from captivity, we shall be filled with such consolation that we shall seem to be in a dream.[13406]

2. [125:2] Then we shall be so full of joy that our tongue will break forth in canticles of gladness.

4. [125:3] And we, too, shall say: The Lord hath wrought great things in our behalf; for this reason we rejoice.

5. [125:4] Deliver us, then, O Lord! from our captivity, and grant that we may be consoled as are consoled those that dwell in the South when there conies to them an abundance of water.[13407]

PSALM 126 OF THE PSALTER

Returned from Babylon, the Jews had undertaken to rebuild the city and the Temple, and as they were hindered from doing so by the in cursions of their enemies, the prophet exhorts them to trust in God.

3. [126:2] In vain do you rise before daybreak, if the Lord does not come to your aid; moreover, you should not rise until you have taken your repose, since you have eaten the bread of sorrow, that is, you have lived in the midst of so great evils.

4. [123:3] "Cum dederit dilectis suis somnum." After the Lord shall have given to his beloved, that is, to his people, sleep, that is, peace by means of the promised Redeemer. "Ecce hereditas Domini, filii." Then shall appear the inheritance of Jesus Christ the Lord, an inheritance that shall consist in the multitude of the children born in his Church according to the prophecy; Postula a me, et dado tibi gentes hereditatem tuam—Ask of me, and I will give thee the Gentiles for thine inheritance (Ps. 2:8). "Merces, fructus ventris." The recompense of the Lord shall be the fruit of the womb; that is, these same children shall be the recompense of Jesus Christ according to another prophecy: Si posuerit pro peccato animam suam, videbit semen long ævum—If he shall lay down his life for sin, he shall see a long-lived seed (Is. 53:10). This is well expressed in the Greek version in this sense: The multitude of children shall be the inheritance of the Lord, and the recompense of Jesus Christ, who was properly the fruit of Mary's womb.

5. [126:4] These children, tormented by persecutions, shall be against their enemies as so many arrows in the hand of a strong man.[13408]

6. [126:5] Blessed is he that shall see his desire satisfied by the birth of so many children; he shall not suffer confusion when he shall have to treat with his enemies before the gate of the city,[13409] that is, according to Bellarmine, at the last judgment, which shall take place at the great gate or before the whole world, when Jesus Christ shall confound the demons, who thought to drag the whole human race down to hell.

PSALM 127 OF THE PSALTER

The prophet announces to the Jews after their return from Babylon the blessings that they will receive from God if they keep his laws. These blessings are temporal; belong, properly speaking, to the just under the Old Law.[13410]

2. [127:2] The labors of thy hands shall be blessed, for thou shalt taste of their fruits; thou shalt be happy and rest content.

3. [127:3] Thy wife, living retired in thy house, shall be fruitful in children as a vine abundant with grapes. "In lateribus" St. Jerome translates: In penetralibus—In the inner part.

6. [127:5] "Ex Sion." That is: From heaven.[13411]

PSALM 128 OF THE PSALTER

Many interpreters refer this psalm to the time when the Jews, freed from captivity, strove to rebuild Jerusalem. The psalmist exhorts the people to put their trust in the Lord, who had already delivered them from their past evils.

1. [128:1] Many times from my youth up I have been combated by my enemies; thus the people of Israel should now speak.[13412]

2. [128:2] "Etenim." St. Jerome translates: Sed. But they could not crush me.

3. [128:3] "Fabricaverunt." According to the Hebrew, this word signifies properly the repeated strokes on the anvil; hence the more precise meaning would be: Sinners have struck on my back with repeated blows.

4. [128:4] "Cervices." Their heads, that is, their pride. "Sion." The people of Israel.

5. [128:6] "Fiant sicut fenum tectorum." Let them become as the grass which grows on the roofs of houses.[13413]

PSALM 129 OF THE PSALTER

This psalm expresses the lamentations of the Israelites who are yet prisoners at Babylon. It is suitable in the mouth of the sinner, who, groaning under the weight of his sins, implores aid from God.

1, 2. [129:1, 2] From the deep abyss of my miseries, I cry out to Thee, O Lord; hear my prayer.

3. [129:3] If Thou requirest a strict account of our sins, who will be able to endure it?

4. [129:4] But Thy mercy gives me courage, for in Thee there is an exhaustless fountain of compassion and goodness; and what causes me to hope in Thee is, that Thou makest it a law to have pity on every sinner who in humility seeks Thy pardon.

5. [129:5] My soul awaits the mercy of God, relying on his promise; thus having hoped in the Lord, it will not be confounded.[13414]

6. [129:6] From break of day, even until night, Israel will not cease to trust in the Lord.

7. [129:7] The prophet points out here the foundation of all our hopes, namely, the blood of Jesus Christ by which he was to redeem the human race. He says: For mercy with God is infinite; and he is well able to redeem us by abundant help from our evils.

PSALM 130 OF THE PSALTER

David complains that Saul and his followers accuse him of being proud, and calls God to witness against this calumny.

1. [130:1] My God, Thou knowest that I have not had in my heart, nor shown in my looks, proud sentiments.

2. [130:1] That is: I have not conducted myself in such a manner as is above my condition.

3, 4. [130:2, 3] If instead of thinking humbly of myself, I have been exalted in mind above what is becoming, I am content to be punished, and treated as a babe that lies wailing at its mother's breast when deprived of milk.

PSALM 131 OF THE PSALTER

King Salomon prays to God to come to dwell in the Temple which is prepared for him, and at the same time to perform the promises that David had received for the benefit of his descendants. It is believed that this psalm was chanted when Salomon had the Ark borne into the Temple which he had built.[13415]

2–5. [131:2–5] While the Ark was still under the tent, David made to God this vow, which he confirmed with an oath:[13416] I promise not to enter my house, nor to give myself any repose, until I have found a place for my Lord, which may be a dwelling worthy of the Lord.

6. [131:6] "Eam." That is: The Ark.[13417]

7. [131:7] But now we shall enter with joy his own tabernacle, and we shall adore the Lord in this holy place where he has set his feet, that is, where he has begun to dwell.

8. [131:8] Arise, then, O Lord! and enter the place of Thy repose, with the Ark of Thy sanctification, that is, the Ark by which Thou hast been so glorified.

9. [131:9] May Thy priests be invested with justice, that is, with holiness, and all Thy holy ministers serve Thee with gladness.

10. [131:10] For the love of David, Thy beloved servant, reject not his Son who is Thy Christ.[13418]

12. [131:12] "Testamentum." St. Jerome translates: Pactum. "Testimonia mea." My precepts, tokens of my will.

13. [131:12] If their descendants shall do likewise, they in perpetuity shall sit upon this same throne of Thine.

15. [131:14] The Lord said: This is, etc.

16. [131:15] "Viduam ejus benedicens benedicam." Here I will bless the widow by succoring her abundantly.

17. [131:16] I will vest with salvation, that is, I will sanctify her priests, and her ministers shall live in joy.

18. [131:17] Here I will cause the power of David to flourish; for I have prepared for him a lamp, that is, a brilliant posterity.

19. [131:18] Sanctificatio mea." That is: The sacred crown by which I have sanctified him.[13419]

PSALM 132 OF THE PSALTER

The prophet exhorts all the ministers of the sanctuary to live together in peace, and to praise God with one accord by praying to him for the people.

1. [132:1] How useful and sweet it is for brethren to dwell together in perfect union!

2, 3. [132:2, 3] This union is like a perfumed ointment which, poured on the head of Aaron, flowed down by his beard even to the border of his vestment; it is also like the dew that falls down upon the mountains of Hermon and of Sion, and renders them so fertile.[13420]

4. [132:3] Because, where such a union reigns, God showers down blessings in abundance, and vouchsafes the joy of a life that is eternal.

PSALM 134 OF THE PSALTER

In this psalm the prophet exhorts the priests and the levites to praise the Lord for his power, which so greatly distinguishes him from the gods of the Gentiles, and to render him thanks for the benefits that he has bestowed upon his people.

3. [134:3] "Suave." It is sweet on account of the blessings that he pours on his creatures.

8. [134:8] He makes the winds issue forth from the places where he keeps them stored, as in a treasure-house, to use them when he pleases; he it is who in Egypt struck with death the first-born of men and of beasts.

14. [134:14] "Judicabit." That is: With a just judgment he will punish the persecutors of his people. "Deprecabitur" Bellarmine says that this verb must be taken in a passive sense; that is: Exorabitur. In his mercy he will be moved by their prayers, and he will answer them.[13421]

15. [134:15] The true God is all-powerful; but these idols have no power.[13422]

17. [134:17] "Neque enim est spiritus in ore ipsorum." That is: They have no breath; they did not show any sign of life.

19. [134:19] "Domus Israel." The family or people of Israel.[13423]

21. [134:21] Blessed be the Lord who dwells in Jerusalem, and who pours forth his graces upon us from Mount Sion.

PSALM 135 OF THE PSALTER

The prophet exhorts the Israelites to thank the Lord for all the benefits that he has bestowed upon men, and especially upon the Jewish people.

1. [135:1] "Confitemini." Render thanks to the Lord.

2. [135:2] "Deo deorum." The true God of false gods.[13424]

25. [135:25] Omni carni." All men and beasts.[13425]

PSALM 136 OF THE PSALTER

This psalm shows us the Jews, who, captives at Babylon, bewail their miseries and sigh for their return to Jerusalem. It is most suitable to the Christian soul that mourns in this exile here below and desires to go to its heavenly country.[13426]

1. [136:1] "Sedimus." We sat down oppressed with sadness.

4. [136:3] They said to us: Sing us one of those hymns which you were used to sing on Mount Sion.

5. [136:4] But we answered: How, etc.

6. [136:5] If ever I forget thee, O Jerusalem! in this bondage where I now am, may my right hand become helpless.[13427]

7, 8. [136:6] May my tongue be dried up and cleave to the roof of my mouth, if I fail to be ever mindful of thee, O Jerusalem! if I do not make Jerusalem the beginning of all my joy, that is, if I ever give myself to joy while I am afar from my fatherland.

9, 10. [136:7] Bear in mind the barbarity which the Edomites showed on the day when they took Jerusalem, and said: Destroy it entirely.

PSALM 137 OF THE PSALTER

In this psalm David thanks God for having heard his prayers and for delivering him from the hands of his enemies.[13428]

1. [137:1] I will ever give thanks to Thee with my whole heart, because Thou hast graciously heard my prayers.

3. [137:2] I will praise Thy mercy and Thy faithfulness to Thy promises, because Thou hast made known how great above everything else is Thy holy name.[13429]

4. [137:3] Every time that I shall invoke Thee, hear me speedily by augmenting in me the strength that I need to be able always to serve Thee.

5. [137:4] "Audierunt omnia verba oris tui." They have been instructed in all the words that Thou hast said, and Thou hast brought them to pass.

6. [137:5] Let them praise the ways pursued by the Lord; for very great is his glory in fulfilling all his divine counsels.

7. [137:6] Let them say that the Lord is high above all, and yet that he does not disdain to look with gracious favor on things that are mean and low, that is, on the humble; while he knows from afar off the things that are lofty, that is, he holds himself aloof from the proud, and despises them.

8. [137:7] If I find myself in the midst of tribulations, Thou wilt give me strength to bear them in peace; when my enemies advanced upon me in rage, Thou didst stretch forth Thy hand, and it saved me.

9. [137:8] "Dominus retribuet pro me." The Lord will avenge himself on those that persecute me.

PSALM 138 OF THE PSALTER

The prophet shows here that the knowledge and the providence of God extend to all things. He seeks, moreover, to induce us to unite ourselves to the just, whom God enriches with blessings, and to detach ourselves from sinners, whom his justice constrains him to punish.

1. [138:1] "Tu cognovisti sessionem meant et resurrectionem meam." Thou hast known perfectly the time when I should sit down and when I should rise up, that is, when I should take repose and when I should work; this taken in a moral sense may mean: the time when I should be humbled and when exalted. Bellarmine says that this verse may well be applied to Jesus Christ, speaking of his death and of his resurrection, as, indeed, the Church does apply it on Easter Sunday in the Introit.

2. [138:3] "Semitam meam et funiculum meum." The path that I should follow, and the term at which I should arrive.[13430]

3. [138:4] Thou hast foreseen my ways, that is, my actions, before my tongue has uttered a word to reveal them.[13431]

4. [138:5] Thou hast known all things that concern me, whether old or new; for Thou hast formed me; Thou hast busied Thy hands to create me, and make me Thy servant.[13432]

5. [138:6] "Ex me." A Hebraism, says Bellarmine, for Super me—Above, beyond me; this is explained by the following words: "Confortatus est, et non potero ad eam." That is: Thy knowledge is too high for me to comprehend it.

6. [138:7] "A spiritu tuo." That is: Away from Thy knowledge. "A facie tua." Away from Thy gaze.

7, 8, 9. [138:8, 9, 10] That is: Thou art in every place through Thy immensity, and Thou exercisest everywhere Thy power. I shall be unable to free myself.[13433]

10. [138:11] St. Jerome translates this verse thus: Si dixero: Forte tenebræ operient me; nox quoque lux erit circa me. Hence the verse is thus explained: If I should say that perhaps darkness will hide me from Thy eyes, I should deceive myself; for night from Thy eyes is a light that surrounds me, and discovers to Thee all my actions. But we may also, as Bellarmine observes, explain the words of the Vulgate in this manner: If I should hide myself in the darkness of the night in order not to be seen, while indulging in pleasures so shameful as shun the light of day, still I could not for all that withdraw myself from Thy gaze.

12. [138:13] "Renes meos." That is: The most inward parts of my body, and consequently my affections and my desires.

13. [138:14] O Lord! I will praise Thee always, because Thou hast made me know Thy greatness in a fearful manner, that is, Thou who commandest respect and a holy fear in Thy admirable works which my soul knows too well not to be greatly impressed.

14. [138:15] Of all that Thou hast in secret formed within me, that is, my bowels and bones, nothing is hidden before Thee; so that the whole substance of my body is known to Thee, as also whatever is hidden in the deepest bowels of the earth.

15. [138:16] Thy eyes have seen my imperfection, that is, my body, when it was shapeless, without distinction of members; for in Thy book, that is, in Thy mind, all men are found written, so that Thou knowest what is to become of them. The meaning is brought out better by what follows: "Dies formabuntur, et nemo in eis." Menochius explains: Days shall succeed to days, and not one of them shall be missing in Thy book so as to escape Thy knowledge.[13434]

16. [138:17] "Mihi." To my mind, according to my judgment. Thou honorest and Thou exaltest Thy enemies in calling them to enjoy eternal glory when they shall be made princes of the eternal kingdom.

17. [138:18] "Exsurrexi." According to the Hebrew: Evigilavi—Have wakened from sleep. "Adhuc sum tecum." That is: I am united with Thee up to the present moment, and I hope to continue thus united till the end.

18, 19. [138:19, 20] I know, on the other hand, that Thou wilt destroy the wicked, and I say to them: Men of blood, depart from me; for you say in your thought, that is, among yourselves: In vain, O Lord! will Thy servants occupy the cities that Thou hast given them.

22, 23. [138:23, 24] Prove me, and penetrate all the affections of my heart; interrogate me, that is, examine me and weigh all my ways, all my actions, and if Thou seest that I am in the way of iniquity, do Thou lead me into the eternal way, that is, make me walk by that way which will bring me to the possession of eternal good.[13435]

David implores help from God against Saul, and against those that spoke calumniously of him to that prince.[13436]

5, 6. [139:5, 6] That is: They use every means in their power to make me fall into their hands.

8. [139:8] "Obumbrasti." Thou hast extended Thy shadow, Thy protection.

9. [139:9] "Ne tradas me . . . peccatori." Bellarmine renders these words thus: Ne sinas me tradi . . . dæmoni—Suffer me not to be given over to the devil. The verse, then, is explained as follows: Permit not that, drawn by my concupiscence, I give myself over into the hands of the enemy. These enemies have no other thought than to injure me; do not Thou abandon me lest they should boast of having conquered me.

10. [139:10] If Thou dost assist me, the whole force of their wiles with which they seek to circumvent me in various ways, and the evil they strive so hard to do me by their calumnies, all this will cover their own selves by falling back upon them.[13437]

11. [139:11] "Carbones." Burning coals, that is, the afflictions that they devised for me. "In miseriis non subsistent." Their miseries shall be such that they will not fail to be crushed by them.

12. [139:12] The man that makes an ill use of his tongue to lie, to detract, and to injure his neighbor; and the evils that shall afflict him, far from making him gain merit by patience, will only serve to sink him deeper in eternal death.

14. [139:14] "Cum vultu tuo." That is: In that blessed kingdom where they shall see Thy beautiful face.

PSALM 140 OF THE PSALTER

The psalmist implores the lord to protect him from his enemies; he also prays God to preserve him from such faults as may render his prayers useless.[13438]

2. [140:2] May my prayer ascend to Thee as the smoke of innocence rises in Thy sight; and when I lift my hands to Thee to implore Thy help may this be acceptable to Thee as the sacrifice that is offered to Thee at evening time.[13439]

3. [140:3] That is: Permit not that any inconsiderate word escape me that could cause Thee displeasure.

4, 5. [140:4] And if even through weakness I should offend Thee, suffer me not to speak maliciously by seeking to excuse my ins. This is what wicked men do; but I do not wish to have part with them, nor share in the disorders that are their chief delight.

6. [140:5] That is: I prefer the charitable corrections and reproaches of the just to the flatteries of the wicked.

7. [140:5] This verse is very obscure; according to St. John Chrysostom it is thus explained: I will not only have no communication with the wicked, but moreover my prayer to God is that he will not allow me to find delight in those things that please them; they will perish along with their judges, that is, their chiefs who lead them on to evil; these indeed have already perished by striking against the rock which has caused their wreck.

8. [140:6] This verse is also very obscure; it is thus explained: I hope nevertheless that they will hear my words; for they are such as will have power to make them repent, and as the hardened earth yields to the spade and is broken up, so their obstinacy will be broken and yield to my persuasions.

9. [140:7] Our bones have been scattered, that is, our strength is weakened, so that we find ourselves as it were on the brink of the grave; but, O Lord, my eyes turn to Thee; in Thee have I put my hopes, give me not up to death.

11. [140:10] The wicked ones shall be caught in the snares that they laid for me; for myself, I hope to be in a special manner protected by Thee until I am out of danger.[13440]

PSALM 141 OF THE PSALTER

According to interpreters, this psalm is the prayer that David, hiding in the cave of Odollam, addressed to God in order to be delivered from the imminent danger in which he found himself.[13441]

3. [141:4] Seeing that I have not the strength to resist my enemies, I have recourse to Thee, my God, who knowest how perilous are the ways that I have to tread.

5. [141:5] I turned to my right hand[13442] to see whether any one would help me; and I found not even one who seemed to know me.

6. [141:5] It is not permitted me to save myself even by flight, and there is no one to have a care of my life.

7. [141:6] "Portio mea." My portion, that is, my inheritance, all my goods.

10. [141:8] Take me out of this prison, in order that I may be able to praise Thy name; the just await me, till Thou restore to me the freedom which I desire.

PSALM 143 OF THE PSALTER

David returns thanks to the Lord for his victory gained over Goliath, and for all the other benefits that he had received; he also begs him for strength to vanquish the Philistines.[13443]

5. [143:4] Man is not vanity, since he is Thy creature; but his littleness is such that he is like unto vanity; the days of his life pass by as a shadow.[13444]

6. [143:5] Come down to defend me from my enemies; place Thy powerful hand on these proud mountains, and they shall pass away in smoke.[13445]

8. [143:7] Stretch forth Thy hand from the height of heaven, save me, and deliver me from the hands of these foreign foes,[13446] who rush forward like a torrent of water to swallow me up.

9. [143:8] Their mouth utters words only of vanity and pride; and their hands work naught but iniquity.

10. [143:9] Save me, and I will celebrate Thy praises in thanksgiving.

18. [143:15] "Beatus populus." Understood: As for us, we say: Blessed the people, etc.

PSALM 144 OF THE PSALTER

The psalmist here exalts the perfection of God, and especially his goodness and mercy.[13447]

14. [144:13] "Verbis." Words, or Promises.[13448]

15. [144:14] "Allevat." According to the Hebrew: Sustentat—Sustains. Those that have fallen are never left without means on the part of God to raise themselves.

17. [144:16] "Benedictione." That is: With Thy benefits.[13449]

18. [144:17] "In omnibus viis tuis." In all the dispositions of his Providence.

19. [144:18] "In veritate." That is: With confidence.[13450]

21. [144:20] "Peccatores." Obstinate sinners.

PSALM 145 OF THE PSALTER

Addressing himself to the Jews, captives in Babylon, the psalmist exhorts them to hope only in God for their deliverance.[13451]

2. [145:1] Beware of putting your trust in the powerful of this world; they are but men, and therefore cannot give you the salvation that you expect.

3. [145:4] They are but men, I say; one day their spirit will go forth, and their body will return to the earth from which they were formed;[13452] then all their projects will come to an end.

5. [145:7] "Qui custodit veritatem." The Lord our God is faithful in keeping his word, or his promises.

8. [145:9] "Custodit advenas." He has care of strangers, who are far from their country. "Vias." The designs, machinations, undertakings.

PSALM 146 OF THE PSALTER

Same subject as in the preceding psalm.[13453]

1. [146:1] Let all praise the Lord, because to praise him is good and profitable to ourselves; but see that your praises are acceptable to God and worthy of his majesty.

2. [146:2] The Lord will rebuild Jerusalem, and will reunite the people of Israel who are scattered among the nations.[13454]

3. [146:3] "Contritos." That is: The afflicted.

4. [146:4] He knows the number of the stars, and he gives to all of them their names.

10. [146:9] "Invocantibus eum." That by their cries seem to call upon him.[13455]

11. [146:10] He has no will to help the man that trusts to the strength or fleetness of his horse: nor him who glories and confides in the agility and speed of his legs.

The prophet exhorts the people to thank the Lord for his benefits. This psalm regards the Jews now returned from captivity, in the sweet enjoyment of peace.[13456]

2. [147:13] "Benedixit." That is: He has filled with good things.

4. [147:15] He sends his commands, and they arrive promptly.

5. [147:16] "Dat nivem sicut lanam." That is: He showers down snow from heaven in such quantities to benefit the earth, that its flakes form as it were a quilt of wool. "Nebulam." St. Jerome translates: Pruinam—Hoar-frost.

6. [147:17] Moreover, he covers the earth with ice as with pieces of crystal; how shall he that is exposed to so great cold be able to endure this? "Ante faciem." A Hebraism, says Bellarmine, for Coram, that is, in its presence.

7. [147:18] Then the Lord will issue another command, and will cause the snow to melt by sending forth the South wind.

8, 9. [147:19, 20] "Verbum suum . . . justitias et judicia sua." That is, his precepts, his holy law.

PSALM 4 OF THE PSALTER

According to interpreters this psalm was composed by David, happy to see himself delivered from the hands of Saul, or of Absalom. In a mystical sense it is applied to Jesus Christ inasmuch as he is the end of the law and of the prophets.[13457]

1. [4:2] When I called upon my God, he heard me, he who is the defender of my innocence: Yea, Lord, when I was in tribulation, Thou didst enlarge my heart by Thy consolations.

2. [4:2] Continue, then, to have pity on me, and hearken to my prayers whenever I have recourse to Thee.

3. [4:3] "Usquequo gravi corde?" How long do you wish to have your heart thus heavy, that is, so bowed down to earth, and inclined to earthly passions? "Vanitatem . . . mendacium." Vain and deceitful things, false goods.

4. [4:4] Know that the Lord has made his holy one admirable, that is, me his servant, whom he has sanctified as King and Prophet; he will, therefore, continue to hearken to me whenever I shall have recourse to him in prayer.

5. [4:5] If you become angry, take care not to commit sin, that is, be angry with a just anger, when the honor of God or your own duty require you to do so, and then do not be disturbed. St. Paul says: Irascimini, et nolite peccare; sol non occidat super iracundiam vestram—Be angry, and sin not. Let not the sun go down upon your anger (Eph. 4:26). And if your conscience reproaches you for having yielded to some fit of passion, then retire to your chambers at night, and ask God's pardon with compunction. "Compungimini." According to the Chaldee: Deum apud vos cogitate—Think with yourselves on God.

6. [4:6] Offer to God the sacrifice of justice, that is, of a just life, and put all your trust in the Lord. "Quis ostendit nobis bona?" Interpreters refer these words to the followers of David, who, seeing themselves persecuted with him, said: When shall we recover peace? According to Bellarmine, we can explain them in two ways—either by supposing them as coming from the mouth of worldlings, who make but little account of heavenly goods, and say: Who has ever come back from the other world to tell us of these goods, which we do not see? Or else: What is this holiness, this justice, which you so much recommend to us? who will show us the way to acquire them?

7. [4:7] "Signatum est." According to the Hebrew: Eleva—Lift up; or: Elevatum est ut signum—Is lifted up as a sign; which comes to the same thing. The sense, then, of the verse is Thou hast shown us the light of Thy face, that is, Thy goodness, and thereby Thou hast rejoiced my heart.[13458]

8. [4:8] That is: I behold my enemies multiplying with the good things that they enjoy.

9. [4:9] But for me, confiding in Thy goodness, I shall continue to sleep and to repose in peace.

10. [4:10] "Singulariter." In a singular manner. According to the Greek: Solitarie. That is as much as to say: Thou takest care of me as if Thou hast none else than me to look after.

PSALM 30 OF THE PSALTER

Here the first six verses of the Psalm 30: In te, Domine, speravi, page 93, are read.

PSALM 90 OF THE PSALTER

The psalmist here exhorts those that have put all their hope in God to fear no danger. This psalm is somewhat in the form of a dialogue; for the psalmist, the just man, and God himself speak successively.[13459]

1. [90:1] He that lives in the confidence of the help[13460] of God shall be assured of his protection.

3. [90:3][13461]"Venantium." That is: Of enemies who sought to make me their prey. "A verbo aspero." Some interpret this of every calamity; Bellarmine, with others, understands it of the condemnation of the reprobate, that is, of the sentence of eternal death.

4. [90:4] If thou trustest in the Lord, he will cover thee with his shoulders, that is, with his wings, and under the wings of his protection thou mayest hope to be sheltered from every danger.

5, 6. [90:5, 6] "Veritas ejus." The faithfulness of his promises. "A timore nocturno." Of the secret plots of thy enemies. "A sagitta volante in die." Of arrows that shall be shot at thee unexpectedly during the day, that is, sudden and unforeseen dangers. A negotio perambulante in tenebris." All hurtful things brought about by unknown causes. "Ab incursu et dæmonio meridiano." Of any assault of the devil, made with open attack in the middle of the day. In a word, as St. Augustine says, if God protects thee, thou wilt not have to fear any evil planned against thee, by day or by night, in public or in private, whether on the part of men or of demons.

7. [90:7] Thou shalt see thy enemies fall around thee in great number, and they will not be able to hurt thee.[13462]

8. [90:8] With thy eyes thou shalt see the protection of God over thee, and the vengeance that he will take of thy unjust persecutors.

9. [90:9] And whereas thou hast trusted in the Lord, saying: O Lord, thou art my hope; thou hast procured for thyself a most high refuge, that is, one most safe, wherein thou hast nothing to fear.[13463]

10. [90:10] Know that here no evil shall happen to thee, and no scourge shall come nigh thy dwelling.

11, 12. [90:11, 12] For the Lord has commended thee to his angels, that they may guard thee in all thy ways: if even thou art in some perilous road, they will bear thee up in their hands, so that thy feet may not chance to stumble against any stone of scandal, that is, any dangerous occasion of sin.[13464]

13. [90:13] That is: Thou wilt have nothing to fear from evil encounters. In a spiritual sense, by the asp is understood the demon who inspires despair; by the basilisk, the demon who inspires presumption; by the lion, pride; and by the dragon, attachment to earthly goods.

14. [90:14] "Cognovit." He has known and invoked.

16. [90:16] I will give him a long life, and will make him enjoy the health and salvation that I shall bestow upon him in this life, and eternal salvation which I reserve for him in the next.[13465]

PSALM 133 OF THE PSALTER

The prophet here exhorts the priests and levites to praise the Lord and to pray for the people.[13466]

4. [133:3] "Te." This pronoun applies to the assembly of those whom the prophet exhorts to praise God. "Ex Sion." From Mount Sion where he takes up his abode.

THE CANTICLE OF SIMEON

The holy old man Simeon intoned this canticle while he held in his arms the Infant Jesus whom the Blessed Virgin had brought into the Temple to present him to God.

1. [2:29] Now, dost Thou let Thy servant depart in peace from this life, according to Thy promise.[13467]

2. [2:30] "Salutare tuum." The Saviour whom Thou hast sent.

3. [2:31] Whom Thou hast set forth in the sight of all the people.

TRANSLATION.

Reverend Father:

As the centenary of the death of the illustrious Founder of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer drew near, you conceived the pious and appropriate plan of shedding a new lustre on his memory by translating all his works into English and publishing them. The Holy Father, therefore, who has at heart the spiritual advancement of the faithful, as well as the exaltation of the holy Doctor, has most graciously accepted the nine volumes thus far published, which you wished to present to him. While bestowing upon you well-deserved praise for your useful labor, and thanking you for the gift inspired by your filial love, he gives you from his heart the blessing which you humbly asked for in your letter, complying also with the request of the Most Rev. Archbishop of Baltimore.

As the bearer of this, I wish you all happiness in the Lord.

I am, Reverend Sir,

Your obedient servant,

M. CARD. RAMPOLLA.

NOTICE

We have gathered in this volume all that has reference to the holy ministry of preaching, its importance, the good that it accomplishes, and the manner of exercising it, so that the greatest amount of fruit may be derived from it. In regard to the ministry of preaching, we must distinguish its three parts, namely: the first has for its object PREACHING IN GENERAL, its necessity from a point of view of divine Providence, and the manner in which one should preach in order to make preaching successful under all circumstances; the second regards the MISSIONS, their various exercises, and the means that one should employ to make them a success; the third is INSTRUCTION, or the Large Catechism, which one should use while giving it, and the best method that should be followed in order to interest, to enlighten, and to move others, either during the mission 0r at any other time.

We shall not fail to remark the persistency with which our holy Doctor recommends 0n every occasion natural simplicity of language, and reprobates every expression that savors of grandiloquence, studied eloquence, or any pretension to elegance. This is a rule that he rigorously imposed upon all those that lived under his authority; he himself always followed this rule, not only in his discourses, but also in all his writings.

St. Alphonsus, in preaching and in having others to preach in this manner, which is joined to the practice of all the virtues that make men truly apostolic, has effected and does not cease to effect through his children an immense deal of good. With feelings of gratitude to God, he thus congratulates himself in a circular addressed to the worthy companions of his labors, who had been formed after his school:

"My dearest Brothers in Jesus Christ: I he principal thing that I recommend to you is the love of Jesus Christ. Very much are we bound to love him. For this end he has chosen us from all eternity, and called us into his Congregation, there to love him, and to make others also love him. What greater honor, what greater mark of love, could Jesus Christ have shown us? He has snatched us from the midst of the world, in order to draw us to his love, and that, during the pilgrimage of this life, by which we must pass into eternity, we might think of nothing but of pleasing him, and of bringing those crowds of people to love him who every year, by means of our ministry, abandon sin, and return to the grace of God. It is generally the case that when we begin a mission the greater number of the people of the place are at enmity with God, and deprived of his love; but five or six days have scarcely elapsed when, behold, numbers, as if roused from a deep sleep, begin to listen to the exhortations, the instructions, and the sermons; and when they see that God offers them his mercy, they begin to weep over their sins, and conceive the desire of being reconciled with him; the way of pardon is opened before them, and seeing it, they begin to abhor that manner of life which they had previously loved, a new light begins to shine upon them, and a peace hitherto unknown touches their hearts. Then they think of going to confession, to remove from their souls those vices which kept them separated from God; and whereas before a Mass of a quarter of an hour appeared to them too long, five decades of the Rosary too tedious, and a sermon of half an hour unendurable they now gladly hear a second and a third Mass, and they are sorry when the sermon, which has lasted an hour and a half, or perhaps two hours, is over. And of whom does the Lord make use, if not of us, to work so wondrous changes, and to bring the people to delight in those very things that before they despised? When the mission is over, we leave in the place two or three thousand persons who love Almighty God, who before were living at enmity with him, and who were not even thinking of recovering his grace."

And while, on the one hand, the holy Founder of an Order which is altogether apostolic has accomplished and is still accomplishing so much good by his word; on the other hand, by his admirable writings, which have raised him to the rank of Doctor of the universal Church, he does not cease to preach, every day, with the greatest fruit, to a countless number of souls in all parts of the world. ED.

St. ALPHONSUS published his LETTER TO A RELIGIOUS in 1761; as he was promoted to the episcopate only in the following year, the signature of bishop which we see at the end of the letter, was added after that period. It is a complete dissertation 0n the matter and the form required in pulpit oratory, for mission sermons, for sermons preached in Lent and on Sundays, for panegyrics, or simple instructions and catechetical instructions.

"He took care to send it," says Tannoia (B. 2, ch. 50), "to the General Superiors of the religious Orders, and all admired the high degree of sacred eloquence that he possessed, as well as the zeal with which he tried to induce preachers, to preach Jesus Christ, and not to preach themselves."

He also sent copies of this letter to a large number of bishops, and added to it a note, dated May 10, 1761, in which he thus expresses himself: "I feel great pain when I see so many poor ignorant people who listen to sermons, but derive very little fruit therefrom; and this because of preachers who use an elevated and a florid style, and disdain to lower themselves to break to them the bread of the divine word. It is this that has determined me to publish the present letter, which I have the honor to send to your Lordship. I beg you you to read it, and to have it afterwards read by the priests of the diocese who are engaged in preaching. I would also ask you to send it to the convents of religious priests, and to recommend it to the Superiors to have it read by those that preach. You would also do me a favor if you asked those to read the letter who come to preach the sermons during Advent and during Lent. It is true that the latter bring with them their sermons prepared; but who knows whether by reading it they would not correct themselves in the future, and think of the great account that those preachers will have to render to God who do not make themselves understood by poor ignorant people?" (Villecourt, 1. 6, p. 4, ch. 3, a. 8.)

All that we read above shows the importance that our illustrious Doctor attaches to this letter. ED.

A Letter TO A RELIGIOUS

IN WHICH HE TREATS OF THE ADVANTAGES OF PREACHING IN A SIMPLE AND APOSTOLIC MANNER, AND OF THE N ECESSITY OF AVOIDING AN ELEVATED AND FLORID STYLE

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

I have received your esteemed letter, in which you say that what I have written in the Selva, or Collection of Materials,[13468] for the spiritual exercises of priests, on the style to be employed in sermons preached for congregations consisting both of the illiterate and the learned, has been criticised by a distinguished literary character. In the Selva I have asserted that the style of all sermons preached before the ignorant and the learned should be simple and popular. My critic, you say, maintains that, though sacred orators should preach in a clear and orderly manner, they should never condescend to speak in a popular style; because, according to him, such a style is unworthy of the dignity of the pulpit and degrading to the word of God. This proposition has astonished me; but, to speak with the sincerity of a friend, what you have added has scandalized me. The objections of my critic, you say, appear somewhat reasonable to you, because a sermon should have all the properties of a discourse, and it is admitted that one of the most essential is to delight the audience; and therefore, when the audience consists both of the ignorant and the learned, the sacred orator should not, by a low, popular style, disgust the latter, who are the respectable part of his hearers, but should speak in a manner calculated to please and delight them.

Now, to explain fully my sentiments on this point, which I shall show are the sentiments of all wise and pious men, and to answer every objection that can be proposed against my opinion, it will be necessary to repeat much of what has been already written in the Selva.

It cannot be doubted that by preaching the world has been converted from paganism to the faith of Jesus Christ. How, says the Apostle, shall they hear without a preacher? Faith then cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God.[13469] As the faith has been propagated, so it has been preserved by preaching, and so are Christians induced by preaching to live according to the maxims of the Gospel: for it is not enough for the faithful to know what they must do in order to be saved; it is, moreover, necessary for them, by hearing the word of God, to be reminded of the eternal truths and of their obligations, and also to adopt the means of obtaining eternal life. Hence St. Paul commanded Timothy continually to instruct and admonish the flock committed to his care: Preach the word, be instant in season, out of season: reprove, entreat, rebuke in all patience and doctrine.[13470] Hence also the Lord addressed the same command to the prophet Isaias: Cry, cease not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet, and shew My people their wicked doings.[13471] And again he said to Jeremias, Behold I have given My words in thy mouth: Lo, I have set thee this day over the nations, and over kingdoms, to root up, and to destroy, etc.[13472] Jesus Christ has imposed the same obligation on his apostles, and through them on all priests who are called to the office of preaching. Going therefore, teach ye all nations: to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you.[13473]

And if, through the fault of those who are bound to announce the divine word, a sinner perish, God will demand an account of his soul at their hands. If, when I say to the wicked, Thou shalt surely die, thou declare it not to him, nor speak to him, that he may be converted from his wicked way, and live, the same wicked man shall die in his iniquity, but I will require his blood at thy hand.[13474]

But let us come to the point. My proposition is that, when the audience is composed of the learned and of the ignorant, the style of the sermon (I do not here speak of funeral orations or of panegyrics—of these I shall say something hereafter) should be simple and popular. This proposition is not mine only: it is that of the celebrated Louis Muratori, who is regarded as one of the first literary characters of the day. It cannot be said that such a man censured a lofty and polished style because he was but little acquainted with it: for the whole world knows that he was a man of great genius, and of extraordinary literary acquirements. In his golden book on popular eloquence which is in the hands of every one, he asserts, and proves most learnedly, the proposition that I have laid down.

But, to confirm my assertion, I shall take many reflections from other authors, and particularly from the holy Fathers; and I entreat you, and every one into whose hands this book shall fall, to read the whole of it; for it contains a great deal of matter most useful for those that are engaged in preaching, and that are desirous of gaining souls to Jesus Christ. St. Basil says: "The sacred school does not follow the precepts of the rhetoricians."[13475] The saint does not mean to say that the sacred orator should not employ the art of rhetoric in his sermons, but that he should not imitate the empty eloquence of the ancient rhetoricians, who in their orations sought only their own glory. It is not denied that we should avail ourselves of the rules of rhetoric in all our sermons. But what, I ask, is the principal end that every preacher should propose to himself in using the art of oratory? Certainly he should have no other object in view than to persuade and to induce the people to practise what he preaches. Such is the doctrine of the learned Marquis Orsi, who, in a letter to Father Platina, says: "Let eloquence be employed to move rather than to delight; for to move is the same thing as to persuade, which is the only object of the art." In his work on popular eloquence Muratori says that "rhetoric is necessary, not to fill sermons with flowers, but to teach the method of persuading and of moving." I shall occasionally take passages from this book; because the opinions of so great a man cannot, like mine, be treated with contempt. In his life of the younger Father Segneri he says: "Good rhetoric is nothing else than a perfect imitation of the natural and popular method of reasoning with others, and of persuading, everything superfluous being removed. The more the reasoning of the sacred orator is natural and intelligible, —not to the few men of learning who may be present, but to the people to whom he speaks,—the more effective will be his eloquence." Speaking of the style to be adopted by the preacher of the divine word, St. Augustine says: "Let him try as much as possible to be understood, and to be listened to with docility."[13476] St. Thomas says, "that the preacher whose principal object is to show his eloquence, does not so much intend to induce the people to practise what he teaches, as to imitate himself in the elegance of his language."[13477]

The language of sermons preached before mixed congregations should be so plain and simple that the audience may clearly understand all that is said, and may be moved to practise all that is taught. Hence the preacher should avoid two things: loftiness of thought and superfluous elegance of language.

With regard to the first, would to God that Superiors would imitate the example of St. Philip Neri. It is related in his life that he commanded those who gave instructions to the people to speak on subjects that are useful and popular, and never to enter into scholastic questions, or to seek after sublime conceptions. Hence when he heard the members of his Congregation introduce subjects that were too subtle or curious, he made them descend from the pulpit, even though they were in the middle of the sermon. Finally, he exhorted all to employ their eloquence in showing, in a plain and easy style, the beauty of virtue and the deformity of vice. Of some preachers we may say, with the prophet Isaias, Who are these that fly as clouds?[13478] And as lofty clouds seldom forebode rain, so, from the sermons of those that preach in a lofty style it cannot be hoped that the waters of salvation will ever flow. Hence the holy Council of Trent has commanded all parish priests to preach in a style accommodated to the capacity of their flock. "Archpriests, . . . either personally, or by others who are competent, shall feed the people committed to them with wholesome words, according to their own capacity."[13479] Hence also the celebrated Muratori wisely observes, "The preacher must speak to the people in the language in which a man of learning would endeavor to persuade a peasant, and thus he will make an impression on the learned as well as on the ignorant."

Except, says St. Paul, you utter by the tongue plain speech, how shall it be known what is said? For you shall be speaking unto the air.[13480] Hence, according to the Apostle, they that preach in language not easily understood by the people, only speak to the air. But, alas! how many preachers are there that labor hard, through a miserable desire of acquiring the praises of their hearers, to fill their sermons with sublime conceptions and subtle thoughts, unintelligible to the people, and recite their discourses in the tone and manner of a comedian? What fruit can such preachers expect from their instructions? Louis of Grenada says that the ruin of the w0rld is to be ascribed to this crying evil, that the greater number of preachers seek applause rather than the glory of God and the salvation of souls.[13481] Would to God it were not too true! And Father John d'Avila, in one of his letters, in which he describes the miseries and iniquities of the world, says: "There is no remedy for so great an evil, principally on account of the preachers, who are the medicine of these wounds; but such dangerous diseases are not cured by the soft lenitives of polished and delicate discourses—they require strokes of fire." One would imagine that some of those lofty preachers study to make themselves unintelligible, or rather, as Muratori says, that they are ashamed to speak in language that all can understand. The little ones, says the prophet Jeremias, have asked for bread, and there was no one to break it unto them.[13482] In his comment on this passage, St. Bonaventure says,[13483] that the bread of the divine word is not to be divided in a manner calculated to indulge curiosity, but must be broken in small pieces on which the little ones may feast. What profit can the poor and illiterate derive from sublime conceptions, from irrelevant erudition, or from long descriptions of a tempest or of a pleasant garden, the study of which has cost the preacher a week's labor, though the entire discourse does not last longer than a quarter of an hour?

And here let it be observed that lofty thoughts and ingenious reflections, or facts of a curious and distracting nature, though they may please the learned, still injure the effect of the sermon; for, as Muratori well observes, he that understands them dwells with delight on the sublimity of the thoughts or on the novelty of the facts, and does not attend to his own spiritual profit: thus the will is not affected, and no fruit is produced.

It was not in a lofty style that St. Paul preached to the Corinthians: And I, brethren, when I came to you, I came not in loftiness of speech or of wisdom, declaring unto you the testimony of Christ; for I judged not myself to know any thing among you, but Jesus Christ, and Him crucified.[13484] I, brethren, in preaching to you, have not had recourse to sublime discourses, or to human wisdom: I have desired only to know Jesus Christ crucified, that is, that ail our hope and our salvation consists in imitating his sorrows and his ignominies. The sentiments of Natalis Alexander on this passage of St. Paul are worthy of attention: "It is not to be wondered at that most preachers derive no fruit, since they make their preaching consist in the artifice of secular eloquence, in measured periods, in excessive ornament of words and flights of human reason. They do not teach the Gospel, but their own inventions; they know not Jesus crucified, but rather propose to themselves the imitation of academic orators than that of the apostles and of apostolic men. Let the humility of the preacher accompany the simplicity of the sermon, of which Christian eloquence is not altogether deprived, which is adorned with a natural, not a counterfeit, beauty. Let him fear lest by his pride, and by the captivation of human glory and applause, and by the ostentation of eloquence he may hinder the work of God. The fewer, continues the learned author, the ornaments of secular eloquence the preacher employs, and the less his confidence in human means, the more fruitful will his sermons be in converting sinners."[13485]

The learned and celebrated missionary, Father Jerome Sparano, of the venerable Congregation of the Pious Workmen, used to compare those that preach in a lofty and florid style to artificial fireworks, which, while they last, make a great noise, but leave after them only a little smoke. St. Teresa[13486] then had just reason to say that the sacred orator who preaches himself does great injury to the Church. "The apostles," she would say, "though few, have converted the world; because they preached with simplicity and with the true spirit of God, and now so many preachers produce but little fruit." And why? "Because," says the saint, "the preachers of the present time have too much of human wisdom and human respect, and therefore few only of their hearers give up the habits of vice." St. Thomas of Villanova says: "Many preachers there are, but few that preach as they should."[13487] Philip Neri used to say: "Give me ten priests with the true spirit of the apostles, and I will convert the whole world."

By the mouth of the prophet Jeremias the Lord asks: Why then is not the wound of the daughter of My people healed?[13488] In his exposition of this passage St. Jerome answers: "Because there are not priests to apply the necessary remedy."[13489] Speaking of preachers who adulterate his word, the Lord says, in another place: If they had stood in My counsel and had made My words known to My people, I should have turned them from their evil way and their wicked doings.[13490] "They would," says Cardinal Hugo, commenting on this passage, "have made known My words, not their own." Preachers who speak not in simple language, preach not the word of God, but their own; and therefore, says the Lord, sinners remain in their wicked ways. O God! what an abuse is it to see sometimes religious, even of the reformed Orders, who, from their penitential garments, and from the appearance of their mortified lives, seem to breathe zeal and sanctity, and from whom the people expect to hear sentiments and words burning with divine love; what an abuse, I say, is it to see such religious ascend the pulpit, and deliver a discourse which is only a collection of ingenious thoughts, of descriptions, of antitheses and of other such trifles, of inflated language and rounded periods, which the hearers scarcely understand, and from which they derive no benefit! What a pity to see so many of the poor come to learn the means of saving their souls, and obliged, after listening to the preacher for more than an hour, to go away without having understood any part of the sermon! They return home as ignorant as before, and full of discontent at having spent so much time in attending to a discourse which they could not understand.

Those orators who preach themselves, and are not understood by their audience, sometimes say: "The people were all attentive to the discourse." I also say that the people were attentive; they wished to understand the discourse, but have they understood it? Muratori says that he had seen the poor listen with open mouths to panegyrics, of which they scarcely understood a single word. Hence it happens, that, having found by experience that they do not understand the discourses preached in the Church, they become disgusted with religious discourses, they cease to attend to them, and thus become more and more obstinate in vice. Justly, then, has Father Gaspar Sanchez called those who do not preach in a simple style the greatest persecutors of the Church; for, in reality, there cannot be a greater persecution or evil that can befall the people than the adulteration of the word of God; for, when mixed up with flowers and trifles, it is either not understood, or is at least deprived of its efficacy; so that it cannot give to the people the light and help which they might receive from it.

Secondly, the preacher should employ words that are in common use, and should avoid those that are not understood by the illiterate. Preachers of long standing and of high character must be particularly careful to use language easily understood by the people; for, should they speak in a polished style, young preachers, being naturally desirous of applause, will study to imitate them. Thus the abuse will be more widely extended, and the poor will be deprived of the fruit of the word of God. St. Jerome compares vain preachers, who employ only sounding and polished words, to women who by their vain ornaments please men, but do not please God.[13491]

But Father Bandiera, in the preface of his Gerotricameronce, controverts the opinion of those who maintain that in sermons a selection of words, and careful attention to the collocation necessary for elegant diction, do not edify the people, but, on the contrary, destroy the simplicity suited to spiritual subjects, and take up the preacher's time in the study of empty words. He asserts that ornaments of style throw a splendor round spiritual subjects, such as the maxims of faith, the beauty of virtue, and the deformity of vice. He says that the holy Fathers employed these ornaments, and that without their aid the word of God cannot be preached with dignity from the pulpit. He also adds, that some persons censure select language as unsuited and injurious to devotion, because they themselves have not a command of polished expression. To remove every erroneous impression that might be made on the minds of his readers I shall answer his arguments and refute his assertions.

First; I cannot conceive what could have induced Father Bandiera to give expression to so unreasonable sentiments in his preface; for in the body of his work he says that, when the greater part of the audience consists of the poor, the style of the sermon should be easy and simple, and that sometimes it should be low, when otherwise the hearers would not derive profit from the discourse. He also says that the style of academic discourses is very different from that of sermons. He adds that preachers who, in their instructions, should adopt the style of his own work, would act improperly. He then agrees in opinion with us, that, when the greater part of the audience is composed of the illiterate, the style of the sermon must, if the preacher wishes to produce fruit, be simple, and be accommodated to the capacity of the hearers. What, then, has induced him to assert that the dignity of the divine word, delivered from the pulpit, requires the ornaments of style, and that those ornaments give splendor to spiritual things; or that some writers, because they themselves have not a command of language, censure, as injurious to devotion, a nice selection of words?

Let us now come to the refutation of the assertions of Father Bandiera: his opinion should be received with caution, for, being an eminent professor of the Tuscan language, he may have been induced to adopt it by too great an attachment to eloquence of expression. He says that "it is necessary to give splendor to spiritual subjects." Such is not the language of St. Ambrose. This Father says that Christian preaching stands not in need of the pomp or elegance of words, and that therefore ignorant fishermen were chosen by the Lord to preach the Gospel, and to sow the word of God pure and unadulterated.[13492]

Natalis Alexander answers Father Bandiera, and says that the word of God requires not affected and flowery ornaments, since it is adorned by the natural beauty which it contains in itself; and therefore the more simply it is expounded, the more luminous and splendid it appears. The words of the same author, which have been already quoted, are so appropriate, that I shall repeat them in this place: "Let the humility of the preacher accompany the simplicity of the sermon, of which Christian eloquence is not altogether deprived, which is adorned with a natural, not a counterfeit, beauty. . . . The fewer the ornaments of secular eloquence the preacher employs, and the less his confidence in human means, the more fruitful will his sermons be in converting sinners."[13493] Thus the more purely and nakedly the word of God is preached, the more forcibly it strikes the hearts of the hearers; for, according to the Apostle, it is in itself living and effective; so that it is more piercing than a two-edged sword.[13494] And God himself, by the mouth of the prophet Jeremias, has declared that his word is a fire which inflames, and a hammer which breaks the rock in pieces—that is, the most hardened hearts: Are not My words as a fire, saith the Lord: and as a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces.[13495]

Let us examine the sentiments of the author of the Imperfect Work on this subject. "The word of God," he says, "though simple and popular, is in itself living, and gives life to those who hear it, because it contains in itself the truth of God, which persuades and moves the hearts of men; but human language, though polished and select, is, for want of God's co-operation, dead, and therefore produces no fruit."[13496] The learned Mansi says that when it is naked and divested of ornament the word of God strikes the heart, but adorned with flowers, it is like a sword within its scabbard—it cannot cut.[13497]

Father Bandiera asserts that the holy Fathers have in their writings employed the ornaments of style. In answer I say, that we have not heard the sermons of these Fathers, nor are we acquainted with their style of preaching. We only read their written discourses, and we know that sermons which were preached in a simple and popular style are usually polished before they are committed to writing or given to the public. This remark has been made by the celebrated Muratori. "It is," he says, "true that St. Ambrose very frequently spoke in an abstruse manner; but we have not the sermons which he preached to the people." He reduced to treatises the discourses delivered from the pulpit, and added to them various ornaments, so that the original form of his popular instructions has disappeared. But Muratori says that, in their sermons to the people, the most celebrated Fathers of the Church, namely, St. Basil, St. Augustine, St. John Chrysostom, St. Gregory of Nyssa, St. Gregory the Great, St. Maximus, and St. Gaudentius, preferred popular to sublime eloquence; and this is evident, as well from the sermons as from the other works of these saints. Let us hear how St. John Chrysostom speaks of sermons embellished with pompous words and well-turned periods: "We seek by those words and beautiful compositions to delight our neighbors. We try to be admired, but we are not anxious to heal the diseases of our neighbors."[13498] And he adds, that the preacher who studies to delight others and to attract admiration by elegant compositions should be denominated "Miserable and unhappy traitor."[13499] St. Augustine says: "We do not make use of high-sounding and poetical words of secular eloquence, but we preach Christ crucified."[13500]

Father John d'Avila used to say, that every preacher should ascend the pulpit with a thirst for the salvation of souls, which would make him endeavor and hope, with the divine aid, to gain to God the souls of all his hearers. Hence St. Gregory says that the sacred orator should descend to the level and should accommodate his language to the weak understanding of the people.[13501] This is the doctrine of Muratori, who says that every one who preaches to the illiterate "ought to imagine that he is one of them, and that he wishes to teach and convince them of some truth." And therefore he says he is bound to adopt the most popular and lowest kind of eloquence, and to proportion his language to their gross understandings, by speaking to them in a familiar manner, using short sentences, and sometimes even proposing questions and giving the answers. The merit of such sermons consists in employing the language and figures which usually make an impression in common conversation.

St. Gregory deemed it unworthy of a preacher of the Gospel to confine himself to the rules of grammar, and therefore he says that in his sermons he frequently exposed himself to the imputation of ignorance, by uttering even barbarisms.[13502] In his exposition of the words of David, My bone is not hid from Thee, which Thou hast made in secret,[13503] St. Augustine, knowing that the word so signified either the mouth or a bone, used the barbarous word ossum to express the meaning of the prophet; for he preferred to be censured by grammarians rather than to be unintelligible to the people.[13504]

Such was the contempt of the saints for elegance of style when they spoke to the people. In the fourth book on the Christian Doctrine, the same Father says that the preacher should not be the servant of his words, and thus expose himself to the danger of not being understood; but he should employ the language best calculated to convey his meaning and to persuade his hearers.[13505] It is in this manner, as the prophet says, "bread is broken to the little ones." The little ones have asked for bread, and there was none to break it unto them.[13506] Hence the sermons of the missions and of the spiritual exercises produce so much fruit, because in them the bread of the divine word is minutely broken to the people.

I may be asked: Do you mean that all sermons should be composed in the same style as the sermons for the missions? In answer, I in the first place ask: What is understood by sermons for the missions? Is it a discourse composed of vulgar expressions, without order and without method? No: vulgar phrases are not necessary; they are not becoming even in familiar instructions, much less in sermons. Order is indispensable in all sermons. The art of oratory, and the occasional use of tropes and figures, are also necessary; and therefore you must have observed that, in the third part of the Selva,[13507] speaking of the style of preaching to be adopted in the missions, I have given a comprehensive abstract of rhetoric, for the instruction of the young men of our congregation. But the rules of rhetoric are, as Muratori says, suited even to popular eloquence, provided the preacher employ them, not to win applause, but to move his hearers to lead a Christian life. The art of oratory should, adds Muratori, be used, but only in such a way that it may not be perceived by the people.

There is no doubt that the sermons prepared for the missions should be more easy and simple, and less encumbered with Latin quotations, than other discourses. Some young missionaries fill their sermons with a confused medley of texts of Scripture, and long passages of the holy Fathers; but what profit can a poor illiterate peasant derive from so many Latin quotations, which he does not understand? Texts of Scripture serve to give authority to our instructions, but only when they are few, and explained in a manner proportioned to the capacity of our audience. One text well expounded, and accompanied with appropriate moral reflections, will be more profitable than many passages heaped together. An occasional passage from the holy Fathers is also very useful; but it should be short and forcible, and peculiarly applicable to the subject. Look at the sermons of that celebrated preacher, the Venerable Father Paul Segneri, and you will find that they contain few Latin passages, but a great many practical reflections and moral deductions.

The style to preaching in the missions must certainly be more simple and popular, that the poor may be persuaded and moved to virtue. The language should be plain and the periods concise, so that a person may understand any sentence without having heard or understood the preceding one, and that they who come to the church in the middle of the sermon may immediately understand what the preacher says. If the style of the sermon be close and connected, the illiterate, who have not heard the first period, will not understand the second, nor he third. Moreover, as Muratori well observes, in order to keep up the attention of the people it is necessary to make frequent use of the figure called Antiphora, by proposing questions and replying to them. With regard to the modulation of the voice, it is necessary to avoid the sonorous and inflated tones used in panegyric. We should also abstain from the violent efforts of the voice made by some missionaries, who expose themselves to the danger of bursting a bloodvessel, or at least of losing their voice, and at the same time disgust their audience. The best way to excite and fix the attention of the people is, to speak at one time in a loud, at another in a low, tone of voice, but without violent and sudden transitions; at one time to make a long exclamation, at another to pause and afterwards to begin with a sigh, etc. This variety of tone and manner keeps the audience always attentive.

The act of contrition is the most important part of sermons for the mission, and therefore in such sermons it should never be omitted; for little indeed would be the fruit of the sermon if the people are not excited to compunction, or not induced to resolve on a change of life. It is to effect this object that the act of contrition is proposed to them. It is even necessary to repeat several acts of sorrow, in order to move the people to contrition, not by loud exclamations, but by solid motives and reasons. In the purpose of amendment which accompanies the act of sorrow the preacher should recommend, in a particular manner, the people to avoid the occasions of sin, and to have recourse in their temptations to the assistance of Jesus and of Mary; and should therefore, at the end of the sermon, make them ask the divine Mother to obtain some favor for them, such as the pardon of sin, the gift of perseverance, and the like. These observations are particularly applicable to sermons for the missions; but I wished to insert them in this place, because they may be useful to some of those who are devoted to the missions.

Sermons for Lent, or for Sundays, should certainly differ somewhat from those that are prepared for the missions; but, where the audience consists of the ignorant and the learned, all sermons should, as Muratori says, be simple and popular, if the preacher wish to produce substantial fruit, and to induce the people to approach the tribunal of penance. I remember that when a celebrated missionary preached in Naples, in a simple and popular style, the churches were thronged, and the confessionals were surrounded by crowds, who, after the sermon, ran to confess their sins. Muratori says that in the small towns, and even in the churches of cities which are frequented by the common people, the preacher is obliged to adopt the most popular and even the lowest style, in order to accommodate himself to their gross understandings. I have seen a whole town sanctified by the Lenten sermons of those who addressed the people in simple and popular language.

Oh, what a pity to see so many Lenten sermons preached in the villages, and so little fruit! In the beginning of Lent the poor come to the sermons, but finding that they do not understand the preacher, and consequently derive no fruit from his instructions, they cease to frequent the church. I would entreat those who preach in the villages, that, if they will not consent to change the discourses which they have already composed in an elevated style, they will at least, towards the last weeks of Lent, after the people return from, give the spiritual exercises in the manner in which they are given during the missions. The laboring Poor cannot, particularly on working days, attend in the mornings at the hour at which the sermon is usually preached. I assure these preachers that they will reap more fruit from the spiritual exercises proposed in simple language, then from a hundred Lenten sermons. Some will excuse themselves from giving these exercises, saying that they are preachers, and not missionaries. Some are perhaps even ashamed to give these exercises in which a simple and popular style is indispensably necessary, lest their reputation might be injured, or lest they should be regarded as preachers of little note. But I am consoled by the conviction that not only priests, but also many religious, are accustomed during the Lent to give these exercises with so much advantage to the people.

Oh, what universal benefit would flow from the Sunday sermons if preachers always addressed the people in plain and simple language! At Naples the Holy Sacrament is exposed every day in several churches, in particularly in those in which the devotion of the Forty Hours is performed. These churches are frequented by great numbers of the faithful, but particularly of the poor. How great would be the fruit of the sermons preached in these churches if the sacred orators adopted a popular style, instructing the people in the practice of the different virtues, in the practical method of preparing for Communion, in the manner of visiting the Blessed Sacrament, of making mental prayer, of attending Mass, of meditating on the Passion of Jesus Christ, and of performing the other exercises of devotion? But are the discourses delivered in their churches of this description? No; the style is generally high and flowery, and therefore they are but little understood by the people. Father John d'Avila being once asked for a rule for preaching, answered, that the best rule for preaching well was to love Jesus Christ fervently. The answer was most just; for the preacher who loves Jesus Christ ascends the pulpit, not to gain applause, but to gain souls to Jesus Christ. St. Thomas of Villanova used to say that to pierce the heart of sinners, to effect their conversion, darts burning with divine love are necessary. But can darts of fire proceed from the frozen heart of the preacher who seeks by his preaching to acquire a great name?

Should we then conclude from this that whoever then preaches in a polished style does not love Jesus Christ? I do not mean to assert that; but I know well that the saints did not preach in that manner. In all the lives that I have read of holy missionaries I have not found any one of them commended because he preached in an elevated and ornate style; I find, on the contrary, those commended in a special manner who preached in a style simple and popular. Thus in truth did the holy apostle Paul teach us by his own example how to preach, saying: My reasoning consists not in the embellishments of human eloquence, but in making the people comprehend sincerely the truths of religion. [13508] "It was the task of the apostles," says Cornelius a Lapide, commenting on the text just cited, "to show how their spirit manifested the spirit of the divine mysteries so that others might receive the Holy Spirit through them."[13509]

It is said of St. Thomas of Aquin, by the author of his life, that "he accommodated himself to the capacity of his audience, lowering the wings of his genius, proposing simply such reflections as served to inflame the heart rather than feed the mind. For this purpose he used only such words as were most common and familiar, being accustomed to say: 'The language of the preacher should be so clear that the meanest capacity may understand it.'"[13510]

In the life of St. Vincent Ferrer we read that the saint composed his sermons, not on the model of discourses written in select and studied language, but at the foot of the crucifix; and from this source he derived his eloquence. P. Bartoli writes as follows, in his life of St. Ignatius of Loyola: "Where others seek to recommend the word of God by clothing it with ornaments, he, by divesting it of all such elegance, made it appear beautiful and grand; for his method was to reduce the arguments to a certain nudity which exhibited them in their true form and genuine character." And therefore the same P. Bartoli relates that the learned who heard him were wont to say: "That in his mouth the word of God had its true weight." The same practice was observed by St. Philip Neri, of whom I already mentioned, as it is written in his life, that he prescribed to the members of his Congregation, in preaching, to treat each subject in an easy and popular manner; and when they indulged in lofty and curious speculations he made them come down from the pulpit.

It is also mentioned of St. Francis de Sales, that when preaching he accommodated himself to the capacity of the rudest among his audience. The incident is well known which occurred to the Bishop of Belley. This prelate being invited by the saint to preach, delivered a very elegant and florid discourse, so that he received the highest applause from his auditors; but St. Francis was silent, and the prelate, surprised at this, asked him at last how he liked the sermon, the saint replied: "You pleased all but one." The Bishop of Belley was invited a second time to preach, but as he understood that his former discourse was not pleasing to the saint, because it was too highly embellished, he made the second quite simple and moral; and then St. Francis assured him that he was very much pleased with the second discourse. On another occasion he addressed to him the following words: "A sermon is excellent when the auditors retire from the church in silence, reflecting but not speaking; and instead of praising the preacher, think on the necessity they are under of amending their lives." And as the saint thought, so did he practise. The author of his life states, that although he preached in Paris before an auditory composed of princes, bishops, and Cardinals, he always preached in a solid, simple manner, not seeking to acquire the character of an eloquent preacher, but to gain souls to God. In conformity with this, the same saint wrote from Paris to a religious of his Order in the following terms: "On the vigil of the Nativity I preached in presence of the Queen in the Church of the Capuchins; but I assure you I did not preach better before so many princes and princesses than I do in your poor little convent at Annecy." But because the saint preached from the heart and to draw souls to God, although he preached without ornament, the fruit he produced was immense; wherefore Madame de Montpensier said, as we find it related in the life of the saint: "Others in their sermons fly, as it were, in the air; but the Bishop of Geneva descends to his prey, and this orator of holy love suddenly besieges the heart, and makes himself master of it."

I shall relate in the sequel what the saint wrote in one of his letters, concerning the manner of preaching, and what he thought of those preachers who employ frivolous ornament in their discourses. It is mentioned in the life of St. Vincent de Paul that in his sermons he used not only a simple, but even an humble style. Above all, he required of his brethren that they should preach to the candidates for orders in a simple and familiar manner; because it is not, he said, pomp of expression that is conducive to the salvation of souls, but simplicity and humility, which dispose the heart to receive the grace of God. And for this purpose he was accustomed to adduce the example of Jesus Christ, who although he could have explained the mysteries of faith in a style proportioned to their sublimity, he being the wisdom of the eternal Father, nevertheless made use of familiar terms and similitudes, to accommodate himself to the capacity of the people, and to leave to us the true model of explaining the word of God. Of St. Francis Regis it is likewise written in his life, "that he explained the truths of faith with such clearness and simplicity, that he made himself intelligible to the meanest capacity."

The case of Father Tauler, the Dominican, is also well known. He preached at first in a very lofty style, but being afterwards led to embrace a more perfect life, by means of a poor man who was sent him by God as his spiritual guide, he ceased to preach for many years; but the poor man having enjoined him to resume this function, he changed his style of preaching from the sublime to the popular; and we are told that in the first sermon he preached the compunction of the people was such that several swooned away in the church. We are told of Father John d'Avila, that in his sermons he used such familiar language that by some he was considered to be an ignorant person; so that once a certain individual, who was a man of letters, but of depraved morals, said to his companion, 0n an occasion when Father d'Avila was to preach, "Come, let us go hear this ignoramus;" but during the sermon he was struck by the grace of God and he totally reformed his life. Now let us hear the sentiments of this great servant of God. According to the author of his life, he said: "If the preacher does not faithfully fulfil his office, if he is attentive rather to gratify the taste of his auditors than touch their hearts, and seeks for fine words rather than the conversion of souls; in fine, if by loftiness of thought he preaches himself rather than Jesus Christ, he stands in imminent danger of eternal ruin; he frightfully abuses and betrays the commission confided to him." The same we find written in the life of Father Louis Lanusa, and of Father Paul Segneri, junior, and of other servants of God, particular mention of whom for brevity's sake I omit.

Hence we see the account that these preachers will have to render to God, who preach themselves and not Jesus Christ, as well as the Superiors who allow them to preach in this manner. For myself, once hearing a young man of our Congregation preaching in a grand and elevated style, I made him leave the pulpit in the middle of his discourse. But let them not entertain a doubt that, if they are not corrected by their Superiors, they will be assuredly chastised by God; for the preacher is bound to promote the good of each person who hears him, as in the pulpit he fulfils the office of ambassador of Jesus Christ, as the Apostle affirms of all priests: He hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation, . . . He hath placed in us the word of reconciliation. . . . For Christ therefore we are ambassador, God as it wer e exhorting by us.[13511] The preacher then occupies in the pulpit the place of Jesus Christ, and speaks on the part of Jesus Christ to sinners who hear him, in order that they may return into favor with God. Now if a king, as Father John d'Avila observes in one of his letters, commissioned one of his subjects to negotiate a marriage with a lady on his behalf, and the ambassador concluded it for himself, would not such a man be a traitor? And such exactly, said Father d'Avila, is the preacher who, commissioned by God to effect the conversion of sinners, studies to procure glory for himself, and thus renders the divine word useless, by adulterating it so that it produces no fruit. And thus does St. John Chrysostom also denominate every preacher who preaches from vanity—"A miserable and unhappy traitor."[13512]

The embellishment of a sermon with lofty sentiments and elaborate expression, to gain a character for one's self, is precisely that adulteration of the word of God which the Apostle avoided; as he writes to the Corinthians: For we are not as many, adulterating the word of God, but with sincerity, but as from God, before God, in Christ we speak.[13513] On which words St. Gregory observes, that adulterers are not desirous to have children: on the contrary, they abhor them; they propose to themselves nothing else but the gratification of their unlawful passions: such are those who do not preach to gain souls, but to acquire a name and reputation.[13514]

But let preachers tremble lest God should cut them off, as he threatens by the prophet Jeremias: Therefore, behold, I am against the prophets, saith the Lord, who steal my words every one from his neighbor.[13515] Who are they who unjustly employ the divine word? They are precisely those who make use of it only to acquire the name of great orators, robbing God of his glory to transfer it to themselves. St. Francis de Sales said that the preacher whose discourses abound in foliage, that is, curious thoughts and elegant expressions, is in danger of being cut down and consigned to the fire, like to the unfruitful tree in the Gospel; whilst our Lord said to his disciples, and through them to all priests, that he had chosen them to bring forth fruit—lasting fruit. Hence Cornelius a Lapide, speaking of such orators, hesitates not to assert that they sin mortally, both because they pervert the office of preaching to their own exaltation, and also because by preaching in a lofty and elegant style they oppose an obstacle to the salvation of so many souls that would be converted if they preached in an apostolic manner.[13516] The same was said by Father John d'Avila, as we have remarked above: "If the preacher do not faithfully fulfil his office," etc.

Nor does it avail such a person to say: What I principally propose is the glory of God. He who makes use of lofty and uncommon language, so as not to be understood by all, opposes an obstacle to the glory of God, by preventing the conversion of many who hear him, since, as Muratori well remarks, whoever preaches is bound to procure the salvation of each individual, be he learned or ignorant, as if there were no other who heard him. And if any one of them be not converted, because he could not comprehend what was said, the preacher will have to render an account, as God himself declared by the mouth of Ezechiel (this all preachers are sufficiently aware of, but in practice they attend but little to it; hence I repeat it here): If when I say to the wicked: Thou shalt surely die; thou declare it not to him, . . . the same wicked man shall die in his iniquity, but I will require his blood at thy hand.[13517] And undoubtedly it is the same not to preach the word of God, as to adulterate it by a florid style, so that it does not produce the fruit that it certainly would if it were expounded in a clear and simple manner. St. Bernard says that on the day of judgment those poor ignorant persons will appear to arraign those preachers who have lived on their bounty, but have neglected to heal, as they ought, the diseases of their souls.[13518]

We should be persuaded that when the word of God is adulterated by studied elegance of expression it becomes feeble and enervated, so as not to be of any service either to the learned or unlearned. I do not assert this of myself: it is stated by St. Prosper, or, if you will, another ancient author who goes under his name.[13519] And this sentiment he borrowed from St. Paul, who writes as follows: Christ sent me . . . to preach the Gospel, not in wisdom of speech, lest the cross of Christ should be made void.[13520] On which text St. John Chrysostom observes: "Some devote themselves to external wisdom: the Apostle shows that this wisdom does not only aid the cross, but it even annihilates it."[13521] Lofty conceptions, then, and elaborate expression in sermons hinder and, as it were, annihilate the spiritual profit of souls, which is the fruit of the redemption of Jesus Christ. Hence St. Augustine said: "I should not presume to employ wisdom of speech, lest the cross of Christ become enervated; satisfied with the authority of the divine word, I would rather serve the simplicity of the Gospel than vanity."[13522]

St. Thomas of Villanova inveighs against those hearers who, whilst their souls are lost in sin, go in quest of flowery discourses. "O fool," he says, "thy house is burning, and thou expectest artificial discourse!"[13523] But this reproof is better directed to those preachers who address a congregation of which probably there are many in a state of sin: these miserable souls require rather the thunder and lightning which would arouse them from their lethargy, and strike them with terror, and for this purpose are required words not borrowed from the academy, but springing from the heart and from a true zeal and desire to rescue them from the hands of the enemy, and yet we would amuse them with polished phrases and sounding periods. If a house were on fire, what folly would it be, says Father Mansi,[13524] to attempt to extinguish it with a little rose-water. Thus, when I hear any one praised who preaches with studied elegance, and hear it said that his sermons have produced great fruit, I smile, and say: It is impossible; and why? because I know that God does not lend his co-operation to such preaching. My preaching, says the Apostle, was not in the persuasive words of human wisdom, but in shewing of the spirit and power.[13525] "To what purpose, says Origen, commenting on the text cited above, "does all our eloquence serve if it be not animated by the spirit and virtue of divine grace?[13526] The Lord lends his aid to him who preaches his word in a plain and simple manner, without vanity, imparting a force and power to his language that moves the hearts of all who hear him. But this efficacy he does not communicate to studied and polished expression. The diction that is refined and adorned according to the dictates of human wisdom, says the Apostle, as we have before observed, enervates the divine word, and destroys the profit which might be expected from it.

Oh, what a fearful account will those priests have to render to God who preach through vanity! St. Bridget[13527] saw the soul of a preacher, who was a religious, condemned to hell for having preached in this spirit; and the Lord said to the saint that he does not speak by vain preachers, but rather the devil. In discoursing one day with that great missionary, Father Sparano, mentioned above, he related to me an awful occurrence. He told me that a certain priest who preached in a polished style, being at the point of death, and feeling a great aridity and indisposition to conceive a hearty sorrow for his sins, almost despaired of his salvation; and then the Lord spoke to him from a crucifix near him, in a voice which was also heard by all present: "I give you that compunction which you excited in the hearts of others when you preached." But more terrible is the circumstance related by Father Cajetan Mary de Bergamo, a Capuchin, in his book entitled The Apostolic Man in the Pulpit. This author relates that a preacher, then a Capuchin, related to him the following occurrence, which happened to himself a few years before. He being a young man and accomplished in polite literature, had already begun to preach in the cathedral at Brescia; but when preaching there a second time, after an interval of some years, he was observed to preach quite in an apostolic manner. Being afterwards asked why he had thus changed his style of preaching, he replied: "I knew a celebrated preacher, a religious, a friend of mine, and who, like me, preached in a spirit of vanity; when he was at the point of death it was found impossible to induce him to make his confession. I went to see him, and spoke to him strongly; but he looked at me steadfastly without making a reply. In the mean time the Superior conceived the idea of bringing to him in his cell the Blessed Eucharist, in order to move him by this means to receive the sacraments. The most Holy Eucharist was brought, and those who were present said to him: 'Behold, Jesus Christ is come to grant you pardon.' But the sick man began to exclaim in a voice of despair: 'This is the God whose holy word I have betrayed.' We all then commenced to pray to the Lord that he would have compassion 0n him, or to exhort him to confide in the divine mercy; but he in a louder voice exclaimed: 'This is the God whose holy word I have betrayed;' and then added: 'There is n0 more mercy for me.' We continued to suggest to him sentiments of confidence, when a third time he cried out: 'This is the God whose holy word I have betrayed;' and then he said, 'By the just judgment of God I am condemned,' and suddenly expired. And this is the reason, observed this Father, why I have so much reformed my manner of preaching."

Wh0 knows but some one will smile at those facts, and the whole of my letter; but such a one I shall expect to meet before the tribunal of Jesus Christ. Besides, I do not intend that at all times and before all sorts of persons the same style of expression should be used. When the audience is composed entirely of priests or educated persons, the preacher should make use of more select language; but his discourse should be always simple and familiar, as if he were discoursing in familiar conversation with the learned, and not decorated with lofty ideas and elaborate expressions; otherwise, the more florid the discourse, the less will be the fruit derived from it," says St. Ambrose.[13528] The pomp and luxury which appear in the flowers of eloquence make it useless for the production of fruit. St. Augustine said that the preacher who seeks to please his auditors by an ornamental style is not an apostle that converts, but an orator that deludes; whence it may be said of his hearers what is said of the Jews, who, hearing Jesus Christ, admired his doctrine, but were not converted.[13529] They will exclaim, "He spoke extremely well;" but they will have derived no profit whatever from the discourse. St. Jerome wrote to his friend Nepotianus that in preaching he should endeavor to elicit tears rather than applause from his auditory.[13530] St. Francis de Sales expresses the same idea in a more emphatic manner in a letter to an ecclesiastic: "In leaving the church I would not wish it should be said, O how great an orator! he has a prodigious memory; he is very learned; he spoke admirably: but I would wish to hear the hearers say, How beautiful, how necessary is penance! My God, how good, how just Thou art! and the like: or that the words of the preacher having made a breach in the hearts of the hearers, they were unable to render any testimony in favor of their merit but the amendment of their lives."[13531]

Perhaps the preacher who studies to speak elegantly may entertain a hope that he will obtain universal applause: let him divest himself of this persuasion. Many will praise, many will criticise him; some will offer one opinion, some another. And such is the folly of those orators who preach themselves and not Jesus Christ that, with all their efforts to obtain a vain appplause, they do not, notwithstanding, obtain it from all; whilst, on the other hand, he who preaches Christ crucified always secures the fruit of his discourse, as by it he pleases God, which should be the only end of all our actions. Hence generally a simple and familiar style of preaching, as Muratori remarks, "will please and delight even persons of cultivated understandings; for, when the preacher speaks in a lofty and florid style, the hearer then is satisfied with relishing and admiring his genius, and pays little or no attention to his own spiritual profit; on the other hand, even the learned commend a preacher who, with a view to benefit all, breaks for them that spiritual bread—the word of God. They will not praise his genius, but his fervor; by which, without making a display of talent, he proposes solely to serve the souls of his hearers—this is the true glory to which the sacred orator ought to aspire. Moreover, the learned who desire to derive fruit from the sermon seek not him who enlightens their minds, but him who heals their souls; and on this account both learned and unlearned crowd to hear him who preaches in a popular manner, because every one finds there the spiritual nourishment that is necessary for him."

Seneca says that the sick man does not seek for the physician who speaks well, but who will cure him. To what purpose does it serve, he says, for you to entertain me with fine words when I stand in need of the cautery and the knife to cure me.[13532] Wherefore St. Bernard says: "I like to hear the voice of that teacher who seeks to gain of me, not applause, but tears."[13533] I recollect that the renowned D. Nicholas Capasso, a man so distinguished for learning, went every day to hear the Canon Gizzio whilst he was giving the spiritual exercises to the members of the Congregation of the Holy Ghost; he said that he went to hear that servant of God because he preached the word of God in an apostolic manner, and without studied elegance. Oh how does the pure and simple word of God please even the learned! Muratori relates in the life of Paul Segneri the younger, which he wrote, that, although he preached in a familiar and popular style, he delighted all so much that he touched the hearts even of the most enlightened among his audience.

In like manner, in the life[13534] of St. John Francis Regis I find the following passage: "His discourses were simple: he preached only to instruct the people; and, notwithstanding, the gentry as well as seculars and clergy of the town of Puy crowded to his catechetical discourses so eagerly that for two or three hours before he began every place was occupied; and it was the common saying of the inhabitants of Puy that they admired more his holy simplicity than the studied elegance of the most distinguished preachers. He, they observed, preaches Jesus Christ and the divine word as it really is; while the others come here to preach themselves, and, instead of the divine word, display their own eloquence, which is altogether human." And the following fact, which is afterwards mentioned, is remarkable: There was a certain preacher who gave a series of instructions in the cathedral during the same Lent in which the saint was giving a mission. Being astonished how it was that the people left him to go hear an ignorant priest, as he considered St. Francis compared with himself, he went to find the Provincial, who at that time was making his visitation, and said to him that Father Regis was indeed a saint, but that his manner of preaching was not suitable to the dignity of the pulpit, and that the meanness of his style and the trivial things he said dishonored his ministry. The Provincial replied: "Let us both, before we condemn him, go and hear him." The Provincial was so much affected with the force and unction with which he explained the evangelical truths, that during the entire discourse he was shedding copious tears; then, on leaving the church, turning to his companion, he said, "Ah, my Father, would to God that all sacred orators preached in that manner! Let us allow him to preach with his own apostolic simplicity—the finger of God is there." The same preacher, says the writer of his life, was touched with such compunction in hearing the discourse, that instead of censuring him, as he had proposed, he even praised him as he deserved.

Let us now say something of panegyrics, as we promised. Why, I ask, do panegyrics, as they are composed nowadays, produce no fruit? How fruitful would they be were they delivered with simplicity, detailing with devout reflections the virtues of the saints; thus would the people be moved to imitate their example. This undoubtedly is the object of panegyrics, and hence the masters of the spiritual life recommend strongly the reading of the lives of the saints. Therefore St. Philip Neri, as the writer of his life relates, recommended the members of his Congregation to adduce, in preaching, some example from the life of a saint, in order that the doctrine might be more firmly impressed on the minds of the hearers; but he wished that such facts should be mentioned as would move the auditors to compunction rather than excite their wonder. Father John Dielegis, who wrote on the manner of composing panegyrics, says that panegyrics do not produce fruit through the fault of the auditors who come to hear the discourse, not to derive any benefit from it, but to listen to exquisite thoughts and an elegant discourse; but he would have said with more truth, that the fault is generally imputable to orators who fill their discourses with conceits and affected language, for the purpose of obtaining empty praise, when their only object should be, as the same author observes, to move their hearers to the imitation of the virtues of the saints of whom they speak. But let us hear what Muratori says on modern panegyrics. In his work already cited, On Modern Eloquence, in the 13th chapter, he writes thus: "Why do sacred orators for the most part heap together gems and flowers, and make a parade of their eloquence? The end of panegyrics is to lead the auditory, by such examples, to the practice of virtue; but few indeed think of this. Good God! how many extravagant hyperboles! how many fantastic ideas! in a word, how many silly conceits!"

And in truth, what fruit can be derived from the panegyrics of certain learned preachers, who fill them with flowers, subtleties, ingenious thoughts, curious descriptions, high-sounding words, unintelligible to persons of ordinary capacity, rounded periods, so long that, to comprehend their meaning, even the learned require to exert all the powers of their minds, so that they nearly resemble academical discourses, in which his own glory is the only object of the speaker. O God! what a disorder to see a minister of Jesus Christ expend uselessly many months and much labor (one of this class of preachers, who is now in eternity, said, that to compose a panegyric he required at least six months), and for what purpose?—to round periods, and heap together figures and flowers. And what profit does the orator derive from this either for himself or for others? For himself, nothing but a little smoke; and as for the hearers, they derive from it nothing, or almost nothing, because either they do not understand it, or, it they do, their attention is distracted by those sounding words and ingenious thoughts; and thus they lose their time. It has been related to me by several persons deserving of credit, that the preacher mentioned above, who said that to compose one panegyric he required six months, being at the point of death, gave directions that all his manuscripts should be burned. I was moreover assured that this same person, being once complimented by others for his panegyrics, was much troubled, and replied: "Alas! these discourses will be one day my condemnation."

Muratori, in a work entitled Christian Charity, writes as follows: "Oh, why have we so many panegyrics, which invariably terminate in a vain display of talent and ingenious subtleties, devised by volatile imaginations, unintelligible to the people?" And then he adds: "Let a panegyric, if intended to be useful, be composed in that popular and intelligible style of eloquence which instructs and moves the ignorant no less than the learned; but this is oftentimes not understood by him who fancies himself more learned than others." Oh! that these frothy panegyrics were abolished in the Church, and that these discourses were composed in a simple and familiar manner, as this writer says, who was eminent at once for piety and learning.

But, before I conclude, it is necessary that I should reply to the observation which your letter contains—that to entertain is one of the principal objects of the orator, and therefore, when persons of education assist at a sermon, the preacher should speak in a polished and ornamental style in order to please them.

Reverend Father, I will not reply to you: St. Francis de Sales answers for me, who, in the letter already cited, which he addresses to an ecclesiastic on the manner of preaching, in confirmation of all we have advanced above in the fifth chapter, writes as follows: "Lengthened periods, polished language, studied gesture, and the like, are the bane of preaching. The most useful and elegant artifice is, to employ none. Our words should be inflamed by an interior charity, and should come from the heart rather than the mouth: the heart speaks to the heart; the tongue speaks but to the ear. The texture of the discourse should be natural, without vain ornament, without affected expression. Our forefathers, and all those whose preaching has brought forth fruit, have abstained from speaking with too much elegance, and from using the ornaments of worldly eloquence, because they spoke from the heart, as good parents do to their children. The object of the preacher is to convert sinners and to make the just perfect; whence, ascending the pulpit, he should say in his heart: Ego veni ut isti vitam habeant et abundantius habeant."[13535] Then the saint, speaking of the pleasure the preacher should afford, uses the following words: "I know that many say the preacher should delight; but as for me, I distinguish, and say, that there is a pleasure consequent on the doctrine which is preached and the impression made upon the hearers; for what soul is so insensible as not to feel extreme pleasure in learning the way to heaven; how to gain Paradise; in comprehending the love which God bears us? And, in order to impart this pleasure, all diligence should be used to instruct and to move. But there is another sort of pleasure which oftentimes is an obstacle to instruction and to persuasion—a tickling of the ear by a profane elegance of language and a certain balancing of words, which is altogether artificial. And as to this, I say without hesitation, that a preacher should not make use of it, because it belongs to profane orators; and whosoever preaches in this manner preaches not Christ crucified, but himself. St. Paul detests preachers who are prurientes auribus, and consequently such as are solicitous to please their hearers.[13536] So far the saint: and let it be observed, that the writings of this saint are, in a special manner, approved and adopted by the Church, which prays that by their guidance we may arrive at eternal happiness.[13537] Such is the prayer we recite in the Office of the saint.

In conformity with this, the learned theologian Habert, speaking of the style which the ministers of the Gospel should adopt in preaching, says that the preacher then should endeavor to please, by a style clear, easy, and accommodated to the capacity of each of his auditors.[13538] Then the audience will be gratified, as St. Francis de Sales observes, by understanding the eternal truths, the maxims of the Gospel, and by knowing what they have to do, or to avoid, in order to be saved; they will be pleased whilst they feel themselves touched with compunction, animated with confidence, and inflamed with the love of God.

St. Augustine says that if the pleasures of sense delight, much more delightful is the knowledge of the truth; and hence, he adds, there is nothing which the soul so ardently desires as to know the truth.[13539] Agreeably to this, St. Francis observes, in his treatise on the love of God: "Truth is the object of the understanding, and hence it finds all its pleasure in knowing the truth; and the more sublime it is, the greater its gratification: whence the ancient philosophers abandoned riches, honors, and pleasures, that they might understand the truths of nature. And Aristotle said that human felicity consists in wisdom; that is, in knowing the truth of the most excellent things."[13540] Hence the saint concludes, that a soul cannot enjoy greater delight than in acquiring a knowledge of the truths of faith; the more as the knowledge of them is not only a source of pleasure to us, but also eminently useful, as upon them depends all our happiness for time and eternity.

Wherefore St. Antoninus says that the preacher ought indeed to delight his audience; but for what end? In order that, being moved by the discourse they may be induced to practise what they have learned.[13541] On the other hand, St. John Chrysostom affirms that the ruin of the Church is the great eagerness of sacred orators, not to move their hearers to compunction, but to please them with fine words; as if they came to hear a singer chant a piece of sacred music in the pulpit. "Such preachers," continues the saint, "act like a father who gives to his sick child what it wants. Such a one, however, does not deserve the name of father. This happens every time that one seeks flowery language, not to inspire compunction, but to win vain praise."[13542] Yes, reverend Sir, there are many sacred orators who delight their auditory by their elegant and pompous diction, and attract crowds to their sermons. But I would wish to know how many of those who are so highly pleased with their discourses, full of elegance and ornament, leave the church with a contrite heart, and afterwards amend their lives. Such precisely was the language of St. Francis when mention was made before him of preachers who had obtained great applause. "Be so good as to tell me," he would say, "how many were converted by their preaching." The accursed passion for display spoils the sermons of many preachers, and destroys the fruit of them for those who hear him. This made St. Vincent de Paul exclaim, as we read in his life: "O cursed ambition of display! how many virtues do you infect! of how many evils are you the cause! You make him who should preach Jesus Christ, preach himself, and destroy when he should save."[13543]

Some, in order to entertain the audience, ornament, or rather disfigure, their sermons with witticisms and ridiculous anecdotes, and even go so far as to say that this is necessary in instructions or catechetical discourses addressed to the people, in order to excite and keep alive their attention and interest. But I know that the saints in their sermons did not make the people laugh, but weep. When St. John Francis Regis preached (and his sermons were always familiar) the audience wept from the beginning to the end of the discourse. A facetious remark, naturally suggested by the occasion, may perhaps be allowed; but to reduce the exhortation to a comic scene, as some do, by introducing ridiculous trifles or curious stories, with attitudes and gestures designed to make the audience laugh—I do not know how they can reconcile such an exhibition with the respect due to the temple of God, and to the pulpit from which is announced the word of God, and in which the preacher fulfils the office of ambassador of Jesus Christ. The auditors indeed will laugh and be merry but afterwards they will be distracted and indevout, and instead of attending to the moral instruction, will continue to reflect upon the witticism or ridiculous story which they have heard.

From all I have written, your Reverence will be able to infer what surprise the assertion contained in your letter caused me, that the preacher should delight his auditory by a polished and ornamented style. I hope in the Lord that you will remove from your mind this prejudice, this grievous error, hurtful to your own soul, and to all those that will assist at your instructions.

And as your Reverence is so very humble as to condescend, towards the close of your letter, to ask of an unworthy sinner some instructions for preaching with advantage to the people, I recommend you for the most part, in your sermons to speak of the last things—death, judgment, hell, eternity, and the like; because the eternal truths make the deepest impression, and incline the heart to the love of virtue. I beg of you, repeatedly in your discourses to explain to the people the peace enjoyed by the soul that is in favor with God. St. Francis de Sales by this means drew away many souls from a vicious life, and on that account Henry IV., King of France, commended him much, blaming other preachers who make the way of virtue appear so difficult that they deter souls from entering upon it. I entreat you also to speak often of the love that Jesus Christ has shown us in his Passion, in the institution of the most Holy Sacrament, and of the love we should bear in turn towards our most blessed Redeemer, by often calling to mind those two great mysteries of love. I say this because few preachers, or at least too few, speak of the love of Jesus Christ; and it is certain that what is done solely through fear of punishment and not through love will be of short duration. A great servant of God, and a great laborer in the vineyard of the Lord, Father Gennaro Sarnelli, used to say: "I would wish to do nothing else but proclaim without ceasing: love Jesus Christ, love Jesus Christ, because he is deserving of your love." In like manner often recommend, in preaching, devotior to the most Holy Virgin, through whose intercession all graces come to us, by making the people have recourse to her at the end of the discourse to obtain some special grace, as the forgiveness of their sins, holy perseverance, and the love of Jesus Christ. Above all, I beg of you to give practical advice to your audience, by suggesting the means of persevering in the grace of God, such as to guard the eyes from looking at dangerous objects, to fly evil occasion—from conversing with persons of a different sex or vicious companions; to frequent the sacraments; to hear Mass every day; to enter into some pious sodality, to practise mental prayer, instructing them at the same time practically in the manner of making it; to read spiritual books; to visit the most Holy Sacrament; to make the examination of conscience; to recite the Rosary of the Blessed Virgin Mary. You should often inculcate conformity to the divine will amidst contradictions, as upon this conformity our perfection and salvation depend. Exhort them particularly to have recourse each day to Jesus and Mary, to obtain holy perseverance, and in particular, in the time of temptation; and I strenuously recommend you constantly to suggest to the people that great means of salvation, prayer—a subject which I remark preachers treat very seldom, and very slightly, although upon prayer depend our eternal salvation and all our good.

I am aware that speaking upon such practical subjects has little attraction for those preachers who aim at loftiness of speech, because they appear to them to be trivial matters, and they do not admit of ingenious thoughts and sounding periods. But it was thus St. Francis de Sales preached, who converted by his sermons innumerable souls: he always enforced the practices of a Christian life, so that in one country district the people desired to have in writing the practical rules which he recommended from the pulpit, that they might be the better able to put them in practice.

Oh, if all sacred orators preached solely with the view of pleasing God, in an easy and popular style, and discoursed on the truths and the maxims of the Gospel, in a manner plain, simple, and unadorned, and enforced practically the remedies against sins, and the means of persevering and of advancing in the divine love, the world would change its face, and God would not be offended as we now see him. We may remark, that the country parish in which there is a fervent priest, who truly preaches Christ crucified, is soon reclaimed and sanctified. I say, moreover, if a pious and simple discourse is delivered in a church the whole auditory is touched with compunction, and if they are not all converted, they are at least moved and affected; if such a style of preaching, then, were universal, what advantage would we see universally accrue to souls!

I will trespass on you no longer; but as you had the patience to read this long letter, I beg of you to join me in the following prayer to Jesus Christ:

O Saviour of the world, who art little known and loved less by the world, especially through the fault of Thy ministers; Thou who didst give up Thy life for the salvation of souls,—I beseech Thee through the merits of Thy Passion to enlighten and inflame so many priests who might convert sinners, and sanctify the entire earth if they preached Thy word with humility and simplicity, as Thou and Thy disciples preached it. But, alas! they do not do so; they preach themselves, and not Thee: and thus the world is full of preachers, and in the mean time hell is constantly crowded with souls. O Lord, repair this mighty ruin which preachers cause in Thy Church; and if it be necessary, humble, I pray Thee, as an example to others, by some visible sign, those priests who for their own glory adulterate Thy holy word, that they may amend, and that they may not thus obstruct the spiritual profit of the people. Thus I hope, thus I pray.

I recommend myself to your prayers, and remain your Reverence's most devoted and obliged servant,

ALPHONSUS M.,

Bishop of S. Agatha, ect.

Refutation OF A FRENCH BOOK ENTITLED "ON PREACHING, BY THE AUTHOR OF THE PHILOSOPHICAL DICTIONARY."[13544]

1. EXPOSITION OF THE AUTHOR'S IDEAS

While the last pages of the present work (The Truth of Faith) were being printed, this book fell into my hands. By appearing as a new production by the author, who wrote the Philosophical Dictionary, which has already been condemned everywhere, it announces for this very reason a suspicious doctrine. In fact, I have found therein several unsound propositions, and even an impious proposition, which is clearly opposed to holy Scripture.

Moreover, on seeing the title of the work, On Preaching, one would have thought that it treated of the utility and even of the necessity there is in this world of preaching to the people in order to enlighten them, because in consequence of sin and the corruption of their nature they are enveloped in darkness, and naturally inclined, not to what is good and virtuous, as the author wishes, but to evil and to vices. Now this is not the case: the end of the work is to discredit preaching, by representing it as entirely useless for the reformation of morals.

I do not wish to quote here all that the author says: I shall give only a short sketch of it, to make the reader understand what the book contains.

The author distinguishes the conversion of the mind from that of the heart, and says that preaching can bring about the conversion of the mind, but not that of the heart; that is, it may effect a change of religion, but not a change of morals. And here is the way in which he pretends to prove this:

He says that preaching began when men united to live together in society. Cain, he says, having built the first city, which he called Henoch, and this city having become peopled with a race as wicked as himself, Enos preached against vice, but without success. Then came Henoch, who added threats, but his preaching was just as fruitless, or rather, it became injurious; for the faithful, by mingling with the Gentiles to convert them to the worship of the true God, married their daughters, and thus the corruption extended throughout the world.

He continues by saying that the Lord, seeing the whole world corrupted by sin, ordered Noe to inform men of the near approach of the deluge; and Noe in the presence of the Ark, which he had begun to build, preached against vice; but all this was useless, so that God was obliged to submerge the world; and so it happened.

After the deluge generations multiplied again, and there were two empires—that of Babylon and that of Ninive. Noe continued to preach, and did so with more force recalling to people's minds the chastisement that had been administered. The prophets afterwards preached; but the people, instead of amending, added new crimes to their old ones in such a manner that the manner that the Lord sent fire from heaven, which consumed five cities.

After the coming of the Messias St. John the Baptist preached penance; but how many persons practised it?

Jesus Christ himself preached, and gathered together only a small number of disciples, who after his death were dispersed and began to preach throughout the world; but they ended by being put to death in different countries by those very men to whom they had preached.

Thus speaks the author, and then adds:

Under the reign of Constantine the Gospel began to be preached everywhere; many people embraced the faith, but did not renounce vice: they thus changed their religion without changing their manners. Preaching was much more multiplied in the 12th century, thanks to the zeal of the children of St. Francis and of St. Dominic. Then came the children of St. Ignatius, and many other new religious, who filled the Church with preachers; and notwithstanding all this, the world found itself more than before filled with vice and wickedness. What means can we therefore employ in order to effect a reform of morals, since so far preaching has always been ineffectual?

The author, arriving at his conclusion, says that the preacher who is really capable of reforming the world is a good government, which rewards the virtuous and punishes the wicked. Preachers, he says, preach about eternal goods and eternal evils, as faith teaches them; but these future goods and evils are far off, and make little or no impression, because men are more touched by what they see than by what they hear. The author then suggests different ways of extirpating vices.

This is what he first proposes: 1. To the fathers of families should be left, as was given by Romulus and Remus, the absolute power of chastising at their will their own children, except that they should not be allowed to sell or kill them, as was allowed to the Romans; 2. The husbands should be the judges of their wives; 3. The masters should have over their servants the authority that generals have over their soldiers.

But his principal project is to establish in every city or village a censor, who should be charged with presiding over the families; then to establish a college of twelve censors from the nearest places, forming a distinct tribunal of the tribunals of justice. This tribunal would have to chastise the vices that magistrates are not charged with punishing, and to reward the virtues that have not received the reward that they deserve. After this he makes an attack upon the author of the Spirit of the Laws, who had said that a monarchical government remedies all things, and replies to him that the universe is an altogether too convenient a censor, since it leaves vices without punishment and virtues without reward.

2. REFUTATION

What displeases me above all in these projects is, that the author, in order to induce people to live well, speaks only of human means, and does not even mention the necessity of divine grace, without which all human forces can certainly do nothing for the conversion of hearts. Human governments in punishing bad subjects and in rewarding the good only serve, without divine grace, to make Pharisees, who outwardly appear to be saints, but inwardly are filled with vice. It is grace only that is successful in reforming hearts; hence the Church teaches us to pray thus: Tua nos quaesumus, Domine, gratia semper et praeveniat et sequatur, ac bonis operibus jugiter praestet esse intentos—(Let Thy grace, we beseech Thee, O Lord, ever precede and follow us, and make us continually intent upon good works). Now holy preaching, of which I will afterward speak, serves to make us know the necessity of grace, and at the same time the necessity of prayer in order to obtain grace.

As regards the second part of this book, which refers to civil government, it is not my business to discuss it; for it is not a subject about which I am concerned. I only say that if this college of censors, which the author proposes should depend on a higher authority, I would leave it to this latter authority, as belonging to it, the right of determining whether or not it is expedient to establish a tribunal of this kind; for, on the one hand, it seems that it can be made useful, but on the other hand the greatest inconveniences would result therefrom. If, on the contrary, one should wish to make it independent by establishing a democratic regime instead of a monarchical government, it would be in opposition to the common opinion of wise men, all of whom hold that the monarchical government is better and more suited to preserve harmony in society.

But let us return to the first part concerning preaching, which is of particular interest to me: the author declares it to be useless for the reformation of morals.

If he wishes to speak of vain and ornate preaching, as he really speaks of it in some parts of his book, he is right, and I agree with him; for I myself have published a little work in which I have proved that preachers who in their discourses seek their own glory, and not the glory of God, are, as far as the public are concerned, not only useless, but are often even pernicious; since most of the hearers being illiterate people, these discourses, which they do not understand, only cause them tediousness, and they go with disgust to hear the word of God. For myself, I say that if the divine word were not altered, if it were preached in its purity and in a simple manner, every one would become a saint. Very severe will therefore be the account that will have to be rendered to God by those priests who profane holy preaching by a lofty and pompous style, beyond the capacity of the people, causing thereby the loss of so many souls. We should read what is said about this matter by Muratori in his golden book entitled Popular Eloquence.

In short, if the author means this kind of vain preaching, he is right when he says that it cannot be conducive to the amendment of bad morals; but if lie speaks in general, as he really does, of holy preaching, I say that his thesis is not only most false, but it is, moreover, pernicious and impious, since it is contrary to holy Scripture.

Holy Scripture teaches us that good morals, like faith, are propagated and cultivated by preaching. Jesus Christ has declared that to save men his Passion alone was not sufficient, but that preaching was also necessary in order that men might do penance for their sins and amend their lives: And thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise again from the dead on the third day : and that penance and remission of sins should be preached in His name unto all nations.[13545] For this reason, therefore, he commanded his disciples to go out into the whole world, to teach not only the mysteries that men should believe, but also the commandments that they should keep: Go ye into the whole world, and preach the Gospel to every creature.[13546] Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you.[13547] In obedience to this command the apostles preached, and their preaching produced fruit in the entire world, as is testified by St. Paul: In the word of the truth of the Gospel, which is come unto you, as also it is in the whole world, and bringeth forth fruit and groweth, even as it doth in you, since the day you heard it.[13548] And this came to pass because the Lord co-operated in making successful their zeal: And they going forth preached everywhere, the Lord working withal, and confirming the word with signs that followed.[13549]

The author says that preaching is inefficacious for the reformation of morals. But God does not speak thus: the Lord declares that as the rain makes the earth fruitful and makes it produce wheat, in the same way the word of God does not remain sterile; it produces in souls fruits of good works: And as the rain and the snow come down from heaven, and return no more thither, but soak the earth, and water it, and make it to spring, and give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater; so shall My word be, which shall go forth from My mouth: it shall not return to Me void; but it shall do whatsoever I please, and shall prosper in the things for which I sent it![13550] St. Paul adds that the word of God is so efficacious that it penetrates the hearts more than a two-edged sword: For the word of God is living and effectual and more piercing than any two-edged sword; and reaching unto the division of the soul and the spirit.[13551] By the word animae—soul—we understand the inferior part of man, which is called animal; and by the word spiritus—spirit—we understand the superior part, which is called spiritual. Hence the word of God prevents the superior part from uniting with the inferior part, as happens among the wicked in whom the inferior drags down the superior part; so that holy preaching, or rather, the grace by means of preaching, separates the inferior part from the superior, and prevents the superior part from being dragged down, and dominates overall the actions and all the desires of men.

St Paul, moreover, writes: It pleased God by the foolishness of our preaching to save them that believe.[13552] He says, By the foolishness of preaching: this is because the mystery of the Redemption, which the apostles preached, was regarded as foolishness by the Gentiles, just as we afterwards read in the same place: But we preach Christ crucified: unto the Jews indeed a stumbling-block, and unto the Gentiles, foolishness.[13553] The Apostle then declares that it is by means of the preaching of such folly that the Lord has wished to save believers. Now in order to save men, they must be led not only to believe the truths of faith, but also to do what faith teaches; for faith alone without works cannot save any one. Hence the Apostle assures us, in another text already cited, that the faith of Jesus Christ produced fruits of good works in the whole world: It is in the whole world, and bringeth forth fruit.[13554]

Origen also attests[13555] that in his time in all parts of the world those that had abandoned their divinities as well as the laws of their country, and consequently their wicked morals, in order to follow the law of Jesus Christ, were innumerable. Hence the apostles, as the fruit of their preaching, had the consolation of seeing the Gentiles not only despise and trample under foot their gods, but also extirpate their vices, which were inveterate for so many centuries, abhor earthly pleasures, renounce the riches and the honors of the world, in order to embrace sufferings, opprobrium, poverty, persecution, exile, tortures, and death.

The author says that preaching has not served to extirpate vice. It is not denied that, notwithstanding all the preaching, there were, there are, and there will be obstinate people who, in order not to give up their vices, renounce God; but on the other hand, how many are there who, after having heard the divine word, have changed their lives and given themselves to God! And these conversions were not dramatic conversions, which were only apparent as would be those that were only accomplished because of temporal rewards and punishments, of which the author speaks: they were true conversions of the heart. This was especially shown by so many martyrs, who, in order to confess their faith according to the precept of the Gospel, sacrificed their lives amid torments, and had so great a desire to die, that Tiberian, governor of Palestine, was forced to write to the Emperor Trajan that it was impossible to put to death all the Christians, so great was the number of those that offered themselves to die for Jesus Christ. This subsequently induced Trajan to leave the Christians in peace. Those that were thus converted by holy preaching were not only the common, ignorant people; but there were among them nobles, learned men, decurions, judges, senators, so that Tertullian in his Apology could say to the Gentiles: "We are filling all your places, —cities, islands, meetings, camps, decurions, the senate, the forum."[13556] After the first three centuries, which were centuries of blood, the fourth and fifth were centuries of self-inflicted penances, and of renouncing of the world; for many men and women retired to the desert, leaving behind their country, their relatives, their property, and everything, in order to give themselves up entirely to God by the practice of the holy virtues. St. Jerome, when he was living in Palestine, wrote[13557] that thither came every day from India, from Persia, from Ethiopia, companies of monks living in solitude, for the purpose of visiting the holy places of Jerusalem. And Rufinus[13558] assures us, that particularly in the territory of a single city of Egypt there lived at the beginning of the fourth century twenty thousand religious virgins who led a holy life. All this was the fruit of holy preaching.

I do not wish to continue any longer, nor fatigue my readers, to prove the utility and the necessity of holy preaching; for this it suffices to recall to mind what the Apostle says: How then shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? Or how shall they believe him of whom they have not heard? And how shall they hear without a preacher.[13559] It seems to me, moreover, that the little that I have said above sufficiently proves how impious is the thesis of the book in question, in which the author pretends to prove that preaching has never been a useful and proper means for the reformation of morals, when, on the contrary, without preaching we should be deprived of one of the principal means destined by God to bring about the true conversion of hearts.

A LETTER

ON THE ADVANTAGES OF THE HOLY MISSIONS, TO A BISHOP RECENTLY APPOINTED, BY WHOM THE SAINT HAD BEEN CONSULTED ON THE SUBJECT.[13560]

I HAVE received your lordship's most esteemed letter, in which I see your zeal for procuring missions for all th e villages of your diocese, and in which your lordship states several objections which have been made against the advantages of the missions. In obedience to your lordship's commands I shall detail at full length my views on the matter, and shall answer all the groundless objections which have been put forward against the holy missions.

It is certain, my lord, that the conversion of sinners is the greatest benefit that God can bestow upon man. St. Thomas[13561] says that the gift of grace by which God justifies the sinner is a greater favor than the beatitude of glory. But the conversion of sinners is precisely the end of the missions; for, by the instructions and sermons of the missions, they are convinced of the malice of sin, of the importance of salvation, and of the goodness of God, and thus their hearts are changed, the bonds of vicious habits are broken, and they begin to live like Christians.

In the old as well as in the new law the Lord ordained that the world should be saved by means of the missions. The faith, according to St. Paul, has been propagated by preaching; but preaching would have been ineffectual if God had not sent the preachers. How, says the Apostle, shall they believe him of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher? and how shall they preach unless they be sent?[13562] Hence, according to St. Gregory, the missions began at the commencement of the world: for God has never at any time neglected to send workmen to cultivate his vineyard.[13563] In the Old Testament he sent the prophets to preach the law, and in the New he has sent his own Son to teach us the new law of grace, which is the perfection and accomplishment of the old law. God who in times past spoke to the fathers by the prophets, last of all in these days hath spoken to us by his Son.[13564]

But because Jesus Christ was sent to preach only in Judea, he appointed the apostles that, after his death, they might preach the Gospel to all nations.[13565] By the preaching of the apostles the Gospel began, as we learn from St. Paul, to fructify throughout the world.[13566] The apostles sent their disciples to propagate the faith in the other nations, which they themselves had not been able to reach. And in after years, as we know from ecclesiastical history, holy workmen were sent by the Sovereign Pontiff and by other bishops to preach the Gospel in other kingdoms. In the fourth century St. Ireneus was sent to France. In the fifth, St. Palladius was sent to Scotland, and St. Patrick to Ireland. In the sixth, St. Gregory sent St. Augustine to England. In the seventh, St. Eligius was sent to Flanders, St. Kilian to Franconia, Sts. Swidbert and Willibrord to Holland. In the eighth century Gregory the Second sent St. Boniface to Germany, St. Wulfran to Friesland, and St. Hubert to Brabant. In the ninth, St. Ascanius was sent to Denmark and Sweden, and St. Methodius to Bohemia, Moravia, and Bulgaria. In the tenth, St. Maynard was sent to Livonia, and St. Ottone to Pomerania. In the thirteenth century the Pope sent Dominicans and Franciscans to Greece, Armenia, Ethiopia, Tartary, and Norway. These facts have been taken from a work entitled Historical Notices of the Church.

Finally, we know that in later times immense numbers have been converted from paganism in the East Indies and Japan by St. Francis Xavier, and in the West Indies by St. Louis Bertrand. I abstain from mentioning the many provinces of infidels and heretics which were converted by missionaries. St. Francis de Sales was sent to the province of Chablais, and converted seventy-two thousand heretics. We also know that St. Vincent de Paul instituted a Congregation of priests, which was approved by the Holy See. The priests of this Congregation are called "The Fathers of the Mission," because their lives are spent in giving missions in all places to which they are invited.

In a word, wherever the faith has been planted or a reformation of morals introduced, all has been effected by means of the missions; and when the scourges of heaven—earthquakes, wars, famine, and pestilence—have failed to convert the people, when the civil laws with all their penalties have not succeeded in preventing murders, thefts, adulteries, and blasphemies, the missions have been found effectual; hence, the learned Contenson of the Order of St. Dominic says that by the missions alone souls obtain eternal life.[13567] Hence, when a mission is to be given in any place, we can clearly perceive the efforts of hell to prevent it. For there is always some dissolute person who does all in his power to prevent the mission, because he knows that it will be an effectual obstacle to the execution of his wicked designs. But if in cities the missions are most useful, they are necessary in the villages and small towns as well for the instruction of the people as to give them an opportunity of making a good confession. First, in the small towns the missions are necessary for the instruction of the people. It is true, in all or in almost Catholic countries, sermons are preached to the people during the Lent. But the people derive far greater fruit from the sermons of the missionaries than from the Lenten discourses. For the preachers for Lent ordinarily preach in a high and flowery style, or at least in a manner not adapted to the capacity of the poor. They have their sermons committed to memory, and cannot change them, whether their audience consists of the learned 0r ignorant. When the preachers of the villages came to ask the blessing of Cardinal Pignatelli, Archbishop of Naples, his Eminence recommended them to address the people in a simple and popular style. For, said his Eminence, the greater part of the people being illiterate they derive no fruit from the sermons unless the language be accommodated to their capacity. He then added, Perhaps you will tell me that the prescription is already written. I then answer, Oh, what a pity for the patients!

The remarks of this holy prelate were most just; for, what benefit can a sick man derive from remedies which have been prescribed without a knowledge of his disease?

Hence when the poor people of the country places are asked what fruit they have received from the sermon, they answer that they could not understand it because the preacher spoke Latin. It is not true that these preachers always speak Latin, but their language is so little adapted to the weak understanding of the ignorant that to them it is as unintelligible as if it were Latin. I assert, and in this assertion I believe I am not rash, that it would be sometimes better for the ignorant to be absent from these sermons. For after listening for an hour to a sermon, in the hope of deriving from it spiritual profit, they find that their time has been lost, and thus they conceive a dislike for the word of God, and become worse than they were before. Hence it is that after the sermons of Lent we see the same bad practices, the same animosities, and hear the same blasphemies and the same obscenities. The greatest misery of the poor in the country is, as Contenson says, that there is no one to break to them the word of God; and therefore, he says, woe to the bishops, woe to the negligent priest![13568]

But, it will be asked, are there not over the poor in the villages pastors who preach every Sunday? Yes, there are pastors who preach; but we must consider that all pastors do not, or cannot break the bread of the divine word to the illiterate in the manner prescribed by the Council of Trent. "They shall feed the people committed to them with wholesome words, according to their own capacity, and that of their people, by teaching them the things which it is necessary for all to know unto salvation, and by announcing to them, with briefness and plainness of discourse, the vices which they must avoid, and the virtues which they must follow after."[13569] Hence it often happens that the people draw but little fruit from the sermon of the pastor, either because he has but little talent for preaching, or because his style is too high or his discourse too long. Besides, many of those who stand in the greatest need of instruction do not go to the sermon of the parish priest. Moreover, Jesus Christ tells us that No prophet is accepted in his own country.[13570] And when the people always hear the same voice, the sermon makes but little impression upon them.

But the sermons of the missionaries who devote their lives to the missions are well arranged, and are all adapted to the capacity of the ignorant as well as of the learned. In their sermons, as well as in their instructions, the word of God is broken. Hence, in the mission the poor are made to understand the mysteries of faith and the precepts of the Decalogue, the manner of receiving the sacraments with fruit, and the means of persevering in the grace of God: they are inflamed with fervor, and are excited to correspond with the divine love, and to attend to the affair of salvation. Hence we see such a concourse of the people at the missions, where they hear strange voices and simple and popular discourses. Besides, in the missions, the eternal truths which are best calculated to move the heart, such as the importance of salvation, the malice of sin, death, judgment, hell, eternity, etc., are proposed in a connected manner, so that it would be a greater wonder that a dissolute sinner should persevere in his wickedness, than that he should be converted. Hence, in the missions, many sinners give up their evil habits, remove proximate occasions of sin, restore ill-gotten goods, and repair injuries. Many radically extirpate all sentiments of hatred, and forgive their enemies from their hearts; and many who had not approached the sacraments for many years, or who received them unworthily, make good confessions during the missions.

It has been said that, during the ten or fifteen days which the mission lasts, the missionaries have given absolution to many relapsing sinners, who would require a trial of many months before they could be safely absolved. Would to God that all confessions were made with the same dispositions with which they are made in the missions. Oh, how small should be the number of damned souls! Surely length of time is not the only means of ascertaining the dispositions of a penitent; it may be a very fallacious means. How many are there who, in order to receive absolution during the time of the paschal precept, abstain for a month and more from the habits of sin, who interrupt their evil practices, and relapse immediately after? I therefore am of opinion that the disposition of a penitent may be better known from the deep impression made by the sermons, from the compunction of heart which he manifests, from the resolution which he makes, and from the means which he adopts in order to avoid sin, than from length of time. St. Cyprian says that charity is perfected, not so much by length of time, as by the efficacy of grace. And St. Thomas says that God sometimes infuses so much compunction into the hearts of sinners that they instantly acquire perfect sanctity.[13571] At a synod of the Bishops at Flanders, held at Brussels, the following decree was made: "The confessor, in the case of greater sinners, even when they are backsliders, should not ask that they should perform works of penance for a notable time, but he should with the holy Fathers be mindful that God in the conversion of the sinner considers not the measure of time but of sorrow.[13572] Moreover, since the matter of the sacrament of penance is moral and not physical, it is sufficient for the confessor to have a moral certainty which (as the author of the Instructor of Young Confessors says) is nothing else than a prudent probable judgment, not opposed by a prudent doubt of the dispositions of the penitent. Those who have assisted in giving missions, and who are accustomed to hear confessions, know well the difference between the confessions made on other occasions and the confessions made during the missions. They are fully convinced that in the missions penitents confess their sins with true sorrow, and with a firm purpose of amendment.

The reparation of so many sacrilegious confessions in which sins are concealed through shame, particularly by women, should of itself be sufficient to render the missions very desirable. This great evil of bad confessions is more common in small villages in which there are but few confessors, who are acquainted with all the inhabitants. Penitents are ashamed to confess their sins to confessors whom they meet every day, and thus through shame they continue to make sacrilegious confessions during their whole lives. Many, through this accursed shame, conceal their sins even at the hour of death, and thus sacrilegiously receive the last sacraments. Hence, the reparation of so many bad confessions is one of the greatest advantages of the missions. The people, knowing that the missionaries are strangers who will remain only for a few days, and whom they shall never see again, are easily induced, by the terrors of the divine judgments proposed in the sermons of the mission, to confess the sins which they had before concealed.

Hence I say that in every village the mission should continue as long as will be necessary for the missionaries to hear the confessions of all the inhabitants; otherwise, many persons will not be able to make their confession to the Fathers, and thus their consciences will be perplexed and troubled. For, by the sermons, scruples are excited; but by the sermons alone, a person addicted to bad habits, to unjust contracts, or inveterate hatred is not sufficiently taught what he must do in order to tranquillize his conscience. But in confession everything is adjusted, and the penitent is instructed how to make restitution for injuries done to others in their property or character, how to remove the occasions of his sins, and how to pardon injuries. But if the doubts and scruples excited by the sermons be not removed in the confessional, many persons will be more perplexed and troubled in mind than they were before the mission began. And if a person whose past confessions were sacrilegious cannot confess to the missionaries, he will, being obliged to make his confession to the priests of the village, continue, as before, to conceal his sins. Where the mission is so short that all the inhabitants of the place have not time to make their confession to the missionaries, it will do more injury than service to many souls. For, some persons whose ignorance rendered the omission of certain sins in confession excusable, being instructed in their obligation, will be found to confess these sins, but will not have courage to disclose these to the confessor of the place: thus, they will commit sacrileges and be lost.

Finally, all the world knows the immense good which has been and is daily done by the missions. A description of the innumerable conversions of sinners, produced by means of the missions, would be too long for this letter: but I shall mention a few.

Speaking of the missions of Father Segneri the younger, the celebrated Muratori says that the entire people gave up their employments to attend his sermons. He says that hatred for their sins and compunction of heart were plainly depicted in the countenances of all. Human respect and human feelings were trodden under foot, the most obdurate sinners were converted, and the confessors were obliged to hear confessions not only by day but by night. He adds that after the mission the whole town appeared to be changed: scandals were removed, abuses corrected, inveterate and obstinate animosities ceased, and blasphemies, imprecations, and obscenities were no longer heard. A similar description has been published of the fruits of the missions of Father Joseph Carabantes, a Capuchin; but in one city the people were so deeply penetrated with compunction that almost all of them went through the streets in the garments of penance, scourging themselves, and with tears asking of God the pardon of their sins.

Speaking of the missions given by the venerable priests of the congregation of St. Vincent de Paul, the author of his life says that, during a mission in the diocese of Palestrina in 1657, a young man whose arm had been cut off by an enemy, having met his enemy in a public street after the sermon, cast himself at his feet, asked pardon for the hatred he had borne him, and, rising up, embraced him with so much affection that all who were present wept through joy, and many, moved by his example, pardoned all the injuries that they had received from their enemies. In the same diocese there were two widows who had been earnestly entreated but constantly refused to pardon certain persons who had killed their husbands. During the mission they were perfectly reconciled with the murderers, in spite of the remonstrance of a certain person who endeavored to persuade them to the contrary, saying that the murders were but recent, and that the blood of their husbands was still warm. The following fact is still more wonderful: In a certain town, which shall be nameless,[13573] vindictiveness prevailed to such an extent that parents taught their children how to take revenge for every offence, however small; this vice was so deeply rooted that it appeared impossible to persuade the people to pardon injuries. The people came to the exercises of the mission with sword and musket, and many with other weapons. For some time the sermons did not produce a single reconciliation; but on a certain day, the preacher, through a divine inspiration, presented the crucifix to the audience, saying: Now let every one who bears malice to his enemies come and show that for the love of his Saviour he wishes to pardon them: let him embrace them in Jesus Christ. After these words a parish priest whose nephew had been lately killed came up to the preacher and kissed the crucifix, and, calling the murderer, who was present, embraced him cordially. By this example and by the words of the preacher the people were so much moved that for an hour and a half they were employed in the church in making peace with their enemies and embracing those whom they had before hated. The hour being late, they continued to do the same 0n the following day, so that parents pardoned the murder of their children, wives of their husbands, and children of their fathers and brothers. These reconciliations were made with so many tears and so much consolation that the inhabitants long continued to bless God for the signal favor bestowed 0n the town. It is also related that many notorious robbers and assassins, being moved by the sermon, or by what they heard from others of it, gave up their arms and began to lead a Christian life. Nearly forty of these public malefactors were converted in a single mission.

We read in his life of the stupendous effects produced by the missions of Father Leonard of Port Maurice, of the reformed Franciscans. In a village of Corsica called Mariana murders were so frequently committed through revenge that entire families were extinguished; such was the fruit of a mission given by Father Leonard that at the end of it there was not a single individual in the town who had not made peace with his enemies. In another place, called Casaccone, there was a family who obstinately refused to be reconciled with certain persons who had offended them. But when, at the close of the mission, the preacher declared that he did not intend to bless those who retained sentiments of hatred in their hearts, all the members of that family came forward, and with many tears made peace with their opponents. During the mission in this place, a young man came from a distance, for the purpose of killing an enemy, whom he expected to find at the exercises of the missions; but by hearing the sermon he was converted, laid aside his hatred and made a general confession. In a town called Castel d'Acqua, there was a great number of opposite factions: during the mission they came one day, armed, to the church. Great slaughter was apprehended; but by the sermon their hearts were filled with compunction, they went of their own accord to the preacher, and a common peace was established. In another place there were two parties who had been at variance for twenty years; in these contentions many persons were killed. Through the obstinacy of their chief, whose name was Lupo, one of the parties at the beginning of the mission refused to make peace; but at the end of the mission, seeing that his opponents were reconciled with God, and that he was still the enemy of God, Lupo was struck with remorse, and offered to make peace: thus the two parties were reconciled. In Livorno great preparations were made for the amusement of the carnival; but as soon as the mission began, the masks and dances and, because no person would go to the theatres, even the public comedies were given up. These are ordinary, not extraordinary, fruits of all missions. I therefore abstain from saying more on this subject.

Let us now come to the objections that are made against the utility of the missions. It is said in the first place that the fruit of the missions is only temporary, that, though it appears great, it lasts but a short time, and that the wicked become worse than they were before. I answer, would to God that all who are converted would persevere! It is one of the miseries of human nature that many who recover the grace of God lose it again by sin. But though it should be admitted that the fruits of the missions are not permanent, it is at least certain that, during the mission, bad practices are given up, scandals are removed, blasphemies cease, a great deal of ill-gotten property is restored, and many bad confessions are repaired. But it is not true that, after the missions, all sinners become worse than they were before; many persevere in the grace of God, and others, if they relapse, abstain for many months from mortal sin. Moreover, by listening to the sermons of the missions, the people acquire a more perfect knowledge of God and of the importance of salvation, and a greater horror of sin; and if they relapse into sin, they endeavor to rise again at the time of the Paschal Communion. I hold for certain that, if among all those who have attended the sermons any one die within a year after the missions, he will scarcely be lost. The fruits of the mission are always visible at least for a year or two; and if they do not last longer, it is because the priests of the place do not labor to preserve and maintain them by assembling the people to meditation and to the visitation of the Blessed Sacrament, and, above all, by attending to the confessional. "Vae," says the learned Contenson, "praelatis dormientibus, vae presbyteris otiosis." But when, after three or four years, the land becomes dry, it is necessary to refresh it by another mission.

The second objection against the missions is that the consciences of many are disturbed by scruples excited by the sermons. Oh what an objection! Then, rather than disturb their conscience, it is better to allow sinners to slumber in the lethargy of sin, and in an accursed peace which is the seal of damnation! The devil wishes that the false peace of sinners, which keeps them in a state of perdition, should not be disturbed! But it is the duty of a pastor to awaken those who sleep in sin, and to warn them of the danger of damnation to which they are exposed; and surely than the missions, there is no better means of arousing sinners to a sense of the perils by which they are beset.

Hence, bishops should take care that missions be given in every village, however small. Where there are many villages near one another, some missionaries select for the mission a place in the midst of these villages. The greatest sinners, who are consequently the most blind and the most careless of their salvation, do not go to the exercises of the mission unless they are performed in their own church. They remain at home under the pretext that the church in which the mission is given is too distant, or that the weather is bad, and thus they continue in their miserable state of perdition. I speak from experience, for we found that many places derive little or no profit from the missions, either because these missions were given in the midst of several villages or because they were too short. Hence, when the missionaries of our little Congregation go into any diocese, it is usual to give the mission in every village, however small, at least for eight days, and in populous towns for fifteen, twenty, or thirty days, until the confessions of all are heard.[13574]

The third objection is that the exercises of the missions generally end at night, and are therefore a cause of much scandal. I answer that they who attend the exercises are struck with the terror of God's judgments; and should any one during that time be disposed to tempt others to sin, he could not expect to succeed: but even though some attempt should be made to draw others into sins, must the mission be given up? If, to avoid all danger of evil, it were necessary to abstain from what is good and profitable, we should prohibit festivals of the saints, processions, and pilgrimages to holy places, because in these things there is always some disorder; we should prohibit confession, Communion, and hearing Mass, because even in these there are sometimes scandals and sacrileges. But we know that the Church not only permits but even approves and commands these things.

But it is said that from preaching at night many sins arise: and will there be no sins if the missions be given up? Ah, if the missions be given up, bad habits, quarrels, blasphemies, and all scandals will continue. But at least, during the mission, thousands of sins are avoided. But you will ask why are the sermons preached at night? I answer that, where the people attend by day, the sermons should be preached during the day and not at night; but, where they cannot attend by day, what can be done? It is certain that if, in the country places, the poor laboring classes, who form almost the entire audience, do not attend the sermons, the mission will be lost; but however strongly they may be exhorted to attend at an early hour, these poor people cannot come till after the work of the day. Masters and employers are recommended to allow their servants and workmen to give up their work at an early hour during the days of the mission; but these employers look to their own interest and pay but little attention to such recommendations. The workmen, unless they complete the day's work, are not paid. Without their wages they are not able to provide food for themselves or their families: hence in the villages the poor cannot attend till about sunset; and if they do not attend, I say the mission is lost.[13575]

The fourth objection is that some imprudent missionaries preach from the pulpit against the sins which they hear in the confessional, and excite in the people a hatred for confession. This objection has been made by some wicked persons who hate the missions, and is utterly destitute of foundation. The first thing the missionaries do after their arrival at the place of the mission, is to inform themselves of the prevailing sins and abuses of the place, and these they attack in their sermons. But they are careful never to mention in the pulpit any circumstance which could in the most remote manner reveal any sin heard in confession. But of what are they to speak in the pulpit? Is it of ecstasies, raptures, visions, or of revelations? No, they must preach against the vices which are most common, and which are ordinarily committed in all places, such as impurity, blasphemies, hatred, theft, and the like.

*F*inally, it is said that the missions, being repeated every three years, are too frequent, and therefore produce little or no impression on the minds of the people. I admit that, between two successive missions in the same place, there should be a considerable interval of time; but an interval of three years is quite sufficient. For, ordinarily speaking, in that space of time many forget the sermons of the missons, many relapse into sin, and very many fall into tepidity. A new mission will renew the fervor of the tepid, and will restore God's grace to those who have relapsed. But it is not true that repeated missions do not produce much fruit. For although in the second mission the people do not manifest so much compunction as in the first, the fruit is notwithstanding very great. For, as I have already said, many who have returned to their former bad habits rise again from sin, many who became tepid begin again to serve God with fervor, and many are more firmly established in the practice of virtue. Hence, to renew the fervor and resolution of the people, the missionaries of our little Congregation usually return after some months to the place in which they have given missions. And we have learned by experience the great advantages which flow from these renewals.

I have said enough; I only entreat your Lordship to continue with your wonted zeal to procure every three years a mission for every village in your diocese. Do not attend to the objections of those who speak against the missions through interested motives or through ignorance of the great advantages of the missions. I also pray you to oblige the pastors and priests of the villages to continue the exercises recommended to them by the missionaries, such as common mental prayer in the church, visit to the most holy sacrament, familiar sermons every week, the Rosary, and other similar devotions. For it frequently happens that, through the neglect of the priests of the place, the greater part of the fruit produced by the mission is lost. I recommend myself to your prayers and remain,

Your very devoted and obedient servant,

ALPHONSUS, MARIA,

Bishop of St. Agatha, etc.

The Exercises of the Missions

OUR saint describes in this treatise the exercises of the missions such as they are given or were given at his time at Naples; but we may clearly gather from what he says, that he does not pretend that the same method should be followed and the same means employed in every place and at all times. This is what he himself, in his old age, gives us to understand when he heard that there was an intention of introducing his Institute into Austria. "The missions," he said, "are not there given in the way in which we give ours: instruction or catechism is more useful there than preaching, because the people are living in the midst of Lutherans and Calvinists." Moreover, the statutes of his Congregation lay down this regulation for the missionaries: "Those ceremonies that are obsolete, ludicrous, and unusual in the country or places where they preach, shall be omitted; and as a general rule, the means of exciting the feelings of the people shall be used but sparingly, or shall even he omitted, especially in large places, and in places where the people are well educated." He that presides over the mission should, therefore, consider the circumstances of time and place where the mission is given, and, above all, the character of the people, so as to select and direct the exercises in a manner that will produce most fruit.—Ed.

INTRODUCTION

There are some who assert that the missions do more harm than good, because they trouble, they say, the people and their consciences, and because, if the people abstain from committing sin during the mission, they fall back into vice as soon as it is over, and become worse than they were before. Those that speak in this way, having had no experience in regard to missions, are ignorant of the great number of souls that are thereby gained for God. But he that practically knows what missions are, is fully aware how many inveterate enmities they remove, how many bad habits they root out, how many restitutions of ill-gotten goods they bring about, how many law-suits—a fruitful source of hatred—they adjust, and above all, how many bad confessions they repair, especially in the country in small places, where in this respect one may say that the missions are not only useful, as in large cities, but are even necessary. Indeed, as in these places the inhabitants know one another, it is not a rare thing that shame prevents them from manifesting their sins to the confessors of the place.

It is true, many at the opening of the mission complain that the missionaries have come to create disturbance among them; but these complaints are not uttered by good people: they are uttered by those that live thoughtlessly in their sins, and do not wish to be disturbed. Such is the aim of the devil: he does not wish that his unhappy slaves should be roused from their false peace in which they live—a peace that is to be the cause of their eternal torment and their eternal despair!

It is also true that after the mission many will relapse into sin. Ah! would to God that all those that are once converted would have the happiness of persevering in the state of grace till death; but so great is human frailty, that many sinners after having recovered the grace of God, again lose it. Nevertheless, even if no other advantage could be gained, it is certain that, at least during the time of the mission, many sins are avoided. The missions, however, bring back to God many souls, who afterwards persevere in God's grace till death; and if many should happen to relapse, they keep from sin at least for several months, and will acquire during the mission a greater horror of sin, a better knowledge of God and of the importance of their eternal salvation.[13576]

As for the exercises of the missions, there are many books that treat of them at length, especially the beautiful work of the venerable priest Philip de Mura, which bears the title, The Missionary instructed, from which I confess that I have taken the greater part of the present little work. However, it was for the greater convenience of the young members of our Congregation that I made this abridgment, in which I have briefly set forth rules and examples of all the exercises in accordance with the usage of the missions given by our Institute. To these I have added many things and many reflections which an experience of thirty-four years has made me regard as very useful to souls. I hope that this little work will also be profitable to many other priests; for therein they will find expressed in a clear and succinct manner what is said diffusely in other books, the more so since a plain and concise style is more pleasing at the present time, in which one wishes to read little and know much. Besides, in this book will be found examples written in a familiar style, proper for missions, in which Sunday or Lenten sermons are preached.

Chapter I

EXHORTATIONS (SENTIMENTI)

THERE are four kinds of exhortations; namely, the exhortations of the evening, the exhortations of the day, the exhortations during the taking of the discipline, and the exhortations of peace.

To give to each of these exhortations the suitable form, it is necessary to consider the aim and purpose of each. Thus:

1. The exhortation of the evening is given in order to rouse the sinner and to call him to the mission.
2. The exhortation of the day is given to gather together the faithful and to lead them to the church.
3. The exhortation of the discipline is given to move sinners to contrition, and to do penance for their sins.
4. Finally, the exhortation of peace is given to reconcile enemies.

I. THE EXHORTATION OF THE EVENING.[13577]

1. PRELIMINARY REMARKS

1. The exhortations of the evening contribute greatly to inspire the people with fervor from the very beginning of the mission. To arouse sinners and to induce them to come to church in order to hear the sermons, it is not sufficient that the opening of the mission be announced to them, or that they be called by the sound of the bell; they must be moved by the power of the word, and by the fear of the chastisements that God has reserved for them. Without these exhortations, at least during the first four or five days, we shall see the church but little frequented by those that need the mission most. On the contrary, we know by experience that the evening exhortations awaken in a wonderful way these destitute souls, and determine them to go to the church with the rest.

2. These exhortations should be short, and even very short, so that they do not last longer than half or quarter of an hour, either because being given in the evening, in the open air, and mostly in winter, they may become inconvenient both for the speaker and for the listeners, or even because several exhortations are given in the same evening, and must be given with fervor and vehemence, by using startling expressions which, like arrows, strike the ears and hearts of the hearers. Young missiona ries often have this defect, that they prolong these exhortations as well as the other smaller exercises of the mission, and almost make sermons out of them. They thereby grow tedious to the listeners and disturb the order of the mission, so that there is no time left for other more necessary exercises.

3. The evening exhortations are concluded, not by an act 0f contrition, but, by a terrible Sentence (sentenza terribile). Only at the end, after returning to the church, another very short exhortation is made, and is concluded by an act of contrition expressed in a few words.

2. DIVISION OF THE DISCOURSE

The evening exhortation contains five parts; namely:

1. The Introduction with the Proposition; 2. The Amplification; 3. Moral reflection with the invitation to penance; 4. The Announcement of the powers with which the missionaries are invested, as also of the exercises of the mission, and of the indulgences that are attached to the mission; 5. The terrible Sentence.

I. The INTRODUCTION, preceded by the singing of a hymn, may be begun in different ways, of which the following are examples: 1. By an EXCLAMATION: "O eternal God! how good Thou art! Men despise Thee, flee from Thee; and Thou goest in search of them; Thou callest to them in order to offer them pardon."

1. By a REPROACH: "Sinner! tell me: When will you cease to offend God?" (It must here be remarked that the exhortation should not be begun by the use of abusive words, such as wretched, villianous, crime-laden souls, and the like, for the hearers grow angry when they hear themselves thus called at the beginning of the discourse.) 3. By an INTERROGATION: "My dear brother, tell me: At the end of this kind of life that you are leading, what will become of you?" 4. By expressing a sentiment of COMPASSION: "Poor sinner! who would not pity your unhappy state, knowing that you are in disgrace with God, etc.?" 5. By an EXPOSITION: "My dear Christian, I have come to tell you in the name of God, that he is ready to pardon you, if, etc."

After this introduction or the like, the PROPOSITION, or the argument of the exhortation, is announced. The proposition is drawn from the hymn that is sung before. Let us suppose that the hymn is as follows:

"Lo! a God of all compassion
Calls thee; shall he call in vain?
If thou yet reject his mercy,
Will he ever call again? "

After the people have heard this hymn, we may thus address them: "My dear Christians, I have come this evening to bring you two messages; the one a message of joy, the other a message of terror: if you return to God, who calls you back to him during this holy mission, he will embrace you as his dear children; but if you do not return, and do not return soon, God will no longer call you, and you will be damned." Sometimes it will be well to begin the introduction by the proposition itself; thus: "You understand me, ye sinners: if now you return to God, you will find him full of mercy; but if you do not return to him immediately, he will turn his back upon you and will n0 more call you." Sometimes, also, it will be well to repeat the very words of the hymn; for example: "My Brethren, you have heard what the hymn says:

"Soon thy life will end, poor sinner,— Know'st thou when the end will he?' "

I. As regards the Amplification, the following rules must be observed:

If the proposition is not a truth of faith, as for example, that God after a certain number of sins abandons the sinner, it should be confirmed by some succinct arguments, presented in short, clear, and quite simple periods. Some short reflection should also be made, without employing comparisons, frightful examples, or texts of Scripture, unless these texts are short and generally known, such as: God is not mocked. It is appointed unto men once to die. Depart from Me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire; etc. The following is an example of amplification: If we take the proposition given above, namely, that God abandons obstinate sinners, we may briefly give the following reason: "He does not deserve mercy who uses God's mercy only to offend him more. The Lord bears with the sinner and gives him time, so that he may be converted and may weep over the evil that he has done; but when God sees this ungrateful sinner, instead of profiting by the time that he has given him to be converted, using it only to heap sin upon sin, he deprives him of life by a just judgment." Afterwards this short reflection may be added: "Put an end to all this sin—put an end to it, my dear Brethren: know that the greater the patience that God has had with you, the greater will be the chastisement that he reserves for you, if you do not hasten to amend your life."

But if the proposition has for its object some truth of faith, as the certainty of death, of judgment, etc., it will suffice to amplify it by reflections; for example, in speaking of death: "What torture and what despair will you not experience when you see by the light of the candle that the time for doing good has passed for you, and that at this last moment, with your head quite stupefied by fear and confusion, you are no longer capable of doing anything?" etc.

I. The amplification is followed by the MORAL APPLICATION and by the INVITATION TO PENANCE. Example: "What then would be your folly, my dear Brethren, if instead of returning to God, now that he calls you, you expose yourselves to the danger of being abandoned by God, and consequently of going to endure an eternity of torments in hell! Return to him; do not delay; profit by this favorable moment, in which Jesus Christ himself comes to seek you by a holy mission in your own home."

It must here be remarked, that in the moral application no particular vice should be named; for some one of the hearers might take offence, thinking that on his account the exhortation was given. And when the exhortation is given purposely for the benefit of some scandalous person, it should not be given too near his house, but at a certain distance, so that he may hear it without suspecting that the exhortation is given expressly on his account.

I. Here follows the ANNOUNCEMENT of the mission, which begins or has already begun, by making known the powers with which the missionaries are invested, the exercises that are to take place in the church, and the indulgences that may be gained according to a plan that will afterwards be given.

II. We conclude by the TERRIBLE SENTENCE which should correspond to the proposition of the exhortation. This sentence should be short, but should consist of words grave and striking, which will remain engraven on the minds of the hearers; for example: "Tremble, yes, tremble, ye sinners; perhaps this very night, if you do not resolve to amend your life, God may permit death to surprise you, and you may die and be condemned to hell! Or: "If you do not now weep over your sins, think that you may have to weep over them for all eternity in hell." Or: "Continue, O obstinate sinner! continue to offend God. But remember: In the valley of Josaphat I await you; there you will hear the sentence which Jesus Christ will pass upon you: Depart from me ye cursed into everlasting fire!" Sometimes we may finish by the very words of the hymn, if they well express the terrible sentence. Example:

"Who can tell?—perhaps, my brother,
Death this night will come to thee."

3. EXAMPLES OF DIFFERENT EVENING EXHORTATIONS WITH THEIR DISTINCT PARTS

FIRST EXAMPLE

" Lo! a God of all compassion
Calls thee; shall he call in vain?
If thou yet reject his mercy,
Will he ever call again?"

1. INTRODUCTION.—Dear Christians, I have come this evening to bring you two messages; the one a message of joy, the other a message of terror: if you return to God, who calls you back to him during this holy mission, he will embrace you as his own dear children; but if you do not return, and do not return soon, God will no longer call you, and you will be damned.

2. AMPLIFICATION.—Hear, my Brethren: the Lord pardons the sins of him who repents of them; but he does not pardon him who has the will to commit sin. See for how many years God has borne with you, and is saying to your heart: Cease, my child; amend your life; offend me no more!—And what have you done? Always the same thing: you have confessed, you have promised; yet you have always begun again to sin, you always continue to offend God! For what are you waiting? That God may take you from this world and cast you into hell? Do you not see that God cannot bear with you any longer?

3. Moral APPLICATION.—Let us, then, my Brethren give up evil, now that a mission is offered to you; give yourselves to God, who deigns still to wait for you, and who is ready to pardon you all the offences that you have committed, if you wish to amend your life. Come to the church where the mission is going on, come to hear the sermons, and make a good confession. Do not doubt that if you truly desire to abandon sin, I promise you on the part of Jesus Christ that you will receive the grace of pardon.

4. ANNOUNCEMENT.—See, Jesus Christ has come among you with his holy mission, which begins to-morrow. The missionaries have the power of absolving all reserved cases, even censures reserved to the Pope; they can also dispense from vows. In the church there will be every day, morning and evening, various touching and salutary exercises, such as the recitation of the Rosary, with instructions and sermons. Moreover, those that attend these exercises, if they confess and communicate, will gain a plenary indulgence when they receive at the end of the mission the Papal blessing. You see that God opens at this moment the treasury of his mercy; you can sanctify yourselves if you wish.

5. SENTENCE.—What do you say? What do you *re*solve to do? Yes or no; do you desire no more to offend God? Who knows whether it is not the last appeal that the Lord addresses to you? Hasten to take a resolution. Do you wish to wait until God puts an end to your disorders by casting you into hell without the least hope of ever remedying your misfortune? Go, my dear Brethren, enter your homes, and reflect on what you have heard this evening; recommend yourselves to the Blessed Virgin, and ask her to enlighten you.

SECOND EXAMPLE

Sinner, thou art foe of heaven,
And thou tremblest not with fear?
Cease those sins, my child, ah! leave them Death advances, hell is near."

*1. INTRODUCTION.—O sinner, you remain an enemy of your God without trembling! . . . My dear Brethren, if you are in the state of sin, it is certain that God is your enemy: God, I say, who if he wishes can this very mo*ment cast you into hell! And you sleep, and you laugh, and you do not tremble, and you do not weep . . . !

2. AMPLIFICATION.—Ah! for myself, I pity you, because sin has blinded you, and does not allow you to see the danger in which you are of dying at any moment, and of going to burn in an abyss of fire for all eternity! Have you perhaps as your enemy only a great man of the world from whom you can hide yourselves, from whom you can escape by flight, or against whom you can defend yourselves? Oh no! it is God whom you have as your enemy—God who sees you everywhere whithersoever you may go, who can reach you wherever you are; if he wishes to chastise you, how could you defend yourselves against his hand?

3. MORAL APPLICATION.—My dear Brethren, tell me: In living as you do, how can you save yourselves? Do you not see, unhappy sinners, that you are damned? Do you not see that God cannot have patience with you any longer? Listen to me this evening: you are now the enemies of God, it is true, since you have offended him much; but he is ready to pardon you if you wish to amend your life. Courage, then, my dear Christians! come to the mission, go to confession, and renounce sin: hasten to give yourselves to God, who is still waiting for you, who is still calling for you; do not anger him any more.

4. ANNOUNCEMENT.—See, Jesus Christ has come to your very dwellings to invite you to return to him; it is on your account that he has sent hither missionaries who have the power, etc.

5. SENTENCE.—O sinners! what more do you wish God to do? Do not, therefore, lose confidence, hope, but hope and tremble: if you wish to amend your life, hope; if you wish to continue to have God as your enemy, tremble—yes, tremble that the present appeal may not be the last one for you; it you do not resolve to give yourselves to God, perhaps this very evening God will abandon you, and you will be damned! Go, my dear Brethren, enter your houses, and reflect, etc.

THIRD EXAMPLE

"Soon thy life will end, poor sinner;
Know'st thou when the end will be?
Who can tell?—perhaps, my brother,
Death this night will come to thee."

1. INTRODUCTION.—My Brethren, have you understood what this hymn says to you: "Thy life will end, and thou knowest not when the end will be"? See, poor sinners, the beautiful life that you are leading, alas! far from God, far from the sacraments, far from the church. You scarcely hear a Mass on feast days, and when you hear it, you do so in a careless manner; and then how do you spend the rest of the time? To offend, to anger God! In fact, you live as if you were never going to die.

2. AMPLIFICATION.—Unfortunate sinner! do you not think of death? But whether you think of it or not, whether you wish it or not, a day will come when your life will end; you will have to leave this world; your body will be buried in the earth, and your soul will enter eternity. Do you, my Brethren, believe or do you not believe that? It is certain, it is of faith, that you must die, and that after this life a life is to begin that will never end; and if you are damned, your life will be unhappy, you will be in despair forever, as long: as God will be God.

3. MORAL APPLICATION.—Tell me: if this night, or even this moment, while I am speaking to you, death were to surprise you, what would become of vour poor soul? whither would you go, O miserable man? Let us, my Brethren, quickly profit by the means of salvation, now that God is waiting for you, and gives you time to confess and to regulate your accounts before death comes upon you. What do you say? what do you intend to do? You must decide.

4. ANNOUNCEMENT.—See, Jesus Christ has come to call you to himself by a mission, and to pardon you if you wish to do so. The missionaries have the power, etc.

5. SENTENCE.—I ask again: What do you say? what do you wish to do? do you wish to return to God? Consider: How many have died since the last mission given in this place? How many of those that have died are now burning in hell? Why?—because they did not wish to give up their wicked lives, and God himself has put an end to them. Now do you wish that the same thing should happen to you, and that you should be condemned to weep in the flames of hell during all eternity? Go, my Brethren, into your houses, and reflect, etc.

FOURTH EXAMPLE

"Love God who, loveth thee,
For love itself is he;
Me bids the sinner weep;
He saith: Poor child, from sin depart;
Rest thee within thy Father's heart;
Turn to thy Shepherd, wandering sheep."

1. INTRODUCTION.—O my God, how good and merciful art Thou towards men! They leave Thee, and Thou goest in search of them. They outrage Thee, and Thou offerest them pardon and peace.

2. AMPLIFICATION.—My dear Brethren, I come this evening on behalf of Jesus Christ to offer you pardon and salvation, if you wish to accept them, Tell me: Do you merit this grace? The Lord could make you die and send you to hell the moment that you offend him, yet, see the great mercy which he now shows you: instead of punishing you, you see him coming to you with this holy mission, in order to pardon you; he comes himself to seek you, to make peace with you; it will suffice if you repent of having offended him, and if you promise not to offend him any more.

3. MORAL APPLICATION.—Here is what the hymn says:

"He saith: Poor child, from sin depart; Rest thee within thy Father's heart; Turn to thy Shepherd, wandering sheep."

Now what do you say? how do you respond to the appeal that the Lord addresses to you? Ah! do not delay any longer, cast yourselves at his feet; come to the church, and make a good confession.

2. ANNOUNCEMENT.—The mission has already begun. The missionaries have the power, etc.

3. SENTENCE.—My dear Brethren, listen: if you wish to profit by this beautiful occasion of returning to God, he has his arms open to receive you; but if you continue to shut your ears to his voice, tremble lest he may abandon you and may call you no longer. Now if God abandons you, woe be to you! You will die in your sins, and you will be cast into hell to weep there without any hope of ever remedying your eternal ruin. Go, my Brethren, etc.

FIFTH EXAMPLE

"Souls to hell are blindly running,
Ah! what myriads, who can tell?
On they go, because they think not
What a fearful thing is hell!"

1. INTRODUCTION.—Sinner, what do you say? You say: If I go to hell, I shall not be there alone? If I am damned, I must have patience!—Yes, O heavens! this is what so many blind sinners say, and see how they go to hell! And why? You have heard the words of the hymn: "On th ey go, because they think not what a fearful thing is hell!"

2. AMPLIFICATION.—Listen: What you now say was also said by so many damned souls that now burn in the eternal fire: "If I go there, I shall not be there alone! If I am damned, I must have patience!" But at present they do not speak thus. Ah! would that this evening one of the damned came from hell and spoke in my place; you would hear him cry out: Unhappy me! I said that in hell I should not be alone; now that I am damned, would that I could be alone in my punishment! Alas! in the midst of this fire, which devours me, in the midst of the darkness, of the smoke that envelops me, in the midst of so many other torments, I must still bear the torment of being in the midst of all these damned persons, whose number suffocates me, whose cries stupefy me, whose stench becomes insupportable to me. I said: "If I go to hell, I must have patience!" Alas! what patience! I am dying with rage at every moment; I do nothing but utter cries and shrieks of despair. I should like to die, and I cannot even hope to die.

1. MORAL APPLICATION.—You hear, my Brethren, how the damned speak who cared little about hell, and it is they whom you are imitating. Hear now what God says to you by my mouth: My children, for these miserable beings there is no remedy; but there is a remedy for you if you wish to use it: ask my pardon; I will pardon you, and I will deliver you from hell.

2. ANNOUNCEMENT.—It is for this reason that the Lord sends you this mission. The missionaries have the power, etc.

3. SENTENCE.—O sinners! who knows whether this is not the last notice, the last mercy, which you receive from God? Put an end to all this; the Lord cannot bear with you any longer; his vengeance is near. Will you believe in hell only when you have arrived there? Ah! take care, you are going there; and if you once arrive there, remember that there will be no remedy for your misfortune; think that if you ever fall into that abyss of fire, you will never come forth from it; never, never. Go, my Brethren, etc.

SIXTH EXAMPLE

"Think, then, ere yet this life is o'er,
On that whereon thy all depends—
That evermore or nevermore,
Eternity which never ends!"

1. INTRODUCTION.—O eternity, eternity*!* The saints tremble at the mere thought of eternity; and ye sinners, who are in disgrace with God, you do not fear? You do not tremble? It is of faith that he who dies in the state of sin goes to burn in the fire of hell for all eternity!

1. AMPLIFICATION.—What is hell? It is a dark place, where one sees only horrible monsters; where one hears only cries, shrieks, howling; where one feels only the torture of fire and other torments. And how long will all these horrors last? During all eternity: always, always! Will they ever end? No; never, never!—Come here, unhappy Judas, thou who hast been in hell for so many ages! tell me: How long will thy punishment last?—Judas answers: Always, always!—And thou, unfortunate Cain! tell me: How long hast thou been suffering in this abyss of fire? Alas! answers Cain: for many thousand years! And when will thy punishment be over?—Ah! never, never!

3. MORAL APPLICATION.—My dear Brethren, what think you? Tell me: How can you sleep with sins upon your souls, and as enemies of God? Does not an eternal hell await you? Why do you not resolve to give up the wicked life which you are leading? Now that you can do so, why do you not remedy this great ruin that threatens you if you do not become reconciled with God? Hasten to prevent this misfortune; make a good confession, return to God's grace; for he certainly does not desire you to be damned.

4. ANNOUNCEMENT.—You already know that the mission has been begun. What is a mission? It is Jesus Christ, who comes to save his lost children and to deliver them from hell. Know that the missionaries have the power, etc.

5. SENTENCE.—My Brethren, do not fail to profit by this great mercy that God has bestowed upon you today. Now, while shedding tears at the feet of a confessor, you can deliver yourselves from hell; but if you do not amend your lives, pay attention to what I am going to say to you this evening: you will have the misfortune of ending by going to weep in hell during all eternity, as long as God will be God! Go, my Brethren, etc.

4. STANZAS FOR THE EVENING EXHORTATIONS AT A MISSION

(Per li sentimenti di notte.)

1.

Love God, who loveth thee,
For love itself is he;
He bids the sinner weep;
He saith: Poor child, from sin depart;
Rest thee within thy Father's heart;
Turn to thy Shepherd, wandering sheep.

2.

'Tis the Lord hath sent me hither,
Messenger of pardon free;
Day of grace and hour of mercy—
Grace perhaps the last for thee!

3.

Lo! a God of all compassion
Calls thee; shall he call in vain?
If thou yet reject his mercy,

Will he ever call again?

4.

Sinner, thou art foe of heaven,
And thou tremblest not with fear?
Cease those sins, my child, ah! leave them;
Death advances, hell is near.

5.

Now thy Lord is waiting, waiting;
But he will not always wait:
When the day of vengeance breaketh,
Cries for mercy come too late.

6.

Turn to God in humble penance,
Sinner, do not still delay;
Do not scorn the love of Jesus,
Cast his mercy not away.

7.

Lost in sin, and yet rejoicing!
Far from God, and canst thou sleep?
On the brink of fell damnation,
And thou carest not to weep?

8.

Soon thy life will end, poor sinner,—
Know'st thou when the end will be?
Who can tell?—perhaps, my brother,
Death this night will come to thee.

9.

Think of death!—that awful moment
When thy dream of life must end;
Boundless bliss or ceaseless torments
On that moment, death, depend.

10.

Live thy life of sinful pleasures,
Sinners, yet the end must come!
Then, bold man, thy outraged Saviour
Shall be Judge to seal thy doom.

11.

Whither shalt thou fly for refuge
From that justly angered One,
Sinner, when he shall reproach thee
All the evil thou hast done?

12.

Souls to hell are blindly running,
Ah! what myriads, who can tell?
On they go, because they think not
*W*hat a fearful thing is hell!

13.

And when shall hell's sharp pains be o'er?
The insult to God's majesty
Has been so deep that evermore
Those pains shall last, eternally.

14.

Think on that dread eternity
To which thou art hast'ning ever;
Think of that long futurity
Of pains that will leave thee never.

5. SIMULTANEOUS EXHORTATIONS

Simultaneous exhortations are given but rarely. This means is employed only in certain places when the inhabitants do not come in sufficient numbers to the church, or when there are many scandalous persons who do not come to the sermons.

The object that is proposed in these exhortations is, to strike fear into the minds of the hearers; hence the exhortations should be filled with threats of the divine | chastisements, such as an unhappy death, abandonment on the part of God, eternal punishments.

The following is the manner of performing this exercise:

1. The missionaries should be so numerous[13578] as to be able to surround the place by keeping themselves at a certain distance from one another, so that their voices do not mingle.

2. They should leave the church in the evening at a later hour than usual, without lights, without the crucifix, and unaccompanied. Each one goes alone and secretly to the place that is designated; then at the signal given by a stroke of the large bell all begin the exhortation at the same time, and they also finish it at a second stroke.

3. This exhortation, as to its parts, is similar to the evening exhortation that has been described above, but with this difference: the Introduction is shorter, and it is made ex abrupto (abruptly) by beginning with the proposition itself, the object of which will be, for example, the proximate abandonment on the part of God, or the ingratitude of those that close their ears to his voice, or justice which he exercises toward those that despise his mercy. To the introduction is joined the Amplification with the reflection; then comes the Moral Application; but each of these parts should be very short, so also the invitation to penance, which shall be without the exposition of motives, without effective words, and without any announcement of powers or faculties, etc.; hence the simultaneous exhortation is in substance composed only of three parts; namely: The introduction, with a short amplification and reflection, the Moral Application with the invitation to penance, and the terrible Sentence.

6. EXAMPLE OF A SIMULTANEOUS EXHORTATION

1. INTRODUCTION.—Do you then, O sinner! really wish to damn yourself? Do you wish God to punish and abandon you? A few days ago the mission began, and you do not even wish to come to the church. Instead of punishing you, God has sent you the holy mission, during which he does not cease to call you night and day, at every hour, in every place, in the church, in the public places, at your very dwellings! What greater mercy could God have shown you? And you have become more and more deaf to his voice, you have become more and more obstinate! Continue, O ungrateful man! continue to despise the invitations and the graces which the Lord offers to you; but you must know that the justice of God is at hand: soon you will be the victim of an unhappy death. The demons of hell demand of God vengeance against you, and God can no longer bear with you. Unfortunate man! I pity you; it would have been better had you not been born! Now, you laugh at the mission; but listen: a time will come when this grace, which God gives you to-day and by which you do not wish to profit, will be a cruel sword which will pierce your soul in hell forever. Then you will open your eyes to weep over and to curse your obstinacy; but then there will be no longer any remedy.

2. MORAL APPLICATION.—Cease then to be deaf, O ungrateful sinner! cease to excite the anger of God. Come to church tomorrow; come to hear the rest of the sermons; the end of the mission approaches. Come; Jesus Christ is waiting for you; make a good confession, but do so soon, soon, soon, before the mission is over. Lose no time; resist n0 longer God, who is calling you.

3. SENTENCE.—If you do not accept my invitation, I announce to you this evening a great chastisement which God will send you, and I inform you that this mission which God has sent you to save you, will serve, if you neglect it, to make God abandon you, and make you weep in hell with greater grief; without any hope, then, of ever being able to remedy your eternal loss.

II. THE EXHORTATION GIVEN DURING THE DAY

We have already said in the beginning that the exhortation given during the day has for its object to collect the inhabitants and to lead them from the public places and their places of work to the church; the aim of the moral application should therefore be to induce the hearers to come to the church, in order to hear the sermon that is about to be preached.

This exhortation is composed of the same parts as the evening exhortation, but with the following differences:

1. It should be longer; may last a quarter of an hour; the arguments may be more extended, and a few—two or three—short Latin sentences may be added; there may also be related an example, which however should have reference to the proposition of the exhortation.

2. The form of this exhortation should also be simple and popular, but less terrible and less vehement.

3. It is not necessary always to begin with a hymn, especially when the people are already disposed to listen.

4. At the end of this exhortation, especially during the first days of the mission we may add the act of contrition, but in a few words.

5. Instead of the terrible Sentence, we finish by a special motive, to induce the people to come to the church.

EXAMPLE OF AN EXHORTATION GIVEN DURING THE DAY

1. INTRODUCTION.—My Brethren, have you ever heard of the following incident: A king having been offended by one of his subjects, justly condemned him to death, but before the execution of the sentence this good prince charged one of his ministers to tell the condemned man that if he repented and asked the king's pardon he should obtain forgiveness?—Similar traits are not seen between the princes of the earth and their subjects; but this is what has taken place between God and you. You are condemned to hell on account of the offences that you have committed against God; but the Lord, instead of treating you according to justice, has sent us to you through this mission. For Christ we are ambassadors.[13579] We are ambassadors of God, but ambassadors of peace and of pardon.

2. AMPLIFICATION.—We therefore announce to you on behalf of Jesus Christ, that he is disposed to pardon you, if you repent of having offended him, and if you promise him that you will amend your lives. Well, what say you? What answer do you give? Dear Brethren, hear well that about which there is question: the mission is a great mercy of God for those that wish to profit by it; but for the obstinate, it will only serve to attract sooner the abandonment and the chastisements of the Lord. Our Lord wept at the sight of Jerusalem: Seeing the city he wept over it.[13580] And why? Because he saw that this ungrateful city did not wish to profit by the merciful visit that he made to it: Because Thou hast not known the time of Thy visitation.[13581] It is for this reason that he announces to you with tears in his eyes the chastisement that he has reserved for you.

3. MORAL APPLICATION.—Ye inhabitants of N., Jesus Christ has come to-day to visit you also by this holy mission in order to show you mercy. Let him who despises this visit of our Lord tremble, and let him expect to receive soon an exemplary punishment. You must, therefore, my dear Brethren, return without delay to God, now that God calls you: the Lord calls you; but he will not call you always; and when he calls anyone he wishes to be obeyed without delay. If you, therefore, hear to-day his voice, do not harden your hearts. To-day if you shall hear His voice, harden not your hearts.[13582] Let us suppose that the condemned man mentioned above, to whom the King made an offer of pardon on condition that he would immediately repent of his crime, would have answered that he would think over the matter, and that afterwards he would speak about it: tell me, would not the King have ordered the sentence to be executed immediately? Indeed, this is precisely what he should expect who is not converted at once when God calls him.

4. ANNOUNCEMENT.—You see, my Brethren, that the mission has come; to-day it begins. Jesus Christ calls you at this moment, and says to you: Turn ye to Me, . . . and I will turn to you.[13583] Sinners, you have left me by offending me; but return to me, and I will receive you into my arms. What more can you ask of so good a God? Ah! no; let no one among you be so ungrateful as to add to the injuries already done to God the injury of despising the pardon that God offers him today.

5. ACT OF CONTRITION.—Come, let us cast ourselves at the; feet of Jesus Christ; let each one of you say to him: O Lord! I thank Thee for having waited for me till the present day, and for not having sent me to hell. I repent. . . . In future I will amend my life, ect.

MOTIVE FOR INDUCING THE PEOPLE TO COME TO THE CHURCH.—Now let all come to the church. Jesus Christ says that his sheep hear his voice: My sheep hear My voice.[13584] At this moment one may see who are the sheep of Jesus Christ, who are those that follow Jesus Christ, etc.

III. EXHORTATION OF THE DISCIPLINE.[13585]

The exhortation of the discipline should be still shorter than the evening exhortation: it should be conceived in terms that produce compunction rather than terror, and pronounced in a voice that expresses grief, since its only aim is to induce the hearers to repent of their faults, and to give themselves up to penance at that very moment.

This exhortation has three parts: the Reflection, the Moral Application, and the Conclusion. In the REFLECTION some important proposition of the sermon, which has preceded, is expounded; in the MORAL APPLICATION the necessity of penance is shown; in the CONCLUSION the hearers are induced to practise penance.

1. EXAMPLES OF VARIOUS EXHORTATIONS TO TAKE THE DISCIPLINE

FIRST EXAMPLE

AFTER THE SERMON ON ABANDONMENT BY GOD

1. REFLECTION.—Have you heard, my dear Brethren, what chastisement you have deserved by your sins? You have deserved that God should abandon you and should no more pardon you. But no: the Lord is still waiting for you; he calls you; his arms are open to receive you, if you wish to return to him. O my Brethren! do no longer offend this God, who has shown so much kindness to you; change your conduct; or do you wish that he should really abandon you?

2. MORAL APPLICATION.—Hasten, O sinners, hasten to give yourselves to God. Tell him that in future you will no more offend him; and as to the past, beg him to pardon you the great offence that you have given him.

3. CONCLUSION.—Weep, then, do penance, chastise your bodies, by which you have displeased God. Now raise your hand, raise your voice, and ask pardon: Pardon me, O Lord! mercy; I repent of having offended Thee; mercy!

Here the missionary intones at once the Miserere, which is continued by the ecclesiastics who are present. About the middle of the psalm, at the verse that best suits his subject, he interrupts it by a stroke of the bell, and makes a second exhortation, but still shorter, by following the same rule as above; for example:

1. Cast me not away from Thy face. David, while thinking of the sins which he committed against God, trembled and said: Cast me not away from Thy face: O Lord! do Thou not reject me, as I have deserved.

2. And you, my dear Brethren, what say you? How many times have you not driven God from your hearts? You would deserve that at this moment God should drive you from this church.

3. But no; see what he says this evening to each one of you: My son, ask my pardon, and I will pardon you. Raise again your voice and say: Pardon, O Lord! mercy.

We must take care that this exercise should always be concluded with fervor. If the fervor of the participants grows weak, the discipline should be abridged by intoning the Gloria Patri. We afterwards say to the people: Now respond to the hymn while saying with tears:

"I have offended Thee, my God,
Alas! my dearest Lord;
Thou Sea of Goodness Infinite,
And Fount of Love adored.
Ungratefully, without a cause,
I have offended Thee,
Who on the cross to give me life
Didst die through love for me.
But I am sorry, O my God!
In mercy, Lord, forgive;
I never will offend Thee more,—
No, never, while I live.
May every moment of my life
Be spent in bitter tears,
To mourn my past ingratitude,
The sins of former years!"

After the hymn the Hail Mary is recited three times by the people, with the face on the floor; and then we conclude by saying: "May the most Blessed Sacrament be praised and thanked! Blessed be the holy, immaculate, and most pure Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary!"

At the end of the exercise all those that wish to go to confession are invited to proceed to the place destined for this purpose. It must be here remarked that the missionaries, especially those that are charged with the duty of giving instructions and of preaching, should always urge the people, and particularly the men, to come to confession very soon, by telling them that if they wait till the great crowds come to confession, it may not be possible to satisfy them. This advice should be often repeated with much force from the very beginning; for otherwise the missionaries will remain unoccupied for several days, and will afterwards be overwhelmed by crowds, and this will cause confusion and embarrassment.

SECOND EXAMPLE

AFTER THE SERMON ON DEATH

1. REFLECTION.—Have you understood, my Brethren: A day will come when you must die; and then the world coming to an end for you, you will find yourself extended on your bed and abandoned by all men.

2. MORAL APPLICATION.—Then there will be no more time to make peace with God: your conscience being confused, God angered, your head weakened, your heart hardened—such will be your state; help yourself then if you can. Now, sinners, it is time to regulate your accounts and become reconciled with God; for this end he has waited for you up to the present time; he has opened his arms to receive you. Know that if to-day you weep over your past offences, God will forgive all your sins.

3. CONCLUSION.—Weep, then, do penance, chastise your bodies.

THIRD EXAMPLE

AFTER THE SERMON ON JUDGMENT

1. REFLECTION.—A day will come, my Brethren, when you will appear before the tribunal of Jesus Christ to render an account of your whole life. Tell me: if Jesus Christ wished to judge you this very evening, what sentence would he pronounce against you?

2. MORAL APPLICATION.—Pay attention to what I say: On that day there will be no more mercy; then Jesus Christ will be the just Judge, while now he is a Father, and he opens his arms to receive and to pardon you.

3. CONCLUSION.—Hasten then to weep, etc.

FOURTH EXAMPLE

AFTER THE SERMON ON HELL

1. REFLECTION.—My dear Brethren, have you heard this evening the sermon on hell? Have you reflected where you should be now 0n account of your sins? You should now find yourselves in this abyss of fire, in profound darkness, in the midst of terrible torments. Do you not thank God that you still find yourselves in this church, with the certain hope of obtaining pardon if you only wish it? Ah! if one that is damned were present here this evening, and could repent of his sins, and obtain grace, what penance would he not perform in order to be released from hell!

2. MORAL APPLICATION.—And you who have so many times deserved hell, more than many others who are now condemned for fewer and less grave sins than yours, what do you do? Do you not weep? do you not ask pardon of God?

3. CONCLUSION.—Ah! do not delay to weep, etc.

2. EXHORTATION TO TRAIL THE TONGUE ON THE GROUND

The exercise of the discipline ordinarily continues every evening till the evening before the day on which the Papal blessing is given; but on the last evening, instead of the discipline, it is customary to trail the tongue on the ground, an exercise very useful for those that have the habit of blaspheming and of uttering immodest language. This is done in the following manner:

After the women have left the church, and the door has been locked, the chairs and benches are removed, and the men are assembled at the main entrance of the church. Then the Father who is to give the exhortation places himself opposite to the people on an elevated place, with the crucifix held by a cleric who is between two others carrying lighted candles; at the same time all the other missionaries keep the multitude together in front of the crucifix, and hold back the children, if any have moved forward. Immediately after this the exhortation is given; and at the end, when the Father exhorts all to trail the tongue 0n the ground, the other missionaries begin by setting the example; but afterwards, as soon as they see the men prostrating themselves with the face on the ground, they rise, place themselves in the church at a distance from one another, and all together, in a loud voice, continue to animate the people to perform this penance with compunction.

The end of this exhortation is no other than to inspire people with horror of the sins of the tongue. As to the form, it may be the following; but the discourse may be more extended, as I give here only an idea of what is to be done.

3. EXAMPLE OF THE EXHORTATION TO TRAIL THE TONGUE ON THE GROUND

O goodness of God, how great art thou! O justice of God, how terrible art thou! O cursed sin, how cruel art thou! Raise your eyes, my Brethren; see the image of the man hanging on the cross, after having been scourged, crowned with thorns, and all covered with wounds from head to foot. Could you tell me who is this man and what he has done? It is the august Son of God, innocent and holy. Why did his eternal Father condemn him to so painful a death? Hear what his Father answers: For the wickedness of My people have I struck him. It was for the crimes of my people that I have struck him. Consider then the humiliation and the pain inflicted by your sins upon this innocent Lamb: it was because of your impurities that his flesh was torn; it was because of your bad thoughts that he was crowned with thorns; his feet and his hands were nailed to the cross because of your sinful steps and impure touches; his heart was pierced on account of your obstinacy. But, O my Jesus! be consoled; for these poor sinners are no longer obstinate; Thou already knowest that during these days of the mission they have tried to repair the evil that they have done: Thy painful wounds they have tried to heal by the scourges that they inflicted upon themselves; the spittle that covered Thy eyes they have tried to wipe off by tears; the pain of Thy feet pierced with nails they have tried to alleviate by coming to the church; the wounds made by the thorns they have tried to lessen by holy resolutions. Yes my Brethren, all this is true; but this divine mouth of Jesus Christ I see still tormented by the gall of your blasphemies, of your lies, of your immodest language. Well, this evening you should sweeten all the bitterness that you have caused our Lord in the past. And what must you do to accomplish this? At first, you should weep over the displeasure that you have given to so good a God, who died for you; and then you should chastise yourselves by trailing a little on the ground that tongue that has put so much gall into the mouth of Jesus Christ. Come, then, let us this evening offer him this consolation. My Fathers, be ye the first to give the example; and you, my Brethren, follow the priests. Weep, then, etc.

4. MOTIVES TO HE ANNOUNCED HY TIIE MISSIONARIES DURING THE TRAILING OF THE TONGUE ON THE GROUND

1. Suffer, cursed tongue, for having dared to offend Jesus Christ. Think, my Brother, that your tongue should now be burning in hell, etc.

2. Say from the bottom of your heart: O my Jesus! accept this penance, however small, and pardon me all the sins that I have committed by my words.

3. Most Holy Virgin Mary, my Mother, offer to God this mortification, and pray to him to pardon me.

4. O my Brother! what joy this evening for the angels to see, etc. And what torment for the devils to see that God receives you this evening into his arms, etc.

5. At the same time make an act of contrition and ask pardon, etc.,—O Lord, I am sorry, etc.; and then a firm resolution, etc.,—O Lord, I will rather die. Oh, I have given Thee enough gall, my sweet Jesus! If I should offend Thee again by my cursed tongue, let me rather die.

6. Eternal Father, for the love of Jesus Christ, and by the merit of the gall which he tasted on the cross, pardon me, etc.

7. My dear Brother, if you were in hell, which you have deserved, what penance would you not do to be redeemed out of it? Well, this evening, 0n account of this mortification God will deliver you from the pains that you should suffer in hell, etc.

IV. THE EXHORTATION OF PEACE

The exhortation of peace, which is delivered after the discipline, as distinguished from that which precedes the general Communion, according to Bari, is composed of six parts. 1. Recapitulation; 2. Application; 3. Proof; 4. Example; 5. Moral application; 6. Conclusion.

1. A point of the sermon that has preceded is briefly recapitulated.

2. It is applied to those that cherish hatred against their neighbor by announcing to them the chastisement reserved for the revengeful.

3. It is proved by some passage from holy Scripture or from the holy Fathers, and by reasons, showing how much he should fear divine vengeance who wishes to be revenged, and how, on the contrary, he should hope for pardon from God who forgives others.

4. The proof is confirmed by an example given somewhat in detail.

5. The moral application is then made.

6. At the end the hearers are invited to become reconciled with one another by forgiving one another the injuries that have been received.

After the conclusion of the discourse, the Father still continues to urge those present to the forgiveness of injuries, and this by various motives that are found at the end of the following example.

It should be explained that it is the business, not of him who has given offence, but of him who has received it, and who wishes to forgive, to come to tell the missionary in secret what is that offence. If only the one that gave offence presents himself, he should be dismissed with a few kind words, and should not be allowed to mention the fact nor the person who has been offended. When the person offended presents himself, if the offence has been secret, care should be taken to have the reconciliation brought about in secret; but if it has been public, he who is the author of it is called, provided it is not an ecclesiastic, so that both may embrace each other at the foot of the crucifix; and if the author of the offence is not present, he is to be replaced by one of his near relatives. It must, however, be observed, that if the hatred proceeds from a cause concerning honor, it suffices to say to the person offended that he should pardon the offence in his heart, and this need not be followed by an embrace, which might create scandal and some sinful affection.

EXAMPLE OF AN EXHORTATION TO PEACE

1. RECAPITULATION.—You have heard, my dear Brethren, the account which you have inevitably to render to Jesus Christ, and the terrible sentence which the divine Judge will pronounce against sinners.

2. APPLICATION.—Job, who was so holy a man, thinking of God's judgments, cried out: For what shall I do when God shall rise to judge? and when he shall examine, what shall I answer him.[13586] And you, my Brethren, what will you answer God when he asks you an account of your life? Tell me, what will you answer him, you especially who bear hatred towards your neighbor, and who, after having heard the sermon of this evening, still think of revenging yourselves?

3. PROOF.—Vengeance belongs to God only; he is the just avenger of sins, and for this reason he is called the God of revenge.[13587] And you, miserable worm of the earth, you wish to act as if you were God? But think of the chastisement with which St. James menaces those that refuse to forgive others: he will be judged without mercy: For judgment without mercy to him that hath not done mercy.[13588] Now you do not wish to forgive your neighbor the offence that he has given you: well, when on the day of judgment you wish to obtain pardon from Jesus Christ, it will with justice be refused to you. You yourselves, then, according to St. Augustine,[13589] will not dare to ask mercy of God, who himself has given you the command to forgive your neighbor. Now you wish to take revenge upon your neighbor: then Jesus Christ will also take revenge upon you. Our Lord has said: Revenge is mine, and I will repay them in due time.[13590] Should you not have committed other offences against God, you should think it no little injury that you heap upon him this evening by wishing to persist in hating your neighbor, when Jesus Christ exhorts you to pardon him for the love of him, when he commands you to do so, and when he seems even to beg you to do so!

4. EXAMPLE.—It is related that St. John Gualbertus, whose relative had been assassinated, met one day the murderer, who asked his pardon for the love of Jesus Christ. On hearing this name the saint pardoned him. Having afterwards entered the church, he saw the image of Jesus crucified bend its head and salute him as if to thank him for having pardoned the murderer for the love of his Saviour.

Instead of this incident, the following may be related: A powerful man had seven enemies, and wished to take revenge on all seven. St. Catharine of Siena begged him to pardon at least one of them for the love of Jesus Christ. He did so, and while doing so he felt such interior consolation that he at once called upon St. Catharine to tell her that for the love of Jesus Christ he pardoned all his enemies.

1. MORAL APPLICATION.—You see then how our Lord presses to his heart all those who for the love of him pardon the injuries that have been heaped upon them. Hence, my dear Brethren, if you wish also to be embraced by Jesus Christ, you must pardon your neighbor and embrace him who has offended you. Our Lord says: Forgive and you shall be forgiven.[13591, 13592] Know, then, if this evening, to please God, you forget to pardon the offences that you have received, God will forgive the offences that you have committed against him, and he will embrace you as his children.

2. Well then, my dear Brethren, if your neighbor has offended you, come first to mention this in secret to the missionary, and then become reconciled with one another at the foot of the crucifix. Oh, happy he that is the first this evening to perform this noble deed and to set the good example! Come then, Jesus Christ is waiting for you, etc.

This exhortation is here given in an abridged form, merely to give a succinct idea of it; he that has to give it, should take care to develop it in any way that he thinks fit. We think it useful to indicate here, in conclusion, various motives, which may be given for the purpose of inducing those who have been offended to grant full pardon; for example:

1. Come, give to-day this satisfaction to Jesus Christ, come to pardon, etc.; I do not ask this on my account, but for the love of Jesus crucified, who, if you pardon others, will pardon you; and if, on the contrary, you refuse to pardon others, do not ask his pardon; for he will withdraw from you, and on the day of judgment, etc.

2. You see that at this moment the devil is occupied in tempting you, so as to prevent you from pardoning your neighbor; he says to you that it would be a shame for you to pardon others. Answer him by asking whether it was a shame for Jesus crucified to pardon his executioners. Ah! do not listen to the devil; listen to Jesus Christ, who says to you this evening: If you wish me to make peace with you this evening, make, first, peace with your neighbor.

1. Come, why are you waiting? Do violence to yourselves: do not allow yourselves to be conquered by the devil. Give this pleasure to Jesus Christ and to the Blessed Virgin Mary, who now have their eyes upon you to see what you are going to do.

2. Oh, what consolation will you feel after this beautiful act! Hasten, come, etc.

3. See, and tremble: if you do not forgive your neighbor this evening, God will abandon you, and you will be damned.

4. Pay attention: see who is coming; do not allow him to pass by. Come to Jesus Christ, the King of peace. Live Jesus, and may the power of hell burst with anger! Courage! etc.

(As for the example of another exhortation to peace, given to the people before General Communion, see farther on, in Chapter IV.

Chapter II

THE ROSARY OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN

I. NARRATION

THE recitation of the Rosary may be preceded by an introduction in which is related some example of the protection which the Blessed Virgin grants to those that practise this devotion. But it must be observed that this introduction should be given only when there is time for it, and when it becomes necessary in order to keep the people occupied; this is, however, rarely the case. Ordinarily, in winter, and in those places where the instruction is given during the day, according as it is commonly practised, there is little time for it. It is, therefore, better to omit the introduction, and to recite the Rosary immediately, as it greatly contributes to the success of the mission. It will then be well to begin by giving out the mysteries on which the meditation is to be made, by joining to them some short reflection and a short moral, as will be said farther on. If afterwards time permits, the narration may be given at the end of the Rosary; we give here the rules for it.

The narration contains three parts: The Introduction, the Fact, and the Moral Application.

1. As to the INTRODUCTION, the proposition which is its subject is drawn from the very fact that one wishes to relate by passing from a general proposition to the particular proposition of this fact. If there is question, for instance, of the help given by the Blessed Virgin to one of her pious clients at the hour of death, one may say: "At all times, under all circumstances, Mary, our good Mother, comes to the assistance of her clients; but it is, above all, at the hour of death that they stand in the greatest need of her protection, etc."

2. As to the FACT, only that is given which has connection with the proposition without speaking of the circumstances that are foreign to it, and without speaking parenthetically. It will always be well to mention the name of the author who relates the fact, as well as the circumstances of time and place.

3. As to the MORAL APPLICATION, we begin by drawing the conclusion from the fact related, according to the particular proposition which precedes it; for example: "You see, my dear Brethren, how the recitation of the Rosary is useful to obtain the protection of Mary at the moment of death." Then comes the moral application: "Hence, in future, do not omit to recite it every day with devotion and with confidence. Let us then say it together this evening: Deus, in adjutorium, etc."[13593]

EXAMPLE OF NARRATION

1. INTRODUCTION.—He that has a true devotion to Mary may be called happy even in this life, and may be sure of paradise, according to the words of the Gospel: He that shall find Me, shall find life, and shall have salvation from the Lord.[13594] But who is he that finds Mary? It is he who loves her, and who honors her by special devotions. Now among all the devotions I know none that is more pleasing to the Mother of God than the Rosary. Oh, what a beautiful hope of salvation have those who recite every day the Rosary with piety and perseverance! The books are full of examples of souls saved by this means. Hear what the devils themselves, forced by a command from St. Dominic, have said in praise of the Rosary.

2. FACT.—Father Pacciucchelli[13595] relates that one day while St. Dominic was preaching about the devotion of the Rosary, a heretic was brought in who, for having publicly spoken ill of the Rosary, had been by a just judgment of God become possessed of devils; he had been bound, and he uttered horrible cries. Then the saint commanded the devils, in the name of Mary, to answer all the questions that he would address to them. At first he asked them why they had taken possession of this sinner, and how many they were. They answered that it was on account of the irreverence committed against Mary, and that they numbered fifteen thousand, on account of the fifteen mysteries of the Rosary. Then the saint asked them whether what he had preached on the Rosary was true. The evil spirits then began to howl and to curse the moment in which they had entered this body, since they now found themselves forced to confess what would do them so much injury.

"Hear, O Christians!" they said all that our enemy has said of Mary and of the Rosary is true." They added that they had no power against the servants of Mary, and that many sinners at death by invoking Mary, notwithstanding their unworthiness, succeeded in saving their souls. They concluded with these words: "We are compelled to make known that he who perseveres in devotion to Mary and to the Rosary will not be damned; for Mary will secure for him eternal salvation." Then St. Dominic told the people to recite the Rosary. At each Ave Maria there departed from the unhappy man a multitude of devils like burning coals, so that at the end of the recitation of the Rosary he was entirely delivered from these infernal spirits. Such a prodigy brought back many heretics to the true faith, and filled every one with an ardent devotion to the Rosary.

1. MORAL APPLICATION.—You see, my dear Brethren, what a beautiful hope we have of being saved by the protection of Mary when we honor her by devotion to the Rosary. Do not, therefore, in future, fail to recite it every day with much affection and confidence; if any one has neglected this practice in the past, let him begin it this evening, and never discontinue it. Let us, then, begin and recite the Rosary during these days of the mission, so that the Blessed Virgin may obtain for all the inhabitants of this place the grace of true conversion. Deus, in adjutorium, etc.

II. THE MYSTERIES

After the exposition of the mystery come the Consideration, the Moral Application, and the Prayer, for example:

THE JOYFUL MYSTERIES

In the 1st, the ANNUNCIATION, we contemplate how the Blessed Virgin was informed by the archangel Gabriel that she should conceive and bring forth our Lord Jesus Christ.—(CONSIDERATION): Consider here, my dear Brethren, the love of our God: he could have saved us by sending an angel to redeem us; but he wished to come himself to die for our salvation, so that our hearts might not be divided, says St. Bernard: "In order that our hearts might not be divided, he wished to be our Creator and Redeemer,"[13596] etc.—(MORAL APPLICATION): However, where is the love, where is the gratitude, of men towards a God who has loved them so much?—(PRAYER): Let us ask Mary, in this first decade of the Rosary, to obtain for us this holy love of God: O holy Mother of God! so full always of love for this good Lord Jesus Christ, who became thy Son, that he might deliver us from hell, obtain for us the grace to love him with our whole heart, etc.

In the 2d, the VISITATION, we contemplate how the Blessed Virgin Mary, having learned that Elizabeth, her cousin, was with child, set out immediately to visit her, and remained with her three months.—(Cons.) The visit of Mary was the source of grace to this whole family.—(Mor. applic.) Happy the soul that is visited by Mary, etc.—(Pr.) Let us pray, then, to our dea r Lady, that she may deign, during this mission, often to visit our souls, so that they may be sanctified, etc.

In the 3d, the BIRTH OF OUR LORD, we contemplate how, the time having arrived, the Blessed Virgin brought forth our Redeemer at midnight, in a stable, between two animals, and she laid him in a manger.—(Cons.) When the time of her delivery arrived, Mary was at Bethlehem; but not being able to procure any lodging in the city, she was obliged to take shelter in a cave, which was used as a stable for cattle; and there she gave birth to the Son of God, etc.—(Mor. applic.) Jesus wished to make his first appearance in this world in the form of a babe lying in a manger, in order to inspire sinners with greater confidence, etc. . . . Let no one, then, entertain sentiments of distrust, etc.—(Pr.) Let us beseech the Blessed Virgin to obtain for us true confidence, etc.

In the 4th, the PRESENTATION, we contemplate how, forty days after the birth of our Lord, that she might fulfil the precepts of legal purification, the Blessed Virgin offered her divine Son in the Temple, and placed him in the arms of the aged Simeon.—(Cons.) Mary had no need to be purified, because she was always free from every stain; but in order to obey the law, and through humility, she went to be purified, and to appear sullied like other women.—(Mor. applic.) Since, then, the Mother of God, who was so pure, was not ashamed to appear as if she needed to be purified, how shall you ever be ashamed to confess your sins during this holy mission?—(Pr.) Pray to the Blessed Virgin to help you to overcome every repugnance to confess your sins, etc.

In the 5th, the FINDING OF OUR LORD IN THE TEMPLE, we contemplate how Mary, having lost her Son, and having sought for him during three days, found him again disputing in the midst of the Doctors, when he was twelve years of age.—(Cons.) The Blessed Virgin and St. Joseph, having gone to Jerusalem to visit the Temple, took with them the little child Jesus; but at the return they lost him. For three days, then, they sought after him with many sighs and tears, and found him at last in the Temple.—(Mor. applic.) The Blessed Virgin never lost the grace of her divine Son; she was only deprived of his sensible presence; and, nevertheless, she sought after him with tears. Oh, how much greater reason has the sinner to search with tears for Jesus Christ, when he has lost his grace! Whoever seeks for him in this way will surely find him.—(Pr.) Let us pray to the Blessed Virgin to obtain for us a true sorrow for our sins, etc.

SORROWFUL MYSTERIES

In the 1st, the AGONY IN THE GARDEN, we contemplate how Jesus Christ, while praying in the Garden of Olives, sweat drops of blood.—(Cons.) When our Saviour reached the Garden of Olives, he was seized with so great a sadness that he said it was sufficient to take away his life: My soul is sorrowful even unto death.—(Mor. applic.) What was it, then, that afflicted the heart of Jesus so much, that made him sweat drops of blood? It was the sight of our sins that caused him this cruel agony. Let us also unite our sorrow to that of Jesus Christ.—(Pr.) Let us pray to the Blessed Virgin to obtain for us this sorrow.

In the 2d, the SCOURGING, we contemplate how cruelly Jesus Christ was scourged in the house of Pilate, where, according to a revelation made to St. Bridget, he received six thousand six hundred and sixty-six blows.—(Cons.)

This scourging of Jesus Christ was so cruel that his body became like a leper's, that is, one continual wound from head to foot, according to the prophecy of Isaias: And we have thought him as it were a leper.—(Mor. applic.) Holy writers teach that our Saviour was pleased to suffer this great punishment especially to satisfy for the sins committed against chastity. Sinners, have you heard this? Your impurities are the scourges that made our Saviour suffer; ah! do no longer scourge him, etc.—(Pr) Pray to the Blessed Virgin to deliver you from this vice, which makes hell so full, and in temptations invoke Mary, etc.

In the. 3d, the Crowning with Thorns, we contemplate how Jesus Christ was crowned with thorns and treated like a mock king.—(Cons.) After having been scourged he was made to sit upon a stone; a reed was put into his hand to represent a sceptre, a rag upon his shoulders for a royal mantle, and on his head, in place of a crown, a wreath of thorns, which they struck with a cane to make them penetrate. Then the soldiers insulted him, saying: "Hail, King of the Jews!" And they buffeted him.—(Mor. applic.) Sinners do the same: for they confess; but scarcely risen from the feet of their confessor, they leave the church to give Jesus Christ new blows on the face.—(Pr.) Let us beseech the Blessed Virgin to obtain for us the grace to die rather than ever offend God any more, etc.

In the 4th, the CARRYING OF THE CROSS, we contemplate how Jesus Christ, having been condemned to death by Pilate, was made to bear the cross upon his shoulders in order to increase his humiliation and his pain.—(Cons.) With great affection Jesus embraced this cross, wishing by this means to satisfy for our sins.—(Mor. applic.) It is therefore just that we, in our turn, to satisfy for the many offences which we have given him, should embrace the crosses that God sends us, etc.—(Pr.) Let us pray to Mary to obtain for us resignation and patience in all our tribulations, etc.

In the 5th, the Crucifixion, we contemplate how Jesus Christ, having arrived at Calvary, was stripped, then nailed to the cross, where he died for love of us, in the presence of his afflicted Mother.—(Cons.) Consider what a bitter death our Saviour suffered to purchase our love.—(Mor. applic.) Let us always keep by us some beautiful image of Jesus crucified, and often, while looking at it, let us say: I love Thee, my Jesus, because Thou hast died for me.—(Pr.) Let us ask the Mother of sorrows to obtain for us the grace to think often of the dying love of Jesus Christ, which he bore to us by dying for us.

THE GLORIOUS MYSTERIES

In the 1st, the RESURRECTION, we contemplate how, the third day after his death, Jesus Christ rose again triumphant and glorious, to die no more. (Cons.) Let us consider the glory of our Redeemer when he arose from the sepulchre, after having vanquished Satan, and delivered the human race from bondage.—(Mor. applic.) How great is the folly of the sinner who, having been once delivered from the tyranny of the devil, consents to become again his slave for some wretched gain or some miserable pleasure of this world!—(Pr.) Let us pray to the Blessed Virgin to unite us by love so closely to Jesus Christ that we may never again by mortal sin become the slaves of Lucifer.

In the 2d, the ASCENSION, we contemplate how Jesus Christ, forty days after his resurrection, ascended into heaven in triumph, surrounded by wonderful glory, in the sight of his most holy Mother and of his disciples.—(Cons.) Before Jesus Christ died for us, Paradise was closed against us; but by his death, Jesus has opened it for all those that love him.—(Mor. applic.) Ah, what a pity that, after our Saviour has suffered so much to obtain Paradise, this happy kingdom, in which, etc.; and then so many foolish sinners should renounce it and give themselves up to hell for a worthless pleasure, for a mere nothing!—(Pr.) Let us beseech Mary to obtain for us the light to see clearly how miserable are the goods of this world, and how great the delights that God offers in the world to come to those that love him.

In the 3d, the MISSION OF THE HOLY GHOST, we contemplate how Jesus Christ, seated at the right hand of his Father, sent down the Holy Ghost to the chamber where the apostles with the Virgin Mary were assembled.—(Cons.) Before receiving the Holy Ghost, the apostles were so feeble, so cold, in the love of God, that, at the time of the Passion of our Lord, one betrayed him, another denied him, and all abandoned him; but as soon as they had all received the Holy Ghost, they were so much inflamed with love that they gave up their lives generously for Jesus Christ.—(Mor. applic.) St. Augustine says: He who loves, does not labor. He who loves God feels no affliction under crosses, but rather rejoices, ect.—(Pr.) Let us ask of Mary to obtain for us from the Holy Ghost the gift of divine love; for then all the crosses of this life will seem sweet to us.

In the 4th, the ASSUMPTION OF OUR BLESSED LADY, we contemplate how Mary, twelve years after the resurrection of Jesus Christ, departed this life, and was carried up by angels to heaven.—(Cons.) The death of Mary was full of peace and consolation, because her life had been all holy, etc.—(Mor. applic.) Our death will not be like hers, for our sins will then be a subject of alarm. But hear: for as to him who renounces a bad life and consecrates himself to the service of Mary, this good Mother will not fail to comfort him in that last moment, and obtain for him the grace of dying consoled, as she has done to so many of her faithful servants.—(Pr.) Let us place ourselves, then, under her protection, with the firm purpose to amend our lives; and let us always ask her to assist us in the hour of death, etc.

In the 5th, the CORONATION OF OUR BLESSED LADY, we consider how Mary was crowned by her divine Son, and we contemplate at the same time the glory of all the saints.—(Cons.) When Mary was crowned in heaven by the hand of God, she was also appointed to be our advocate; for this reason, Blessed Amadeus says that she prays for us incessantly.—(Mor. applic.) It is true that Mary prays for all men, but she especially prays for those that often and confidently have recourse to her intercession.—(Pr.) Let us beseech her always to pray for us, by saying with the Church: Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us; and with St. Philip Neri: O Mary, Mother of God! pray to Jesus for us.

Chapter III

PREPARATORY ACTS FOR THE CONFESSION OF CHILDREN

BEFORE the acts that are made to dispose the children for confession, we address to them an instruction which is composed of three parts: the Introduction, the Proof, and the Fact.

1. To the INTRODUCTION is joined the Proposition, which has for its subject the injury that is done to God by sin, or the ingratitude of the sinner, or the mercy of God towards him who repents. It will be well to begin the introduction by a truth opposed to the proposition. For example: if one takes for the subject the injury done to God by sin, the introduction should at first show how God deserves to be honored; if it is the ingratitude of the sinner, one should speak of the great obligation of loving God for so many benefits, etc.; and if it is of the mercy of God, one should speak of the chastisements that he merits who offends God.

2. Here follows the PROOF, giving reasons or authorities, which should be few in number, expressed briefly and simply, according to the capacity of the children. A short moral is added to the proof.

3. After this a FACT is selected, which should correspond to the proposition, and be conducive towards exciting compunction so as to dispose the children to make a good act of contrition.

We pass, then, to the Acts.

We begin by the acts of theological virtues; that is, Faith, Hope, and Charity. Care should be taken that these acts be preceded by their corresponding motives, namely: for the act of faith, that we should believe what the Church teaches, because God has revealed it to her; for the act of hope, that we should hope for paradise and the graces necessary to reach it, because we have the promise of God, who is all-powerful, merciful, and faithful; for the act of charity, that we should love God, because he deserves to be loved by men by reason of his infinite goodness.—I have said that these motives should precede the acts, and not follow them, as they are made to do by some; for the motive is called motive because it should move us to act. This is what should be observed in regard to the acts that are made at the end of each instruction. Besides, we should be careful that the acts preparatory for the confession of the children has special relation to confession that they are going to make, namely: to believe specially that in the sacrament of penance sins are pardoned, to hope especially for pardon through the merits of Jesus Christ, etc.

We finish with the act of contrition, preceded by the motive, the reflection or reason that moves one to repentance, and by the invitation through which one is urged to repent; for example:—(MOTIVE): Jesus Christ has said: Him that cometh to Me, I wilt not cast out (John, v. 37).—(INVITATION): Ah, my children, you would deserve to be rejected to-day by Jesus Christ; but since he says to you that he will not reject you, hasten to cast yourselves at his feet, weep, repent, etc., and say to him. (Act) My Jesus, it is true that I have offended Thee, but I love Thee with my whole heart; and because I love Thee, I repent, etc.—It will also be good for the children, and for persons but little instructed, to make them conceive the act of contrition by asking them, for example: My children, do you not love with your whole heart this God who is so good? And because you love him, do you repent of having offended him?—It will be well to repeat these acts of contrition three times, by giving them different motives: the first motive should be drawn from the proposition; at the second, the crucifix should be kissed; the third, finally, should be stronger and more touching.

EXAMPLE OF THIS EXERCISE

1. INTRODUCTION.—My dear children, if you have offended God, you have committed a great crime, and very great is the punishment that you have deserved. How have you had the boldness to offend a God so great and so good? He has created you, he has loved you so much that he gave his life for you, etc.—But thank the infinite mercy of your God.—(PROPOSITION): Know that this God, whom you have so much despised, wishes to pardon and embrace you to-day if you sincerely repent of having offended him.

2. PROOF.—Do not fear; have confidence. God says that he does not wish the death of the sinner, but that he be converted, and that he live: I desire not the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his way, and live (Ezech. xxxiii. II). (All these texts, if one wishes to quote them, should be briefly but clearly explained.) Hence our Lord invites all sinners, etc. Turn ye to Me . . . and I will turn to you (Zach. i. 3).

3. FACT.—(Here is narrated in a few words an example of the mercy of God. The most touching is that of the prodigal son [Luke, xv.]. We briefly describe his departure from the paternal house, the miserable state to which he, was reduced; for to keep himself from starving he was obliged to take care of the swine. Then we mention the reception given him 0n his return by his father, who embraced him, and clothed him with a precious garment, which signifies grace, etc. Hence we pass on to the MORAL APPLICATION.) You see in this example, my dear children, how good God is towards those that return to him with a repentant heart, etc.—Let us, then, have confidence, etc.—If you make to-day a good confession, Jesus Christ will embrace you, etc.—(Here there must be added, in a few words, an example of the chastisements that God sends to those who in confession omit through shame to tell some mortal sin. We should forcibly dwell upon this point, in order that the children at present and in the future conceive great horror for concealing their sins through shame. Afterwards, we let them make the Acts, saying:) Now, before you go to confession, it is necessary that you perform the acts in order to obtain the pardon of God in confession.

ACT OF FAITH.—My God, because Thou hast revealed it to the holy Church, I believe all that the holy Church teaches me as of faith. I believe that Thou art my God, the Creator of all things, who, during an eternity, rewardest the just in paradise and punishest the sinners in hell. I believe the mystery of the Most Blessed Trinity, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, three Persons, but one God. I believe that God the Son, the second Person, was made man by taking the name of Jesus Christ, who died for us, who arose again on the third day, who is now sitting at the right hand of the Father in heaven,—that is, equal in glory to God his Father,—and who will come one day from heaven to judge all men. I believe that only the Roman Catholic Church is the Church of Jesus Christ, in which alone we can obtain eternal salvation. I believe the Communion of the Saints; that is, the participation in the good works among all those that are in the grace of God. I believe the seven sacraments, and especially the sacrament of baptism, by which the soul is washed, cleansed from sin, and receives the grace of God; the sacrament of penance, by which we recover the grace that has been lost; and the sacrament of the Eucharist, in which we really receive Jesus Christ, the body, the soul, and the divinity. My God, I thank Thee for having made me a Christian; and I protest that I wish to live and to die in this holy Faith.

ACT OF HOPE.—My dear children, when you have sinned, the devil wishes to make you despair; but God does not wish us to despair: he even commands us always to hope for the pardon of our sins, provided we repent of them: My God, because Thou art faithful, all-powerful, all-merciful, trusting in Thy promises, I hope, by the merits of Jesus Christ, the pardon of my sins, final perseverance, and the glory of paradise.

ACT OF CHARITY.—Now, my children, God wishes to pardon you, but he wants you to love him. What do you say? Does not this God, who is the sovereign good, deserve to be loved? Let us, then, make an act of love for God, who is so good: My God, because Thou art infinite goodness, the sovereign good, worthy of infinite love, I love Thee above all things, with my whole heart.

ACT OF CONTRITION.—But, in the past, have you always loved our good God? have you not offended him? Ah, make an act of contrition, with the intention of applying it to the confession that you are going to make; and pay attention: for if you do not truly repent of your sins, Jesus Christ will not pardon you. (We make first an act of ATTRITION): Think, my children, that you should at this moment burn in hell forever, separated from God and excluded from paradise. Now, on account of hell, which you have deserved, and paradise, which you have lost, are you sorry for all the sins that you have committed against God?—(We then make an act of CONTRITION). But, above all, think how great is this God, and how much he deserves to beloved by you, at least out of gratitude for the love that he has borne you by having even died for you. Still, you have done him an injury: you have preferred nothingness to him you have turned your back upon him. Are you sorry for all this? Say, then: My God, during the past I have despised Thee; but now I love Thee with my whole soul: and because I love Thee, I am sorry for the sins that I have committed against Thee, for all the displeasure that I have caused Thee; I regret all this with my whole heart; I should like to die of sorrow, and should have rather suffered every evil than have but once offended Thee.

At the end we let the children make a firm purpose of never more offending God, by raising the hand as a sign of the promise that they are making. They should also be told to make now a special resolution never to conceal any sin through shame.

However, before making this formal act of contrition, we should take care to have the children to feel sorrow several times and for various motives, as has been said above, by taking the crucifix when the second motive is mentioned.

After these acts it is customary to take a child that is distinguished for its innocence, and to have him embrace the crucifix on the top step of the altar.

Chapter IV

SOLILOQUIES FOR HOLY COMMUNION

During the mission two soliloquies are given: one being for the children, the other for the people. The only difference between the two is that the first should be given in a more plain and familiar manner, according to the capacity of the children; but to the second the exhortation to penance is added, and is given after the act of contrition, as we may see in the example given. Both have, however, the same parts and the same acts as well for the preparation for Communion as for thanksgiving.

The acts for the preparation are usually the acts of faith, adoration, humility, contrition, love, and desire; but substantially they may be reduced to three —the acts of faith, humility, and love: the act of faith is joined to that of contrition; and to the act of love, that of desire. It will be well to relate between these acts some little touching incidents. We begin the whole by a short introduction, as may be seen further on in the example of the soliloquy for the people, which, excepting the exhortation to peace, resembles the soliloquy for the children, as has already been said.

After the act of contrition, before the Communion of the people, the exhortation to peace is given, and before the Communion of the children the procession takes place, which they make outside of the church, all wearing a crown of thorns on their heads, and the girls having, besides, their faces covered with a white veil.

(As to the girls, we understand here those that are not more than fifteen years old; for those that are older go to Communion by themselves, without procession). When the children return to the church, before they enter, the Communion tickets, received from the missionary who teaches the catechism, are collected. Then the children are placed in a line before the altar, the boys being separated from the girls, and the soliloquy is concluded by acts of love and of desire, etc.

EXAMPLE OF THE SOLILOQUY FOR THE PEOPLE, WITH THE PREPARATORY ACTS FOR COMMUNION

INTRODUCTION.—Let us be glad and rejoice: and give glory to Him: for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and His wife hath prepared herself.[13597] O my dear Brethren! there are no longer tears of grief, but tears of joy and of love which I ask of you this morning. Let us be glad and let us rejoice: Yes, let us be glad; why? the marriage of the Lamb is come: Jesus Christ, the divine Lamb, pacified by your repentance, wishes to come this morning to espouse your souls in Holy Communion. You have longed so much for this day; it has come. Prepare yourselves, then: for the heavenly Spouse is near; he is ready to enter your hearts.

ACT OF FAITH AND OF ADORATION. —St. Teresa is astonished that so many envied the happiness of those that lived in the time when Jesus Christ was visible on earth, when every one could enjoy his presence, speak to him face to face, and ask him for favors: "But," she said, "have we not in the Blessed Sacrament this same Jesus, our Saviour, who not only causes us to enjoy there his presence, but gives us as food his sacred flesh and his entire self?" Such is the assurance which Jesus Christ himself gives you to-day from this altar, from which he says to you: My children, you must know that this bread with which you are soon to nourish yourselves is not bread, but it is my own body: Take ye, and eat: This is My body. [13598] Reanimate, then, your faith. You must have a lively faith to communicate with devotion. Tell me: who is it that lives in the Blessed Sacrament? It is Jesus Christ. Let each one say to himself: Ah, my Jesus, I believe firmly, because Thou hast said so, that Thou art all entirely with body, soul, divinity, in the consecrated Host. I believe that in receiving Thee I receive this same Son of God, who was made man and who died for me on the cross. Yes, my Saviour and my God, in this sacrament I adore Thee with my whole heart, and I unite my adoration to that which is paid to Thee by the angels and the Most Blessed Virgin.

Act of Humility and of Contrition.—In olden times the deacon before Holy Communion addressed to the people these words: If any one is not holy let him not approach the Blessed Sacrament. My dear Brethren, you wish this morning to receive Jesus Christ; but are you holy? If you are not, at least humble yourselves and say: I am not worthy. O Lord! I am not worthy to receive Thee; I am not worthy even to appear in Thy presence. On account of my sins, I should merit to be driven from the church and to be cast into hell. But no, my Brethren, Jesus Christ does not wish, that you should omit approaching him and even receiving him; he has said: Him that cometh to Me, I will not cast out.[13599] He who comes to me with a repentant heart, etc, I will not repel. Have you understood me? Approach, then, this sweet Master; but approach with tears, on account of the sins that you have committed. (Here the crucifix is held in the hand.) Say to him: See, O Lord! the traitor whom Thou hast loved so much and who has been so ungrateful to Thee. My God, I trust that Thou hast already pardoned me; but if Thou hast not yet pardoned me, ah! do pardon me now before I received Thee; I am sorry, etc.

EXHORTATION OF PEACE BEFORE COMMUNION.[13600]

But you must know, my Brethren, that Jesus Christ declares in the Gospel that pardon is granted to him who pardons: Forgive, and you shall be forgiven.[13601] He who does not forgive, how can he hope for forgiveness? How could this Lamb, who is so full of love and mercy, contentedly enter a soul filled with hatred? He has specially ordained that priests should refuse Communion to those that bear hatred toward others when he says: Give not that which is holy to dogs.[13602] By the word dogs we here understand, according to the interpreters, those that bear hatred like infuriated dogs. The angels also give notice that the dogs should be kept out of the church: Without are dogs. [13603] St. Augustine says that hatred toward our neighbor renders us children of the devil; and according to St. Thomas, the sacrament of the altar, this heavenly bread, should be given only to the children of God, and not to vindictive dogs who are the children of the devil.

Let him, therefore, tremble who wishes to receive holy Communion with hatred in his heart; he might experience to-day what is related of a woman who, preserving in her heart enmity towards another woman, dared to present herself before the Holy Table to fulfil the Paschal duty. As this enmity was public, the priest refused her Communion; then, in order not to undergo this affront she declared, yet not with sincerity, that she forgave her enemy. After Mass, the other woman having advanced towards her at the door of the church to thank her for her pardon, she answered: "What pardon? What are you talking about? I would rather die on the gallows than pardon you." Scarcely had she uttered these words when she became black in the face and fell dead to the floor; before the eyes of all, her mouth immediately opened, and the consecrated Host, which she had just received, came out of it and remained suspended in the air until a priest came and respectfully placed it upon the paten. The corpse of the unfortunate woman, like that of a dog, was afterwards thrown upon a dunghill. Would any of you wish to be exposed this morning to the same fate? He who desires to communicate should banish from his heart all rancor, etc.

Now, my dear Brethren, you have a sweet consolation to give to the heart of Jesus Christ. Arise, then, all of you, and hear what you should do: you should all become reconciled with one another; let every one who has received an injury, go to embrace the person who has offended him, and forgive him, for the love of Jesus Christ. Ye boys and girls, go each of you in search of your father and your mother, and on your knees before them ask the ir pardon for all the displeasure that you have caused them, etc. Afterwards, let all approach those who have given offence; let the men embrace the men, and let the women embrace the women. Well, then, let all of you obey. Peace! peace! let hatred be far from you, now that the King of peace is about to enter your hearts, etc. (At this moment all the missionaries, surrounding the hearers, exhort the faithful to become reconciled with one another.)

ACTS OF DESIRE IMMEDIATELY BEFORE COMMUNION

One day St. Catharine of Sienna, arriving late at the church for receiving holy Communion, Jesus appeared to her, his face very pale, as if he were about to faint away. The saint asked him the reason of this, and Jesus answered: "My daughter, it is to make known to thee how greatly I desire that thou shouldst come to receive me; come and receive me immediately." Devout souls, you desire to receive Jesus Christ; but know that he still more desires to receive you. This whole past night our Lord has been, so to speak, occupied in counting the moments, waiting for the morning, in order to give himself to your hearts. Prepare yourselves, then; in a few moments he will come. Let us say the Confiteor. (The missionary himself recites the Confiteor in a loud voice; and when the priest who is at the altar has said the Misereatur, etc., he continues): Come, ye ministers of God, hasten to give Jesus Christ to these faithful souls, who desire to unite themselves to their wellbeloved Lord, and to satisfy Jesus Christ himself who wishes to console them. (Here Ecce Agnus Dei is said.) Already, my Brethren, Jesus is coming to you; here he is; but before he enters your hearts, ardently invite him, saying: Come, my Jesus, the desire of my soul! Pray to the Blessed Virgin to present you to her divine Son herself. Oh, what a joy, what a feast, for the angels this morning! Let the bells ring, let the organ resound. Here the king of heaven, the divine Spouse, is coming to unite himself to you; receive him with a heart binning with love; call him by sighs full of tenderness. Come, my Jesus! come, my God! I love Thee, and I wish to love Thee always. (At this moment, during the ringing of the bells and the playing of the organ, the preacher is silent; only from time to time, during holy Communion and the playing of the organ, he proposes in a few words some motive of fervor and pronounces some act or resolution; for example): O Lord! in future I will amend my life. Deign to receive me today; I give myself entirely to Thee. Thou shalt be in future my only love. If I should be ever in danger of offending Thee, rather let me die at this moment. Tell me what Thou wishest of me; I will do in all things Thy holy will. Most Holy Virgin Mary, attach me entirely to my Jesus, etc.

THANKSGIVING AFTER COMMUNION

Thanksgiving is usually composed of five acts; namely: acts of welcome, thanksgiving, oblation, good resolution, and petition. We give here some examples:

1. ACT OF WELCOME.—Faithful soul, now that you have communicated, see you are now with your God; he dwells in you, as he himself has said: He that eateth My flesh . . . abideth in Me, and I in him.[13604] Reanimate, then, your faith; adore Jesus Christ, who has come to you; welcome him, embrace him, entertain him. Think that Jesus Christ has given himself entirely to you, and say to him: O Lord! whither hast Thou come? what good didst Thou see in me that could have induced Thee to dwell in my heart? Ah! be Thou welcome; I adore Thee; I embrace Thee; I press Thee to my bosom so that Thou mayest never leave me.

2. ACT OF THANKSGIVING.—What do you say? He well deserves to be thanked, he who is the King of heaven, who has deigned this morning to enter your heart. If a king of this earth would enter your house, what thanks, etc.! Thank him, therefore. But what words can suffice to thank a God who descends from heaven to visit a wretched being who has offended him? Thank him at least as well as you can; tell him: O Lord! what can I say to Thee, what can I do, to thank Thee as Thou dost deserve? O saints of paradise! O holy angels! O most blessed Virgin Mary! help me to thank Jesus Christ, who has given himself to me.

3. ACT OF LOVE.—But do you wish to know, devout soul, what is the best thanks that you can give to Jesus Christ? It is to say to him: My Jesus, I love Thee.—He wishes that you should love him; it is in order to be loved by you that he has given himself to you. Love him, then; and offer yourself entirely to him by saying to him: Yes, my Jesus, I love Thee with my whole he art; and as Thou hast given Thyself entirely to me, I give myself entirely to Thee. Deign to receive me; I give Thee my body, my understanding, my will, and all that I am. I belong no longer to myself, I belong to Thee; dispose of me as Thou pleasest. It is sufficient for me to love Thee, my Jesus; I desire nothing more.

4. ACT OF A GOOD RESOLUTION.—Oh, what consolation do I feel this morning, my dear Brethren, in seeing you all united with Jesus Christ! But a sad thought troubles me; it is this: Who knows whether some one among you may not again banish Jesus Christ from his soul? Our Lord, on the night before his Passion, and on which he instituted the Blessed Sacrament, turned to his disciples and sorrowfully said to them that one of them would betray him: One of you is about to betray Me.[13605] Ah! it seems to me that I hear Jesus Christ saying at this moment: Many of you who have just received me will again betray me. Alas! my Brethren, could there be among you any one who, after so many graces, would yet be disposed, etc.? I beg you to renew your good resolution; promise the Lord to suffer all evils rather than lose him again. Say to him: Yes, my God, I have offended Thee; I have lived long enough away from Thee; the time that remains to me I no longer wish to employ to offend Thee any more: no, it is not what Thou hast deserved; I wish to use my time only to love Thee. To-day I give Thee my word: I am resolved to die rather than displease Thee again; I am resolved to lose all rather than Thy holy grace.

5. ACT OF PETITION.—But of what use are these promises if God does not give you the grace to keep them? Now, our Lord, in order to give us his graces, wishes that we should ask him for them, especially after Communion. St. Teresa says that, when Jesus Christ comes into the soul, he there places himself, as it were, on a throne of mercy and says: What wilt thou that I should do to thee?[13606] Cherished soul, ask me what thou desirest; I have come to grant thee graces, etc.—Open, then, your hearts, represent to the Lord your miseries, your wants, and ask him for graces; ask him, above all, for holy perseverance and for his love.—Say with me: O Lord, my God! since instead of sending me to hell Thou didst wish with so much love to visit my soul to-day, deign to console me by granting me holy perseverance; do not allow it ever to happen that I should separate myself from Thee. If Thou seest that I shall lose Thee, let me rather die before I leave this church. Ask him also for the grace of loving him: My God change in me this ungrateful heart: let me forget all, in order to love only Thee, who hast loved me so much; give me Thy love; I wish nothing more.—Jesus Christ has promised us that all the graces that we ask of his eternal Father in his name will be granted to us: Amen, amen I say to you: if you ask the Father anything in My name, He will give it you.[13607] Let us then pray to the eternal Father in the name of Jesus Christ, that he may grant us these graces of holy perseverance and of his love: My God, for the love of Thy Son, give me and to us all holy perseverance and Thy love.—Ask him at the same time for the grace of always praying to him for perseverance; for he who does not continue to ask for it, will not have it. Let us also pray to the Blessed Virgin to obtain it for us, etc.

Then a Pater and an Ave are recited for the bishop, the authorities of the place, the parish-priest, and the priests, the governor, the landlord of the house where the Fathers are staying, and finally for the Fathers themselves. We finish by giving the benediction with the holy ciborium, and then make the people ask again for perseverance, and say at the moment when the Blessed Sacrament is inclosed in the tabernacle: Now, my Brethren, send your hearts into this tabernacle to be inclosed there with Jesus Christ, in order that they may always remain united with him. The tabernacle, having been shut, its key is put into the hands of the statue of Mary with the petition that she should herself guard the hearts of all those that are present, so that they may never more be separated from Jesus Christ.

Chapter V

THE LITTLE CATECHISM, OR THE CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE TAUGHT THE CHILDREN, AND THE LITTLE SERMON THAT IS PREACHED TO THEM AFTERWARDS

I. THE METHOD TO BE FOLLOWED IN TEACHING CATECHISM

THE VARIOUS POINTS TO BE OBSERVED ARE THE FOLLOWING:

1. The manner of explaining the doctrine should be simple and familiar, and adapted to the intelligence of the children, and of uninstructed adults who often come to listen.

2. To the explanation of the mystery or of a precept some short moral should always be added; for example: After having explained what one understands by a God who is a rewarder, we may say: See what good is derived from the service of God, and what evil is caused by sin, etc.—In the same way, when treating of the Incarnation of Jesus Christ: See what love the Son of God has had for us.—When speaking of the second commandment of God: It is a great sin to blaspheme, and great will be the punishment of the blasphemer in hell, ect.—Besides, it will be well to quote some appropriate example, and also to counsel some practice, such as: When you are tempted to anger, say: O Lord! give me patience. Mary, my Mother, help me.—But these moral applications should be short; otherwise they become instructions, sermons, as is the case with some missionaries who make sermons out of all the exercises.

3. After the explanation of the mystery, the precept, or the sacrament, we put questions to two or three children, in order that the truths taught may remain impressed on their minds; we then present to them a little picture, telling, however, the children that such a present is never given to those that ask for it.

4. We should frequently recall to the mind of the hearers the three great means of keeping one's self in the grace of God, namely: the first, to avoid sinful occasions and bad companions; the second, always to recommend one's self to God by prayer, and especially in temptations by invoking Jesus and Mary; the third, to frequent the sacraments.

5. The catechist should show authority from the beginning, so that the children may not become too familiar. Moreover, he should guard against using abusive language against those that do not answer well, or charging the priests of the place with negligence; he should rather blame the children for having been careless in coming to instructions in catechism. He shall positively keep from striking the children, either with the hand or with a stick, even though they should behave improperly, because thereby great trouble may arise. He should rather call to his assistance the priests of the place, that they may keep the children quiet.

II. WHAT SHOULD BE EXPLAINED TO THE CHILDREN DURING THE MISSION

We should explain to the children during the mission the following three points:

1. The mysteries of our holy faith; 2. The sacraments, especially penance and Eucharist; 3. The commandments of God and those of the Church, except the sixth commandment of the Decalogue, which should not be explained to the children,—it will suffice to tell them, without comment, that this commandment forbids all shameful sins.

1. THE MYSTERIES OF OUR HOLY FAITH

We therefore explain, in the first place, the mysteries that we should believe, and before all, the four principal ones: 1. The existence of God, and his perfections; 2. This God is a just rewarder; 3. The mystery of the Holy Trinity; 4. The incarnation and the death of Jesus Christ.

Previously we explain the motive for believing the truths of faith, that God himself, the infallible truth, who can neither deceive nor be deceived, has revealed them to the holy Church, and that the Church teaches us these truths.

1. We explain that there exists only one God, the sovereign good, who possesses all perfections: he is infinite in goodness and beauty; he is the Creator of the universe; all-powerful, he can do all that he wishes; immense, he is in every place; eternal, he has always been, and will always be.

2. We explain that God is a just rewarder; on the one hand, he rewards the just eternally in paradise after having made them pass through purgatory if there still remains any temporal punishment due to the faults that they have committed; on the other hand, he condemns sinners to hell, where they must suffer for all eternity.

3. We explain the mystery of the Holy Trinity,, namely: in God there are three Persons, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; but these three Persons are only one God, because they are only one and the same substance, one and the same essence, and they have the same divinity and the same perfection: hence, as the Father is eternal, the Son is also, etc.; the Father does not proceed from any other, the Son, who is also called the Word, proceeds from the Father from all eternity, being begotten of the Father by intelligence; the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son by the will, or by the love that the Father and the Son bear to each other.

4. We explain the incarnation and the death of Jesus Christ by saying that the Son of God, the second Person of the Blessed Trinity, has taken a body and has become man in the womb of Mary, always Virgin, through the operation of the Holy Ghost, and that he is called Jesus Christ. Hence Jesus Christ is true God and true man: as man he suffered and he died on the cross to save sinners; but he arose the third day after his death; he afterwards ascended to heaven, where he sits at the right hand of the Father: this means that he possesses a glory equal to that of his Father. At our death he comes to judge us in the particular judgment; and at the end of the world, he will come to judge all men in the universal judgment after they have risen, their souls being united again with their own bodies.

Afterwards we also explain that there is only one true Church, the Roman Catholic Church, outside of which there is no salvation. We explain the Communion of the Saints, which consists in this: that all the faithful in the state of grace participate in the merits of the good works of one another.

2. THE SACRAMENTS

In the second place, we explain the seven sacraments: Baptism, Confirmation, Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unction, Holy Orders, and Matrimony. We say that these sacraments have been instituted by Jesus Christ, and that they are the means by which we receive the graces which our Saviour has merited for us by his Passion.

1. By Baptism our souls receive the grace of God, and are purified from every sin, original and actual.

2. By Confirmation they acquire the power of resisting temptations and combating fearlessly for the faith.

3–4. (As to Eucharist and Penance, we shall speak of them afterwards.)

1. By Extreme Unction we receive the help necessary to overcome the temptations of the devil at the hour of death, the rest of the sins are effaced, and we even obtain the health of the body if it be useful for the soul.

2. By the Sacrament of Holy Orders we receive the spiritual power and the graces necessary to exercise it well.

3. By the Sacrament of Matrimony man and woman receive the grace necessary to fulfil the duties of the conjugal state, and to bring up their children according to the law of God.

We afterwards explain more at length the Sacrament of the Eucharist and the Sacrament of Penance.

I. As for the EUCHARIST, there are several things that must be explained, namely:

1. This sacrament really contains Jesus Christ living, as he is in heaven, his body, his soul, and his divinity; for after the priest at Mass has consecrated the Host, this Host, although it preserves the color and the taste of bread, yet it is no longer bread, but the body of Jesus Christ; so the consecrated wine is n0 longer wine, but the blood of Jesus Christ; so that we must adore the sacrament of the altar as we adore God.

2. When the Host is broken, Jesus Christ is not divided; he remains entire in each particle. Besides, Jesus Christ really remains in him who receives him, until the sacramental species are consumed.

3. He that communicates receives help and strength to live in the grace of God; for as earthly bread preserves the temporal life of the body, so the heavenly bread preserves the spiritual life of the soul.

4. To communicate well there are dispositions required on the part of the body and on the part of the soul. On the part of the body, we must be fasting, having neither eaten nor drunk anything since midnight. If we have taken anything in the mouth without swallowing it, this would not prevent us from receiving Communion. On the part of the soul, we must be in the state of grace. If we commit a mortal sin, we must confess it before communicating; and if we do not confess it, we would render ourselves guilty of sacrilege, excepting only in certain rare cases of necessity, for example: if we remember the sin only when we are at the altar railing, and when we could not withdraw without scandalizing those that are present, it will then be sufficient to make an act of contrition. We should be still more guilty if we dared to communicate after having omitted, through shame, to declare to the confessor a mortal sin that we have committed. Those who have only venial sins, will do well to confess them; but if we communicate with these sins on our consciences, we would not commit a sacrilege.

5. We conclude by instructing the children on the great good that is derived from holy Communion; we tell them how advantageous it is to receive it frequently, and above all to occupy one's self after having received it with thanking Jesus Christ for such a favor, and with asking for the graces of which one stands in need.

II. As for the sacrament of PENANCE, we should explain more at length the five things that are necessary to make a good confession, that is: Examination of conscience, sorrow, purpose of amendment, confession, and penance.

1. On the subject of the examination of conscience, we explain that it should precede confession, and should be made carefully, according to the time since we have not confessed, and according to the number of sins that we have committed.

2. SORROW, or contrition, should be true, super natural, universal, sovereign, and full of confidence: TRUE, that is, produced by a sincere regret of having offended God; SUPERNATURAL, or conceived not on account of natural motives, as the loss of goods or of reputation, but on account of having offended God, the infinite goodness, or of having deserved hell, etc., according as one has contrition or attrition with a beginning of love, as we shall afterwards explain; UNIVERSAL, comprising all the mortal sins committed since the last confession, which was well made; SOVEREIGN, SO that one regrets the loss of the grace of God more than any other loss; FULL OF CONFIDENCE, by hoping to obtain from God, through the merits of Jesus Christ, the pardon of all our sins.—Moreover, this sorrow is either perfect or imperfect. It is perfect, and it is called CONTRITION, when one repents of sin because it has offended the goodness of God. It is imperfect, and it is called ATTRITION, when, after having offended God (the offence given to God should always be the object of sorrow), one repents on account of paradise, which one has lost, or on account of hell, which one has deserved, or on account of the supernatural and particular heinousness of the sin committed. We therefore detest sin with contrition, because it is an evil in regard to God, and with attrition, because it is an evil in regard to ourselves. It must be added that with attrition alone one receives only pardon when one receives the absolution of the confessor; while with contrition one obtains it at once before receiving absolution, provided one has the intention of confessing one's sins. All theologians agree that to attrition should be united INITIAL LOVE, that is, a be ginning of the love that we owe to God, which beginning of love already exists implicitly, as theologians commonly say, in the hope or even in the desire which the penitent has of obtaining by confession the pardon of his sins and the friendship of God.

1. *The PURPOSE of amendment must be firm, univer*sal, and efficacious: FIRM, that is, one should be able resolutely to say: I wish (and not I should wish) with God's help to keep from sin; UNIVERSAL, so that one wishes to keep from every sin without exception; EFFICACIOUS, we are thereby induced to use all the necessary means not to fall back again into them, and to avoid the voluntary proximate occasions; for if one promises only to avoid sin, without avoiding the proximate occasions, the purpose is not good.

2. In CONFESSION, it is useful to declare venial sins; however, it is not necessary, since we can obtain pardon of them by other means, such as an act of contrition or an act of love. But we must necessarily confess the mortal sins that we remember to have committed; and if we do not confess them, the confession would be sacrilegious and null: we would then have to confess them again by declaring not only the sin or the sins that we have omitted to tell, but also those sins that we told in the bad confession, together with the sacrilege that we have committed. If the penitent forgets some grievous sin without his fault, the confession is good; but when he remembers the sin, he must confess it in his next confession.

Finally, we must accept the PENANCE imposed by the confessor, and perform it as soon as possible; if it should happen that it is impossible for us to perform it, we should have it commuted either by the same confes*sor or by another.*

3. THE COMMANDMENTS OF GOD AND THE COMMANDMENTS OF THE CHURCH

In the third place, we briefly explain the precepts of the Decalogue.

The first commandment, which ordains the adoration of God, commands the exercise of the three theological virtues, namely: of faith, by believing all the truths of faith enumerated above; of hope, by hoping in the mercy and power of God, and in the promises that he has made to us, through the merits of Jesus Christ, of obtaining paradise, and all the graces necessary to obtain it; of charity, by loving God above all things, and our neighbor as ourselves. This first commandment also imposes upon us the obligation of asking God for help, that we may keep ourselves in the state of grace and obtain salvation.

The second, which forbids the taking of the name of God in vain, forbids us to blaspheme God, or the saints, or the holy days, or things holy. It also forbids false oaths. (We here explain that to SWEAR BY MY CONSCIENCE is not a real oath.) Moreover, it imposes the duty of fulfilling the vows that one makes with the intention of binding one's self.

The third, which ordains the sanctification of holy days, commands us to hear Mass, and to abstain from servile work, unless there is a necessity, such as may arise during the vintage, the harvest, etc.

The fourth commands us to honor our parents; that is, to respect them, to obey them, and to love them by helping them in their spiritual and temporal wants.

The fifth forbids us to kill or unjustly to strike our neighbor, and even to wish him any evil, as also to rejoice at the evil and to grow sad at the good that befalls him.

The sixth forbids all immodest thoughts, words, and actions.

The seventh forbids us to take, to retain, or to damage the property of another against his will.

The eighth forbids us not only to give false testimony, but also (1) to form rash judgments by misjudging our neighbor without a reason; (2) to speak ill of our neighbor either by falsely ascribing to him some fault; or by making known his hidden though real faults, unless it be necessary to manifest them in order to remedy a great evil,—and on this point it must be observed that it is a sin not only to detract or to calumniate any one, but even to listen voluntarily to detraction or calumny; (3) to dishonor our neighbor by action or by word; (4) to tell lies, especially when the lies are injurious to others.

The ninth forbids us to give consent to impure thoughts.

The tenth forbids us to covet what belongs to our neighbor, as also to wish him evil, or to rejoice at the evil done, with regard to his worldly goods.

There are live commandments of the Church, namely:

1. To hear Mass every Sunday and holy day; 2. To fast during Lent, on the Ember days, and on the vigils, and to abstain from meat on Friday and Saturdays;[13608] 3. To confess at least once a year, and to receive Communion at least at Easter in one's own parish; 4. To pay tithes wherever they are due;[13609] 5. Not to solemnize marriage at the forbidden times.

III. THE LITTLE SERMON, ADDRESSED TO THE CHILDREN, AFTER CATECHISM

There is no doubt that the missions are useful not only to adults, but also to children; nevertheless it has been remarked that during the great sermon, which is the most important of the mission, the children create the greatest disorder; for understanding only a little of what is preached they pay but little attention, and spend the time in talking, playing, and pushing one another; this is a source of constant trouble to the preacher and the hearers. It has therefore been thought expedient, as is practised in the missions of our Congregation, to make the children leave the church at the beginning of the great sermon, and to assemble them in another church or in a chapel, where, after they have received an instruction in catechism, we address to them a short discourse, which is followed by an act of contrition. This special exercise is certainly much more profitable to the children than if they listened to the great sermon; for the discourse is in accordance with their weak comprehension; we employ in it forms and expressions that, are suitable to them, without Latin texts and without division of points. We conclude by having them make an act of contrition before the crucifix. Before beginning, some pious hymn is chanted.

This discourse is composed of five parts: 1. The introduction with the proposition, which may take its place; 2. The amplification; 3. The example; 4. The moral application; 5. The conclusion, with the act of contrition.

EXAMPLE OF A LITTLE SERMON ADDRESSED TO THE CHILDREN AFTER CATECHISM

DEATH

1. INTRODUCTION.—Death is certain. Whoever is born into this world is born condemned to death. Sooner or later, young or old, each one must die.

2. AMPLIFICATION.—My dear children, it is certain that you all must die. We know not whether you will be rich or poor, whether you will have good or bad health, whether you will die in bed or elsewhere, whether you will die old or young; it may be that you will die before having reached the age of fifteen or twenty: how many are there who have died in this place even before this age! But, however this may be, my friends, had you many years to live, a day will come when you will find yourselves about to die, and abandoned by every one; for then from the room of the dying person are dismissed his parents, his brothers, his sisters, and all the rest; you will then remain alone with the crucifix on one side, and on the other your spiritual Father, who will make the recommendation of the soul, and will say to you, mentioning your name: N., go forth from this place, go forth from this world. —And whither should you go? Into eternity, into paradise or into hell, to rejoice forever with God, etc., or to burn forever, etc.—Then the devils will surround you, to make you despair by placing before your eyes all your sins. How you are to be pitied at this moment! etc. And if you were to die suddenly?

3. EXAMPLE.—Listen to this example. A boy used often to go to confession; and everyone took him to be a saint. One night he had a hemorrhage, and he was found dead. His parents went at once to his confessor, and crying begged him to recommend him to God; and he said to them: "Rejoice; your son, I know, was a little angel; God wished to take him from this world, and he must now be in heaven; should he, however, be still in purgatory, I will go to say Mass for him." He put on his vestments to go to the altar; but before leaving the sacristy, he saw himself in the presence of a frightful spectre, whom he asked in the name of God who he was. The phantom answered that he was the soul of him that had just died. Oh! is it you? exclaimed the priest; if you are in need of prayers, I am just going to say Mass for you.—Alas! Mass! I am damned, I am in hell!—And why?—"Hear," said the soul: "I had never yet committed a mortal sin; but last night a bad thought came to my mind; I gave consent to it, and God made me die at once, and condemned me to hell as I have deserved to be. Do not say Mass for me; it would only increase my sufferings." Having spoken thus, the phantom disappeared.

4. Moral Application.—NOW, my dear children, tell me: if you were to die now, what would be your death? where would you go? Take courage, then! profit by this mission and make the resolution to sanctify yourselves, never to commit those shameful sins, nevermore to utter curses, blasphemies, bad words, never to take what does not belong to you, never to bear hatred against your neighbor, etc.—Reflect well on this: would you like to die as this unfortunate boy died, whose end you have heard was so terrible?

5. CONCLUSION.—As for the past, for the sins that you have committed, what are you to do now? Should you despair? No; God does not wish you to despair; he wishes that you should ask his pardon, because he wishes to pardon you. Now kneel down, and amid tears and sighs ask pardon of God, etc. (Here the act of contrition is made, two or three motives of repentance being given, for example): Ah! if you were to die this day, this night, on which you had fallen into sin, what would become of you? where would you be? Thank Jesus Christ, your Saviour, with a sincere repentance, etc. What do you say? do you wish to die in the arms of Jesus Christ? But if you wish that Jesus should embrace you, you should weep, etc. (While speaking of death, in the act of contrition, it will be well to exhibit a skull, and also to call to mind a boy now dead who was known to the children, by mentioning his name; for example): O N.! where are you now? What a misfortune if you are damned!

This example of a little sermon is given here in an abridged form; it should be made longer; for with the act of contrition it may last about half an hour or three quarters of an hour, after the instruction in catechism, which lasts half an hour. It must be remarked that not many things should be said to the children, and that it is better to repeat to them the same truths or practices, in order that they may fix them upon their minds, and thus begin to put them in practice.

Chapter VI

THE LARGE CATECHISM, OR Instruction FOR THE PEOPLE

THE large catechism, or instruction for the people, is one of the most important of the mission; the priest who is charged with this duty should be well instructed, and should have had great experience in the office of hearing confessions, in order to know how to discover the illusions and the innermost recesses of consciences, so as to apply suitable remedies.

This instruction[13610] is composed of several parts. It begins with the introduction, the exposition of the subject, and the division; these form the EXORDIUM.—Then comes the EXPLANATION of the mystery, or of the sacrament, or of the commandment, to be followed by the MORAL APPLICATION, with the practice. At the end we answer objections, or excuses brought forward by persons that have no tender consciences; then we briefly sum up, in the form of an EPILOGUE, what has been said in the instruction, and finish with the Christian acts.

1. The INTRODUCTION is drawn from the preceding instruction, so as to unite the material and to refresh the memory by summing up what has been said the evening before. This is done, however, only when the things have some connection with one another; otherwise the introduction is formed by announcing the importance of the subject which one wishes to treat. As for the EXPOSITION, if there is question of a commandment, we take care to distinguish all that it contains.

The DIVISION of the points serves to elucidate better the material, and to impress better on the minds of the hearers the truths that one exposes to them. These three members, as has already been said, form a sort of EXORDIUM; hence they should be very short.

1. We enter, then, into the EXPLANATION of the mystery, or of the sacrament, or of the commandment. What one teaches should be confirmed by authorities—a few of them to be cited briefly—as well from reasons as from facts that refer to the subject. It is especially useful to employ comparisons, which should be clearly exposed.

2. Thence we pass to the MORAL APPLICATION by observing that one should not only enlighten the mind, but should also move the will of the hearers to flee from vice, and to use the remedies and the means necessary to avoid them; many more sins are committed by a bad disposition of the will than by ignorance. The moral application should also be short; it should be announced with animation, but without adopting the preaching tone and without outbursts of the voice. Sometimes, in the instruction, it is useful to raise the voice against a vice, or a maxim of the world, or an excuse made by people who lead a bad life; but these oratorical bursts should be short and rare, in order to avoid the defect of some who make sermons out of their instructions, confounding this last exercise with the first.

We should, above all things, take care, in giving the instruction, to insinuate practical things by teaching the people the very words that it will be proper for them to say when an occasion presents itself of putting in practice what has been indicated; for example: if one receives from another an injury or some annoyance, let him say to him: May God make you a saint! I shall pray to God to enlighten you.—So also when any one has met with some loss or other adversity, let him say: May all be for the love of God! May the will of God be done!—This kind of practice should be repeated many times, in order that it may remain impressed upon the memory of simple and uninstructed people, who do not understand, or who soon forget the Latin texts and other things; they can remember only these short and easy practices which are taught them, and which are often repeated to them.

The catechist should also speak of certain excuses or frivolous difficulties which some are accustomed to bring forward in order to palliate their faults; these are, for example, some of the false reasons: that they have not the means of living without taking the property of another; that others do the same; that they are not saints; that they are flesh and blood; that such a neighbor or such a relative is the cause of their sins. Moreover, it should be declared that if any one would be inclined to revenge himself in case he had received an injury, he would be continually in a state of sin and that he could not justify himself by the worldly maxim that a man must take care of his honor. These false and wicked reasons should be forcibly and warmly refuted, so that the hearers may free their minds from certain prejudices which they hold to be maxims. This is the cause why many always remain in sin, and end in losing their souls.

The instruction is concluded in the EPILOGUE, which is a summary, as short and as substantial as it can be, of the doctrine that has been taught; and at the end we leave to the hearers, as a remembrance, a maxim of religion adapted to the subject and capable of making an impression.

These rules are common to all catechetical instructions; but as for those that are given during the missions a few more remarks should be made.

I.—In the first place, as to the subjects which are to be explained in the missions, the instruction is restricted chiefly to three points, the same that have already been spoken of in the little catechism, namely: 1. The mysteries; 2. The sacraments, especially the sacrament of penance; 3. The commandments of God and of the Church. But in the large catechism these subjects should be explained more at length, with more details, and in another manner, by making the things that we teach rest on authorities and reasons.

There are catechists who think that it is better to speak first of confession, and then of the commandments. For my part I find it preferable to begin by the commandments; for if we explain them towards the end of the mission, it will easily happen that this explanation will raise scruples in the consciences of the hearers; this will oblige them to go to confession again, and thus we should lose much time. If, however, we should wish to join the explanation of the commandments to that of the first part of the confession, which is the examination of conscience, this would also be well.

And as the greatest utility of the missions consists perhaps, and even without doubt, in the reparation of sacrilegious confessions, we must insist on this point in every instruction: in showing how great is the malice of sacrilege, and how many souls are lost through the weakness that they show when they conceal their sins in confession. Many unfortunate persons, overcome by shame, even when they confess to the missionaries, as we know from experience, continue to conceal their sins; now, if there be one who in the mission has not the coinage to repair the confessions he has made badly, how can he escape losing his soul? If he has not overcome his shame when he confesses to a missionary, how will he overcome it when he returns to his ordinary confessor? It is for this reason, as has been already said, that we must always insist on this point. For this purpose it is customary in our missions that the catechist, at the end of his instruction and before the recitation of the Christian acts, always recites a terrible example—and these examples are numerous—of a soul damned for having concealed sins in confession. This is not conformable to the rules of art, since the example does not always correspond to the instruction; but it corresponds to the end of the missions, which are chiefly given to remedy sacrilegious confessions. It is sufficient to introduce the example in these words: Take care, then, to confess all the sins that you have committed, according as I have told you to-day, and do not through shame omit anything.

II.—It is a strange error on the part of catechists when they fill their instructions with fine words, scholastic questions, and witticisms, while the poor people are asking for substantial bread, with which they could be nourished so easily.

1. As for expressions, the common rule is that the style of the instruction should be altogether simple and popular without descending to what is silly and low; this is never necessary, and is unsuitable to the pulpit. The period should be short and concise. It is often useful to ask questions, which the catechist answers himself; this is a means of keeping the hearers more attentive, and of impressing better 0n their memory the things that are said.

2. As for scholastic questions, they are suitable for the literary exercises of theologians, and not for the instruction of the people from the pulpit; since the hearers consist mostly of those that are but little instructed, and that do not understand these questions, or at least cannot derive any profit from them. If there happens to be among the hearers a learned man, if he is prudent and discreet, he will praise this simple manner of instructing the people, and he will blame the catechist who acts otherwise.

3. Finally, as to witticisms, I beg my dear reader to consider well what I am now writing. I do not deny that certain catechists adopt this style, saying that it is useful in order to attract the people to the instruction as well as to keep their attention, and to prevent them from growing tired. But for myself I know thus much: it is this: that the saints, in their instructions, did not make people laugh, but they made them cry. We read in the life of St. John Francis Regis that in his missions the people who heard his sermons, as well as his many instructions, did not cease to weep from beginning to end.

Here at least is what I say: If any one wishes to indulge in some pleasantry which naturally arises from the subject that is treated, such a thing might be allowed; while speaking, for example, of men that have a bad conscience, it would be proper to relate the ridiculous excuses that they make; the same thing may be said of other similar cases. But to wish to make a comical scene of the instruction by relating witty anecdotes, odd stories, with expressions and gestures, the object of which is to excite the laughter of the hearers, I do not know how that can agree with the respect due to the church in which one is, and with the pulpit from which one teaches the word of God, and in which the catechist appears as the minister of Jesus Christ. It is true that people take pleasure in hearing witty things, and things that will make them laugh; but I ask, What benefit can be derived from such a practice? Certainly, after they have laughed, the hearers will find themselves so distracted and so much deprived of piety that it will be difficult for them to recollect themselves again; and often, instead of listening to the moral application which our facetious catechist must draw from his witty remarks in order not to be regarded as a charlatan, they will think only of that which has made them laugh. Were there even no other inconvenience connected therewith, the catechist who delights in saying facetious things, and in indulging in pleasantries, will surely not acquire among the hearers the reputation of a saint, or of a soul filled with the love of God; the most that he can obtain would be to be regarded as an amusing and agreeable man. Moreover, it is a mistake to believe that without these pleasantries many people will not come to the instruction nor pay attention to it. I even say that many more will come, and that they will listen with greater attention, when they see that they do not lose any time, that the hearing of an instruction is not merely a simple amusement, but that it is a useful exercise disposing them to virtue and to piety.

III.—We should guard against exposing certain doctrines that might produce some laxity of conscience. Such doctrine may well be applied to some one in particular when he comes to confession; but when announced in the pulpit, it may injure the hearers who are inclined to be lax: for from this doctrine, which is otherwise just and useful when it is applied under the required circumstances, they may perhaps draw lax and unwarrantable conclusions.

Nevertheless, it is good and even necessary to enlighten the erroneous consciences of those that look upon that to be a sin which is not a sin. There are, for example, persons that think that they have rash suspicions or rash judgments, and that they commit sin even when there exists a reason sufficient for suspecting or judging. Some take it to be a grave sin to curse the years, the days, the wind, or the rain: others think that it is wicked slander if they make known to parents the thefts, the bad habits, or other faults of their children, even when this is necessary so as to remedy the evil. Others believe that they are committing sin when they do not keep a certain commandment of the Church, for example, to hear Mass, to fast, even in cases when they have received a dispensation, etc.—It must be explained that these are not sins, or that in regard to the circumstances they are not mortal sins.

We should, on the other hand, indicate the sins that are certain, especially those that are the cause of other grievous sins; for example: we must teach the people that he who does not avoid the voluntary proximate occasion of mortal sin sins grievously even when he would not have the intention of committing sin, and when he would not know that it is a grave sin to expose one's self to this occasion; for, when one exposes one's self to a similar occasion, it is morally certain that he will fall into sin.

We should instruct women in regard to superstitious things or vain observances, although they practice them in good faith. We must also inform them that they are in a bad state when they take pleasure in having and seek to have men to long for them without intending to be married.

Besides, there are persons that do not look upon it as a grievous sin to curse holy-days or holy things; we should enlighten them on this point: otherwise they will contract a habit of it; and if this habit is once contracted, they cannot get rid of it, even after they acknowledge that such curses are grievous faults.

When speaking of the sixth commandment, we should avoid scandalizing the innocent by awakening their curiosity in regard to the evil of which they are ignorant; it is sufficient, on this point, to condemn in general what offends chastity, without explaining the species or the circumstances; so that those that are guilty may understand how they should confess them, and those that are innocent may remain in their ignorance. We must, however, teach the people when in this matter bad thoughts and words are or are not sins. But we should especially speak of the remedies against the impure vice, by often recommending among other things the three great means, which are: the flight of the occasion, the frequentation of the sacraments, and, above all, prayer, without which no one can be chaste.

The reader is asked to see what has been said in the preceding chapter, for the little catechism; in it may be found many things which may also serve for the large catechism, or catechetical instruction for adults, and which are here omitted.

We afterwards narrate some terrible examples of persons who, for having omitted, through shame, to confess their sins, have had an unhappy end. We may relate one of these examples every day before reciting the Christian acts, as we have indicated above.[13611] We quote these examples succinctly; he that wishes to use them may lengthen them and express them more forcibly, according as he sees fit.[13612]

Then we make the Christian acts in the following manner:

The acts of faith and hope are made like those that are found in the acts preparatory to the confession of the children.[13613] As to the act of faith particularly, we should make it in all its extent, by maintaining in it not only the four principal mysteries, which must be believed as a necessary means to salvation, but also the others that are contained in the Symbol, or Creed, and which must be believed by necessity of precept; in it we should also mention the sacraments by at least specifying the four sacraments necessary to every Christian, namely baptism, confirmation, Eucharist, and penance. We include confirmation among the sacraments necessary to all Christians, because Benedict XIV. [13614] has declared that those that neglect to receive it commit a mortal sin.

We must add the acts of charity, contrition, and firm purpose, but in form other than is indicated above; for example:

ACTS OF CHARITY, CONTRITION, AND FIRM PURPOSE.—My God, because Thou art infinite goodness, worthy of infinite love, I love Thee above all things with my whole heart. And because I have offended Thee, Thou who art infinite goodness, I repent of all my sins; I am sorry for them with my whole heart. By Thy grace, which I ask of Thee now and always, I firmly resolve to die rather than offend Thee any more. I also purpose to receive the sacraments during my life and at my death.

Chapter VII

THE SERMON

To proceed with order in speaking of the great sermon, which is the most important exercise of the mission, we shall treat separately of the three parts to which, according to rhetoricians, one should pay especial attention; we shall speak, then, 1, of the Invention; 2, of the Disposition; and, 3, of Elocution.[136I5] [136I6]

1. THE INVENTION, OR THE CHOICE OF MATERIALS FOR COMPOSING A SERMON

Great is the error of some who, before having found the materials, set themselves to determine the points and to compose the sermon. One must, before all, prepare the materials, that is, the texts of Scripture, the arguments, the comparisons, etc.; which are to serve to prove the proposition that one has in view. For this purpose one may profit by the many collections that exist, such as those of Joseph Mansi of Beyerlinck, of Lohner, of Spanner, of Father Houdry, and of others. Rhetoric, moreover, indicates to us the places whence we may draw, as from certain sources, the proofs needed for the sermon: some are called COMMON PLACES or TOPICS {Loci Communes); others PARTICULAR PLACES. The common places or topics are those that are serviceable for every kind of discourse; the particular, those that are proper to every particular discourse, to establish the fitness or unfitness, the necessity or special utility of that which one wishes to persuade.

But, ordinarily speaking, the common places or topics are those that serve to compose all the sermons; and it is of these that we shall here treat. They are divided into INTRINSIC PLACES or TOPICS, which are those that one finds in the nature of the subject itself, and into EXTRINSIC PLACES or TOPICS, which exist outside of the nature of the subject.

1. COMMON INTRINSIC PLACES OR TOPICS. (LOCI COMMUNES INTERIORES.)

The common INTRINSIC places or topics are fifteen in number:

1. The DEFINITION of the thing; for example: in establishing that sin is a great evil, because it removes us from God.

2. The ETYMOLOGY of the name; for example: Sacerdos signifies, according to St. Thomas, Sacra dans and Sacra docens [one who gives sacred things, and one who teaches them].

3. The ENUMERATION of parts (Enumeratio partium); for example: Temperance is useful for soul and body, for eternal life and for temporal life. —Or, when one affirms on the one hand what one denies on every other; for example: One is unhappy at death, not for having lived in poverty, in a low state of life, etc., but for having led a bad life.

4. The CONJUNCTION of words; that is, when one is derived from the other; as hated from hatred. It is thus that one says: God bears a sovereign hatred to sin: this is the reason why he that is united with sin is sovereignly hated by God.

5. GENUS, as in this reasoning: It is sin that brings ruin upon men; so this unlawful friendship, your possession of what belongs to another, etc., will be your ruin.

6. SPECIES, as when one says: This man is just; therefore he is virtuous.

7. SIMILITUDE and COMPARISON (Similitudo et Comparatio). It must be observed that similitude requires a total resemblance between two objects. For a comparison it is sufficient that the objects resemble one another in some point; it may also take place either between equal things, or between things greater and smaller. From similitude we here draw the argument: The farmer, when he does not cultivate the earth, cannot expect a crop; so he that does not apply himself to the cultivation of the mind will never make progress, etc. To similitude belong examples, parables, and FABLES. The parable is a fiction in which one exposes possible facts; the fable, or apologue, is a fiction in which one exposes impossible facts, as when one should make animals or plants speak. Sermons more easily admit parables, rarely, however, fables; sometimes one may better employ fables in the instructions, in order to urge men to the practice of a virtue.

8. RESEMBLANCE, as when one says: It is proper to the brute to live according to the desires of its senses; the Christian should live according to the maxims of faith.

9. CAUSE (causa), which can be efficient or final, formal or material.—Efficient cause, for example: God has created us; therefore he is our absolute master. Final cause: God has created us, not for the vile and transient pleasures of the earth, but for the immense and eternal delights of paradise. —Formal cause: The soul is created after the image of God; therefore it is more noble than all the treasures of the earth.—MATERIAL cause: Our body is composed of dust, therefore it must return to dust.

10. EFFECT; for example: Patience renders us agreeable to God, and helps us to remain in peace.

11. CONTRARIES, of which there are several kinds, namely: 1. OPPOSITES; for example: Meek persons are loved by God and men; the irascible are hatred by God and men.—2. PRIVATIVES: The sinner is deprived of God's grace, and consequently of peace, which is the companion of grace.—3. CONTRADICTORIES: He that loves God has everything, so that he is always content; he that does not love God finds himself deprived of the most precious good, which is the grace of God, and in this state he is always dissatisfied.—4. INCOMPATIBLES, or things that cannot coexist in the same subject: The love of God and the love of the world cannot exist together.

12. ANTECEDENTS; for example: Quae enim seminaverit homo, haec et metet—"What things a man shall sow, those also shall he reap" (Gal. vi. 8).

13. CONSEQUENTS; for example: He that is unquiet shows that he is not resigned to the will of God.

14. RELATIVES; for example: If God is our master, we are his servants; consequently we are obliged to obey.

15. ADJUNCTS, or circumstances of the fact, which are enumerated in the well-known verse: Quis, quid, ubi, quibus auxiliis, cur, quomodo, quando.—1. Quis; for example: The sinner offends a God so great, so powerful, and so good.—2. Quid; sin is a sovereign evil, because it deprives us of God, of paradise, and of peace.—3. Ubi: The sinner offends God in his presence.—4. Quibus auxiliis: The sinner, in order to offend God, uses the very gifts of God, such as health, riches, etc.—5. Cur: Why does the sinner consent to lose God, the sovereign good? To procure a little smoke, a miserable interest, a short pleasure.—6. Quomodo: The Christian sins more grievously than the unbeliever, because he sins with more light and with greater remorse.—7. Quando: The sinner offends God during the very time in which God bestows favors upon him, preserves him, and provides for his wants.

2. COMMON EXTRINSIC PLACES OR TOPICS

COMMON EXTRINSIC PLACES OR TOPICS FOR THE SERMON ARE THE FOLLOWING:

1. HOLY SCRIPTURE, from which we draw the strongest and most appropriate arguments for eternal salvation, as has been done by all the holy Fathers, and by Jesus Christ himself when he preached. St. Jerome says that there exists no more unworthy preacher than he that does not rest his sermons on holy Scripture. However, in sermons we must use texts of Scripture that are short, and that are taken in their proper sense, and we must avoid all forced and odd interpretations.

2. TRADITION and COUNCILS.

3. The OPINION OF THE HOLY FATHERS; and to give great authority to what one wishes to prove, it will be good to quote their own Latin words, and afterwards explain them more clearly to the people.

4. SCHOLASTIC THEOLOGY conduces greatly to prove certain maxims; but in the pulpit we should avoid treating of any point of controversy, and bringing forward subtilties which are more apt to confuse than to persuade the minds of the people.

5. The TEXTS OF THE CANONS AND THE DECREES OF THE POPES, whenever a case is presented.

6. HISTORICAL FACTS, especially the facts drawn from Scripture. As for other historical facts it will be proper to support them by indicating the author, the time, and the place; and they should be rarely given, so as to avoid the defect of those whose sermons are a complication of facts related one after another.

THE MANNER OF GATHERING MATERIALS

The collection of materials for the sermon is made in the following manner. The proposition having been found, we write promiscuously on a sheet of paper the opinions, the arguments, the similitudes, and the examples that we have succeeded in discovering. Then after re-reading all, we examine the points to which the sermon may be reduced. After this, on another sheet we write separately every point designated by a special title, under which we again promiscuously inscribe the materials that belong to this point, giving to each a distinct number. When we are in possession of materials sufficient for each point, we set about putting in order the authorities, the arguments, the moral application, etc., everything in its place. This done, we begin to work out the sermon according to the following rules, of which we are now going to speak.

II. THE DISPOSITION OF THE PARTS THAT BELONG TO THE SERMON

The parts of the sermon are nine in number, namely: The Exordium, the Introduction, the Proof, the Refutation, the Epilogue, the Moral Application, and the Exhortation. But all these are reduced to three principal parts, which are the Exordium, the Proof, and the Peroration: for in the Exordium are united the proposition and the division; in the Proof are united the Introduction which precedes and the refutation which follows it; finally, the Peroration, or CONCLUSION, comprises the epilogue, the moral application and the exhortation.

It must, however, be observed that the foregoing nine parts are not always found in the sermon, the most of them being accidental: only the proposition and the proof are the essential and absolutely necessary parts; but I add that in regard to mission sermons one s hould regard as necessary and essential the moral application and the exhortation.

We shall speak of each of these parts in particular.

1. THE EXORDIUM

The exordium we may draw from innumerable sources, the principal one of which we here indicate.

1. Ex visceribus causae; for example: if the proposition, or the aim is to show how much one should fear a bad death, the exordium may be as follows: Every man that is born is born to die; for this earth is only a place through which we are passing to eternity, etc.

2. Ab opinione sive judicio; for example: To believe that it is easy to die a good death after a life of dissipation, of wickedness, is folly. Or; To wish to defer one's conversion, and to wish to be damned, we should be convinced, are one and the same thing.

3. A contrario; that is: When one begins by a proposition contrary to that which one wishes to prove; for example: It is certainly a great happiness for some sinners who after a bad life are converted at their death, and are saved; but these cases are very rare: ordinarily he that leads a bad life dies a bad death. (This last proposition will be the subject of the sermon.)

4. Ab exemplo: By beginning with the narration of an example, which one afterwards adapts to the proposition of the sermon.

5. Ab expositione: By exposing some text of Scripture, or, the importance of the subject which one wishes to treat; for example: He that thinks of hell will not go to hell; hence, my dear Brethren, I wish to place before your eyes to-day the pains of hell, so that none of you may have to undergo this punishment.

6. Ex abundanti; that is: When the preacher announces at the beginning that the subject that he has in hand is very vast, and that therefore he must confine himself to some points which he regards as the most important.

7. Ex adjunctis: When one begins with some circumstance of person, of place, or of time.

8. Ex abrupto: The exordiums drawn from the sources that precede are called LEGITIMATE; the exordium ex abrupto is called EXTRAORDINARY, and is rarely employed: it occurs when without any preamble one begins by an exclamation of reproach, of compassion, or of astonishment; for example: O sinner! when will you cease to flee from God, who has been seeking for you so long a time? Or: Poor sinners, poor unfortunate beings, who lead an unhappy life in this world, to spend afterwards a more unhappy life in the next!—Or: O all-powerful God! how canst Thou bear with these ungrateful men, who, enlightened and called by Thy mercy, always continue to offend Thee?

We note here that the exordium may be found defective either by being too long or too common, being applicable to every kind of discourse, or by having but little connection with the sermon, while the exordium should agree with the subject that one wishes to treat.

Rhetoricians assign to the exordium seven parts, namely: The introduction, the general proposition, the confirmation, the repetition, the connection, the particular proposition, and the division.

1. The INTRODUCTION is a little insinuation in order to arrive at the general proposition.

2. The GENERAL DISPOSITION is that which one promises in order afterwards to come to the particular or principal proposition of the sermon.

3. The CONFIRMATION is another proof of the general proposition.

4. The REPETITION reproduces the general proposition, in order to pass to the particular proposition.

5. The CONNECTION is the bond that unites the general proposition with the particular proposition.

6. The PARTICULAR PROPOSITION is the principal proposition, or that which one wishes to prove; which must always be understood when one says simply: The proposition.

7. The DIVISION is the indication of the different points of the particular proposition.

It must be observed that not all these parts of the exordium are necessary, especially in mission sermons, for which the three principal may be sufficient, namely: the general proposition, the connection, and the particular proposition.

The following is briefly an example of the exordium. If one wishes to prove how difficult it is to die a good death after a bad life, one should say: (GENERAL PROPOSITION, with the CONFIRMATION): We must be saved; for if we are not saved, we shall be damned; there is no middle way. (CONNECTION): NOW, in order to be saved we must die a good death by leaving the world in the grace of God. (PARTICULAR PROPOSITION): But it is difficult to die a good death when we have lived a bad life, etc.—The general proposition may be amplified in various ways; for example: It is not necessary to be noble or rich in this world; but it is necessary to be saved.

The PARTICULAR PROPOSITION, or principal, is drawn from the subject which one wishes to treat; for it is the centre to which all the proof should converge, like so many rays. It should announce clearly and briefly a truth that one wishes to prove, never anything extravagant. Moreover, it is an absolute rule that unity should be preserved; otherwise one would have, not one sermon, but several. This unity, however, does not prevent a division into different points; this makes the hearers more attentive, and better impresses on their minds the truth one preaches to them; but the points should always agree to form a single proposition.

The DIVISION may be made in various ways:

1. By the QUALITIES OF THE SUBJECT; example: We should always be prepared for death, first, because death is certain, and, secondly, because the hour of death is uncertain.

2. By the EFFECTS: The bad habit of sin renders salvation very difficult, first, because it blinds the mind of man, and, secondly, because it hardens his heart.

3. By the CAUSES: The death of the sinner will be very bad, first, because of the temptations of the devil; secondly, because of the remembrance of the sins committed; and, thirdly, because of the abandonment by God.

4. By the ENUMERATION OF THE PARTS: The general judgment will be terrible, first, on account of the presence of the divine Judge; secondly, on account of the examination; and, thirdly, on account of the sentence.

5. By the DIVERSITY OF CIRCUMSTANCES contained in this verse already quoted: Quis, quid, ubi, quibus auxiliis, cur, quomodo, quando. Example: Quis: The sinner offends God, who is his Creator, his Redeemer, and his Preserver.—Quid: Sin is an offence against God, and an evil to the soul that commits it.—We explain in the same way the other circumstances.

The rule in regard to the points is that they should be announced in a few words, as briefly as possible, and that they should be restricted as to the number—two or three at the most. To subdivide afterwards the points into other points is a defect. It is not a defect, on the other hand, to restrict the sermon to the simple demonstration of the particular proposition without making any division of points; for example: He that abuses the divine mercy will be abandoned by it.—Or: Sin is the greatest of all crimes, because it shows contempt for God.—The method is sometimes useful in order to have more liberty to enlarge on the matter that one treats, as one is not restricted to determined points.

2. THE PROOF

We have already said that the proof contains three parts, namely: the Introduction, the Proof itself and the Refutation.

I.—The INTRODUCTION is only a preamble in order to enter upon the proof; it may be drawn from the following sources, namely:

1. From the DEFINITION; for example: If we speak of scandal we may give the definition of St. Thomas: "Scandal is a word or action that is not becoming and is an occasion of sin to another."[13617] We shall afterwards explain it.

2. From the DISTINCTION: If there is question of the occasion of sin, the introduction may be made as follows: To proceed with order we must distinguish the proximate occasion from the remote. The first is, etc.

3. From the DIFFICULTY OF THE SUBJECT: In speaking of the malice of mortal sin we may say: To understand what a great evil mortal sin is, we must understand what a great good God is; now, who will ever be able to understand the goodness, the power, the wisdom of God? etc.

4. From some GENERAL PROPOSITION to pass thence to a particular proposition: In speaking of the sacrilegious confession one may begin by describing the malice of sacrilege in general.

5. From some SYLLOGISM or EUTHYMEME, the conclusion of which leads to the proof of the proposition.

6. From some celebrated QUESTION, or some OPINION of a holy Father, or some EXAMPLE.

In every case one must take care that this introduction should be short and proximate: SHORT, so that one passes at once to the proof; PROXIMATE, or drawn from the intrinsic principles of the subject which one treats.

II.—As to the PROOF, one must understand that the body of the discourse should be composed of the proof of the principal proposition; so that in order to persuade the hearers it should have the form of perfect reasoning—of course not after the manner of logicians but of orators; that is, exposed in a clearer and more extended manner. One should observe that it is always better to present few proofs by choosing the more convincing, and by explaining them well, than by amassing a large number that are of little value or are but little developed.

The following are the various modes of argumentation used by rhetoricians:

1. The SYLLOGISM; which is composed of three propositions, namely: the major, the minor, and the conclusion, exposed, as has been said above, in a way that is more ample than in simple reasoning. One proves the major before passing to the minor, and the minor before coming to the conclusion; this is, however, only done when the major or the minor stands in need of a proof; for if they are known and held to be certain, it is sufficient if one amplifies them without proving them.

2. The ENTHYMEME; which is a syllogism reduced to two propositions, the antecedent and the conclusion; one adds the proof to the antecedent if it is necessary.

However, the preacher should take care to invest the syllogism and the enthymeme with an oratorical form, so that they may not appear as such.

1. The DILEMMA; which consists of two different propositions, one of which being denied, the other is necessarily to be admitted; for example: Either God deceives man, or man deceives himself; now, God cannot deceive: therefore, it is certain that man deceives himself.

4. The INDUCTION; which consists in drawing a *conc*lusion from a certain premise; thus: If the just tremble while living amid penances, prayers, etc., how much more should a sinner tremble who lives amid pleasures, honors, etc.!

5. The SORITES; that is, when, from several propositions or truths announced, one draws a particular conclusion; example: Blasphemy brings neither honor nor pleasure; why, then, blaspheme?

6. The EXAMPLE; when one argues from one case to another similar case.

We here remark that it is always good to vary the forms of reasoning by employing now the syllogism, now the dilemma, etc., and also by using interrogation, reproach, etc.

As for the order of PROOFS, some think that it is better to begin with the weaker, continue with the stronger, and conclude with the strongest. Others, on the contrary, and such is my opinion, think it preferable to give, in the first place solid reasons, in the last place the most decisive, and in the middle the weakest, by grouping them together so that thus united they may acquire more authority; for by beginning with the weakest reasons one might produce a bad impression upon some one of the hearers. For the rest the ordinary method consists in presenting first the reasons that carry conviction, then those that amplify the subject, and finally those that are most suitable to touch the heart.

The TRANSITIONS from one point to another should be natural, and should always preserve the unity of the sermon. To mark these passages, the most common forms are the following: Let us see, in the second point, etc.; After having seen, etc. When passing from one argument to another, one may say: Add to this; . . . Moreover; . . . So much the more, . . . etc.—There are other more elegant forms of transition; for example: by uniting the end of the point or of the reasoning which one finishes to the beginning of that which follows. This union should be made at least in words if it cannot take place in the substance of things. One should take care never to pass abruptly from one object to a different object. For this purpose one may use the figures called Preterition, Concession, etc.

The AMPLIFICATION of proofs is REAL in reference to things, or VERBAL in reference to words: the first tends to convince the mind by the development of proofs; the second tends to determine the will.

The REAL amplification may be made by the reunion of several things, following this example of the Apostle: Serving the Lord, rejoicing in hope: Patient in tribulation: Instant in prayer.[13618] Or, by GRADATION; example: It is a virtue to bear patiently with contempt; a greater virtue, to desire it; a virtue that is greater still, to rejoice at it.—Or, by REASONING, which one does by developing the circumstances of the thing.—Or, by COMPARISON, which one does by comparing the thing with another that is reported to be great, to show that that of which one speaks is still greater.

The VERBAL amplification may be made by expressive sayings, by epithets and synonymes, and also by metaphors and hyperboles.

But it must be observed that this vain luxury of words, of which certain preachers make a display, causes the hearers to feel wearied, and serves rather to weaken the sermon than to amplify it. We remark, moreover, that one should amplify not all that one says, but only the principal things.

What has been said of amplification may also be said of ATTENUATION; for, as Quintilian says, he that knows how to ascend, knows how to descend.

As regards MORAL DIGRESSIONS, we must observe that, although the proper place for moral applications is found in the peroration, yet it may well be permitted to make moral reflections in the course of the sermon by speaking especially of a vice or of a virtue, particularly after having given sufficient proof; this holds good above all in mission sermons. One should always take care that these moral applications should not be so long as to form another sermon in the sermon itself, nor should they be so forced as to appear, as we say, to have been lugged in by the head and shoulders, nor so frequent as to render the discourse tedious and languid, as happens to some who, while relating an example, are too much given to making moral digressions. It is indeed permitted to make incidentally a moral application, but excess fills the hearers with disgust. There is, however, no doubt that mission sermons should be more supplied with moral reflections; for it is this that makes most impression on persons that are but little instructed, and that form during missions most of the audience. However, these moral applications should be appropriate to the sermon, and put in a proper place, so as not to weaken the force of the proofs.

II.—After the proofs comes the REFUTATION of the objections. The various modes of REFUTATION are:

1. NEGATION, by exposing the falsity of the contrary argument.

2. CONTESTATION, by showing that the proposition that one sustains is more probable than that which is opposed to it.

3. ANTICIPATION, by opposing, to the difficulties that may be alleged, other more grave difficulties.

4. CONTEMPT for the contrary reasons, by simply saying that their falsity is evident.

5. RETORTION, by retorting the opposed argument. Regularly, the refutation is put after the proofs; but sometimes it is put immediately after the reason that one exposes and that can meet with some difficulty.

3. THE PERORATION

The peroration, or conclusion, contains three parts: the epilogue, the moral application, and the exhortation.

I.—The EPILOGUE is only a recapitulation of the sermon. It should be short, so as not to form a new sermon; but it should contain the most convincing reasons of the discourse presented in another manner in view of the exhortation that is to follow; so that even in this recapitulation the preacher begins to move the hearts of the hearers.

II.—As for the MORAL APPLICATION, in regard to the correction of vices, one must at first be careful to avoid wounding particular persons; for such corrections made in public serve only to irritate the minds in such a way that these persons, seeing themselves thus publicly humbled, will conceive a hatred for the preacher and even for the mission, and become more and more perverse.

Moreover, it must be observed that by moral application we understand not only reprimands and reproaches uttered against vice, but also the pointing out of the remedies to be employed to correct one's self, and the means to be used to persevere in good conduct. The missionaries should, therefore, persuade themselves that what is most important and profitable to the people in the mission is to teach them practical things, that is, remedies against vice and the means to persevere in virtue, such as the following: To flee from the occasions, as public houses, dangerous places, bad company. To do violence to one's self to control movements to anger, to have ready on one's tongue some good words, in order to avoid blasphemies and imprecations; for example: O Lord! give me patience. O holy Virgin Mary! help me. I beg God to sanctify you. And similar utterances. To join some confraternity. To hear Mass every day. To go to confession every week. To make every day a spiritual reading. To make a visit to the Blessed Sacrament and also to the Blessed Virgin before one of her images. Every day, in the morning, to renew the good resolution not to offend God by asking him for the grace of perseverance; and in the evening, to make an examination of conscience with the act of contrition. If one falls into some sin, one should hasten to make an act of contrition with a firm purpose of amendment, and then go to confession as soon as possible. Above all, to have recourse to God and to the Blessed Virgin in temptations by often repeating the holy names of Jesus and Mary, and by continuing to invoke them until the temptation ceases.

These remedies and these means the preacher should repeat and recommend many times in the course of the sermons without allowing himself to be prevented by the fear of some learned critic who might reproach him for saying always the same thing. The preacher, and especially the missionary, must not look for the praise of the learned, but for the good pleasure of God and the salvation of souls, particularly of the poor ignorant people, who come in great numbers to the missions, and who derive less profit from the opinions and reasonings that one makes them hear, than from these easy practices that one takes care to inculcate on them by repeating them. I say, "By repeating them;" for the minds of these poor people, which are but little cultivated, easily forget what one teaches them, if one does not take care to repeat it several times, as one knows by experience.

III.—The EXHORTATION is one of the most important and most necessary parts of the sermon, especially during missions; for the profit derived by the hearers not only consists in convincing themselves of Christian truths, but also, and above all, in taking the resolution to amend their lives, and in giving themselves to God. The missionary should, therefore, not act like some who at the end of the sermon begin at once to cry out to the people: Ask pardon of God, cry for mercy!—and, taking the crucifix, the cords, the torches,[13619] are satisfied with this clamor, which will produce a great deal of noise, but very little fruit.

To obtain fruit one must study to find out the best means of touching the hearers, and of exciting not an apparent but a true compunction in their hearts. Without doubt, this compunction is the work of the hand of God; but the Lord wishes us to co-operate so as to make it as perfect as possible. This is the reason why it will be useful to speak here specially of the manner of moving the heart and of regulating the passions, which are the maladies of the soul: they darken the mind and weaken the will. Now, what does one need in order to subdue one's passions? One needs the hand of God. The preacher should, therefore, for this purpose, count more on the divine help by humbly invoking it than on all the eloquence in the world; otherwise his hearers will only admire his talent without being converted, like those of whom St. Augustine[13620] spoke: "They admired, but were not converted." They will say: What a good preacher! what a beautiful sermon!—and they will continue to slumber in their vices. Moreover, to move others, it is of great importance that the preacher shows that he himself is penetrated with the truths that form the subject of his discourses.

Human passions are numerous: some belong to the CONCUPISCIBLE appetite, others to the IRASCIBLE appetite. According to St. Thomas,[13621] the first are:

1. LOVE, which has the good for its object: it is the strongest of all the passions. The preacher should especially strive by proper motives to inspire the people with love for God and for their neighbor: for God, because he deserves this love, first on account of his goodness, and then on account of his benefits; for their neighbor, because God commands this love.

2. HATRED: one inculcates hatred for sin by showing what is its malice, and what injury it causes; one takes away hatred for one's neighbor by setting forth how pleasing to God and how profitable to our soul is the pardon of injuries.

3. DESIRE, which is a movement of the soul towards a distant good. One shows that the goods in this life are of little value and of short duration, and that they are dangerous to salvation, while the goods of the next life are immense and eternal, and alone worthy of our desires.

4. AVERSION, which is opposed to desire, and makes us have a horror of the things that are hurtful to us.

5. JOY, which is a satisfaction produced by the possession of good. It is very useful, among other things, to set forth the peace that the grace of God brings to him that possesses it.

6. SADNESS, or grief, which is a pain that one feels at a present evil. One shows the pain that remorse of conscience causes sinners.

The following are the passions that belong to the IRASCIBLE appetite:

1. HOPE, which is a movement towards a distant but possible good.

2. DESPAIR, which is the contrary; one tries to persuade the hearers that it is impossible to find happiness in the goods of this world.

3. FEAR, which is a movement born of the apprehension of future evil.

4. AUDACITY, which is a movement that gives one strength not to fear the obstacles in the way of acquiring a desired good.

5. ANGER, which is a movement that leads to revenge. This passion may excite the love of penance in the sinner, who will wish to chastise his body by which he has offended God; for according to St. Augustine, the true penitent is a man justly angry with himself.

We must remark that in general one should in this exhortation guard against being too long; otherwise, one shall lose more than one gains.

III. ELOCUTION

After having treated of the disposition of the parts, we must speak of the means and the methods suitable for rendering the discourse capable of convincing the understanding and determining the will.

Good elocution requires the concurrence of three things, namely, elegance, composition, and dignity.

I. ELEGANCE results from clearness and proper expressions, by avoiding new or antiquated, affected, or vulgar terms. It must be understood that eloquence consists in expressing the idea that one has conceived, and in making the hearers seize it with the same vividness with which it has been conceived.

II. COMPOSITION is the harmony of the discourse which is obtained from the good arrangement of periods and from their number expressed in suitable words. The period is a phrase composed of several parts, united with one another, to render entire the idea that one wishes to express; the principal parts are called Members and the others Incidental. We distinguish three kinds of periods: the concise, the round, and the composite.

1. The CONCISE period, which is the shortest, should have at least two members, but not more than four. It has three qualities, but these are not always found together, namely, equality in the number of words, the harmonious correspondence between both members, and the opposition between the two, as in this text: For you were heretofore darkness; but now light in the Lord.[13622]

2. The ROUND period—that of which the parts form a harmonious union of sentences, of thought, and of words, to express a complete sense. One should therein avoid superfluous vowels and consonants, as well as repetition of the same words, or words formed of the same letters by having the same quantity of syllables, as also turns that represent the measure and cadence of verse.

3. The COMPOSITE period, finally, is that which is formed of several round or concise periods.

III. The DIGNITY of elocution results from the use of tropes and of figures, of which we shall speak farther on.

First of all, we must remind young preachers that what is said of periods rounded and composed of sonorous words, belongs properly to discourses pronounced in academies and in secular assemblies, but not to those that one pronounces in the churches. I know that there are orators who pretend that this is necessary even in sacred discourses in order to attract the people and to induce them to hear the divine word; but I also know that St. Paul protested against it when he said: I came not in loftiness of speech or of wisdom. . . . And my speech and my preaching was not in the persuasive words of human wisdom, but in showing of the spirit and power.[13623] I also say that men of zeal and of charity do not go in search of choice expressions or of harmonious periods; they try to find the most efficacious method to deliver souls from hell and to persuade them to love God. I grant that preachers who attract the people by the charm of florid discourses have many hearers; but where is the fruit that they derive? Who, after having heard them, go to confession with compunction, moved by those ingenious descriptions and those rounded periods, in a word, by those flowers and those leaves, of which the sermon is composed? Origen,[13624] comparing such preachers to women, says that the latter by their vanities succeed in pleasing men but do not please God, and their souls are without fruit. A sick man, as Seneca[13625] remarks, does not ask for a physician that speaks well, but for one that is able to cure him. What good, he would say to him, will your fine discourses do me when iron and water must be employed to cure me? St. Jerome,[13626] writing to Nepotian, gave him this advice: "When you teach in the church, not the clamor (viva! viva!) of the people should be excited, but the tears of the hearers will be your best praise."

Vain preachers may win the praises of some among the learned men, but they will bring no profit to any one. I say, "Of some;" for, whatever may be the trouble that one takes, one hardly succeeds in making one of those florid discourses in which the learned do not find now this, now that, to criticise. Such is then the folly of these orators who preach themselves instead of preaching Jesus Christ; they do all that they can in order to gain a vain approbation, and they do not even, know how they may obtain it from everyone. He who, on the other hand, wishes to preach Jesus crucified is always sure of success in his work, since he thereby pleases God; this should be the end of all our actions.

Oh, would to God that there were banished from the church such a vain mode of preaching! It is certain that if all preachers spoke in a simple and in an apostolic manner one would see the world changed. "Christian preaching," says St. Ambrose, "does not need pomp and cultured discourse; therefore fishermen, uneducated men, were chosen to preach the Gospel.[13627] The Apostle, speaking of those that preach with pomp, speaks of them as adulterating the word of God.[13628] Oh how expressive is this word adulterating! This is what St. Gregory well explains in the following passage: "The perverse man who serves vainglory is rightly said to adulterate the word of God, because by sacred eloquence he desires not to gain children to God, but to show his own science, and he devotes himself rather to his own pleasure than to the generation of spiritual children."[13629]

Sermons preached with vanity serve only to render proud him who preaches, to make him who listens lose time, and what is worse, to enervate the word of God: for the florid style takes from the eternal truths the force that they have in themselves, as is said by St. Prosper or some other ancient author: "A sermon purposely cultured enervates the vivacity of the sentences."[13630] Hence St. Paul thus declares: For Christ sent me . . . to preach the Gospel: not in wisdom of speech, lest the cross of Christ should be made void.[13631] On this text St. John Chrysostom has written: "Some bestow labor upon external wisdom; he (Paul) shows that it not only does not help the cross, but it even destroys it;" so that the refinement of thoughts and elegance of expressions destroy, so to speak, the fruit of the Redemption wrought by Jesus Christ.[13632]

Oh what a fearful account will those orators have to render to God at their death for having preached with vanity! St. Bridget[13633] saw the soul of a religious damned for having preached in this manner; and the Lord afterwards declared to the saint that through the organ of vain preachers it is not he that speaks, but the devil. A still more terrible example is that which is related by Father Cajetan Maria of Bergamo, a Capuchin, in his book entitled "The Apostolic Man in the Pulpit." He says that a preacher of his Order related to him the following occurrence that happened to him a few years before: When still a young man and a lover of belleslettres, he had preached with a vain eloquence in the cathedral of Brescia; but returning thither a few years afterwards, he spoke in a manner entirely apostolic. When asked the cause of this change, he answered: I knew a celebrated preacher, who was a religious and my friend, and had, like myself, a liking for vain eloquence.

At the hour of death it was not possible to persuade him to make his confession. I went to him myself and spoke earnestly to him; but he only stared at me without saying a word. Then the Superior conceived the thought of having the Blessed Sacrament taken to his cell so as to touch him and induce him to receive holy Communion. The ciborium was brought, and those present said to the sick man: "Here is Jesus Christ, who has come to pardon you." But he cried out in a voice of despair: "It is this God whose holy word I have betrayed!" Then we all occupied ourselves, some with praying to the Lord to have mercy upon him, and others with begging the dying man to trust in God's mercy; but he began again to cry out with still greater force: "It is this God whose holy word I have betrayed!" Then he added: "There is no longer any mercy for me!" We continued to encourage him, but he cried out a third time: "It is this God whose holy word I have betrayed!" Then he said: "By a just judgment of God I am damned!" And immediately after he expired. The Father concluded by saying that this event had determined him to change his manner of preaching.

At least in purgatory the Lord will not fail to punish all these vanities that one shows in preaching. It is related of Father Francis dell' Aredo, who converted a great number of souls, that after his death he appeared to his confessor, and said that he had to spend several days in purgatory on account of some florid sermons that he had preached in his youth. This example is cited by Father Nadasi, and here is another which he also quotes: While a Father of the Society of Jesus, Rector of the college at Maiorica, was preaching a very elegant sermon, our Lord said to the Venerable Alphonsus Rodriguez: "Your Rector will have to pay up for this sermon by the fire of purgatory."

It is certain that all the vanities shown in the pulpit and all the applause received are not what gives confidence when one is dying. Several persons worthy of belief have assured me that a celebrated preacher of our time who preached in this manner with the applause of crowds of people, finding himself near death, ordered all his writings to be burnt. Moreover, it has been told me of the same preacher, that hearing on one occasion eulogies addressed to him on account of his pompous discourses, he answered: "These discourses will one day be the cause of my condemnation."

We should note what Muratori says in speaking of panegyrics in his book entitled Christian Charity. Here is what he says: "Ah! why so many panegyrics, which often end in a vain mental pomp, in far-fetched subtilties of a brain filled with self-love, which are beyond the comprehension of most people? . . . If the panegyric is to be profitable, it should be given with that popular and intelligible eloquence which enlightens and touches not only the ignorant, but also the learned. But this kind of eloquence is not always well known by him who imagines himself more learned than others." Seneca, writing to Lucillus, says that the orator should be more attentive to things than to expressions; then he adds, that the orator gives a bad idea of himself when he shows himself fond of such a trifling thing as the adorning of his discourse with leaves and flowers.[13634] So spoke a pagan; how much more should a Christian speak in like manner!

But some one will say, What do you wish?—do you wish that all the sermons should be mission sermons? I answer by asking what one understands by mission sermons: if one understands sermons made at random and negligently, without following any rule and without order, I condemn, as every one does, such sermons. But if one understands sermons made after the apostolic fashion, in a simple style, within the comprehension of the people who make up the audience, I have already cited elsewhere[13635] what has been written on this point in his golden book, Popular Eloquence, by the above mentioned Muratori, who has certainly held and still holds to-day a distinguished place among the first literary men of Europe. He says that when one preaches to an audience in which are found not only the learned, but also the uninstructed, who ordinarily form the greater part, it is expedient to preach in a simple and popular style; for this kind of preaching will profit the common people, and the learned, if they do not find the charm of diction, will nevertheless draw more fruit by seeing themselves enlightened and impelled to devote themselves more to the good of their souls. Moreover, one admits that before an audience composed of people who are well instructed, the preacher should use more choice language. But to apply one's self to interweaving the sermon with flowers and leaves, that is, with learned researches, subtle and lofty reflections, pompous descriptions, choice terms and sonorous periods—all this is not suitable for the pulpit; for God does not cooperate with the success of such sermons; and without God's co-operation, what fruit can one ever hope to derive? Pastors of souls should, above all, guard against such vanities; for preaching by virtue of their office and their duty they are bound by a strict obligation to make themselves understood by all the members of their flock.

Besides, I also admit that Lenten sermons should be different from mission sermons; however, when an audience is composed mostly of people that are but little instructed, Muratori teaches, as has been said, that all the sermons should be simple and popular in order that one may derive fruit therefrom, and have the consolation that the hearers will go to confession after the sermon. I remember that when Father Vittelleschi preached in this simple way at Naples, not only was the church filled, but the confessionals were besieged by a crowd of persons who wished to go to confession. And as for the Lenten sermons, which are given in the country, where nearly the whole audience is composed of poor villagers, one should use, as Muratori expressly says, the simplest and commonest possible words in order to adapt the discourse to the gross intelligence of the hearers. At least, I would wish the preachers who go through the country, and do not care about changing the lofty style of their sermons, to give during the last week, in the evening, when the people return from the fields, the spiritual exercises in the form of a mission. I assure them that they will produce more fruit by these familiar exercises than by a hundred Lenten sermons.

However, as for the Lenten sermons, it is a consolation for me to know that even in great cities like Naples, this foolish and, so to speak, barbarous style, which was in use in the last century, has been rejected; at present priests commonly preach in a familiar and an easy style, and I am glad of that. On the other hand, I regret to hear that on the missions some young preachers have introduced the use of the florid style; and I am astonished that the Superiors permit such subjects, who boast of being called missionaries, to preach in this fashion. In every sermon the missionary should preach as a missionary. One of our young subjects, while preaching one day a sermon on the Blessed Virgin, used a lofty and polished style; not only did I make him come down at once from the pulpit, but I forbade him to say Mass for three days.

The missionary, I say, should always preach as a missionary, but especially during the missions; otherwise he will have to render a twofold account to God, either on account of the little fruit which he derives from the sermons, or on account of the bad example which he gives to others by departing from the mission style, which should be entirely simple and popular. I do not contend, as I have said above, that the mission sermons should not be composed with the order that is suitable to them according to the rules of the oratorical art, and even with the use, wherever necessary, of tropes and of figures, of which we will afterwards speak; but as Muratori says, all this should be arranged with simplicity, without the appearance of being so arranged; for mission sermons should be composed of easy teachings, of suitable applications, and of Christian practices. This is to break the bread, as God requires of all preachers, and especially of missionaries: Deal thy bread to the hungry.[13636]

I beg my reader to make with me the following prayer:

My Lord Jesus Christ, Thou who, to save souls, hast given Thy life, deign to enlighten and animate so many priests who could convert many sinners and sanctify the world if they preached Thy word without vanity and with simplicity, as Thou hast preached it Thyself and Thy disciples have followed Thy example. These priests, however, act otherwise: they preach themselves; and thence it happens that although the world is full of preachers, yet hell is filled with lost souls. O Lord! remedy this great evil, which afflicts Thy Church through the fault of preachers.

1. TROPES

A trope is the employment of a word or a phrase in a signification different from its own on account of some resemblance. Tropes differ from figures in this, that they apply to words a sense other than their natural sense; this is not the case with figures, as we shall see later on. There are six principal tropes: metaphor, allegory, irony, hyperbole, antonomasia, and metonymy.

1. A METAPHOR is the transfer of a word to a sense that does not belong to it; it suffices for a metaphor that there be some resemblance among the things. It is thus, for example, that the priests are called the light of the world and the salt of the earth. The transfer may be made from an animate thing to an inanimate, and conversely. The use of metaphors should not be frequent; and they should not be obscure, or taken from objects either too sublime or too common.

2. An ALLEGORY is a continued metaphor, as when one says that Jesus Christ is the vine and we are the branches; that the branches united to the vine produce fruit, while those that are separated from it can only be thrown into the fire.

3. IRONY is when one says the contrary of what one wishes others to understand. It is necessary, especially in speaking of God, that irony be clearly apprehended by the hearers, and that they understand it in its ironical sense.

4. HYPERBOLE consists in exaggerating or diminishing the expression of a thing beyond measure for fear of not saying enough, as when God says to Abraham: I will multiply thy seed as the stars of heaven.[13637] The use of the hyperbole should be rare.

5. ANTONOMASIA is when, instead of the proper name, we give to a subject another name to express what is good or what is bad in the subject; as when Lucifer is called "the Proud" or "the Dragon." Antonomasia may be used in four ways: (1) by attributing specially to some one a name common to several, as when St. Paul is called by way of eminence "the Apostle," and St. John "the well-beloved Disciple;" (2) by giving to some one for a name the title that designates a particular function, as when a lover of feasting is called "a Gourmand;" (3) by taking the name of the place, as when St. Augustine is called "the Doctor of Hippo;" (4) by forming the name from remarkable deeds, as when St. Francis Xavier is called "the Apostle of the Indies."

6. METONYMY, by which one names an object for another on account of the natural bond that unites them; it is thus that one names the cause for the effect, and conversely, the container for the contained, the subject for the attribute, as in the following examples: 1. They have Moses and the prophets:[13638] we understand thereby the books of Moses and the prophets; 2. Death is in the pot;[13639] we take the vessel instead of the poisonous herbs that it contains, or death instead of these same herbs that caused it; 3. My son, give Me thy heart;[13640] God is asking a man for his heart, asks of him his love, which has its seat in the heart.

2. FIGURES

The Figure is an ornament of words or of thought, which elevates the discourse above ordinary language. We shall at first speak of the figures of WORDS, and then of the figures of THOUGHT.

FIGURES OF WORDS

Figures of words are produced in three ways—by addition, by subtraction, or by similitude.

I.—Figures by ADDITION are the following:

1. ANAPHORA, which consists in repeating the same word at the beginning of several phrases or various members of a period; it is thus that St. Ambrose, speaking of Debora, says: "A woman judged, a woman disposed, a woman prophesied, a woman triumphed."[13641]

2. EPIPHORA, by which one repeats the same words, not at the beginning but at the end of the phrases, as in the text of St. Paul: They are Hebrews, so am I: They are Israelites, so am I: They are the seed of Abraham, so am I.[13642]

3. SYMPLOCE, or COMPLICATION, which is done by uniting the anaphora and the epiphora.

4. ANADIPLOSIS, or CONDUPLICATION, which consists in repeating one word or several words of the phrase that precedes; such as this passage of St. Gregory: "What do we admire, brethren? Mary coming or receiving the Lord? May I say receiving or attracting? but I should rather say attracting and receiving."[13643] When we repeat the word immediately, the figure is called EPIZEUXIS; example: Be comforted, be comforted, My people.[13644] But when one repeats the last word of the phrase, the figure is confounded with the anadiplosis; example: Our feet were standing in Thy courts, O Jerusalem. Jerusalem which is built like a city.[13645] And when the word that begins a phrase is repeated at the end of the following phrase, it is called EPANALEPSIS; thus: O God, who shall be like to Thee?[13646] hold not Thy peace, neither be Thou still, O God.

5. POLYPTOTON, or TRADITION, when a word is repeated in different cases and at different times; thus St. Paul: Now I make known unto you, brethren, the Gospel which I preached to you, which also you have received and wherein you stand, by which also you are saved.[13647]

6. CLIMAX, or GRADATION, when the last word of the phrase that precedes becomes the first of the following, and when one thus advances by degrees from phrase to phrase, as the Apostle in this passage: Tribulation worketh patience; and patience trial, and trial hope; and hope confoundeth not.[13648]

II. Figures by SUBTRACTION are the following:

1. ASYNDETON, or DISJUNCTION, or DISSOLUTION, when several words or phrases follow without a conjunction, as in this passage of Salvian when speaking of the penitent David: "He took off his garments, laid aside his purple, removed his diadem; he is changed in appearance and in heart."[13649]

2. SYNECDOCHE, or COMPREHENSION, when one admits in the discourse some word that is implicitly understood, as when one puts the part for the whole, or the whole for a part; example: I will visit the evils of the world.[13650] By the word world we here understand Babylon.

3. APOSIOPESIS, or ELLIPSIS, OMISSION, RETICENCE, when one suppresses something in the discourse, but in such a manner as to leave understood what one does not say. Thus David says: And my soul is troubled exceedingly; but Thou, O Lord, how long?[13651] This, according to St. Thomas, means: "How long wilt thou delay to come to my assistance, so that I may rise?"[13652]

4. ZEUGMA, or ADJUNCTION, when one refers several subjects to one and the same verb; thus St. Paul: Let all bitterness and anger, and indignation and clamor, and blasphemy be put away from you, with all malice.[13653]

III. Figures by SIMILITUDE are the following:

1. PARONOMASIA, or ANNOMINATION, or ALLITERATION, when one repeats the same word with some modification to signify another thing; it is thus that St. Augustine has said, in speaking of the Publican: Quid miraris, si Deus ignoscit, quando ipse se agnoscit?[13654] And St. Ambrose: Fluctus est quidam maris, non fructus.[13655]

2. HOMCEOPTOTON, or in Latin, Similiter cadens (similar case-endings), occurs when several phrases or several members of a period terminate by words in the same case, as in this text of Isaias: Quaerite Judicium: subvenite oppresso, judicate pupillo.[13656]

3. HOMCEOTELEUTON, or in Latin, Similiter desinens (like ending), occurs when several phrases or several members of a period terminate in the same manner, or in verbs with the same ending; such is the passage from St. John Chrysostom: Considera pactum quod spopondisti, conditionem qua accessisti, militiam cui nomen dedisti.[13657]

4. ISOCOLON, or in Latin, Compar, exists when the members of a period are nearly equal in the number of syllables; thus Isaias: Occidere vitulos et jugulare arietes, comedere carnes et bibere vinum.[13658]

5. EPANORTHOSIS, or CORRECTION, when one feigns to correct or to retract an expression, by replacing it by another that is more proper; thus, St. Augustine: Magna pietas, quod thesaurizat pater filiis; immo magna vanitas: thesaurizat moriturus morituris.[13659]

6. ANTITHESIS, or OPPOSITION, when several terms are opposed to one another in a period, as in this passage of St. Paul: By honor and dishonor, by evil report and good report, as deceivers and yet true.[13660]

FIGURES OF THOUGHT

Among the figures of thought some serve to teach, some to please, and others to move.

I.—Those that serve to TEACH, are the following:

1. DEFINITION.

2. DISTRIBUTION or ENUMERATION of parts.

We have spoken above of these two figures when treating of the common, intrinsic places or topics.[13661]

1. PROLEPSIS, or ANTICIPATION, when the orator anticipates the objection and refutes it.

2. PAROMOLOGY, or CONCESSION, when one grants something to opponents, in order to obtain what one desires and something more; thus St. Augustine: "If you wish to sin, seek a place where God does not see you, and do what you wish."[13662]

3. HYPOMONE, or SUSPENSION, when one excites the curiosity of the hearers and keeps them for some time in suspense.

4. PARALEIPSIS, or PRETERITION, when one briefly says what one declares one wishes to pass over in silence; thus St. Augustine: Omitto dicere quia forte, dum vivis, thesaurizas furi.[13663]

5. PARADOX, when one ascribes to the same subject attributes that seem irreconcilable, and are yet true in fact; thus Origen: Audi ineffabile paradoxum: per non factum, sed genitum, omnia facta, sed non genita.

II.—The figures that serve to PLEASE are the following:

1. APOSTROPHE, or CONVERSION, when the orator, show*ing* emotion, addresses mountains, animals, or absent persons.

2. HYPOTYPOSIS, or DESCRIPTION, when one describes things in lively colors.

3. PROSOPOPOEIA, when one introduces into the discourse either a dead, absent, or fictitious person, or an inanimate thing, and makes them speak or act. One must take care to adapt the language to the thing or to the person; one should not make a king speak as a plebian.

4. PERIPHRASE, or CIRCUMLOCUTION, a term that one uses to express in a longer way, but more suitable, what one does not wish to say in proper words.

5. DIALOGISM, when one makes one or several persons speak among themselves or with others; such is the monologue of the prodigal son in St. Luke: How many hired servants in my father's house abound with bread, and here I perish with hunger![13664]

III.—The figures that serve to MOVE are the following:

1. EROTESIS, or INTERROGATION, when one addresses some one: either to show compassion, as when God called Adam after his sin and said to him: Where art thou?[13665]—or to complain; for example: If I be a master, where is my fear?[13666]—or to reprove, as the Lord, speaking to his people: What iniquity have your fathers found in Me, that they are gone far from Me . . . ?[13667]

2. ANTIPHORA, or SUBJECTION, when to a question addressed to one's self one adds the answer; thus St. Augustine: Tell me for whom are you hoarding riches? For myself, you say.[13668]

3. EPHONESIS, or EXCLAMATION, when one raises the voice to excite fear or some other emotion; for example: O folly of sinners, to lead an unhappy life upon earth in order to lead a still more unhappy life in hell!

4. EPIPHONEMA, a sententious exclamation by which one finishes an interesting recital; thus after having related the deed of a young idolater who, while present at a sacrifice offered by Alexander, preferred to have his hand burn rather than to disturb the ceremony, Tertullian adds: "So great was in this pagan youth the reverence for discipline that he conquered nature!"[13669]

5. APORIA, or DOUBT, when the orator is at a loss what course to pursue.

6. PARRHESIA, or LICENSE, LIBERTY, when the orator freely makes known some truth without fear of reproach.

7. DEPRECATION, when, after having moved the minds of the hearers by reason, one begs them to put in execution what one has said.

8. COMMISERATION, when one shows compassion for the misfortune of others.

9. REPREHENSION, when one reproves the hearers; this one should never do in words that irritate.

IV. MEMORY, PRONUNCIATION, AND GESTURE

I.—As for the MEMORY, but little is to be said; for memory is a gift of nature, and is perfected according as one cultivates it by continual practice. It is, however, very useful, in order to render the memory local, to mark the points of the sermon, and the beginnings of sentences and of arguments, or at least of the longer periods with letters larger than usual, and with additional numbers.

It is also useful to make an abridgment of the sermon by indicating in a brief and distinct manner the beginnings, as has been just said, of the periods, of the sentences, etc.; this may at least be of service to the preacher, who, if he should forget some part of the sermon, can remember the part that follows, and thus free himself from an embarrassment which, as has happened to many, might oblige him to come down from the pulpit.

II.—As for PRONUNCIATION, as one expresses things by words, one should express the different sentiments of the soul by the modification of the voice: the preacher should speak, now by raising the voice, now by lowering it; now quickly, now more slowly; now with dignity, as when he quotes the words of Scripture; now with severity, and now with gentleness and feeling. In this many fail to such an extent that they annoy and weary the hearers, by adopting a kind of sing-song; by dragging the voice in the articulation of words; by being precipitate in their delivery; by excessively raising or lowering their voice; or by suddenly passing from a high to a too low tone of voice.

Without doubt, in order to captivate the attention of the hearers, to impress better on their minds the things that one preaches, especially in mission sermons, it is very useful to vary the tone of voice; for a monotonous discourse gives but little prominence to the things that are said, and that should be expressed with more or less warmth or gentleness. Nevertheless, immediate transitions from one tone to another always cause disorder and trouble. Ordinarily, the exordium should be pronounced in a moderate and grave tone; for the proposition and the division of the points, the voice is raised and becomes more distinct; in the proofs, it is modified conformably to the quality of the things that one says. Arrived at the peroration, or the final exhortation, the preacher should show himself moved in order to move the hearers by speaking to them in such a manner as to excite in them the passion with which he wishes to penetrate them; for example: anger and hatred require an impetuous tone; hope and love, a gentle voice; joy, a jubilant tone; grief, a plaintive voice, broken by groans and sighs. On missions, in the moral applications, the voice should be raised, especially when one speaks against vice.

On missions it has been the custom to use a THIRD TONE,[13670] *W*hich consists in pronouncing the words in a loud voice by prolonging the last syllable but one, especially in the last words of the members of a period. It is expedient to employ this means from time to time when it is suitable; for example, when there is question of threats, complaints, or chastisements, etc. I said: "From time to time;" for if one uses this third tone too often, as some do, one ends in producing no longer any impression, and one even gives annoyance, the ear of the hearers becoming accustomed to it.

II.—As for GESTURE, one should avoid gestures that are affected or too uniform, that are always the same, or so impetuous as to give to the body an excessive agitation by moving inordinately the hands, the head, or the eyes.

The gestures of the hands should be grave. It is ordinarily the right hand that makes the gestures; one uses the left hand only to point out objects placed at its side, or things that are separated or opposed to one another. One should not raise the hand higher than the head, nor extend it too much, nor hold it too short, or only before one's breast. In the exordium, however, at the first period, one should not make any gesture; it is only at the second period that one may begin to move the hands, which during the whole exordium should be moved but little, and it would be better for one to remain always standing in the middle of the pulpit.[13671] While the right hand is raised, the left, if it is not moved, rests on the pulpit, and not on the breast. One should avoid putting the hands on the hips or on the back, raising them in the form of a cross, striking them together, or striking the pulpit; which should be done but rarely. Moreover, one should guard against taking off the surplice and casting it at one's feet, or making with the body any other improper movement; for by the name of gesture one understands not only the movement of the hands, but also that of every part of the body, and especially of the head and eyes.

The movement of the head should be regulated by the movement of the hand by turning the head in the same direction, except when the preacher desires to excite in the hearers a horror of something, and in this case it is proper to turn the head in the opposite direction. It is a fault to turn violently the head, to shake it too much, always to keep it erect, or bent, or often inclined on the breast, or always in the same attitude.

As for the eyes, it is a fault to keep them closed, or always cast down, or always fixed on one side, especially on the side where the women are, as if one made more of one part of the hearers than of the other. The eyes should, moreover, accompany the movement of the head. The expression of the countenance should be varied according to the subject by expressing therein, for example, sadness in things that are sad, such as terrible things, or grievous sins, gravity in things that are grave, and joy in things that are joyous.

Finally, every posture should be modest. One may sit down, but only sometimes. One may also pass from one side of the pulpit to the other, but without precipitation. Ordinarily, it is proper to remain in the middle of the pulpit in order to be understood by all; it is, however, good to turn from time to time, now towards the right, now towards the left, but without going so far as to turn one's back to the opposite side. It is also a defect to make contortions, or to incline the body too much over the pulpit. In a word, the preacher represents Jesus Christ, of whom he is the organ; hence the language, the gestures, everything, should be grave, as is befitting a minister of Jesus Christ.

It must also be here remarked, that when one takes in one's hand the crucifix, one should not wave it as if it were a banner, as some are accustomed to do; it should be taken and held with gravity and respect.

V. SPECIAL INSTRUCTIONS IN REGARD TO MISSION SERMONS

We have already spoken of several things that are to be observed in mission sermons; but it will be well to reunite here in an abridged form the principal instructions, in order that the missionary may have them all united before him. Besides, we shall also indicate here the different other things that refer only to the manner of preaching during the missions.

1. THE SUBSTANCE OF THE SERMONS

Mission sermons should have fewer Latin texts. If we examine the sermons of the Venerable Paul Segneri, a great master in the art of preaching, we shall find few Latin passages, but many practical reflections and moral applications. The quotations from Scripture should be few, but should be well explained and well pondered. It will be better to present a single text well pondered by taking care to draw from it suitable moral applications, than to group together several passages which serve more to gratify the vanity of the preacher than to benefit the people. So also in regard to the opinions of the holy Fathers, they should be few in number, should be short and ingenious, that is, of such a nature as to explain the subject with taste and with a special emphasis.

The comparisons should be exposed in a simple and popular manner, but should not be so common as to be unsuitable for the pulpit.

Only a few examples should be given—two or three at the most will suffice for a sermon; and they should not be too long—this being accomplished by leaving out unimportant details.

The moral applications should be strong and well discussed. It will be observed, as has been said above,[13672] that from them the greatest part of the fruit of the mission is derived. There should not be in every sermon a long string of moral applications, mentioned superficially in passing, for example, against enmity, theft, impurity, lying, etc. It will be better to endeavor every time to combat firmly and in detail one or two of the more common vices, such as blasphemy, hatred, theft, and especially impurity, which being the most common of all, needs to be more frequently combated in the sermons. One should, however, take special care to speak with modesty when one treats of this shameful vice. Moreover, in the moral applications one should avoid hurting the feelings of any one; for those that recognize themselves in any humiliating allusion, which the hearers may apply to them, will not only not derive any benefit therefrom, but will become prejudiced, because they will become incensed and more hardened in evil. One should also guard against ever censuring priests or religious, even in general.

2. THE FORM OF THE SERMONS

As for the manner of preaching on missions, we have already spoken of this above,[13673] when we spoke of the dignity of elocution. We have there quoted[13674] the opinion of the celebrated Muratori, who thinks that when one speaks to an audience composed of many uninstructed persons all the sermons should be preached in a simple and familiar style; and when addressing country people, one should adopt a style that is as popular as can be, provided it be not coarse, so that these poor people may be instructed and moved in their own way. Moreover, as distinguished from Lenten and Sunday sermons, the manner of preaching on missions should be more free and unconnected; for the periods should be concise and detached, so that he who has not heard or understood the first may understand the second, and he that enters the church at the middle of the sermon may at once understand what the preacher is saying. This could hardly be successful in the case of persons who are but little instructed if the discourse is unbroken; hence he who has not heard the first sentence will understand neither the second nor the third.

We must, furthermore, take notice of the good advice given by Muratori, namely, that in order to have the people continually attentive, it is very useful to employ often the interrogation or the figure called ANTIPHORA, or SUBJECTION, described above,[13675] by which the orator puts a question and answers it himself; example: Tell me: Why are there so many that relapse after the mission? It is because they do not keep away from the occasion of sin. Or: What do these words of the Holy Ghost mean: Desires kill the slothful?[13676] We thereby understand those who, having bad habits, always desire to amend their lives and never employ the means of doing so. Or, one makes this exclamation. Oh how touching are the words of Jesus Christ: Him that cometh to Me, I will not cast out![13677] What also serves to keep the hearers attentive, is often to claim their attention by saying: Pay attention to what I am going to tell you. Or: Hear the beautiful reflection made by a celebrated author. One should, however, avoid always using the same form and employing too often this means, and thus causing the hearers to grow weary.

To move the feelings of the hearers it is very useful to make an invocation, even in the middle of the sermon; for example: My God, how many unfortunate beings are damned in consequence of this illusion! Or: O Lord! how canst Thou tolerate these traitors, who promise Thee, and immediately afterwards, etc. Or: O holy Virgin Mary, obtain that these poor blind creatures may be enlightened, etc. Or: O God of goodness, Thou comest to seek us in order to save us, and we flee far from Thee in order to damn ourselves! It is also good sometimes to repeat in a grave manner some strong maxim; for example: We must die; we must die; it is an evil without a remedy! Or we may use some weighty exclamation; for example: O cursed sin! O great moment, the moment of death! or: eternally happy or eternally unhappy!

As regards the modulation of the voice, one must avoid the uniform and emphatic tone of the panegyrists: I am speaking of those that preach their own praises, and not those of a saint; for even panegyrics should, according to Muratori, be pronounced in such a way as to produce fruit and not merely wind. It is good sometimes, as has been said above, to use the THIRD TONE when there is question of inspiring fear or compassion. Besides, one should guard against always speaking in a forced tone, as is done by certain missionaries, who run the risk of bursting a blood-vessel, or at least of losing their voice, while, on the other hand, this manner of speaking wearies the audience without any special benefit. What rouses and conciliates the attention of the people is to speak in a tone, now high, now low, but without excessive and sudden transitions; at one time to make a longer exclamation, at another, to make a pause, and then to continue with a sigh, etc. This variety of tone always keeps the hearers attentive.

3. THE ACT OF CONTRITION AND THE END OF THE SERMON

It will be useful to mention here several things concerning the act of contrition, which is the most important part of the mission sermons. One shall derive but little profit from the sermon if the hearers remain convinced, without, however, being penetrated with compunction and without being resolved to amend their life;[13678] now it is this last effect that it is intended to be produced by making an act of contrition.

At first, before making the people kneel down, one should endeavor to move them as much as possible to kneel down of themselves. At last, when the hearers are on their knees, before showing them the crucifix, one should make them all say: O Lord, pardon! O Lord, mercy! Afterwards, the torches having been brought in, and then the crucifix, one should make them recite several acts of contrition—two or three of them—each with its proper and distinct motive, in order that the sinners may repent and sigh, not inconsiderately, but with a motive and with reason. Otherwise if one contents one's self with saying, as some do: All should weep, should repent, should ask pardon of God;—all this without proposing the motives, then, undoubtedly, many people will cry out, will shed tears, when they hear others crying out, shedding tears, but they will do this without knowing the reason why; and the result will be a great deal of noise but no fruit. The preacher should, therefore, take care to wait till the cries cease before proposing the motive, so that the hearers may hear and understand him; if this is not done, he will by speaking during this commotion exhaust himself in vain. Hence the motive is to be proposed when the people are quiet. One shall say, for example: Sinners, my brethren, let each one of you address to Jesus Christ this petition: O Lord! why hast Thou waited for me till now, and hast borne with me after the many offences that I have heaped upon Thee? Hear what answer our Lord gives to you: I have waited for you, and I have borne with you in order to pardon you; repent, and I will pardon you, etc. (We will afterwards give other examples of these motives for the convenience of preachers.) After having proposed the motive, one should inculcate repentance by saying, for example: Let us now take courage! ask pardon of God; raise your voices, and say amidst tears and sighs: O Lord! I have offended Thee; I repent of my sins; I am sorry for them, etc.

It will also be very useful, when finishing, to have the people make a more formal and more extended act of contrition by calling upon them to repeat the words that one shall suggest one after the other. At first one shall tell the people to make an act of love to Jesus crucified by preparing them for it by some motive briefly expressed; then an act of hope of pardon by reposing confidence in the blood of Jesus Christ; and finally, the act of attrition followed by the act of contrition. But before forming this act, one should induce the hearers to make it for the confession for which they are preparing themselves; for, according to the probable opinion of a good number of authors, the act of repentance, as the matter of the sacrament, should be made in view of the absolution that is to be received. Then is to be added the good resolution never more to offend God, with the intention of going to confession the same evening or the day after, and to confess all sins without omitting any one of them through shame.

It must also be here remarked, that the preacher, at the beginning and at the end of every sermon, as also in the sermon itself, should always exhort the hearers to hear the sermon with the intention of confessing as soon as possible—that very evening or the following morning; for if one does not take this precaution in the beginning, it will easily happen that the people will put off confession till the last moment, and thus the mission will end in confusion and with little profit. Moreover, in telling the people to make a firm purpose of amendment, the preacher should at times insinuate, at the end of the act of contrition, a special resolution in regard to certain more habitual sins, as, for example, to avoid blasphemy, to restore the goods of others, to forgive enemies, not to violate chastity, and above all to flee from the occasion by reminding them several times during the sermons, that he who does not remove the proximate occasion cannot be absolved; this is also to be understood in regard to fathers and mothers that permit the betrothed of their daughters to enter the house. It is good to insist, and insist repeatedly, upon that which refers to the good resolution by saving, for example: Do not defer, make now, the resolution to do what God asks of you; make haste; do you perhaps wish that God should abandon you? This will surely happen if you do not make up your mind.

Before finishing the sermon, the preacher should urge the people always to have recourse to Mary by asking her for some particular grace, as holy perseverance, a happy death, love for God, etc.

At the end, when giving the people the blessing with the crucifix, one should suggest to them what they must say while receiving it; for example: O My God! I do not wish to lose Thee any more. Or: O Lord! if I should still offend Thee, let me rather die. O Lord! do not permit that I should again separate myself from Thee. I have offended Thee enough; I do not wish to offend Thee any more in future. O my God! in the past, I have offended Thee; hereafter, I will love Thee.

The sermon concluded, one should avoid imposing upon the people the recitation of "Hail Marys" for the persons that have asked for them; they should be recited before the sermon; for if they are recited afterwards, the compunction produced by the sermon will grow cold. The best thing will be, to tell the women that they should return home with a contrite heart by thinking of the sermon that they have heard; as for the men, they should be told to remain, either to follow the missionaries who are to give the evening exhortation,[13679] or to participate in the exercise of taking the discipline.[13680]

4. EXAMPLES OF VARIOUS MOTIVES FOR THE ACT OF CONTRITION

1. Sinners, my brethren, rid yourselves this evening of all fear. Of what are you afraid? During the many years that you have lived away from God, he did not cease to go in search of you; and now that you are disposed to change your life, would he repel you? Ah! do not hesitate; repent, weep, etc.

2. St. Augustine says: If a poor shepherd loses a heifer, he weeps; if he loses a sheep, he weeps; and you who have lost God, the sovereign good, do not weep.

3. My dear brethren, God comes in search of you to make peace with you; and you do not wish to make peace with God? Come then, etc.

4. Do you fear that Jesus Christ will reject you? Well, listen to what he says in the Gospel: Him that cometh to Me, I will not cast out.[13681] I cannot repel him who comes to me repentant. Do you understand this? Come, etc.

5. Oh, how God rejoices when he sees a sinner weeping over his sins! My brethren, how much displeasure have you not caused Almighty God! Give him, therefore, this evening, this pleasure by saying to him with your whole heart: O Lord, my God! I repent of having offended Thee.

6. Tell me, sinners: Did Jesus Christ deserve to be treated as he was treated? But this good Lord does not wish that you should despair; ask his pardon, etc.

7. Have you the desire to obtain pardon of God? Know that God desires still more to grant it to you.

8. You see here Jesus Christ; you see what your soul has cost him; you see what he has done for you; and you wished to lose Jesus Christ for a mere nothing!

9. You have turned your back upon God, and God has done the same to you; but hear what Jesus Christ says to you this evening: Turn ye to Me . . . and I will turn to you.[13682] Leave sin, and return to me; I embrace you.

10. Sinners, during how many years have you fled from the Lord who comes to you? Hear what he says this evening to each one of you: My dear little sheep, stop, cease to run away from me, who wishes to do you good, who wishes to serve you.

11. The Lord speaks to you this evening as if bewailing your loss: Why will you die, O house of Israel?[13683] But you answer: What shall I do? the sins have been committed. And thereupon the Lord answers: Return ye, and live.[13684] Return to me, repent, and I will pardon you.

12. See Jesus Christ, with open arms, calling you and saying to each one of you: My child, ask my pardon; for I will pardon you.

13. Sinners, you would no doubt like also to hear the words addressed by Jesus Christ to Magdalen: Thy sins are forgiven thee.[13685] Well, if you wish to hear them, cast yourselves weeping, like Magdalen, at the feet of your Saviour, etc.

14. Rejoice sinners, because you have not to treat with a man of this earth, but with God. If you had offended any person as you have offended God, I should say to you that there would be but little hope for pardon; but you have to treat with God, whose mercy is infinite. Should you have offended him for fifty consecutive years by committing every day a thousand mortal sins, it would be sufficient for you to say this evening: O Lord, I repent, etc. God will immediately answer you: And I will pardon you all the displeasure that you have caused me.

These motives are here presented as examples; one may form many others like them.

5. CONCLUSION

Such are the rules of preaching; but the first rule is that which was given by the Venerable John d'Avila to a priest who had asked him for some good rule in order to preach well: "If you wish to preach well," he said to him, "love Jesus Christ much." To preach well is to attain the end of the sermon, that is, that the hearers are converted to God and that they put in practice what they are taught; now this is attained by those preachers that love God. We read in the chronicles of the discalced Carmelites that a Father, named Julian of St. Paul, although he had studied but little, preached with such success that the people came in crowds to hear him and were converted, every one of them deriving much fruit from his sermons. Some one having asked what good could be found in this preacher, whom every one went to hear, the following answer was given to him: "We go to hear him, because he is a saint: he sheds tears during Mass, he sleeps little, he always goes about with his eyes cast down, he is always praying, he speaks only of God and of our welfare; and therefore we do what he tells us." John d'Avila had then reason to say that the first and most important rule for preaching well is to love God.

6. NOTE AS TO THE SERMONS USUALLY PREACHED IN OUR MISSIONS

Beside the sermon on mortal sin, in which one shows precisely the malice of sin considered as a contempt for God, and besides the three sermons on the Last Things, or on death, judgment, and hell, which should always be given, one must not fail, before beginning to preach on the Last Things, to preach a sermon on confession, in which one should show especially the gravity of the sacrilege and the ruin brought upon the soul by the sin of concealing sins in confession.

Moreover, one should not omit to preach, immediately after the sermon on hell, a sermon on the Blessed Virgin, in which one should speak chiefly on the confidence that we should have in the protection of this divine Mother by having recourse to her in order to overcome the temptations and obtain a happy death.

Again, one should not omit the sermon on prayer, or the absolute necessity in which we are of always recommending ourselves to God to obtain perseverance in what is good and eternal salvation; and in this sermon one should suggest to the people the practical manner of recommending themselves to God, in the morning on rising, in the evening on retiring, when they visit the Blessed Sacrament and the Blessed Virgin, and above all when they are assailed by temptations. This sermon should be preached on all the missions, since, without prayer, one cannot obtain perseverance; and when on any little mission time is wanting, one must speak at length of prayer in the last sermon that is followed by the blessing.

The other sermons are arbitiury, one may choose, as one thinks fit, among them the sermon on the mercy of God, the spiritual and temporal chastisements of sin, the divine vocation, the importance of salvation, the vanity of temporal goods and temporal evils in comparison with eternal good and eternal evils, the number of sins, or abandonment on the part of God—a sermon of great use for the perseverance of sinners who are converted—final impenitence, scandal, and perseverance, a subject that is treated in the last sermon when the blessing is given.

VI. THE EXERCISE OF THE DEVOUT LIFE

The exercise of the devout life is one of the most useful of the mission. Souls that give up sin only when moved by the fear of divine chastisements, when the mission is finished and their emotion dissipated, easily return to their old vices; but those that remain attached to God by love, easily persevere. Hence I say that the exercise of the devout life is very useful; for one's only aim thereby is to point out the means necessary for perseverance while penetrating the hearers with love for Jesus Christ by the consideration of his Passion and of the love that he has borne to us. It is indeed great misery to see that preachers usually treat of everything else except of the love for Jesus Christ after God has done so much and suffered so much to gain our love. But let us come to our subject.

On the last days of the mission, before its close, the usual sermon is replaced by the exercise of the devout life, which exercise lasts three days, or at least two in small places.

On each of these evenings the preacher begins by giving a half hour's practical instruction on the means to be used to lead a Christian life. He should especially teach therein the manner of making mental prayer; at first he should show them how useful and even how necessary it is to all kinds of persons in order that they may keep themselves in the grace of God; for Christians well know the truths of faith, but as they neglect to think of them, they do not live as Christians. Then he explains the manner of making meditation with facility so that every one can practise it. I have already shown in my little work Instruction and Practice for Confessors[13686] the manner of making mental prayer, which should be taught by pastors of souls. The teaching of this method is substantially reduced to the following points: At first, the one that wishes to meditate, places himself in God's presence, humbles himself before him, asks him for the light that he needs; afterwards, he begins to read, if he knows how to read, either to consider some point, whether of the Last Things, or of the Passion of Jesus Christ, or some other similar subject; and then he makes acts of contrition, of love, of confidence, of petition, and makes good resolutions.

One should recommend to the pastors to have daily meditation made in common with the people, either in the evening, or in the morning during Mass, by having some point of meditation read twice, namely, immediately before the beginning of Mass, and after the consecration.[13687]

One should announce this to the people, but should add that those that cannot come to the church to make meditation with the others, should make it at least privately at home, in some retired place, and at a time when there is less noise in the house, and that, if they have no other time or no other way, they should at least make it while working or walking. Moreover, one should exhort the fathers and the mothers to send their sons and daughters to church to make this exercise there, or to introduce it at home for the whole family, as some have already done.

The foregoing instruction finished, the preacher kneels down and announces a mystery of the Passion of Jesus Christ which should be meditated upon; one may also unite two mysteries, as the scourging and the crowning with thorns, or the journey to Calvary and the crucifixion. In this exercise one may use the Reflections and Affections on the Passion, a little work which I have added to the Visits to the Blessed Sacrament. Before beginning the meditation it will be well to sing a hymn of the Passion, the better to dispose souls for compunction and tender affections; for in these meditations one does not speak of things that inspire fear; all the moral applications and all the affections should have for their object the practice of virtues, and especially of a tender love for Jesus Christ. The preacher should, therefore, say at the beginning: I wish this evening no more tears of fear, but tears of tenderness and of love.

One begins the exercise for the preparation by making the ordinary acts: the act of faith in the real presence of Jesus Christ in the Blessed Sacrament with the act of adoration, the act of humility with the act of contrition and the petition for light. Then, after having said an Ave Maria, one passes to the meditation of the mystery, which contains four parts: the representation, the reflection, the affection, and the firm purpose of amendment.

1. The REPRESENTATION consists in exposing in a lively manner, before the eyes of the hearers, the mystery with all the most touching and most important circumstances; or example: Imagine, my brethren, that you see Jesus bound to the column, his head bent, his eyes fixed upon the ground, waiting for the tortures that the executioners are preparing for him, etc.

The REFLECTION; for example: Consider the pains of Jesus Christ and his confusion by seeing himself treated like a slave, and think that by your sins you have been the cause of the sufferings that your Saviour endures.

2. The AFFECTIONS, not only of compassion for Jesus Christ, a sentiment on which some dwell too much, but also of hatred for sin, and above all of love for our Redeemer. One should remark that in these meditations the principal part is the movement of the affections, and that the missionary should dwell thereon at greater length; for example: Say to him then: Here I am, O my Jesus! let me know what Thou desirest of me; I wish to perform it immediately. At this moment I should be in hell where I could no longer love Thee; but since it is permitted to me to love Thee still, I wish to love Thee. —Or: Faithful soul, dost thou not see that God calls thee to his love? Render thanks to him, and say to him: O my God! how could I in the past have been so ungrateful to Thee, who hast loved me so much? The life that remains to me I will spend entirely in weeping over the displeasure that I have caused Thee, and in loving Thee with my whole heart. O cursed years! what have you done? you have made me offend my dear Saviour, who has wished to die for me. O my God! I give myself entirely to Thee; accept me, O Lord, for hereafter I will belong entirely to Thee!

3. The FIRM PURPOSE OF AMENDMENT, or the resolution to put in practice the means given to each one to sanctify himself. It is this that should be inculcated from time to time: Courage, faithful soul, decide now to give thyself to God. Thou seest that Jesus Christ calls thee to his love; thou seest that he wishes to be loved by thee; do not resist any longer. He wishes you to give up that attachment . . . The mission is already coming to a close; make without delay a generous resolution, and thou wilt see the graces that God will bestow upon thee if thou obeyest his voice. Say without hesitation: Yes, my Jesus, I wish to please Thee; I wish to do all that Thou wishest me to do; help me; give me Thy love; I desire nothing more.

Following these examples, one should interweave the meditation with other acts of a firm purpose, of thanksgiving, of self-oblation, of resignation, and of petition, by specially asking for holy perseverance and the love of God. At the end one should briefly make the Christian acts of faith, of hope, of love, and of contrition; but the preacher should stop longer at the act of love and of contrition. The first evening he may exhibit a picture of the Ecce Homo; the second evening, the image of Christ crucified.[13688]

VII. THE LAST SERMON, ON PERSEVERANCE, WITH THE PAPAL BLESSING

After the evenings consecrated to the exercise of the devout life comes the last sermon, with the papal blessing. I know that other Congregations have the custom of giving it before this exercise, and we ourselves followed this custom for some time; but experience has taught us that it is better to finish it in a different manner; for when the people have received the papal blessing, they easily neglect to be present at the exercise of the devout life, believing in some way that the mission is over; on the other hand, it is easy to have every one at this exercise in expectation of the blessing.

1. MANNER OF GIVING THE LAST SERMON

On the day of the blessing there is no instruction; but the people should be kept occupied with the recitation of the Rosary, which the missionary prolongs by examples and moral applications. Then, before beginning the sermon, a short procession takes place with the Blessed Sacrament, accompanied only by priests: I have used the word short, because one should make only a few steps outside of the door of the church, where one should give with the Blessed Sacrament three blessings, one in the middle and two at the sides towards the fields, the priests chanting at each blessing the prayer of the Church: Ut fructus terrae dare et conservare digneris: te rogamus, audi nos.

After the procession has re-entered the church, the Blessed Sacrament is placed on the altar, where it is veiled. Then the sermon begins; in it one should speak of the necessity of perseverance for salvation, and should point out the means that are to be used in order to overcome the enemies of our salvation, namely, the world, the devil, and the flesh. One becomes victorious over the world by not caring for human respect. One should speak at length against this vice; because many souls who in the mission are converted and begin to lead a good life, yielding afterwards to this cursed human respect, for fear of being laughed at, abandon the Christian life and return to their old habits. At the same time, the hearers should be put on their guard against those impious men who, not wishing to do what is good, cannot see it in others without turning them into ridicule and making satirical songs on them.—One overcomes the devil and his temptations by recommending one's self to God. Here one should again inculcate what should be repeated several times in the sermons, namely, that in temptations we must immediately have recourse to Jesus and Mary by invoking their holy names in order to obtain help.—The means of overcoming the flesh, or the impure vice, is also prayer, but the flight of the occasions must be joined to it. On this subject one should speak at length about the sad consequences of visiting persons of the opposite sex, and of going into bad company.

The advice that is to be left as a memento for the hearers is, chiefly, to frequent the sacraments, to make meditation every day, as also to visit the Blessed Sacrament and the Blessed Virgin. Moreover, one should recommend to each family to recite the Rosary in common, and to every one in particular to say three "Hail Marys" in honor of the purity of Mary, in the morning after rising and in the evening before going to bed, adding a prayer for the grace of perseverance; to fast on Saturdays; to confess and communicate especially on each of the seven principal feasts of the Mother of God. One should also recommend the recitation, at the sound of the bell at three o'clock in the afternoon, of three "Our Fathers and Hail Marys," in memory of the agony of Jesus Christ. The following beautiful devotion should also be recommended: When a sick person is in his agony this should be announced by five or seven strokes of the large bell, and then every one should recite three "Our Fathers and Hail Marys" to obtain for the one that is dying a happy death. This is a salutary practice, not only for the sick, but also for all the rest who are reminded of death, which will one day overtake them. Finally one should recommend the act of contrition that is to be made every evening.

This advice having been given, the preacher tells all to kneel down; then he says: The mission is now finished; before departing from you, I wish to leave you under the protection of the Blessed Virgin. Let each one of you repeat after me this prayer:

O my Queen, my Advocate, my Hope, and my Mother! I should have deserved to be banished from thy presence; but I know that thou, who art the Mother of mercy, doth not reject any one of those that have recourse to thy protection; I therefore, O my merciful Sovereign! take refuge under thy mantle. I promise to love thee and to serve thee hereafter, and to do all that I can that thou mayest also be loved by others. I likewise promise thee that when I am tempted to offend thee I shall always have recourse to thee, and shall say: My Mother, help me.—And thou, O my Queen! support me in all the temptations and all the dangers to which I shall be exposed to lose God. Above all, at the hour of death, do not abandon me, O my dear Mother! protect me and save me; for I protest that I shall live and die under thy protection.

2. MANNER OF TAKING LEAVE

The foregoing prayer to the Mother of God having been finished, the preacher, before giving the blessing, takes leave of the people in the following manner:

You see now, my dear brethren, that the mission has drawn to a close. Before my departure, I wish you to pardon me if in my discourses I have caused displeasure to any one. For the rest, I have always spoken in general, without intending to offend any one in particular. All that was harsh and severe in what I said, was not said against you but against vice, because I should like to see every one of you saved. If, however, I have gone too far, if I have caused weariness, if I have been indiscreet in my reprimands, I ask your pardon. I ask you especially to pardon me all the obstacles that I have placed, by my defects, in the way of your spiritual profit, and to pray to Jesus Christ also to pardon me.

I thank you for your attendance at the exercises of the mission, as well as for the obedience that you have shown. I bless all the sweat and all the labor that you have cost me during these days, and I offer all to God for your eternal salvation; I even protest that I am ready to give my life for each one of you, in order that we all that are here may have the happiness of saving our souls and of seeing ourselves all together in heaven.

I part from you, satisfied with the great work wrought in this mission. A simple thought fills me with sorrow, namely, whether there is any one among you who, notwithstanding the mission, still remains an enemy of God. Suppose that there is such a one among you, I would say to him: Poor sinner, you must know that, although the mission has come to an end, yet the mercy of God has not come to end for you. Do not despair; if you wish to make your peace with God, there is yet time: ask his pardon, and he will pardon you; here is Jesus Christ (here the crucifix is shown), who still calls you, having his arms open to receive you and to pardon you. My brethren, let each one among you now say to Jesus: O Lord! I trust that Thou hast already pardoned me; but if through my fault I have not yet been pardoned, deign to grant me pardon on this evening of the last day of the mission; for, O my God, infinite good! I repent of having offended Thee, etc. Ah! be assured, ye children of so good a Father. I do not doubt that he has pardoned you all. What you have to do in future for your salvation is to continue to live in the grace of God; for if you betray him again after the mission, I very much fear that he will abandon you. Courage, then, my brethren; make a good resolution; if that has not yet been made, make it this evening; renounce the world. What have you profited by having committed so many sins? Ah! give yourselves now to God; begin to love this God, who has shown you so much mercy, and who, as I trust, now loves you so much; do not lose all the good that you have gained during these days.

My dear children, I depart from you; but see him whom I am leaving behind for you (here the crucifix is shown): I leave you this infinitely amiable God; learn how to love him.—Ye men, my brethren, I depart from you; but I leave you this excellent Friend, who loves you more than any other friend, more than any relative, more than your brother, more than your father, more than any person in this world.—Ye Christian women, I depart from you; but I leave in your hearts this God of love, who died for you; unite yourselves to him, learn how to return love for love.—And now I address myself to all of you: Souls redeemed by Jesus Christ, do not any more offend this good Saviour. What do you say? do you wish to offend him again? Say then: No, never, never. Ah! you say this too coldly; speak in a loud voice and say: O my God! never more will I offend Thee; rather will I die a thousand times than lose Thy grace. Now, if such is your resolve, raise your hand and give your word to Jesus Christ that you will no more offend him.

Now I am going to bless you; but before doing so, let me make an agreement with you: you will pray for me and I will pray for you; I will recommend you every day to God at the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, and you will say three "Hail Marys" every day for me after the recitation of the Rosary; and when you hear of my death, you must offer up a holy Communion for the repose of my soul.

3. MANNER OF GIVING THE BLESSING

Although I am only an unworthy minister of Jesus Christ, yet I bless you all this evening, in the name of the Most Blessed Trinity, of the Father who created you, of the Son who redeemed you, and of the Holy Ghost who enlightened you, in the name of Mary, the Immaculate Virgin, in the name of St. Joseph, of St. Michael the archangel, and of the Guardian Angels, in the name of St. N., your Patron, and of all your holy Advocates, in the name of all the angels and of all the saints of paradise. I do not take the liberty of blessing your worthy bishop—rather should I receive the blessing from him; but I pray to God to bless him and to sanctify him more and more. You, my dear brethren, should always recommend him to God; for he does not cease to think of your welfare, and you are obliged to pray for him. Nor am I so bold as to bless the Very Reverend Vicar-General, the Very Reverend Canons, your pastor, or the other priests: I pray to Jesus Christ to bless them. Reverend Pastor, here are the members of your flock; we leave them all united with God; it is your duty to guard them in order that on the day of judgment you may present them in the state of grace to Jesus Christ. As a priest, I bless all the civil authorities, the Superiors of the congregations, and all those who during the mission have rendered us services, and have shown us so much charity.

Now, my dear brethren, it is you whom I wish to bless. In the name of Jesus Christ, I bless you soul and body—. I bless your body and all its senses. I bless your eyes, in order that they may always be modest by never looking at any object that may lead you into temptation; I therefore specially bless your eyes. (Here the blessing is given with the crucifix.) I bless your ears, that you may never misuse them by listening to things that offend God. I bless your mouth, that you may never employ it in uttering blasphemies, imprecations, immodest words, and wicked songs. (Here a second blessing is given.) I bless your feet, that when you can you may come to church to make mental prayer, as also visits to the Blessed Sacrament and to the Blessed Virgin. I bless your hands. Young people, raise your hands: I wish to bless them. (Again the blessing is given towards the men.)—I bless all your children; devote yourselves to their sanctification, in order that one day you may find them all together in paradise. I bless all your relatives that cannot come to church—I bless all your lands, that they may bring forth abundant fruit. (Here the blessing is given towards the fields, on the right and on the left.) I also bless all your affairs, your goods, your animals, your hopes. My dear brethren, behave towards God as you should, and he will heap upon you spiritual and temporal goods. In fine, I bless all the bread that you eat, the ground upon which you walk, the air that you breathe; I include in this blessing all that concerns you.

But, above all, I bless your soul: this soul which was purchased by the blood of Jesus Christ; I bless your soul and all its powers, the memory, the understanding, and the will.—I bless your memory, that you may not cease to recall to your mind all the graces that God has conferred upon you in this mission, and especially in this church. When you see this pulpit from which the Lord has spoken to you, this altar at which you have communicated, this confessional where Jesus Christ has pardoned you, remember all the graces that you have received there, and learn how to be grateful.—I bless your understanding, that you may every day make mental prayer, and that you may think often of God, who always thinks of you and of your welfare.—I especially bless your will, that you may love this God who deserves so much to be loved, and who loves you so much.—I bless, moreover, all the steps that you have taken to come to the church to hear the word of God, all the confessions and the communions that you have made, all the tears that you have shed during these days, as well as all the resolutions that you have taken, and all the promises that you have made to Jesus Christ, in order that you may be faithful to them.

Before I give you the last blessing, pray to the Blessed Virgin to bless you herself from on high, and to cause you to be blessed this evening by her divine Son. Receive now the papal blessing.—My Lord Jesus Christ, as I bless them on earth, so bless them from on high, and pardon them all their sins.—And you, my dear brethren, make again an act of contrition for your sins both mortal and venial, in order that you may receive in the blessing that I am going to give you a plenary indulgence of all your sins. Raise your voice while I bless you, and say: O Lord! I am sorry for all the offences that I have committed against Thee; henceforth I will love Thee.

Here the blessing is given with the crucifix by pronouncing, in a loud voice and intermittingly, these words: Benedictio Dei omnipotentis, Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti, descendat super vos et maneat semper. Then the preacher will say:

During the singing of the Te Deum recite five "Our Fathers" and five "Hail Marys" and a "Glory be to the Father," to the intention of the Holy Father, in order to gain the indulgence. The Te Deum is now sung, in order to thank God for all the graces that he has conferred upon you; therefore, while the priests are chanting, thank God with tears of love for all the graces that you have received.—Let the Blessed Sacrament be unveiled. (The Blessed Sacrament having been unveiled the preacher from the pulpit intones the Te Deum, which is continued by the clergy, who are assembled before the altar; then turning himself towards the people, he adds): Behold Jesus Christ; thank him with tears in your eyes, and promise him that you will sanctify yourselves.

The Te Deum finished, the celebrant, who should be one of the missionaries, after the prayers indicated in the Ritual, says five prayers: the first, that of thanksgiving, Deus cujus misericordiae; the second, that of the Blessed Virgin, Concede nos; the third, that of the titulary saint of the church; the fourth, for the Sovereign Pontiff; and the fifth for the civil authorities. Then the Pange lingua[13689] is sung, the Blessed Sacrament is incensed as usual; then the verse Panem de coelo and the prayer Deus qui nobis are sung. After the prayer, the deacon takes the Blessed Sacrament, and gives it to the priest kneeling on the highest step of the altar; the priest turns with the Blessed Sacrament towards the people, and then, at the foot of the altar the preacher says: Brethren, I have blessed you with the crucifix; now Jesus Christ himself wishes to bless you in the Blessed Sacrament. See him here; reanimate your faith, and beg of him that, as we are this evening reunited in this church, we may one day have the happiness of finding ourselves all together in paradise. But in order to enter paradise, we must love God; say then to Jesus Christ while he is blessing you: My Jesus, I love Thee, and I do not wish to cease loving Thee.—O Lord! deign to bless them. Let the organ resound; let the bells be rung; and you, raising your voices, say with tears: My Jesus! etc.

VIII. OTHER REMARKS REGARDING THE SERMON

1. PRACTICES[13690] AT THE END OF THE SERMON

1. At the end of the act of contrition,[13691] the preacher shall strike himself two or three times with a rope: I say, with a rope, and not with a chain; for a chain, if composed of massive rings, may very much injure the preacher, who, finding himself in fervor, would easily be led to strike himself without discretion; and if it is composed of hollow links it would indeed make a noise, but would inflict no pain. He should, therefore, take a rope, on two or three evenings of the mission, and strike himself during a considerable time in order that one may not judge this whole ceremony to be a mere sham. But he should refrain from tying the rope around his neck, as if he wished to strangle himself, as some do; this would appear to be a mere fiction. The preacher before striking himself shall take care to notice that he does this penance, not to expiate his own sins, but to obtain from God the grace of pardon for every obstinate soul that happens to be in the church.

2. In the sermon on death, before the act of contrition, it is usual to show a skull, to which the preacher should speak as follows:

Tell me, O skull: where is thy soul? is it in paradise, or hell? Tell me: on the day of judgment in what state shall I find thee? wilt thou be crowned with stars, or surrounded by serpents and flames? Tell me: art thou the head of a man, or the head of a woman? If thou art the head of a man, tell me: What has become of all thy plans of fortune and ambition? whither has gone thy pride, thou who didst claim that every one should respect thee?—If thou art the head of a woman, what has become of thy beauty? what has become of thy beautiful hair? Alas! worms have made them disappear. Where are thy beautiful eyes? Worms have consumed them. Where is thy tongue, with which thou didst sing so beautiful songs? Worms have devoured it. In a word, thou who didst flatter thyself to be so charming, see now thou art so hideous as to inspire terror.

After this the preacher, addressing the people, says: My dear brethren, you see what this skull is; so each one of you will be one day. There is no remedy: we must die! we must die! The act of contrition is then made.

1. In the sermon on hell it is customary to show the picture of a person that is damned. It has happened in our missions that sinners who remained insensible to all the other sermons, were moved at the sight of this picture and were converted. The manner of proceeding is as follows: The preacher, after having made the act of contrition, says:

I have spoken to you in this sermon about hell; but what could I say about hell? Nothing; for hell is known only by him who endures it. Ah! if this evening there came forth from hell a soul that is damned, in order to speak to you, it would know how to tell you what hell is. At least, my brethren, allow me to let you see a picture of one that is damned, in order that he may speak to you in his own way; here he is. Sinners, recognize yourselves in this picture, and see what you should be on account of your sins.

This picture should be carried by a missionary at the height of about ten or twelve palms above the ground; two other missionaries walk before him with two large torches, which they should take care to hold low enough and far enough from the picture so that the smoke does not prevent it from being seen. The priests then move from the high altar and go to the door through the church, stopping from time to time, and turning the picture slowly now on one side, now on the other; the picture is then given to the preacher, who shows it from the pulpit, where he leaves it till the following evening exposed to the gaze of all; then he takes the crucifix and gives the blessing.

1. Another very touching practice is to carry the Statue of the Blessed Virgin in procession to the church at the end of the sermon; this is the way it is done: Every evening this statue is exposed; but on this day we take it out of the church; immediately after the act of contrition, everything having been arranged beforehand, the door is opened, all the priests, in surplice and with lighted torches, are seen entering, carrying the statue of the Blessed Virgin, which they proceed to put, after walking through the church, in its usual place, near the pulpit.

2. It is also very useful if the missionaries walk in procession, in a penitential garb, strewn with ashes, and with a rope around their necks; they enter the door in procession, and afterwards take the discipline in the middle of the church. On another evening the priests of the place can hold a similar procession.

3. It might also be well, on one evening, after the sermon and the act of contrition, to have the people to make a general reconciliation, the women embracing the women, and the men embracing the men. But before this the preacher should call upon them to stand up, then he tells them that while peace is being made, the daughters should ask pardon of their mothers, the sons of their fathers, and that the persons who have offended their neighbors should go in search of those whom they have offended. All the missionaries should be present at this exercise, to see that the men are separated from the women, and to prevent disorder; moreover, when the people show themselves insensible, it will sometimes be-opportune for the missionaries to come forward to exhort and persuade them.

2. THE ERECTION OF CROSSES

This ceremony is very touching; it is performed in the following manner:

After the last meditation of the exercise of a devout life, the preacher announces that as a remembrance not only of the Passion of our Saviour, but also of the mission, five crosses would be erected, and that the faithful who visit them can gain ten thousand years of indulgence by reciting five "Our Fathers" and five "Hail Marys" in memory of the Passion of Jesus Christ and of the sorrows of the Blessed Virgin (Ap. P. Viva, in append. Jubil. in calce Trutinae, § ult.).[13692]

We may see what has been said above about this exercise (pages 126 and 151).

Hence, the meditation finished, five missionaries come from behind the high altar, carrying each a cross upon his shoulder, and walking one after the other with two torches before each cross. When they have reached the place destined to receive the crosses, they place them on the ground; and at the erection of each cross a suitable exhortation is given.

The preacher should take care that during the procession the men leave the church first, and then the women, so as to avoid confusion; and during the exhortations the missionaries should watch that the two sexes remain separated, in order that everything that is unseemly may be prevented, as this ceremony usually takes place in the evening.

The exhortations should be very short, in order that they may be animated and may not cause weariness in those that are present. As five crosses are to be erected, five exhortations are to be given in memory of the five principal mysteries of the Passion, the same as those of the Rosary, namely: the agony, the scourging, the crowning with thorns, the carrying of the cross, and the crucifixion. Every exhortation contains three parts: the exposition of the mystery, the announcement of the grace for which one asks, and the prayer. Thus:—In the first place, one exposes the mystery in memory of which the cross is erected.—Secondly, one announces the grace that should be asked of the eternal Father, through the merits of Jesus Christ, by the faithful who should come to visit this cross, in accordance with the mystery that is announced; for example: at the agony, one should ask pardon for one's sins; at the crowning with thorns, for victory over bad thoughts; at the scourging, one should ask for the virtue of chastity; at the carrying of the cross, for patience in trials; at the crucifixion, for holy perseverance.—Thirdly, at the erection of each cross one actually begs for the grace that refers to the mystery.

At the end of each exhortation a missionary sings the following hymn:

I adore thee, holy cross,
My Saviour's painful bed,
Whereon for sinful man
Was placed that sacred head;
I adore thee, holy cross.

The following is an example of the first exhortation, which, differing from the four that follow, should be preceded by a short introduction; then follow the three parts designated above.

INTRODUCTION.—My brethren, the mission is already at an end, and it closes by leaving to your consideration how much Jesus Christ has suffered in order to save us. You should, then, in future unceasingly keep before your mind the remembrance of the love that your Redeemer has shown you in his Passion, as well as of the promises that you have made; this is the only reason why we erect these crosses.

EXPOSITION OF THE MYSTERY.—The first is erected here in memory of the bloody sweat endured by our Saviour in his prayer in the Garden of Olives. When you come to visit this cross, recite an "Our Father" and a "Hail Mary," and remember the bloody sweat and the agony which Jesus Christ suffered in the Garden of Olives while he was thinking of your ingratitude, etc.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF GRACE.—Through the merits of this pain which Jesus Christ felt, you should ask the eternal Father to grant you a great sorrow and pardon for your sins.

PETITION FOR GRACE.—Well, let us begin this evening. Raise the cross. (Here the cross is raised, and is to remain so.) Let all of you kneel down; let us adore this cross, and let us pray: O holy cross! we adore thee in memory of the bloody sweat and the agony which Jesus Christ suffered in the Garden of Olives.—And Thou, O eternal Father! by the merits of these sufferings of Thy well-beloved Son, give us a great sorrow for our sins and the pardon of all the offences that we have committed against Thee.

After this prayer the foregoing hymn is intoned. Afterwards, in the same way, exhortations are given for the four other crosses.

3. THE PLACING OF THE AUDIENCE AND OF THE PULPIT

The placing of the audience and of the pulpit is of great importance to the success of the mission; the Superior should therefore pay considerable attention to this point. The following is a way of arranging the audience: The women are put together in the upper part of the church, that is, towards the high altar; and the men are to be in that part near the door. Care should be taken that the hearers are not placed too far from the pulpit; for when they see the preacher from afar, his words make but little impression, because they seem to them to be addressed to others, and not to themselves.

The pulpit should be placed in the middle or nearly in the middle, between the men and the women. In our missions we are accustomed to use portable pulpits; for these can be more easily put in the desired place, and they are more suitable for familiar language, which is the language of the missions. It is, however, true, that in places where the population is numerous, and where the churches are large, especially if they are very long, it is not opportune to use portable pulpits, which are very often low; for then those that are far off do not well see nor understand the preacher, whose voice remains as it were stifled: under these circumstances one must preach from the pulpit of the church.

One should, moreover, always take care, as much as possible, to separate the men from the women by means of curtains or benches, so that they may not even see one another.

In our missions it is not customary to expose the Blessed Sacrament every day; this is done only at the last sermon, when Benediction is given.

Near the pulpit it is usual to place a large statue of the Blessed Virgin, in such a manner that the feet of the statue may be nearly at the height of the pulpit.

4. THE HOUR WHEN THE SERMON IS PREACHED

There are pastors who desire that the sermon should be finished before the close of the day; for they say that if it is given in the evening many scandals will be the consequence. But this is mere prejudice, and altogether a mistake when there is question of missions. During the time of the mission, especially in villages, the hearers are composed mostly of workmen who live from hand to mouth, and who consequently are obliged to work every day to make a living. This being the case, if the sermon is given during the day it will be attended only by priests, by a few people of leisure, and by a small number of devout women who can leave their occupation; while most of the women, and especially the men, who need the mission most, will not be able to attend. They will scarcely come on holydays and on the last day, the day of the blessing, when they will be found insensible, because they have not heard the sermons: they will not then be absolved, and they will remain in the bad state in which they were before; so that the mission will be a failure, as this has happened in a certain place, because the sermon was preached before the men returned from the fields. It should be understood that the greatest fruit of the mission consists in the conversion of the men; for if the men remain bad, the women will also be bad.

But to this you may reply: If the mission is permitted to go on in the evening, many inconveniences will result therefrom; for every one knows the old proverb: Evil should not be done that good may arise therefrom—Non sunt facienda mala, ut eveniant bona. I reply: The proverb says: Evil should not be done—Non sunt facienda mala. But it is not said: Evil is not permitted that good may arise therefrom—Non sunt permittenda mala, ut eveniant bona. Sometimes it is good to permit some evil in order that good may not be omitted, especially when there is question of the common good; for if one had to avoid all the inconveniences that may be caused in the exercises of piety, we should have to abolish in the Church all the feasts, the processions, the exposition of the Blessed Sacrament, and even the confessions and the communions, since all these works give rise to inconveniences; but the Church rightly permits these inconveniences in order not to hinder the common good.—Moreover, I answer that during the mission these supposed scandals hardly occur: then the people are more timorous; the wicked themselves abstain from committing any impertinence for fear of being regarded as men who have lost the faith, or at least, because they presume that they would not find those whom they wish to tempt ready to yield to their wicked designs. O God! can we suppose that those perverse men, who have so many occasions and means to do evil, will want to do so all the time of the mission? Let us add that, as to what concerns shameful scandals, the danger does not morally exist: care is taken that the church is always well lighted as soon as it becomes dark; there are many lights and many eyes; and as for things outside of the church, the women always return home in the company of persons who will not allow the least scandal to be committed before their eyes.

After all, let us concede that sometimes an impropriety may occur in some place; but which is a greater evil—to permit some rare impropriety of this kind, or to leave the whole population in the state in which it is, with its habitual sins, its wicked morals, its inveterate vices, its sacrileges, its scandals? For my part, I do not understand the zeal of those who, through fear of some rare impropriety which scarcely occurs, believe it their duty to hinder the certain good of the mission, by taking away from the people the opportunity to hear the sermon. In the spring, when the days are long, the sermon may be successfully preached during the day; but in winter it is impossible for the mission to succeed when the sermon is given before the evening. During this season it should be given only about half an hour before the setting of the sun; often even, where the fields are distant from the centre of habitation, it will be necessary to begin it half an hour after sunset, and sometimes even later.

Chapter VIII

OTHER EXERCISES THAT TAKE PLACE DURING THE MISSION

I. THE MORNING MEDITATION

DURING the mission, in the morning, before daybreak, a meditation is given for the convenience of persons who must work. There is no question here of the common and daily meditation which is usually made by pious persons or by communities, but of that which takes place in the missions, and which in substance is, composed of all the parts requisite for the sermon, with this difference, that it demands a more moderate and more emotional style, admits less reasoning and fewer proofs, and should be shorter. The sermon usually lasts an hour and a quarter, inclusively of the act of contrition; but the meditation should not continue beyond three quarters of an hour.

The parts of meditation are: First, the exordium with the proposition, the preparation, and the proofs; then the reflections, the applications, and the practices; and finally, the act of contrition with the resolution. In regard to all these parts, we should observe what has been said on the subject of the sermon, Chapter VII., §2.[13693] As for the preparation, which is made in the meditation differently from the sermon, we have spoken of it in, § 6[13694] which treats of the devout life.

It must be here remarked that in the places the population of which is numerous, on the days on which many people come to church, especially on feast days, besides the meditation, it is usual to preach another sermon, though at a later hour.

II. THE DISCOURSE FOR THE MEMBERS OF THE CONFRATERNITY

Nothing can be more useful to keep men in the path of virtue than to induce them to frequent a confraternity, the spiritual Father of which gives them an instruction on Sundays, and hears their confessions. We should, therefore, endeavor, as much as possible, to urge the men to have themselves admitted into the confraternity.

The preacher should specially exhort them to join it; moreover, the evening after the sermon, it will be well to invite all those that wish to enter the confraternity to have their names registered in the church by a missionary. After this it will also be well for the preacher himself, or another missionary, on the morning of a feast day, to go to the chapel where the confraternity is to meet, and give a special instruction to the members; he should take care to give notice of this from the pulpit on the preceding evening, so that on the following day he may find them all assembled. The purpose of this instruction is to make known the great good that results from the frequentation of the confraternity, especially in the case of those that have been consecrated to the Blessed Virgin.

EXAMPLE OF THIS DISCOURSE

Now all good things came to me together with her.[13695] The great deluge at the time of Noe was the cause why all mankind perished, with the exception of eight persons who were saved in the Ark. In our time a deluge, not of water, but of sins, continually inundates the earth, and few persons escape it, especially among seculars; hardly are those saved that take refuge in an ark of salvation, that is, some confraternity of the Blessed Virgin. Among so many seculars, how many are there in the grace of God? There are some, but these frequent the confraternity.

My dear brethren, you have attended the mission; I trust that God, by the light of his grace, has made you see that there is no other good or happiness in this life than to save one's soul. The world calls him happy who is rich, who is honored, and it calls unhappy him who is poor and despised; but the truth is no one is happy but he who is in the grace of God and is saved, and that no one is unhappy but he who lives as an enemy of God and is damned. In a few days all things have an end for man; what will it then profit him to have gained the whole world if after dying he loses his soul, and goes to weep in hell for all eternity? Now I wish to show what hope of salvation there is for him who frequents the confraternity of the Blessed Virgin.

When a secular asks me what he should do in order to save his soul, I know of no more useful and sure means to counsel him than to enter a confraternity. The confraternity contains the most efficacious means to attain eternal salvation, so that every member of the confraternity may rightly say that he finds therein all that is needful: All good things came to me together with her.

In the first place, it is a great means of salvation for a secular to hear often the word of God, while, on the other hand, the holy Fathers regard him as damned who despises it; for the sheep of Christ willingly hear his voice, which he makes them hear through the mouth of his ministers: My sheep hear My voice.[13696] In fact, seculars that give themselves up to the affairs of the world and hear no sermons, easily lose the remembrance of the good and of the evil of the next world; and consequently, abandoning themselves to earthly pleasures, they live and die in the state of sin. But he who frequents the confraternity, hearing the priest speak of death, judgment, hell, eternity, easily resists with God's help the temptations that assail him, according to what the Holy Ghost says to us: In all thy works remember thy last end, and thou shalt never sin.[13697]

Secondly, to keep one's self in the grace of God it is necessary to frequent the sacraments; for they are the nourishment of the soul; they preserve its life; this is especially done by holy Communion, which is called bread: as the earthly bread preserves the life of the body, so the heavenly bread preserves the life of the soul. This is taught by the Council of Trent, which says: "This sacrament frees us from daily faults, and preserves us from mortal sins."[13698]

Thirdly, he who visits the confraternity of the Blessed Virgin is enriched with graces by this divine Mother, through whose hands the Lord dispenses all his graces; this she tells us in these words that the Church applies to her: With me are riches . . that I may enrich them that love me.[13699]—And St. Bonaventure says: "He who obtains grace from Mary shall be recognized by the citizens of paradise; and he who bears the impress of her name shall be inscribed in the Book of life."[13700] This is especially to be understood of the confraternity of Mary. We may see that to be enrolled as a member of the confraternity is the same as to be inscribed in the Book of life, provided we persevere in being faithful in frequenting the confraternity and in observing its rules; for, of what use would it serve to have one's name inscribed on the register, or if one enters it without frequenting the sacraments; this being one of its most important rules? There are some that enter the confraternity, not to honor the Blessed Virgin, nor to save their souls, but to domineer, to rule; and sometimes they begin to shout, to dispute in a manner more noisy than if they were at a house where gaming is going on. Those that act thus would do better to stay away from the confraternity.

I therefore recommend to each one of you, first, to frequent the confraternity, and not to omit to be present through frivolous reasons, as some do, who either in order to play, or to take a walk, or to perform some trifling thing, will say that their business prevented them. But I say to them in reply: Know that in this world, whatever may be your business, you have nothing more important than the salvation of your soul; for if you lose your soul, all will be lost to you. Tell me: would you neglect to gain a thousand pieces of gold in your efforts to gain a few little pieces of money? Hence it is, etc.—Rather lose all than lose one's soul. When Sunday comes, my dear brethren, leave everything in order to go to the confraternity. Be convinced that the Blessed Virgin will not allow you to suffer any loss on this account. It is said that her servants are clothed with double garments: All her domestics are clothed with double garments.[13701] This means that they are provided with two kinds of goods, spiritual and temporal.

Besides the attendance at the meetings, I recommend to you not to omit confession and Communion, which the Rule prescribes; otherwise, if you happen to fall into sin and remain in the same state, of what use will the confraternity be to you?

Finally, I recommend to you to come to the confraternity for the sole purpose of attending to your devotions. Let each one occupy his place, observe obedience, and fulfil the task that has been given to him, seeking only to save his soul in the confraternity. If you act in this way, you will see that the Mother of God will protect you, soul and body; particularly at the hour of death will she assist you with maternal tenderness.

Oh, how consoling it is at death to have served Mary! Father Binet relates that a pious servant of the Blessed Virgin, whom he assisted in his last moments, said these words to him before dying. "O my Father! if you only knew what contentment I feel for having served the Mother of God! I cannot express to you the joy that I experience at this moment." And he died in celestial peace.—I believe that a death full of consolation is reserved specially for the members who frequent the confraternity. The Duke of Popoli said that all the graces that he had received from God had been given to him through the hands of Mary, because he had frequented the confraternity. At the moment of death he called his son and said to him; "My son, frequent the confraternity of the Blessed Virgin; it is the greatest inheritance that I can leave you; it is that which I leave you."

ACTS OF THANKSGIVING AND PROMISE TO THE BLESSED VIRGIN

Now, my dear brethren, let us all prostrate ourselves at the feet of our Sovereign, and let us promise her not to neglect the confraternity; let each one repeat after me the following prayer:

Ah! my Queen and mother, I should now be in hell; it is thou who through thy intercession hast hitherto preserved me from it: I thank thee to-day for this benefit, and I ask thy pardon for the number of times that I have without a reason neglected to attend the confraternity. How many sins would I have avoided had I attended it! Pardon me, O my Mother! and pray thy divine Son to pardon me all the offences that I have given to him.—Yes, O my Jesus! by the blood that Thou hast shed for me, and also by the love of Mary, pardon me; for I repent, etc.—(Let us now make our promise by saying:) O Mother of God! I promise thee that in future I will never without a good reason neglect any more the confraternity; I promise this to thee, and I give my consent that thou shouldst punish me if I fail to keep it. And thou, my Queen, help me in all my necessities, and principally in all the dangers in which I shall find myself of offending God. Above all, O my tender Mother! do not abandon me at the hour of death; assist me at this decisive moment, and let me die under thy mantle.

But you, my brethren, do not forget then to invoke her, and she will certainly come to your aid. Be, therefore, faithful to the promise that you have to-day made to Mary, and I promise you in her name that she will protect you during life and at your death. If you come to honor her in this chapel, she will one day lead you to paradise to reign there with her. Now I am going to bless you also in the name of Mary, in order that you may keep the promise that you have made to her. (Here the blessing is given with the crucifix.)

THE SECRET CONFRATERNITY

It would also be of very great benefit to establish in honor of the Mother of God the SECRET CONFRATERNITY of the most fervent members. I will here briefly indicate the exercises that are usually performed in the secret confraternities: 1. A half-hour's spiritual reading is made; 2. The Vespers and Compline of the Holy Ghost are recited; 3. The Litany of the saints is said, and the members appointed then perform some act of mortification, as the carrying of the cross on the shoulders, and the like; 4. A quarter of an hour's meditation on the Passion of Jesus Christ is made; 5. Each one accuses himself of the faults committed against the rules, and receives a penance therefor from the Director; 6. A member appointed reads the nosegay of mortifications practised during the week, and announces the coming novenas, etc.; 7. Finally, the discipline is taken during a Miserere and a Salve Regina, and every one kisses the feet of the crucifix placed at the foot of the altar. As for the rules, the following are what the members should observe: 1. Every day, mental prayer of half an hour, visit to the Blessed Sacrament and to the Blessed Virgin, examination of conscience in the evening, spiritual reading, recommendation to God of souls in purgatory and of sinners; 2. The avoiding of plays and of worldly amusements; 3. Frequent Communion, and the practice of some mortification, as the cilicium, the discipline, etc.; 4. When a member becomes sick, all the rest are obliged to visit him.[13702]

III. THE DISCOURSE TO MAIDENS

St. Ignatius, Martyr, writing to his disciples, exhorted them carefully to watch over the virgins, so that they might be constant in the promise that they had made to Jesus Christ of their virginity, which is so precious a gift before God. Virgins consecrated to the love of the divine Spouse are called by St. Cyprian the most noble part of the Church.[13703] Therefore, besides St. Cyprian, several among the holy Fathers, as St. Ephrem, St. Ambrose, St. John Chrysostom, and others, have composed works that treat entirely of the praises of virginity.

The glorious Apostle St. Matthew, as Denis the Carthusian relates, did not wish to allow the virgin St. Iphigenia, who was consecrated to Jesus Christ, to marry a monarch, although he promised to embrace the faith with all his people. Thomas Cantipratensis relates that at Rome the sister of the Count of Puglia, promised in marriage by his brother to a lord, fled in the disguise of a man so as not to be forced to marry; but she was pursued by her brother, and overtaken near a rock that projected into the sea. Putting her confidence in God, she threw herself into the abyss, and afterwards walked upon the water as far as a desert in Greece, where she remained safe. I wished to quote these examples to show that it is not a useless work, but a work that is very agreeable to God, when priests take care to exhort young persons to consecrate to Jesus Christ the lily of their virginity. This is the reason why in our missions it is customary, on the morning of one of the last days, that a missionary, assisted by another priest advanced in years, addresses in a retired place an instruction on this point to all the young women.

EXAMPLE OF A DISCOURSE TO YOUNG WOMEN

My dear sisters, I do not pretend to explain to you in this discourse all the merits and all the advantages obtained by young maidens in consecrating their virginity to Jesus Christ. I will confine myself to pointing them out briefly.

First, they become in the eyes of God beautiful as the angels of heaven: They shall be as the angels of God in heaven.[13704] Baronius[13705] relates that at the death of a pious virgin, named Geogia, a great number of doves were seen flying about her; and when her body was carried to the church, these doves placed themselves on the part of the roof which corresponded to the place where the coffin was put, and flew away only after the burial of the deceased. Every one believed that these doves were angels, who thus honored her virginal body.

Moreover, when a young person renounces the world and devotes herself to the love of Jesus Christ, she becomes the spouse of the Son of God. In the Gospel our Saviour is called now Father, now Mother, now Shepherd of Souls; but in regard to virgins he calls himself their Bridegroom or Spouse: They went out to meet their bridegroom.[13706]

A young person who wishes to establish herself in the world, if she is prudent, makes careful inquiries about those that aspire to her hand, and tries to know which among them is the noblest and richest. Let us, then, address ourselves to the Spouse of the Canticles, who knows very well the prerogatives of the divine Spouse, and let us ask him what he is:—Tell me, O divine Spouse! what is he who loves thee and renders thee the most happy among all women?—My beloved is white and ruddy, chosen out of thousands.[13707] My beloved, she says, is all white by his purity, and is ruddy by the love with which he is inflamed; he is, in a word, so beautiful, so noble, so affable, that one finds him to be the most amiable among all spouses.

When to St. Agnes was offered as her spouse the son of the Prefect of Rome, this glorious virgin was right when she answered, as St. Ambrose tells us, that she had found a far better match.[13708]

Such was also the answer of St. Domitilla, niece of the Emperor Domitian, which she gave to persons who tried to persuade her that she could be married to Count Aurelian, since he consented that she should remain a Christian: "But, tell me," she answered them, "if to a young woman there was presented, on the one hand, a great monarch, and on the other, a poor plebeian, which of the two would she choose for a husband? To accept Aurelian, I should have to renounce the King of heaven; this would be folly, and I do not wish to be guilty of it." Hence in order to remain faithful to Jesus Christ, to whom she had consecrated her virginity, she gave herself up to be burnt alive—a punishment to which her barbarous lover had condemned her.[13709]

Generous souls who renounce the world for the love of Jesus Christ, become the cherished spouses of the Son of God. They are called First-fruits of the Lamb: First-fruits to God and to the Lamb.[13710] Why the First-fruits? Because, says Cardinal Hugo, as the first-fruits are more agreeable than others, so virgins are objects of the Lord's predilection. The divine Spouse is nourished among the lilies: Who feedeth among the lilies.[13711] And what are these lilies, if not fervent souls who consecrate their virginity to Jesus Christ? Venerable Bede assures us that the chant of the virgins, that is, the honor which the virgins render to God by preserving to him intact the lily of their purity, is more agreeable to the Lord than the chant of all the other saints. In fact, the Holy Ghost declares that no good can compensate for the merit of virginity. No price is worthy of a continent soul.[13712] For this reason, according to Cardinal Hugo, one can obtain a dispensation from all other vows, but not from the vow of virginity. It is also on this account that theologians believe that the Blessed Virgin would have been disposed to renounce the sublime dignity of the Mother of God rather than lose the treasure of her virginity.

Who then here below can ever comprehend the glory that God reserves in paradise for his chaste spouses? Doctors teach that in heaven virgins have their own glory, which is a certain crown or a special joy, of which other holy souls are deprived.

But let us pass to what directly refers to the subject that we actually have in view.

A young person will say: If I marry can I not also sanctify myself?—I wish you to hear the answer to this, not from my mouth, but from that of St. Paul; you will also see at the same time the difference between virgins and married persons. The following are the words of the Apostle: The unmarried woman and the virgin thinketh on the things of the Lord: that she may be holy both in body and in spirit. But she that is married thinketh on the things of the world, how she may please her husband.[13713] Then he adds: This I speak for your profit: . . . for that which is decent, and which may give you power to attend upon the Lord without impediment.[13714]

Let us ponder well this advice of the Apostle. In the first place, I must remark that married women can, it is true, be holy in spirit but not in body, while a virgin that sanctifies herself is holy in spirit and in body, having consecrated to Jesus Christ her virginity: Holy both in body and in spirit. Note, moreover, these words: Which may give you power to attend upon the Lord without impediment.—Ah! how many obstacles have not married women in order to sanctify themselves! the higher their rank the greater obstacles do they encounter. In order to sanctify one's self one must use the means, especially apply one's self much to mental prayer, frequent often the sacraments, and think without ceasing of God. But how can a married woman find time to occupy herself with the things of God? She that is married thinks on the things of the world, how she may please her husband. She must, says St. Paul, occupy herself with the things of the world; she has to provide for the wants of her family, for food, for clothing; she has to watch over the education of her children, to please her husband and the relatives of her husband; and this will be the cause, adds the Apostle, why her heart will be divided, as she is obliged to divide her affections between her husband, her children, and God. How can a married woman devote herself much to mental prayer and go frequently to Holy Communion if she does not find enough at home to provide for the wants of her family? The husband wishes to be served; the children cry, scream, or ask for a thousand things; how can she go to make meditation amidst so many occupations and embarrassments? It will hardly be permitted her to go to church to recollect herself and to receive Communion on Sundays. She will still have a good will; but it will be very difficult for her to attend to the things of God as she should. It is true that by this very privation she may gain merit by resigning herself to the will of God, who in this state requires of her only a continual sacrifice of resignation and of patience. But in the midst of so many distractions, of so much noise without meditation, without the sacraments, it will be morally impossible for her to have this heroic virtue of patience and resignation.

Ah, would to God that married women would have nothing else to deplore than to be deprived of the time necessary to attend to their devotions! The greatest evil is the danger in which these unfortunate persons continually find themselves of losing the grace of God, being obliged to see frequently their brothers-in-law or other relatives, or friends of their husband, either at home or elsewhere. Of this young persons are ignorant; but this is well known by married women, who are every day exposed to all these dangers, and is also well known by the confessors who hear them. We do not speak of the sad days which all married women must spend. The bad conduct of the husband, the disagreeable things caused by the children, the necessities of housekeeping, dependence on a mother-in-law or sisters-in-law, the pains of child-birth that is always accompanied by danger of death, suspicions, troubles of conscience in regard to the education of the children—all this forms a chain of tribulations in which married women can only lament, happy indeed if they do not lose their soul, and if God gives them the grace not to pass from the hell of this life to an eternal hell in the next. Such is the lot that awaits young women who give themselves up to the world. But you will say, Among all the married women are there none that have sanctified themselves?—I beg your pardon, there are some; but who are they? Those that sanctify themselves by martyrdom, those that know how to suffer everything for God, with a patience that nothing can overcome. How many are there that rise to such perfection? They are as rare as white flies. And if you meet with any one of these, you will learn that she is always weeping for regret of having entered the world, while she could have consecrated herself to Jesus Christ. For myself, I do not remember to have ever found among married women a single pious person who was content with her state of life.

True happiness is therefore the inheritance of virgins consecrated to Jesus Christ. They are free from the dangers to which married persons are necessarily exposed. Their affections are not fixed on children, nor on men of the world, nor on perishable goods, nor on vain ornaments, nor on any kind of dependence. While married women are obliged to adorn themselves with care, and at great expense, to appear in the world according to their rank and to please their husbands, a virgin consecrated to Jesus Christ needs to cover herself only with a garment, however common it may be; she would even create scandal if she dressed herself with elegance. Moreover, virgins are not troubled with the care of a house, a family, a husband; their sole concern, the only desire of their hearts, is to please Jesus Christ, to whom they have dedicated their souls, their bodies, and all their affections. Thus they have more liberty of spirit to think of God, and more time to give themselves up to prayer and the frequentation of the sacraments.

But let us hear the excuses put forward by certain persons that have but little love for Jesus Christ.

I would renounce the world, one says, if I could enter a convent, or at least if it were always permitted me to go to church to make my devotions there; but I cannot remain at home, or I have brothers who ill-treat me, and on the other hand, my relatives refuse to allow me to frequent the church.—Before answering you, I shall put this question to you: Do you wish to leave the world to lead a comfortable life or to sanctify yourself; to do your will or that of Jesus Christ? And if you wish to leave the world, to sanctify yourself, and to please Jesus Christ, I ask you a second question: Tell me: in what does sanctity consist? Sanctity does not consist in remaining in the convent, nor in spending the entire day in the church, but it consists, on the one hand, in practising mental prayer and going to communion when one can, and on the other, in obeying, in rendering one's self useful to the house, in living in retirement, and in suffering pain and contempt for God. And if you were going to a convent, what, think you, would you do there? Would you always be there in the choir, or in your cell, leaving it only in order to go to the refectory and to recreation? In the convent there is no doubt a time fixed for meditation, for Mass, and for Communion; but after that, the religious must be employed in the service of the house, especially the lay-sisters, who, as they do not go to the choir, are engaged in work, and have consequently less time to devote to prayer. All say, the convent, the convent! Ah! pious persons who are poor have greater facility to devote themselves to prayer and to sanctify themselves in their own house than in the convent! How many are there who to my knowledge are sorry for having entered the convent, especially in certain houses where the community is large, and where the poor lay-sisters have scarcely time to say the Rosary.

But you will reply: I have a father and a mother who have a disagreeable temper; I have at home impertinent brothers, who ill-treat me; I cannot remain there.—Well, if you go out into the world, will you find no one to contradict you; no mother-in-law, no sisters-in-law, no children, no husband? Ah! how infamous the treatment on the part of husbands, who at first make line promises, and afterwards are no longer husbands, but become the tyrants of their unfortunate wives, whom they treat no longer as their companions, but as slaves! Ask all married women whether what I say is not true; or rather, without making inquiries, have you not already learnt this truth from the example of your mothers? At least, when you have given yourselves to God, if you have to suffer at home, you bear all for the love of Jesus Christ, and the Lord well knows how to make your cross light and sweet; but what a pain to have to suffer, and to suffer for the world, without consolation and without merit! Believe me, if Jesus calls you to his love, if he wishes you for his spouses, listen without fear to his voice; you will not fail to be consoled and even to rejoice in the midst of sufferings. This will, however, only be the case as long as you love him and conduct yourselves as his true spouses.

Learn, then, what are the means that you should use so as to live as true spouses of Jesus Christ, and to attain sanctity.

In order that a virgin may be holy, it is not sufficient that she should preserve her virginity and that she be called a spouse of Jesus Christ: it will be necessary that she should practise the virtues that are proper to a spouse of Jesus Christ. We read in the Gospel[13715] that heaven is like virgins; but what virgins?—no doubt wise, but not foolish, virgins. Wise virgins were led to the nuptials; but the foolish found the doors shut, and the Bridegroom said to them: I know you not: You are virgins, but I do not recognize you as my spouses.—The true spouses of Jesus Christ follow their divine Spouse wherever he goes: These follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth.[13716] What is it to follow the spouse? St. Augustine[13717] explains this to us: It is to imitate him by walking in his footsteps in body and in soul. After having consecrated to him your body, you must give him your whole heart, so that your heart may be entirely occupied in loving him.

1. The first means is mental prayer, to which you should particularly apply yourselves. But do not believe that in order to make mental prayer it is necessary to be in the convent or to spend the entire day in the church. It is true that at home there is often noise, and there is much disturbance caused by persons who come and go; however, if one wishes one can always find a place and a time for devoting one's self to prayer, as when the house is more quiet, either in the morning before others rise, or in the evening after they have retired. Nor is it necessary, in order to pray, that one should always be on one's knees: one may meditate even while working or while walking, when there is no other more suitable time; it is sufficient if one occupies one's self with God, as when one reflects on the Passion of Jesus Christ or on some other pious subject.

2. The second means is the frequentation of the sacraments of confession and Communion.—For confession we should choose a Director to whom we should be entirely submissive; without doing so we should not walk on the right road.—As for Communion, it must depend entirely on obedience; but we must desire it and ask for it. This divine bread needs a soul that hungers after it; Jesus Christ wishes us to have a longing for him. It is frequent Communion that makes the spouses of Jesus Christ faithful to this heavenly Spouse, particularly in keeping them in holy purity. The Blessed Sacrament preserves in the soul all the virtues; but it is especially effective in preserving intact the lily of virginity, according to the words of the Prophet, who calls it: The corn of the chosen ones, and wine which maketh virgins to spring forth.[13718]

3. The third means is retirement and vigilance.—The divine Spouse compares his well-beloved to a lily surrounded by thorns: As the lily among thorns, so is My love among daughters.[13719] If a virgin wishes to live in the midst of society, of amusements, and other worldly frivolities, it will be impossible for her to remain faithful to Jesus Christ; she must, therefore, keep herself constantly among the thorns of obedience and of mortification, and should behave, especially towards men, not only with the greatest reserve and the greatest modesty in her looks and her words, but also when necessary with a rigid austerity, and even with rudeness. Such are the thorns that preserve lilies, that is, virgins; without these precautions they would soon go astray.—The Lord also compares the beauty of his spouse to that of the turtle dove: Thy cheeks are beautiful as the turtle-dove's.[13720] Why? Because the turtle-dove is naturally inclined to flee the company of other birds, and loves to be always alone. A virgin, therefore, appears beautiful in the eyes of Jesus Christ when she leads a retired life, and does all she can to keep herself retired and hidden from the eyes of others. St. Jerome says that this Spouse of souls is jealous.[13721] Hence it is very displeasing to him to see a virgin, after having consecrated herself to his love, seeking to appear in the world and to please men. Those persons that are truly virtuous prefer to disfigure themselves rather than be the object of a bad desire.—The venerable Sister Catharine of Jesus, before becoming a religious of St. Teresa, washed herself with dirty water, and then exposed herself to the sun so as to spoil her complexion.—Bollandus[13722] relates that St. Andregesina, having been promised in marriage, begged the Lord to make her quite deformed, and her prayer was immediately heard. She at once appeared covered with leprosy so that every one fled from her; but after the espousals had been dissolved, she recovered her former beauty.—We read in the Mirror of Examples, that there was in a convent a young virgin who had consecrated herself to God, and whose eyes had charmed a prince. The latter having threatened to set fire to the convent if she did not yield to his desires, what did she do? She tore out her eyes, and sent them to him in a basin with this message: "Here are the darts that have wounded your heart; take them, and leave me untouched."—The same author also quotes the example of St. Euphemia, whom her father had promised in marriage to a count. Seeing that this suitor neglected no means to make her his wife, she one day took a knife and cut off her nose and her lips, saying: "Vain beauty, thou shalt not be to me any longer an occasion of sin!" Baronius[13723] also relates that St. Ebba, abbess of the monastery of Coldingham, fearing an invasion of the barbarians, cut off her nose and her upper lip as far as the teeth, and that after her example all the other religious, to the number of thirty, did the same thing. The barbarians actually came, and seeing them thus disfigured, they became furious, set fire to the monastery, and made all perish in the flames. The Church honors them as martyrs.—They were incited to this heroic act by an impulse of the Holy Ghost; it is not permitted to others to act in this way. You see, moreover, in these examples what virgins who love Jesus Christ have done in order to escape the lust of men. Every fervent young maiden should at least endeavor to conduct herself with modesty, and expose herself as little as possible to the gaze of the world. If it should unfortunately happen that a virgin should be the victim of any violence, without her fault, let her be assured that her purity has not been tarnished. Hence St. Lucia answered the tyrant, who threatened to have her dishonored: "If I am outraged against my will, I shall obtain a double crown." We know the adage: "Not the feeling, but the consent, wounds the soul." Besides, you must be convinced that a young maiden who conducts herself with modesty and reserve will not fail to make herself respected.

4. The fourth means in order to preserve purity is the mortification of the senses—St. Basil says: "It is altogether improper for a virgin to violate chastity, with the tongue, with the ears, with the touch, much less with the heart."[13724] A virgin, in order to remain pure, should be chaste with her tongue, by always speaking modestly, and only through necessity with men, and in this case in a few words; chaste with her ears, by avoiding to listen to discourses about the things of the world; chaste with her eyes, by keeping them shut or lowered to the ground in the presence of men; chaste with regard to the touch, by using the greatest precaution both in regard to others and in regard to herself; but she should be especially chaste in her heart by trying to resist every immodest thought by promptly having recourse to Jesus and Mary.—For this purpose it will also be necessary for her to mortify her body by fasts, by abstinence, by disciplines, by ciliciums; but in order to practise these mortifications permission from the confessor must be asked: without this they would be rather hurtful to the soul, as they might inspire one with pride. No one should therefore practise such penances without having obtained permission from one's Director; but one should desire the permission and ask it, for Directors do not grant it as long as we do not show them a desire to obtain it. Jesus is a Spouse of blood; he has espoused our souls on the cross, on which he has shed the last drop of his blood: A bloody spouse thou art to me.[13725] This is the reason why spouses that love him love to suffer tribulations, diseases, pains, ill-treatment, injuries, and they receive them not only with patience, but with joy. In this sense the passage of Scripture is understood, namely: These follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth.[13726]

They follow Jesus their divine Spouse by singing his praises with joy, even in the midst of reproaches and pains, after the example of so many holy martyrs who expressed their happiness amid tortures, or while they were on their way to the place of execution.

2. Finally, in order to obtain the grace of perseverance in a holy life, you should take care often to recommend yourselves to the Queen of heaven, the most pure Mother of God. She is the mediatress who prepares and who concludes the union of souls with her divine Son; it is she that introduces and presents them to him as his spouses: After her shall virgins be brought to the King.[13727] It is she, finally, that obtains for these chosen spouses the virtue of perseverance; without the help of Mary they would become so many faithless spouses.

PRAYER TO JESUS CHRIST

(The preacher, after having made all his hearers go down on their knees at the foot of the crucifix, or a statue of the Infant Jesus, which would suit better under the circumstances, thus continues:)

You, then, who are listening to me—I am addressing myself to young maidens who feel themselves called by the divine Spouse to renounce the world for the love of him—you who have conceived the pious design of not belonging to the world, but to Jesus Christ, I do not wish that you should on this very day make this vow, and that you should contract immediately the engagement to keep perpetual chastity; you should make this vow when God inspires you and when you have obtained for this purpose the consent of your confessor. I wish only that by a simple act, without contracting any obligation, you should render thanks to Jesus Christ for the favor that he has done you of having called you to his love, and that you should offer yourselves to belong entirely to him during your whole life. Speak to him in the following manner:

Ah! my Jesus, my God and my Redeemer, who didst die for me; pardon me if I also call Thee my Spouse: I am bold enough to do so, because I see that Thou deignest to invite me to this honor; it is a favor for which I know not how to thank Thee. At present I deserve to be in hell, and instead of punishing me Thou wishest me to become Thy spouse. Yes, my divine Spouse, I renounce the world, I renounce everything for love of Thee, and I give myself entirely to Thee. What is the world to me? My Jesus, Thou shalt henceforth be my only good, my only love. I see that Thou wishest to possess my whole heart; I wish to give it to Thee entirely: please accept my offering; do not repel me as I deserve to be repelled. Forget all the displeasure that I have given Thee in the past; I repent of it with my whole soul; ah! would that I had died before offending Thee! Pardon me, inflame me with Thy holy love, and grant me the grace to be faithful to Thee, and never more to turn my back on Thee. Thou, my Spouse, hast given Thyself entirely to me; here I am, I give myself entirely to Thee.

O Mary, my Queen and my Mother! bind, chain my heart to Jesus Christ, and attach it in such a manner that it may never be separated from him.

(At the end, the preacher gives them the blessing with the crucifix, saying:)

Now I am going to bless you, and by this blessing I wish to unite you to Jesus Christ in order that you may never more leave him; and while I am blessing you, you should give him your heart, saying:

My Jesus, my divine Spouse, in future I will love Thee, Thee alone, and nothing more.

Chapter IX

EXERCISES OF PIETY WHICH ARE RECOMMENDED TO BE PERFORMED AFTER THE MISSION

I. EXERCISES TO BE PERFORMED BY THE PEOPLE

1. We should recommend to the people meditation in common in the church;[13728] this can be more easily done in the morning during the first Mass in the following manner: A priest or a cleric, before the beginning of Mass, reads at first the preparatory acts mentioned in the book, then a short point of meditation, and the Mass begins immediately, the people continuing to meditate on the point that has been read; after the consideration another point is read; and at the end of Mass the Christian Acts, which are also found in the book, are recited.

It must be remarked that the priest who presides at the meditation should read and not dictate it. It is true that many priests would have the talent to develop the subject of meditation; but if one adopted this method, two inconveniences would result therefrom. The first is that the priest who dictates the meditation would be easily led to speak the whole time, and the people would thus become accustomed, not to meditate, but to listen; so that if any one should not be able to come to the church, and should have no one to dictate the meditation, not knowing how to meditate by himself, he would do nothing. The second inconvenience is that this priest will not be able, nor would he be willing, to be always present at the exercise, and if he were absent, this useful devotion would not take place. This has occurred in certain places where a priest had begun to dictate every day the meditation for the people; but afterwards, either because he found the number that attended too small, or because he grew tired of such an office, he omitted it, and thus the meditation in common was given up. The meditation should, therefore, be read, and be read in a loud voice and with pauses, so that all may hear it and understand it. Moreover, it is strongly recommended never to omit this pious and useful exercise, even when only a few persons attend, as very often happens; it suffices if one sees some of the faithful persevere in this exercise.

1. The visit to the Blessed Sacrament should be recommended; it is made in the following manner: A priest, vested in surplice and stole, exposes the Ciborium before six burning candles, and then reads the Christian Acts, such as are found in the little book composed for this exercise. It will be well to make this visit about sunset, when the people have returned from the fields. After this the acts are read out of the book composed for this purpose.[13729]

2. The devotion of visiting the crosses should also be recommended.[13730]

3. One should recommend devotion for the dying, namely, when a person of the place is in his agony: this should be announced by five strokes of the large bell, and every one should recite a Pater and an Ave for the happy passage of this soul into eternity.

4. One should recommend the pious exercises for young women to be performed every Sunday in some church or chapel, in the following manner:

At first the Rosary is recited, and is concluded by the singing of a pious hymn. Then the priest, who has been appointed, gives a short instruction on all that those present have to practise during the week, according to the rules given afterwards. He then teaches them how they should make mental prayer, the acts for Communion, for the visit to the Blessed Sacrament, for the Mass, and even for the time of work; how they should frequently raise their mind to God. He also instructs them on the virtues, mortification, humility, patience, and particularly prayer; how they should recommend themselves to God, in the morning, the evening, during the day, and especially in temptations, by often invoking the holy names of Jesus and Mary until the temptation ceases.

After this instruction the Rosary of the sorrows of the Blessed Virgin is recited. A conclusion is made by a little sermon or a short meditation, which lasts only a quarter of an hour, inclusively of the act of contrition. The matter of the discourse, or meditation, should usually be sin, death, judgment, hell, paradise, eternity, or the Passion of Jesus Christ.

The discourse finished, all those present are sent to make together a visit to the Blessed Sacrament and to the Blessed Virgin; after this they return home. The whole exercise should not last longer than an hour and a half.

The preacher will appoint two of the older members, who shall have the care of the others, shall see that the recitation of the Rosary is begun, and also who are absent, so as to give information of such absence to their parents. He will also appoint two others to act as overseers, whose duty it will be to notify the authorities if any one should behave badly, that thus she may be corrected.

RULES OF CONDUCT AND PRACTICES OF DEVOTION WHICH SHOULD BE OBSERVED BY EVERY UNMARRIED WOMAN WHO PERFORMS THE PIOUS EXERCISES

1. In the morning, on rising, she should thank the Lord, then make an offering of all that she is to do and to suffer during the day; then she shall say three "Hail Marys," that the Blessed Virgin may keep her under her protection during the day and preserve her from every sin.

2. She should make mental prayer during half an hour, or at least a quarter of an hour, on the Passion of Jesus Christ or on the eternal truths, and this at the time and at the place most suitable for her—either in the church or at home.

3. She should hear Mass every time that she is able, and make a visit to the Blessed Sacrament, if not in the church, at least at home.

4. In the evening she should make the examination of conscience with the Christian Acts, of faith, hope, charity, and contrition; and before going to bed, she should again place herself under the protection of the Blessed Virgin Mary, by saying three "Hail Marys."

5. She should receive Communion every Sunday, and oftener if she can, but always in accordance with the advice of her spiritual Father.

6. In honor of Mary she should recite every day five decades of the Rosary; she should fast every Saturday on bread and water, or as well as she can, and during the novenas of the seven feasts of the Blessed Virgin, according as the preacher may direct.

7. She should try always to lead a retired life, avoid going to banquets, to festivals, and frequenting the houses of others, even of relatives. She should flee as from death the danger that is to her of joking and laughing with men; if through necessity she must speak to them, she should do so in a few words and with her eyes cast down. She should never remain at the window or be seated at the door of the house, and should never sing profane songs.

8. She should keep silence in the church and in the streets; she should even keep silence for an hour when at home.

9. She should dress modestly, wearing a garment of a dark color and a veil when she goes to church or walks the streets. She should wear neither gold nor jewels, nor any other object of vanity.

10. She should avoid every venial sin committed wilfully, especially lies, imprecations, and acts of impatience. She should patiently bear sufferings, injuries, and all contradictions, and then say: My Jesus, may all be for Thee. Mary, my Mother, give me patience. May God sanctify me! etc.

11. She should obey her confessor in all that regards her soul, and her parents in whatever regards the government of the house. I said: "The government of the house;" for if her parents wished to marry her by force, she would not be obliged to obey.

12. At the death of any member who has frequented the exercises, all the others should offer up for her five Communions, and say the Rosary for her for a week.

II. THE EXERCISES THAT ARE TO BE RECOMMENDED TO THE PRIESTS

As for the priests of the place, we should recommend to them, chiefly, the frequentation of their Congregation, at which, first, a quarter of an hour's spiritual reading should be made, then a quarter of an hour's meditation; afterwards a case of conscience is proposed. It would also be well for the instruction of young ecclesiastics to exercise them in preaching sermons, or instructions, or exhortations, which are to be given at Christmas or during Passion week. At least, the conference of cases of conscience should not be omitted, and should be given in the following manner: First, he who has been appointed shall propose some question and give the reasons for and against, and conclude by expressing his own opinion; then the others shall bring forward their own views and raise difficulties.

Besides this exercise of the Congregation, an effort should be made to establish, if possible, an academia for moral cases, in which, two or three times a week, every one in his turn shall explain a treatise, so that when one has finished, another may begin; the most important treatise may thus be discussed, for example: De Restitutione, de Contractibus, de Paenitentia, de Matrimonio, de Censuris, de Conscientia, de Legibus, de Praeceptis Decalogi, etc. —It is certain that we learn much more in these conferences than in all the studies to which we apply ourselves in our rooms. The fact is, Moral Theology is a science so vast and so complicated that he that studies it by himself without discussing it with others reads much, but will retain little. In the academia, however, not only are the principles learnt better, but they are better impressed upon the mind, and by thus applying themselves many priests render themselves capable of assisting souls and avoiding at the same time idleness, which usually is the cause that leads so many secular priests astray.

It is also to be recommended to parish priests, and to other capable priests, to preach every Saturday evening, in honor of the Blessed Virgin, a little sermon, which is to be concluded by the narration of some grace granted by the Blessed Virgin to her servants, with a prayer at the end asking for her protection. Moreover, we should also recommend that the priests should make every year, on some feast of Mary, a solemn novena, with exposition of the Blessed Sacrament and sermon every day of the novena. The priests should keep before their minds the promises made by this divine Mother to those that seek to honor her, according to what is read in her Office: They that work by we, shall not sin. They that explain me, shall have life everlasting.[13731]

Chapter X

GENERAL REMARKS ABOUT THE GIVING OF MISSIONS

I.—WHEN several villages happen to be situated at a short distance from one another, there are Superiors who are accustomed to give a mission in a church that occupies a central position, imagining that the people of the surrounding places will attend this mission, and thus a single mission will suffice for all the villages together. In this way these Superiors reason, and act accordingly.

For myself, I say that such a mission will not be of use to any of the neighboring villages; it will hardly be of benefit to the place where it is given; and even for the latter it can have but little success on account of the confusion and the concourse of inhabitants from other places; for if only a few people were to come from the different villages, they would form a large number, but usually very little fruit would be produced. Missions of this kind would serve only for the purpose of being able to say that a mission has been given in those places; but to tell the truth, one should say that none has been given. The following are my reasons: The fruit derived by the people in attending the mission consists in hearing the sermons, and in hearing all or nearly all of them in the order in which they are preached in the missions. This series of sermons on the eternal truths, namely, the importance of salvation, the malice of sin, final impenitence, etc., with the four Last Things, is that which makes, so to speak, a powerful assault upon souls plunged in the mire of sin, and gains them to Jesus Christ. Now when the mission is given in a church for several of the neighboring places, it happens that the greater part of those that come from the surrounding villages do not hear all the sermons; they scarcely hear two or three of them; for as the mission is given outside of their place, they attend it, each one in his turn, so as not to leave their homes without protection; and then, in order to be soon enough back to their homes, those that come from afar often leave the sermon at the most important part of it. Moreover, such a mission is profitable to the devout souls of those places, but not to others, who, however, stand most in need of it; for having troubled consciences, and feeling a repugnance for the word of God, they easily dispense themselves from going to the mission, alleging various excuses, such as: It is too far, the sermon is over too late, it is cold, the church is small, etc.—But when the mission is given in the place itself, and all attend it, men and women, sinners will also attend, although they will do so with repugnance; yet they will do so through human respect, in order that others may not point their finger at them. They will attend, and God will touch their hearts, as frequently happens in the missions.

From all this I conclude that it is better to give the mission separately in every village, even if this cannot be done in the same year; for in those places where it is given, every one will profit by it, and especially those that need it most. As for the other villages, it may, at least, be hoped that emulation will prompt the people also to procure for themselves during the subsequent years the benefit of a mission; then, finally, it will not be said that all have received this benefit, when in reality they did not receive it.

Moreover, when a mission is to be given in some city or village, the population of which is very large, especially if many of the habitations are far distant from the principal church, and more so if this church cannot hold all the people, it will be well, and even necessary, to give several missions at the same time in different, churches. This is what we have done with great fruit in several cities, as at Nola, Sarno, etc.; particularly at Foggia and at Salerno, where, besides the mission at the cathedral, five other missions were given in as many different churches. To proceed with order, the following method has been followed: At first the mission is begun in the principal church, in which it should last at least for two weeks; during this mission, eight or ten days after it has been begun, a feast day is chosen to open the little missions, the exercises of which should continue for about twelve days. Experience has proved that these small missions have sometimes been more successful than the large missions.

II.—The Superior should take care that in each mission there be a sufficient number of missionaries to hear the confessions, according to the population of the place; for it should be borne in mind that the principal fruit of the missions, above all in country places where there are few confessors, and where the latter belong to the place itself, consists in repairing many of the sacrilegious or invalid confessions, on account of the great repugnance that penitents feel of making known their miseries to one whom they know, and whom they see every day. Monsignor Falcoia, Bishop of Castellamara, who formerly belonged to the Institute of Pious Workers, and who was the first director of our Congregation,[13732] said that after having spent forty years in the missions when in certain places there are few missionaries, the mission is conducive to the ruin rather than to the saving of souls. He does not speak thus without a reason; for the exercises of the mission rouse consciences, and those that before were quiet and in good faith, after having heard the instructions and the sermons, begin to have a thousand doubts. Now if these souls have not the opportunity to confide their scruples, of which they feel ashamed, to strange confessors, since they feel a repugnance to manifest them to those of the place, and find themselves in bad faith on account of the doubts that they now have, they will make sacrilegious confessions, and will lose their souls in consequence of the mission.

For myself, in the missions that I had to conduct when I had not a number of missionaries in proportion to that of the faithful of the place, I found it better not to give the mission, and to give it at another place for which the number of confessors was sufficient; for when it becomes necessary to call the resident priests to hear confessions, all or most of the sacrileges that exist will continue to exist. If many souls, overcome by shame, continue to confess sacrilegiously when even confessing to us missionaries, although we do not know them, and we are soon to leave them, what hopes will there be that they will rid themselves of their shame when they confess to the same confessors of the place or of the neighborhood that know them? One cannot say that these persons, having then an opportunity to confess to strangers, will leave those of the place; for while seeing their ordinary confessor in the confessional, they will feel too great a repugnance to allow themselves to be seen going to a stranger, and they thus continue to commit sacrileges.

It is, therefore, always expedient for the bishop to suspend from the power of hearing confessions during the mission all the priests of the place where the mission is given. If the bishop does not do this, let at least the missionary who gives the exercises to the priests beg the confessors of the place to be kind enough to allow their penitents during this time the liberty of confessing to the missionaries, and even to impose this upon them by virtue of obedience, because it is not a rare thing that persons of whom one thinks the least are precisely those that need this the most.

Our confessors should here take notice that, although it is not necessary to have every one to make a general confession, especially if one is pressed for time, and a large number of persons must confess, yet, when the penitent asks to make a general confession, there being a necessity of making it, because the preceding confessions were sacrilegious or invalid, one should allow them to make it by distinguishing the species and the number of sins as exactly as one can. If one, however does not see that the preceding confessions have been certainly null, one should permit the penitent to say what he wishes, and should afterwards put this question to him: Well, now, do you accuse yourself of all the sinful thoughts, words, etc., which you committed from your youth?—But one should take care to let him say so; otherwise not receiving the satisfaction that he expected in making a general confession, he will, as often happens, go to other missionaries, and much time will be lost.

The missionaries should, finally, observe that during the mission, especially when there is a great concourse at the confessionals, it is not necessary to stop too long to examine and to instruct devout souls in the matter of advancing in perfection. This is not the opportune moment to occupy one's self with the care of such a thing, when other souls are waiting to be delivered from the miserable state of damnation in which they find themselves.

III—During the sermon, and even during the instruction, it would be well if one ceased to hear confessions, first, because the noise that is made by the preacher's voice will prevent the confessor from hearing the words of the penitent, and the penitent from hearing the words of the confessor; so that the confessions take up twice the usual time, and also leave behind them trouble and disquietude. Moreover, in order that the mission may produce its fruit, it is necessary for every one to hear the great or principal sermon, which is its most important exercise. Now when confessions are heard during the sermon, it happens that this exercise is lost, not only to the persons that confess, but also to all those that surround the confessional, and who, desirous of confessing soon, will think only of entering the confessional as soon as possible; thus preoccupied, they pay but little attention to the sermon. Hence for one person that is confessing, there are twenty or thirty others who, while waiting for their turn, lose the fruit of the sermon; and besides, by the noise that they make in entering the confessional, they disturb the preacher and the whole audience.

IV.—Before beginning the mission we should obtain from the bishop all the powers necessary for producing fruit, as the power of absolving cases reserved to the bishop, either Nobis or A nobis, also with the censure, as also the communication of the chapter Liceat, and the faculty of dispensing from vows, oaths, and impediments of marriage. Moreover, no mission should be accepted except at the request of the inhabitants of the place, or at least of the parish priest.

V. The mission usually lasts twelve days, of which the first eight are devoted to moral sermons and the Last Things, the three following days to the exercise of a devout life and the last to the blessing. In small places it lasts at least ten days, of which seven are for the sermons, two for the exercise, and the last for the blessing. But in large places, with a population of four thousand or more souls, the mission should be prolonged as long as it is necessary; it has happened to us that we continued it for eighteen, twenty-four, and even thirty-six days, as at Foggia. In a word, the Superior should see that the mission be continued till he can prudently judge that all the faithful have had time to confess.

VI.—It must be remarked that the missions should not be renewed too frequently in the same place; it is expedient that they be given at an interval of at least three or four years. If in the second mission one does not see the minds of the people as much moved as they were in the first mission it does not follow that it is less fruitful. When a mission is given in a place where there has been none for a number of years, it always produces a more lively impression than a second one given at an interval of three or four years; but if the minds are less moved, the fruit derived is often greater: those that have relapsed into sin enter again the right path; and those that have persevered are confirmed more in that which is good.

VII.—In conclusion, I find it proper to quote some other excellent counsels, which the venerable Father Segneri, the great missionary of Italy, has left for the good direction of missions and of missionaries.

1. The confessions of women should be heard only in the confessionals.

2. Public confessions, especially of women, should not be permitted. Nor should enemies be allowed to ask the pardon of their adversaries before the parties have been well disposed for reconciliation.

3. The confessors should not without necessity charge themselves with making personally restitution for their penitents; and in the case in which the latter would not intrust the matter to others, one should at least take care to procure a receipt from him to whom the restitution is made.

4. Without some special necessity, one should avoid collecting alms for the poor; also one should accept no money to distribute as alms, as this gives rise to troubles and to calumnies.—I add that one should also avoid meddling in certain temporal affairs, which, although useful to some, may injure or displease others; for this may be the cause of wicked talk and destroy for many the fruits of the mission.

5. The missionaries should not disperse among the different houses to take their meals or their rest.

6. The mission finished, they should depart immediately and refuse every invitation to remain in order to rest themselves.

7. They should not trouble themselves if they see that obstacles are being put in the way to hinder the success of the mission, and they should not be discouraged if at the beginning they meet with a poor reception, for they should rest assured that in the end they will win the affection of all.

8. As a reward for all their labors and all their sufferings, they should expect (admirable advice) on the part of men, contempt, detraction, and ingratitude; for this is the usual reward of those that labor only for the glory of God.

Chapter XI

THE DUTIES OF THE SUPERIOR OF THE MISSION

I. On arriving at the place where the mission is to be given, the Superior fixes the hours of the exercises and of all other matters, in the following manner:[13733] Leaving the house in the morning at 13 o'clock; return home at 19 o'clock (midday). Instruction and catechism (these two exercises begin at the same time), at 22 o'clock. Sermon at 23 o'clock. Supper at 3.30. Examination of conscience before going to bed at 4.30. Retiring at 5 o'clock.

Such is the time-table that is usually followed during winter, which is besides the season most suitable for missions.—I use the word usually, for when there is a concourse of penitents, we remain in the confessional for seven hours in the morning, our custom being not to hear confessions in the afternoon, and no missionary can leave the church without the permission of the Superior.—I have also used the words during winter; for in spring there are not seven hours of sleep, but six, or at least six and a half, because then we have an hour or an hour and a half of sleep after dinner. At this season we rise at about 8 o'clock, and we go to bed at night at 1 or at 1.30 o'clock; half an hour having elapsed after rising, we go at once to the church, the meditation at this time of the year following the rest given after dinner. In winter after the half hour given for rising, and during which all should observe silence, we make a half-hour's meditation, which should never be omitted; then we go at once to the church.

At table when all are seated in order, silence is always observed, and the Life of a saint is read, the Superior beginning by reading a little, and the others continuing the same one after the other. In the evening, however, it suffices if one of the missionaries reads a little while out of a book treating of the Blessed Virgin.

As regards the food, it must be observed that nothing edifies the people so much as the mortification and the frugality of the missionaries, while on the contrary nothing scandalizes them more than when they see men treating themselves well in regard to eating and drinking. During the mission the people are always curious to know what the missionaries eat; and in certain places where a mission had been given several years before, we have found persons who related with indignation that the missionaries had themselves well treated by living on fowl, choice fruit, with foreign wines, and the like. In another place of this kingdom a mission was given by good preachers and good confessors; but I was told that very little good was done, because the missionaries had a first-class table. Hence in our missions it is an established rule, that at dinner on days on which flesh-meat is allowed there is to be given only soup with boiled meat, and on fasting-days soup with another frugal portion; at supper, salad and other similar food, with a little cheese and fruit. Only on the last day, the day of the blessing, there may be more food, but never fowl, game, choice fish, pastry, or other sweetmeats. The subjects should wait at table, each one in his turn, according as they are appointed by the Father Econome.

After dinner and after supper there will be a half-hour's recreation. As soon as the time of recreation has passed, the missionaries are exhorted to cease their pleasantries and all useless discourse, and each one should attend to the duties of his employment; those that are free should occupy themselves with hearing confessions till the hour of instruction, of prayer, or of study. During the instruction and the sermon those that have some exercise to give on the following day should strive to prepare themselves as well as possible for it. Besides, unless any one has received from the Superior permission to remain at the house, all the missionaries, especially those that are young, if they have no other occupation, should be present at the instruction, or at least at the great sermon. After the sermon and the discipline they all retire to the house, where they hear the confessions of the men till the hour for supper.

In all these observances the Superior should endeavor to set the example, being the first especially in rising at the signal in the morning, in retiring in the evening to go to bed, in keeping silence, and in hearing confessions; for if he fails in his duty he will easily see that the others will also fail, and what is worse, by failing himself he will not have the courage to reprove others.

II. The Superior should appoint the missionaries for each exercise of the mission, namely, one for the sermon, another for the instruction; one for the meditation in the morning, another for the catechism, which is usually given by the Prefect of the church. The latter should take care to notify the priests of the hour in which they may say Mass, one after the other, in order that they may not come together to say Mass at the last hour.

The Superior also appoints a missionary for the exercises that are to be given to the priests, and another for giving them separately to the seminarians, if there is a seminary in the place; for if the seminarians are present at the exercises of the priests they will profit very little.

Moreover, he appoints one to give in the morning separate exercises to the gentlemen in some chapel or other place of meeting. These special exercises are of great benefit to the instructed persons of the place, because in certain places such people hardly attend the mission; but when the exercises are expressly given to them, they all usually attend them. Then when we speak familiarly with them and ad cor, many give themselves to God, and their good example leads to the reform of the entire population.

He should, likewise, appoint some one to give the exercises to the nuns or religious Communities, if there are such in the place, and if they request to have them; but they should not be offered to them nor should any engagement be made with them.

Another Father should be appointed by him to give the exercises to the prisoners, and to hear their confessions.
